START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

APRIL 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-028

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholar-ship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 28

Volume 52

BSO,Pops
U.S. Tour
1929-1930

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

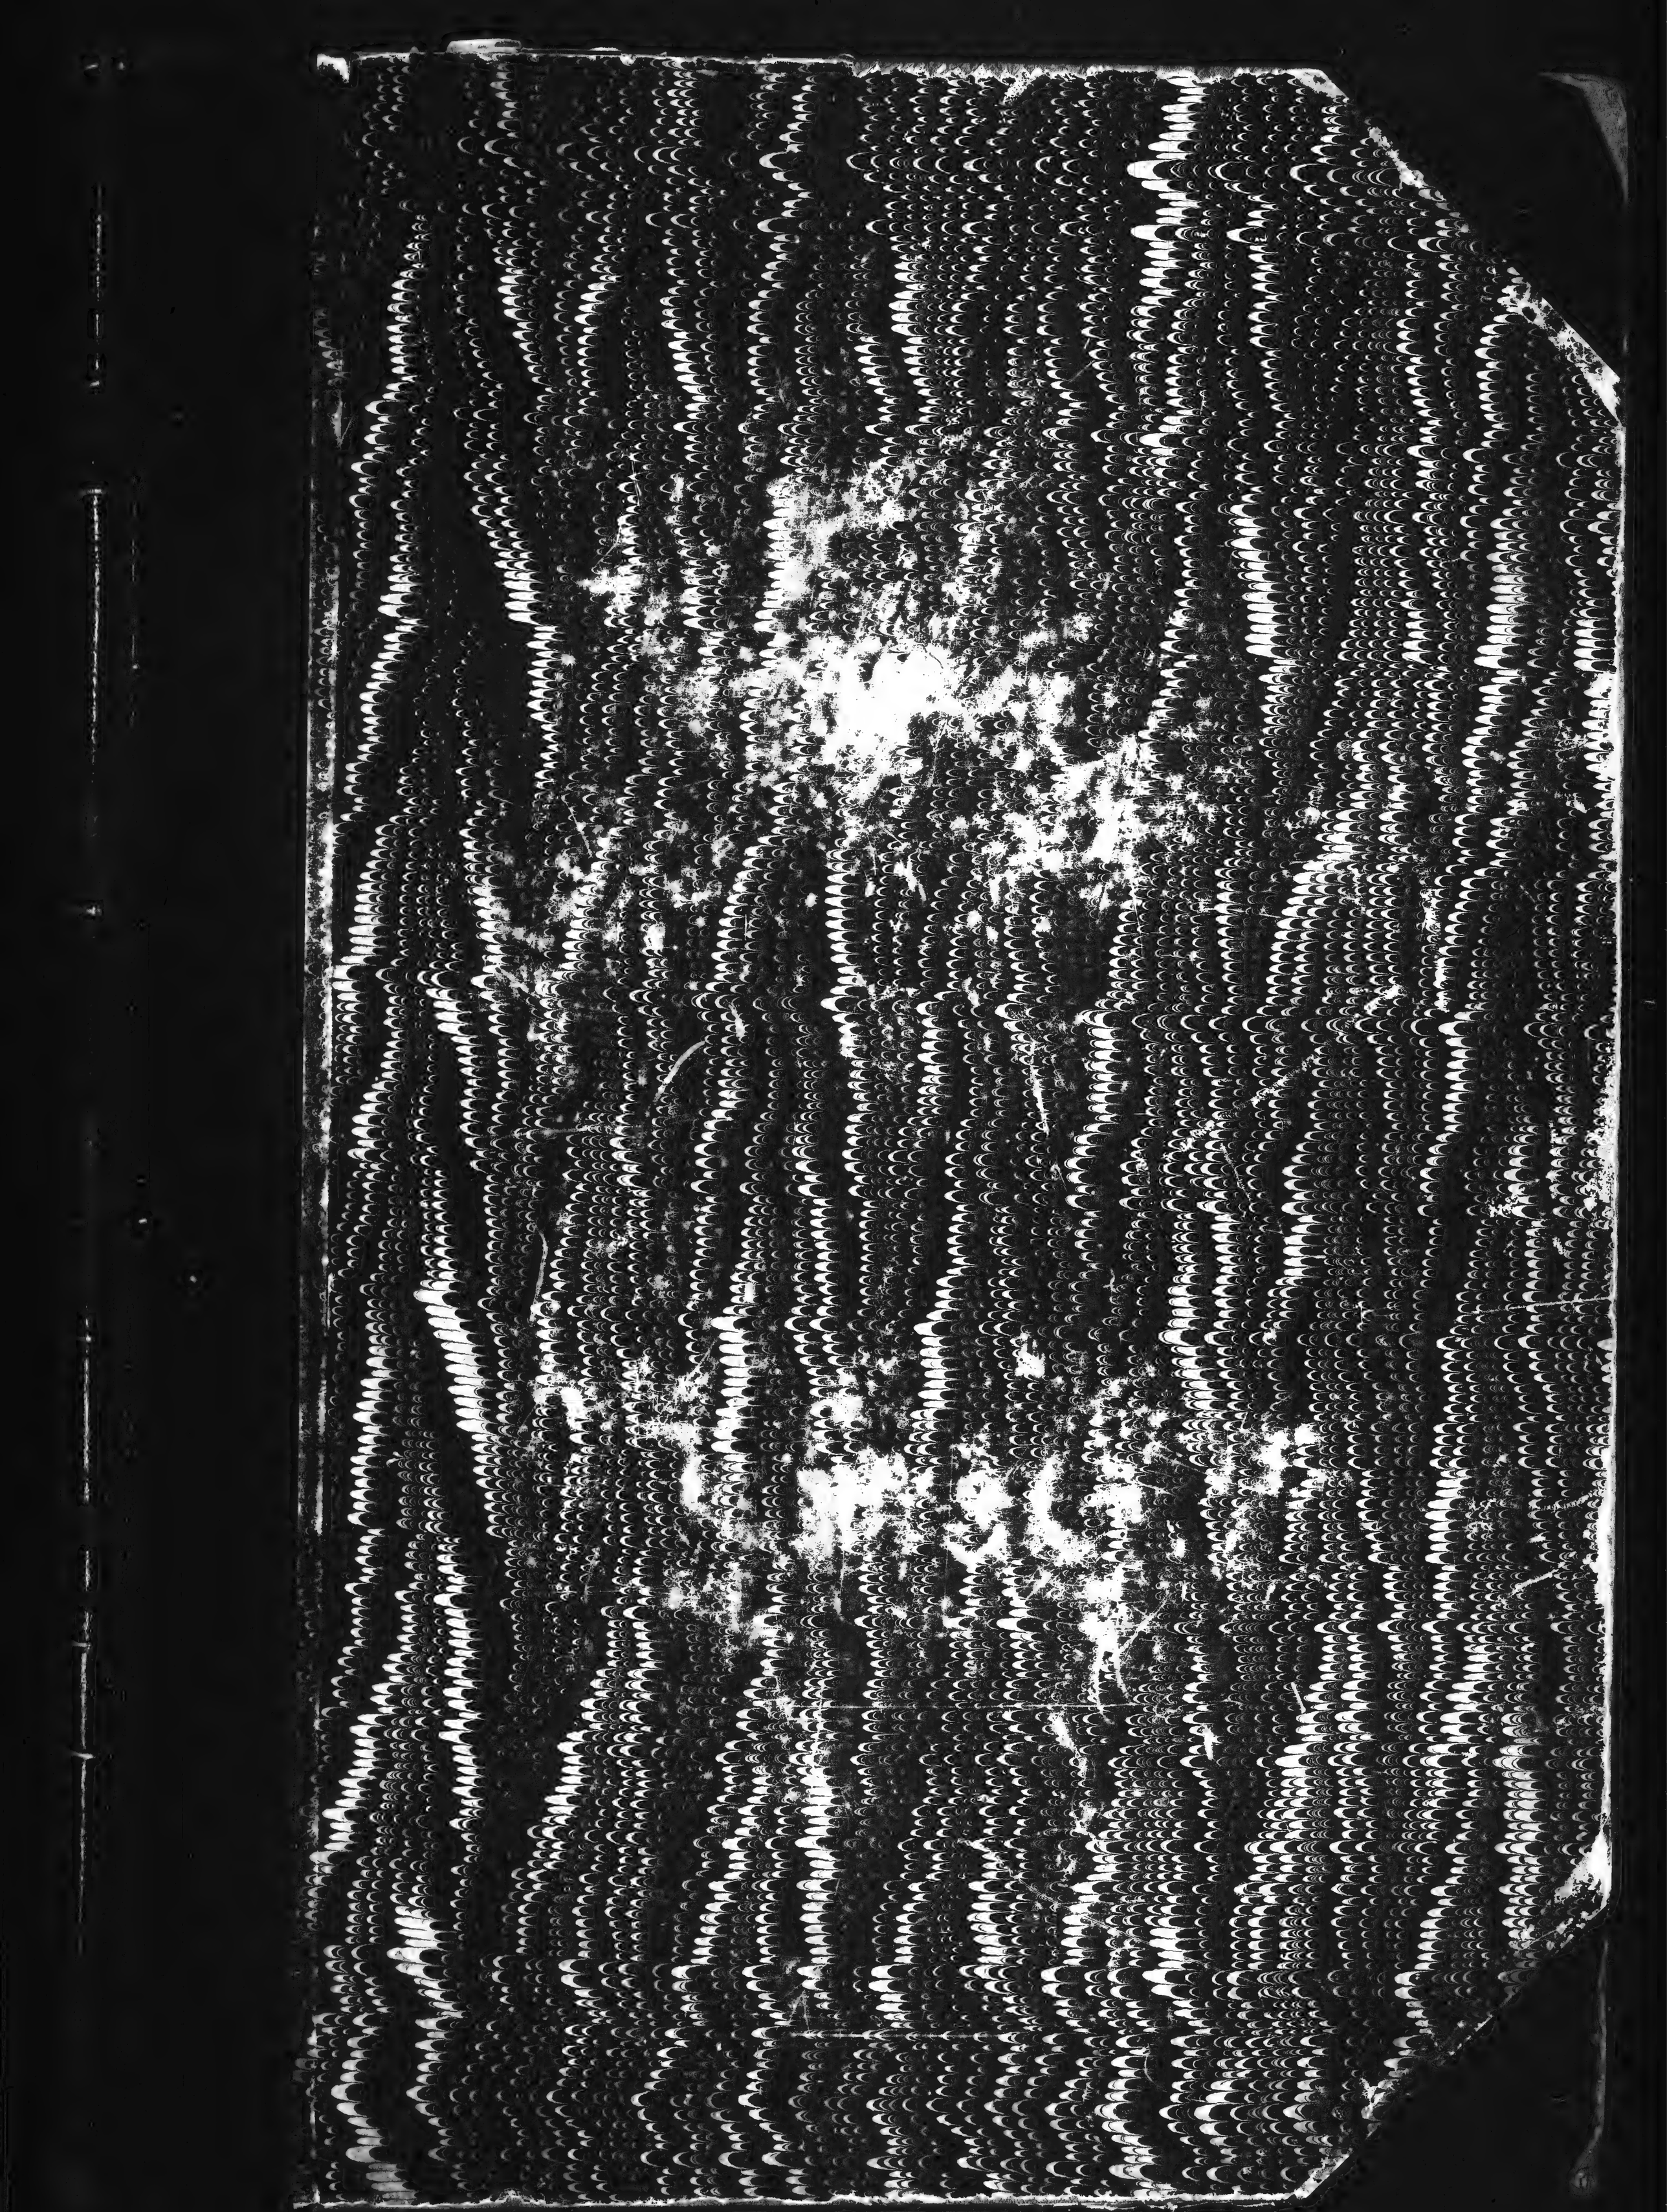
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 52

BSO
Pops
U.S. Tour

1929 - 1930



Providence Concert (Nov. 19) see page 158

Western Trip (Nov. 1929) — page 140
Opening New York Concert — " 122
Boston criticisms (Nov.) — " 112
Brahms Festival " 101

HILL, SMITH & Co.
(INC.)
STATIONERS AND BLANK BOOK
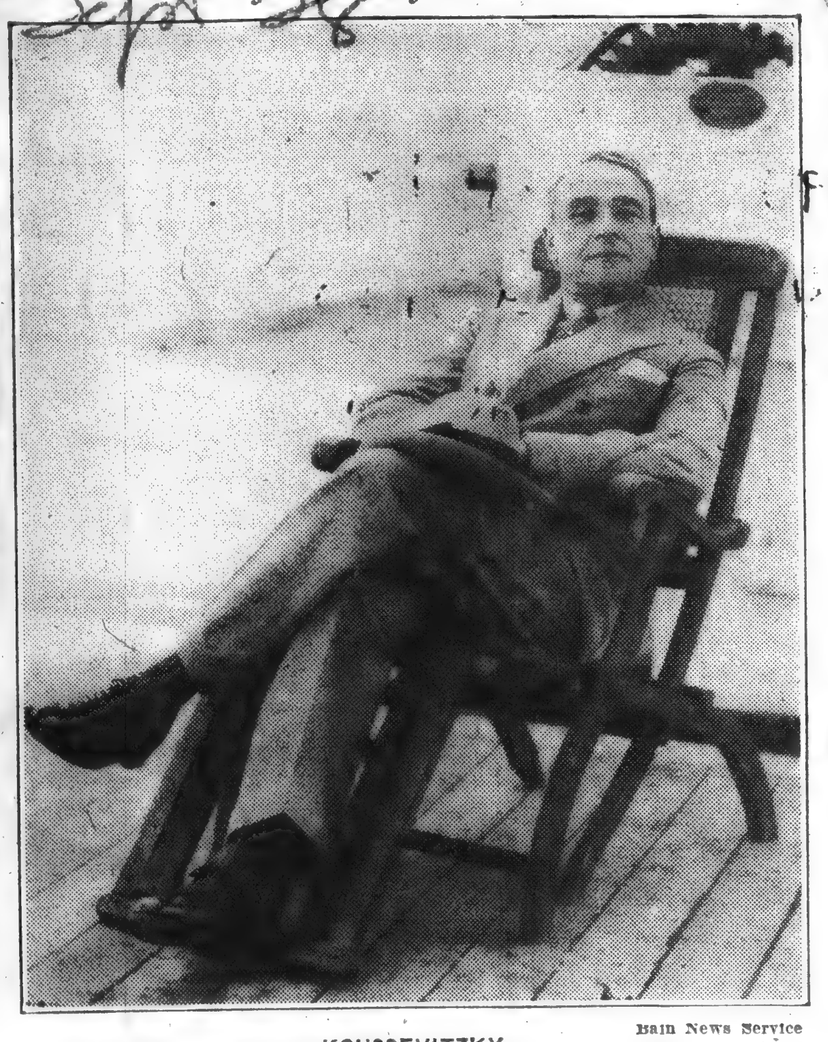
MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET
OLD SOUTH BUILDING
BOSTON
Job No. K1887
Duplicate this book by sending the above number

Boston - Sept. October - General

Post Sept 28, 1929

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, S

A Symphony in Smiles



KOUSSEVITZKY — Bain News Service

Koussevitzky Home, Goes Looking, With Madame, for Place to Live

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came home yesterday to Boston, at least as much as a man may come home who must hurry directly from the train on a house-hunting expedition. By this time it is almost a classic of the Koussevitzky household that the first thing it does upon arriving in Boston after the European summer, is to hunt a house to spend the winter in.

You suspect it has got to be a little joke by now; madame comes on, a day or two ahead; she goes through the forms of looking to see what houses offer; monsieur comes along, and his first question is "Where are the houses we shall look at, and where is the car to take us there?" and away they go in a motor, driving up to and away from front doors until they find a house behind one of the front doors from which they need not drive away because it suits them.

In 1924 Koussevitzky came a stranger to Boston to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. None except Symphony officers, knew much about him except that he was Russian and bore a great reputation as a musician.

That Gray First Day

It was a gray day, that first one; Koussevitzky and Madame stood on the platform of the incredibly old and dirty Back Bay Station, and gazed at each other, and at a circle of reporters, unhappy in the knowledge of the price of having no English to speak of, or with, as you please. Koussevitzky smiled timidly, and twiddled his stick, and murmured deprecatingly, "Mesdames, Messieurs . . ." and it was pretty hard going for everyone.

But now what happens? Koussevitzky returns to Boston for his sixth season. He does not come a stranger, but as a man coming home, after a summer in Europe. Every year since the first there have been a few more words of English, and six times a few words . . . equals a feeling of some assurance as well as a pretty usable vocabulary. Madame is on the platform, with Mr. Judd, and Mr. Brennan and Mr. Burke of the Symphony Hall staff, and a dark, gay young man.

The train slides in; Koussevitzky, grinning cheerfully, is out in the vestibule; he and the last bag the porter hands down from the mountain on the step make the platform of a new, clean Back Bay station as a man makes a hole in one, and with about the same expression. He beams. He salutes Madame affectionately, Madame whose grave, pallid face shows a sudden little flickering smile. Then, with high verve he embraces all the men. It might be the Gare du Nord. It would please Frenchmen, that scene, but it grieves the porters who evidently do not wish to see Continental ways get any foothold in Boston.

"Ah, But I Am Glad"

"Ah, but I am glad, . . ." exclaims Koussevitzky, his eyes glittering with excitement. Not much like the first gray day. . . . Madame allows nothing to dislodge the idea of the house-hunting. . . . Her eyes follow a porter bearing a bass viol, its waterproof striped and blotched with steamship labels. Le Havre . . . Paris. S. S. Beren . . . bits of marine blue and brick red and white, tattered and overlapping each other. . . .

"The house? Have you a house to look to . . . at?" says Koussevitzky, his arm thrown over the shoulder of the dark, gay young man. A porter, looking askance, seizes more luggage than he is willing to carry and begins to stagger away with it. . . . One cannot think of two things at once. . . .

The parade starts. A little parade, along the platform to the elevator. Koussevitzky will speak with a reporter. "But I haf—haVE—so little to say. Yesterday, in New York, I haf—haVE—say somesing. . . ."

"And the name of the composer for the Symphony festival?" he is asked. In New York he wagged a finger when he was asked that and said, "Ah, but not yet, not yet." To ask him in a hurry might fetch the name from him before he thought. A little trick, but Koussevitzky is, at heart, a cheerful name, and if he gives up the name without meaning to, well. . . . But the little trick is no good. Again the wagging finger.

"No, I shall not gif—giVE—it you. Not yet."

"When?"

"I—don't know." The smile of a man who warms himself cheerfully at the little fire of a good secret.

"Soon?"

"I don't know. You — shall see. . . ."

"Well then, the program for the first concert?"

Beethoven Leads First Program

"Yes, that. You may have that. I think that will make up to you for the other, yes? Well, Beethoven. The overture from 'Egmont.' You know? And then a prelude and a fugue from Pick-Mangiagalli. And then La Mer, Debussy. Trois Exquisses Symphoniques. Ver' nice. . . . And then the Beethoven Five Symphony. You see?"

The little parade was moving well along toward the elevator. Koussevitzky's stick tap-tapping. . . . Madame anxious, thinking houses. Last year, a house. The year before, a house. The other years, a house. They say the Koussevitzkys will buy a house, or build a house, but the Koussevitzkys always seem to hunt a house belonging to someone else in the autumn. Regularly as leaves falling.

The house must be near a park, or by a lake because Koussevitzky walks, in the morning, in the wind, in the dark when stars pin the sky's velvet securely together. The elevator is there. The porters with the luggage. Koussevitzky's arm around the shoulders of the dark, gay young man still. . . . Smiles, smiles, smiles. All but Madame.

"We must go to see this, and this, and another, before dinner. The car is here. Where is the viol. Had you a good journey. Pray heaven we shall select one of the three houses. . . . Good-by, good-by. . . ."

And the Koussevitzkys, home, but homeless in Boston, go to hunt a house.

WEATHER PREDICTIONS

U. S. WEATHER BUREAU REPORT

Boston and Vicinity: Fair and somewhat warmer tonight; Sunday partly cloudy; moderate shifting winds, mostly south or southwest.

Southern New England: Generally fair and [illegible] tonight; Sunday [illegible] probably followed by showers; [illegible] shifting winds becoming south [illegible] cloudy

1929

KOUSSEVITSKY BACK WITH NEW MUSIC

Symphony Conductor Arrives On Ile de France

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

NEW YORK, Sept. 24—The seasonal future of the Boston Symphony seems to be assured, for Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, its conductor, has returned from Europe for his annual American pilgrimage. He arrived today, on the Ile de France and paused for a few remarks before taking the train for Philadelphia, whence he will go to Boston.

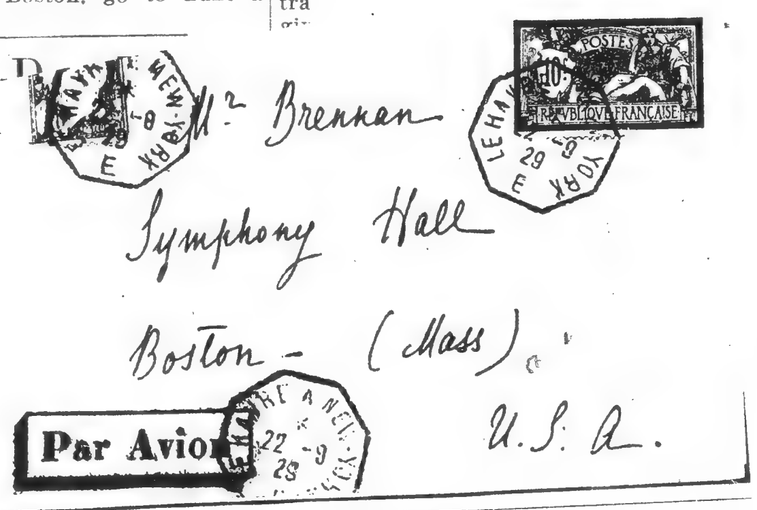
He promises new works for Boston this year, a promise he has kept in former seasons. He will produce a few works of standard heritage, so far withheld from the chill scrutiny of American audiences; also a few more previously tagged as "modernistic." Among the latter are a symphony by Aaron Copeland, a piece by Werner Josten, and a new Prokofieff creation, "Ballet de l'Enfant Prodigue."

"But the most wonderful thing of all, said Mr. Koussevitsky, "is a work by Spohr which I found in Berlin, a concerto for wind instruments. Richard Strauss recommended it to me."

N SCIENCE MONITOR,

s Winged Letter

Door-to-D



SHIP TO SHORE MAIL AIRPLANE LANDS IN BOSTON

Koussevitzky Letter Is One of Consignment From Ile de France

Airmail from the Ile de France, including a letter from Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the manager of the orchestra, was received at the East Boston Airport on the afternoon of Sept. 23, a whole day before the liner docked at New York, and served to accentuate the announcement of the French Line and the North German Lloyd that they definitely plan to make Boston a permanent port of entry for European mails.

M. Koussevitsky's letter came too late for afternoon delivery, but still reached Symphony Hall on the morning of Sept. 24, several hours before the Ile de France docked in New York. It was part of a large consignment of mail brought from the liner by Lieut. Leon Domergue, which was in plenty of time to be put on the Merchants' Limited express for New York, or aboard the evening air-mail planes for that city. The Koussevitsky letter was addressed to William H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The delivery was the second successful attempt of the French Line, and elaborate plans are announced by the North German-Lloyd for a regular service. As soon as their new steamship, the Europa, is completed and the re-engined Columbus is in service, the two lines will have in all about one plane every week reaching Boston with mail, it is expected. Extension of the ship-to-shore service is planned by the French Line, whereby the mail destined for New England can be landed at Boston and the same plane then continue on to New York with the balance of the ship mail.

C. H. Bockelmann, assistant general passenger agent of the French Line, is in Washington to arrange with postal authorities for this expansion, which is not possible because postal regulations require that all foreign mail be landed at the port of entry.

Boston is more than 200 miles nearer Europe than is New York, Mr. Bockelmann pointed out, and is also nearer the position of the ocean steamers on their inbound voyage when it is most practicable to make a hop.

For the present the seaplane will be catapulted from the Ile de France every 21 days when that vessel is approaching the New England coast, and efforts will be made to continue the service the year round. It is planned eventually to add a passenger ship-to-shore service. Should this take place, Boston will be made an official airport port of entry, which would alter the existing customs status and place Boston in the same position with several convenient points in the United States which already have that privilege. Efforts to secure this rating for Boston have heretofore been unavailing, since it was objected that Boston had lacked a regular air service from foreign countries.

Radio Tonight

NOVELTIES LISTED FOR SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Returns With New Pieces to Be Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans. Thus spoke Serge Koussevitsky, yesterday afternoon, as, just arrived from New York, he talked of the season's plans at the Hotel Hemenway, his temporary Boston residence.

FOUR EXPERT SAXOPHONES

By way of illustrating what these same youthful Americans can do Mr. Koussevitzky will proffer during the course of Symphony concerts, soon to begin, a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Werner Josten and Roger Sessions, all in their initial performances, together with a piece that has particularly struck the conductor's fancy, Samuel Gardner's "Broadway." This "Broadway," let it be known, requires four expert performers upon the saxophone, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky believes, can at present yield but three of the requisite virtuosity, although he is confident that in one way or another this difficulty can be overcome.

There will, of course, be European novelties too: a Concerto Grosso by the Rumanian, Lazar, whose name has twice appeared upon Mr. Koussevitzky's programmes; the Third Symphony of Prokofieff; a Prelude and Fugue by the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, a new name at the Symphony concerts; and a suite of Bach transcriptions drawn from the ballet made by Honegger for Ida Rubinstein from the Leipzig Cantor's music. In general Mr. Koussevitzky says that he "detests" transcriptions from Bach, but Honegger's are too charming to be resisted.

Mahler's Ninth

The older, established composers will furnish novelties, too. For the first time Boston will hear Mahler's Ninth Symphony and his "Kindertotenlieder," a cycle of five songs with orchestra; also a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which had lain in the archives of the Berlin State Opera until Richard Straus last Summer commended the work to Mr. Koussevitzky's attention. Forthwith Mr. Koussevitzky had the manuscript copied for his own and Boston's benefit.

From the music of Strauss himself will come a revival of "Don Quixote," from Bruckner the unfinished Ninth Symphony, from Debussy the incidental music to d'Annunzio's "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," the choral portions of which will be heard here for the first time.

Begin With Short Pieces

The programmes of the season will follow a "system" the exact nature of which Mr. Koussevitzky prefers, for the time being, to keep a secret. A hint of it, however, he did disclose, a short piece will begin and a symphony conclude each of the first three programmes, from the respective hands of Beethoven, Sibelius and Tchaikovsky. In detail the first list runs: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmot;" Pick-Man,-giagalli, Prelude and Fugue; Debussy, "La Mer;" Beethoven, Symphony No. 5.

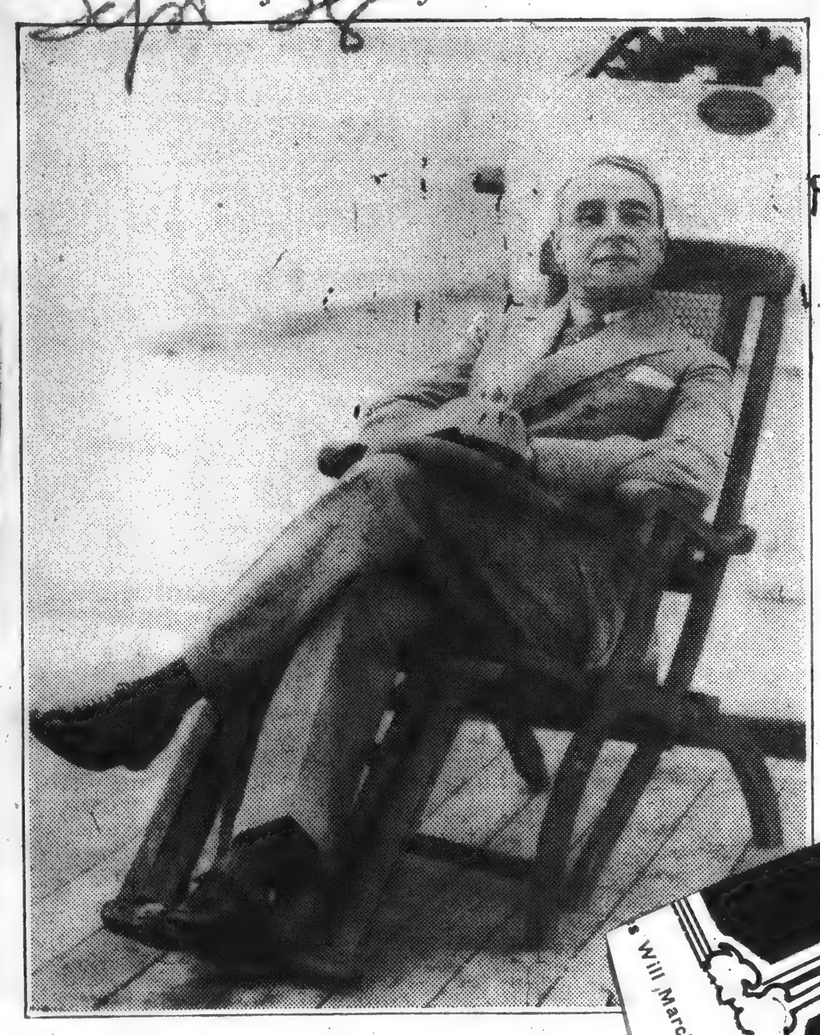
The summer just past found Mr. Koussevitzky in Paris, in Berlin, where he attended a festival of Straussian opera, and elsewhere in Europe in the pursuit of first of recreation. He reached New York last Tuesday on his favorite ship the Ile de France. On Friday next he assembles the Boston orchestra for its first rehearsal, and the first concerts of the season will be on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12.

GOLD DIGGER

Boston - Sept and October - General

Sept 28, 1929

A Symphony in Smiles



KOUSSEVITZKY

Will March and Crowds Throng in the Bril

Koussevitzky Home, Goes L
With Madame, for Place

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came home yesterday to Boston, at least as much as a man may come home who must hurry directly from the train on a house-hunting expedition. By this time it is almost a classic of the Koussevitzky household that the first thing it does upon arriving in Boston after the European summer, is to hunt a house to spend the winter in.

You suspect it has got to be a little joke by now; madame comes on, a day or two ahead; she goes through the forms of looking to see what houses offer; monsieur comes along, and his first question is "Where are the houses we shall look at, and where is the car to take us there?" and away they go in a motor, driving up to and away from front doors until they find a house behind one of the front doors from which they need not drive away because it suits them.

In 1924 Koussevitzky came a stranger to Boston to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. None except Symphony officers, knew much about him except that he was Russian and bore a great reputation as a musician.

That Gray First Day

It was a gray day, that first one; Koussevitzky and Madame stood on the platform of the incredibly old and dirty Back Bay Station, and gazed at each other, and at a circle of reporters, unhappy in the knowledge of the price of having no English to speak of, or with, as you please. Koussevitzky smiled timidly, and twiddled his stick, and murmured deprecatingly, "Mesdames, Messieurs . . ." and it was pretty hard going for everyone.

But now what happens? Koussevitzky returns to Boston for his sixth season. He does not co... but as a man coming h... summer in Europe. Ever... the first there have been a few more words of English, and six times a few words . . . equals a feeling of some assurance as well as a pretty usable vocabulary. Madame is on the platform, with Mr. Judd, and Mr. Brennan and Mr. Burke of the Symphony Hall staff, and a dark, gay young man.

The train slides in; Koussevitzky, grinning cheerfully, is out in the vestibule; he and the last bag the porter hands down from the mountain on the step make the platform of a new, clean Back Bay station as a man makes a hole in one, and with about the same expression. He beams. He salutes Madame affectionately, Madame whose grave, pallid face shows a sudden little flickering smile. Then, with high verve he embraces all the men. It might be the Gare du Nord. It would please Frenchmen, that scene, but it grieves the porters who evidently do not wish to see Continental ways get any foothold in Boston.

"Ah, But I Am Glad"

"Ah, but I am glad, . . ." exclaims Koussevitzky, his eyes glittering with excitement. Not much like the first gray day. . . . Madame allows nothing to dislodge the idea of the house-hunting. . . . Her eyes follow a porter bearing a bass viol, its waterproof striped and blotched with steamship labels. Le Havre . . . Paris. S. S. Beren . . . bits of marine blue and brick red and white, tattered and overlapping each other. . . .

"The house? Have you a house to look to . . . at?" says Koussevitzky, his arm thrown over the shoulder of the dark, gay young man. A porter, looking askance, seizes more luggage than he is willing to carry and begins to stagger away with it. . . . One cannot think of two things at once. . . .

The parade starts. A little parade, along the platform to the elevator. Koussevitzky will speak with a reporter. "But I haf—haVE—so little to say. Yesterday, in New York, I haf—haVE—say somesing. . . ."

"And the name of the composer for the Symphony festival?" he is asked. In New York he wagged a finger when he was asked that and said, "Ah, but not yet, not yet." To ask him in a hurry might fetch the name from him before he thought. A little trick, but Koussevitzky is, at heart, a cheerful name, and if he gives up the name without meaning to, well. . . . But the little trick is no good. Again the wagging finger.

"No, I shall not gif—giVE—it you. Not yet."

"When?"

"I—don't know." The smile of a man who warms himself cheerfully at the little fire of a good secret.

"Soon?"

"I don't know. You — shall see. . . ."

"Well then, the program for the first concert?"

Beethoven Leads First Program

"Yes, that. You may have that. I think that will make up to you for the other, yes? Well, Beethoven. The overture from 'Egmont.' You know? And then a prelude and a fugue from Pick-Mangiagalli. And then La Mer, Debussy. Trois Exquisses Symphoniques. Ver' nice. . . . And then the Beethoven Five Symphony. Yo... see?"

The little parade was m... along toward the elev... vitzky's stick tap... dame anxious... year, a h... hou...

WEATHER PREDICTIONS

U. S. Weather Bureau Report

Boston and Vicinity: Fair and somewhat warmer tonight; Sunday partly cloudy; moderate shifting winds, mostly south or southwest.

Southern New England: Generally fair and ... probably ... tonight; Sunday ... by showers; ... shifting winds becoming south ... partly cloudy

1929

KOUSSEVITSKY BACK WITH NEW MUSIC

Symphony Conductor Arrives On Ile de France

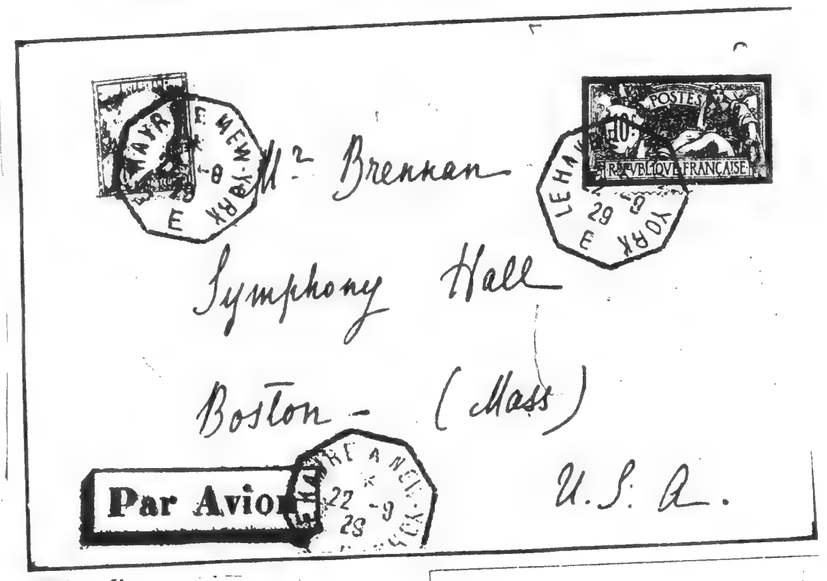
[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

NEW YORK, Sept. 24—The seasonal future of the Boston Symphony seems to be assured, for Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, its conductor, has returned from Europe for his annual American pilgrimage. He arrived today, on the Ile de France and paused for a few remarks before taking the train for Philadelphia, whence he will go to Boston.

He promises new works for Boston this year, a promise he has kept in former seasons. He will produce a few works of standard heritage, so far withheld from the chill scrutiny of American audiences; also a few more previously tagged as "modernistic." Among the latter are a symphony by Aaron Copeland, a piece by Werner Josten, and a new Prokofieff creation, "Ballet de l'Enfant Prodigue.

"But the most wonderful thing of all, said Mr. Koussevitsky, "is a work by Spohr which I found in Berlin, a concerto for wind instruments. Richard Strauss recommended it to me."

Koussevitzky's Winged Letter



SHIP TO SHORE MAIL AIRPLANE LANDS IN BOSTON

Koussevitzky Letter Is One of Consignment From Ile de France

Airmail from the Ile de France, including a letter from Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the manager of the orchestra, was received at the East Boston Airport on the afternoon of Sept. 23, a whole day before the liner docked at New York, and served to accentuate the announcement of the French Line and the North German Lloyd that they definitely plan to make Boston a permanent port of entry for European mails.

M. Koussevitsky's letter came too late for afternoon delivery, but still reached Symphony Hall on the morning of Sept. 24, several hours before the Ile de France docked in New York. It was part of a large consignment of mail brought from the liner by Lieut. Leon Domergue, which was in plenty of time to be put on the Merchants' Limited express for New York, or aboard the evening air-mail planes for that city. The Koussevitsky letter was addressed to William H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The delivery was the second successful attempt of the French Line, and elaborate plans are announced by the North German-Lloyd for a regular service. As soon as their new steamship, the Europa, is completed and the re-engined Columbus is in service, the two lines will have in all about one plane every week reaching Boston with mail, it is expected. Extension of the ship-to-shore service is planned by the French Line, whereby the mail destined for New England can be landed at Boston and the same plane then continue on to New York with the balance of the ship mail.

C. H. Bockelmann, assistant general passenger agent of the French Line, is in Washington to arrange with postal authorities for this expansion, which is not possible because postal regulations require that all foreign mail be landed at the port of entry.

Boston is more than 200 miles nearer Europe than is New York, Mr. Bockelmann pointed out, and is also nearer the position of the ocean steamers on their inbound voyage when it is most practicable to make a hop.

For the present the seaplane will be catapulted from the Ile de France every 21 days when that vessel is approaching the New England coast, and efforts will be made to continue the service the year round. It is planned eventually to add a passenger ship-to-shore service. Should this take place, Boston will be made an official airport port of entry, which would alter the existing customs status and place Boston in the same position with several convenient points in the United States which already have that privilege. Efforts to secure this rating for Boston have heretofore been unavailing, since it was objected that Boston had lacked a regular air service from foreign countries.

Radio Tonight

Sept 28, 1929

NOVELTIES LISTED FOR ...PHONY

...ky Returns
...w Pieces
...Played

...OREY SMITH
...rican composers than the young ...refer the young ...ke Serge Kous... ...ernoon, as, just ...k, he talked of ...he Hotel Hem... ...r Boston resi...

...XOPHONES
...ng what these ...hs can do Mr. ...er during the ...icerts, soon to ...Aaron Copland ...er Josten and ...eir initial per... ...a piece that ...he conductor's ... "Broadway," ...be known, re... ...mers upon the ...on Symphony ...zky believes, ...three of the ...ough he is ...y or another ...rcome. ...be European ...Co Grosso by ...ose name has ... Koussevitz... ...ird Symphony ...e and Fugue ...fangiagalli, a ...ny concerts; ...ranscriptions ...de by Hon... from the ...n general ...t he "de... Bach, but ...ng to be

...S TO FOR ...URY"

...losers will the first ...r's Ninth ...enlieder," ...orchestra; ...struments copy of ...es of the Richard ...nded, the attention had the ...own and

... himself Quixote," ...ed Ninth incidental ...artyrdom ...portions for the ...lone ...ces

...son will ...ature of ...ers, for A hint ...a short ...ay con... ...e pro... ...unds of ...kovsky. ...thoven, ...-Man, ...ebussy, ...No. 5. ...d Mr. where ...aussian ...in the ... He ...on his On Fri... Boston ...nd the ...be on Satur...

...hich was to have ... "Strange Inter...

...ts!

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony Season

The 49th season of Boston Symphony concerts, which will begin at Symphony Hall Friday, Oct 11, promises to be one of the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra. Despite an increase in the price of season tickets, particularly for the Friday series, every place has been taken by subscribers for the 24 Friday afternoons, the 24 Saturday evenings, and the six Monday evenings at Symphony Hall. The New York concerts of the Boston Symphony are again oversubscribed.

A few tickets may still be had for the six Tuesday afternoon concerts in Boston but it seems certain that these, like the other Boston series, will be completely sold out for the season. No city in the entire world supports its orchestra more enthusiastically than Boston. The receipts of the Boston Symphony from sales of tickets for its Boston concerts alone are over half a million dollars a season.

Not a little of the present popularity of the Boston Symphony must be ascribed to the personality of its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who returns for his sixth season here. Attendance at Boston Symphony concerts has for the entire period of their history been very large, but it is today larger than ever before. There is some difference of opinion among musicians about details of Mr Koussevitzky's conducting. But nobody will deny that it is always interesting and stimulating to listen to his highly personal and almost invariably eloquent interpretations of music old and new.

Copland's Symphony

Official announcement from Symphony Hall of plans for the coming season lists the following novelties: a new symphony by Aaron Copland, whom many regard as the most promising of living American composers; an obnoxious as the modernism of his musical style is to the bulk of conservative listeners; a new suite by Prokofieff, from his ballet "L'Enfant Prodigue"; and a new piece by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith College. Mr Koussevitsky will also, on the advice of Richard Strauss, perform a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, a composer whose music has been seldom revived in recent years.

It is reported on good authority that both Prokofieff and Stravinsky have been commissioned to write works for the Boston Symphony as part of its 50th anniversary celebration, in 1930; and that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, still hale and hearty at almost 80, will come from London and conduct as guest one or more numbers from the first program the orchestra played under his baton 50 years earlier.

These new works by Stravinsky and Prokofieff will, it is said, remain the exclusive property of the Boston Symphony, which will control them as it now does Ravel's brilliant arrangement of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," written some years ago at Mr Koussevitzky's request. No official announcement of the anniversary plans has yet been made, but it is said that they include festival performances of Bach's B minor mass, with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society assisting.

Mr Koussevitzky confided to interviewers the other day in New York on landing that he is planning a festival for next Spring, which will, it is said, be devoted to the music of Brahms, including presumably the Brahms "Requiem" as well as the four symphonies of that composer. But this is not yet officially announced.

It is a wholesome sign of the musical times that nothing has yet been said about soloists for the coming season. Mr Koussevitzky's policy is to use only instrumentalists, as a rule, and to engage them only when he wishes to put on the programs a work of great intrinsic value in which they are needed. At the majority of Boston Symphony concerts there is no soloist.

Fewer Soloists

In the old days soloists had to be hired to beguile people into subscribing to a Symphony series. But with a lengthy waiting list for the 1930-31 season and every place at the regular series taken far in advance for this season the orchestra no longer needs soloists as box office attractions. This is a great improvement.

Another improvement Mr Koussevitzky has made in the Symphony concerts is the abolition of applause between movements only in the case of concertos with outside soloists, whom it would be hardly courteous to deprive of the applause they invariably expect after each movement.

Mr Koussevitzky has as a rule performed more ultra modern music than any previous Boston Symphony conductor. He has not neglected the great classics, except for Mozart, with whose music he is not in sympathy to all appearances. But he has displaced composers like Smetana and Grieg from the repertory to make room for novelties, many of which have been disliked by the majority of the audiences at a first hearing. He remarked to an interviewer for the Globe in New York the other day that this season's programs would be "very different from last season's."

He did not explain what he meant, but remembering that during the latter half of last season there was very little new modernist music, owing perhaps to the remarkably cool reception given pieces by Hindemith and others at the beginning of the season; one infers that Koussevitzky is going back to his old way of giving the audience genuinely modern pieces whether or not they were popular with the majority.

One hopes that he is. If new music is not performed by such orchestras as the Boston Symphony, and performed frequently, the art of music will stagnate. Koussevitzky is unquestionably right in principle in performing modernist music. It is to be hoped that he will adhere to the plan he mentioned at first coming to ... ton of giving one, and only one, novelty on each program.

Plan for Boston Symphony Jubilee

Stravinsky and Prokoffiev Are Commissioned to Write for Semi-Centenary

One season more, and in the autumn of 1930 the Boston Symphony Orchestra enters upon its fiftieth year. Only one existing orchestra in America outdates it—the Philharmonic Society of New York with eighty years, there or thereabouts, upon its head. The celebration of this Bostonian jubilee will be large and trustees, conductor and managers are already laying plans. For beginning, Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract as conductor runs through the semi-centenary year, has commissioned new pieces from both Stravinsky and Prokoffiev. They will be written especially for the occasion and they will remain the exclusive property of the orchestra. Unquestionably Stravinsky is the dominant composer of our immediate day; Prokoffiev also sits high in the temple. To give them such commissions is also to re-affirm the liberal courses that through the last twenty-five years have been a chief glory of the orchestra. Celebrating the past, it does not forget to encourage the present.

There are high hopes also that the first conductor of the orchestra may share as well in this celebration of its fiftieth year; may even take the stage to lead it through one or another piece at a commemorative concert, probably a number from his first program. Though his years are many Sir George Henschel (as he later became) is still in excellent health with sufficient strength seemingly for Atlantic voyages and a quasi-festal visit. In London, where he now dwells, and even at his summer house in Scotland, eminent singers still come to him for advice and preparation. He gives both with the old zest. . . . Plausible report further has it that Mr. Koussevitzky will include in the jubilee concerts a performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, with the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe as chorus. It has not been heard in Boston for many years. But of this there is no official confirmation.

One American Killed

Concert-Chronicle

"New, First Times"

FROM Mr. Koussevitzky's ever-courteous hands, in sign of the beginning of a new musical year, comes a list of the new pieces upon his study-table or in mind for performance at the Symphony Concerts. The American items are:

Mason: "Chantecler" (Overture)
Gardner: "Broadway"
Copland: Symphony
Sessions: Symphony
Fairchild: "Chants Nègres"
Gruenberg: "Enchanted Isle"
Josten: "Jungle" (Poem for Orchestra)

A promising list! Mr. Mason's overture, produced last winter, runs in animated vein, everywhere has pleased exacting and unexacting ears. . . . "Broadway," tone-poem or tone-picture, composed by the former violinist, ranked second in the prize-competition won by Bloch's "America." . . . Mr. Copland and Mr. Sessions are the "rising hopes" of the younger generation of American composers. Steadily and with reason Mr. Koussevitzky has encouraged them. More than once at the Symphony Concerts they have justified this fostering. Mr. Blair Fairchild, American composer with a light hand who prefers Paris as dwelling place, is new to Symphony Hall. So also is Mr. Grünberg, though Bostonians have heard elsewhere one or two of his experiments in jazz and other idioms. Mr. Josten of Smith College proved his deserts at the Symphony Concerts late last season; increased them by the setting of Dryden's "Ode for St. Cecelia's Day," produced last week at Worcester. So does Mr. Koussevitzky find room for American composers, in particular, for the young and ripening men. It is the obligation of a conductor, the honor of an artist, so to do.

Next the Europeans' share:

Berg: Three pieces for String Orchestra
Spohr: Suite for Wind Orchestra
Bax: Symphony No. 2
Prokoffiev: Symphony No. 3
Hindemith: Concerto for Wind Instruments
Wetzler: "Baskische Venus"
Hauer: Sinfonietta
Pick-Manglagalli: Prelude and Fugue
Enesco: Suite
Roussel: Suite (first performance)
Krein: "Chant de David"
Martelli: Bas-Reliefs
Satie: Five Grimaces
Lazar: Concerto Grosso
Schoenberg: Variations

Again a characteristic, justifiable list with many an item to whet anticipatory interest. Mr. Koussevitzky, like most of us, believes in Hindemith and gives him room. . . . Prokoffiev will be guest of the orchestra, with this new Symphony, produced in Paris last spring, in his portfolio. . . . No other American conductor lends an ear to Schönberg and his disciples; but here, warrantably, are "the master's Variations that got Berlin by the ears last winter, along with Berg's three pieces. Not since Dr. Muck's time has Schönberg figured at the Symphony Concerts as composer in his own right . . . Bax, Roussel and Enesco are established composers whose new work conductors in London, Paris and American cities receive gladly. . . . Hauer, out of Central Europe, has made some stir at the festivals of the Society for Contemporary Music. . . . Krein and Pick-Mangiagalli are respectively a Russian and an Italian deserving to be heard. . . . To Lazar, a Roumanian of Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky once before gave place. . . . Wetzler's 'Baskische Venus," music upon motivs from the Basque country, is going the rounds of Germany. . . . Strauss recommended to Mr. Koussevitzky the half-forgotten Spohr—a hundred years ago a high-reputed composer. . . . There are still humors to be discovered in Satie's posthumous scores. . . .

Again Mr. Koussevitzky keeps the faith. For it is the bounden duty of the conductor of the Boston Orchestra to inform its audiences about the music of the day; to choose that music far and wide, from old and young; from many faiths and practices. . . . Add the promised performance of Strauss's "Don Quixote" with which the conductor should excel; the possible production of the concert version, choruses included, of Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's play, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"—work of the composer's prime—and the prospect again widens. Where Mr. Koussevitzky is, there is vitality and not routine.

Incidents and Prospects

For the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week, Mr. Koussevitzky proposes a Concerto Grosso (Number Ten of Opus Six) for String Orchestra by Handel; a tone-poem, "The Song of David" by a new Russian, Gregory Krein; the familiar Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird" Sibelius's Second Symphony in D major. Gregory Krein is a middle-aged Russian, inclining (as the books have it) toward the ways of Skryabin and also of Ravel, but of more austere and profound nature. A more brilliant brother, Alexander, has overshadowed him, and outside of Moscow his music is little known. These twenty years Sibelius's Second Symphony, in which he first finds original and characteristic voice, has been standard piece in the Bostonian repertory. Now, for the first times, Mr. Koussevitzky will be heard in it. At Cambridge next Thursday the conductor's program assembles the Concerto Grosso aforesaid; Debussy's "The Sea"; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

By word of The Crimson, the Harvard

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

Amusements

IN CASE you have some loose change in your pocket which you don't know what to do with, you might think over sending the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Paris this coming spring. It will cost only $100,000. I am led to understand that such a donation would be looked upon with considerable favor by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men. Come now, show your public spirit.

U. S. COMPOSERS ARE GIVEN PRAISE

Symphony Leader Compares Work with That of Europeans

Emphasis will be laid upon the works of young American composers, during the coming symphony season, announced Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, upon his arrival in Boston last night.

Mr. Koussevitsky has just returned from a summer in France and Germany. "I have compared during the summer," he said, "the work of the young American composers with that of the young Europeans, and I must say that I find the former to be doing much more interesting work."

While in Paris, Mr. Koussevitsky was invited to conduct the orchestra of the Opera, an honor which he subsequently declined after being refused the extra rehearsal which he felt the orchestra needed.

He also said that in the near future announcement would be made of the selection of guest conductors for the Boston orchestra and that several distinguished leaders were now under consideration.

Festival of Brahms Set For 1930--- Musical Notes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Anticipating by three years the homage which the world of music will undoubtedly pay to Brahms in 1933, the centennial year of his birth, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, seconded by the choral bodies of Harvard and Radcliffe, will present in March of 1930 a Brahms festival. Why, asks Dr. Koussevitzky, should a great musician be honored only in anniversary years?

In addition to the four symphonies of Brahms it is planned to present, with the assistance of the above mentioned choruses from Cambridge, the German requiem, the "Song of Destiny," and the Rhapsody for alto, male chorus and orchestra. The two piano concertos and the violin concerto are also probabilities, with Arthur Schnabel as soloist in the first instance and in the second the hope of Mr. Koussevitzky and to repeat the transcendent performance which he and the orchestra gave that work last season. March 23 through 29 are the dates set for the festival.

* * * *

The repertory of the Cosmopolitan

The Race of the Orchestras

MUSICAL history, it now seems likely, will record 1930 as the Year of the Race of the Orchestras. For Serge Koussevitzky, returning from Europe to America, proclaims that his project of leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Europe next spring will not be deferred merely because the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York has decided to make a similar trip under direction of Arturo Toscanini. The Boston orchestra, he explains, is not an imitator. Its slogan, one gathers from what its conductor said, might be, "We Lead; Others Follow."

Only—the Philharmonic-Symphony, apparently, is going to follow simultaneously, when it comes to a European trip. The management of the New York orchestra has announced definitely that it will make the grand musical tour next spring. The Boston Symphony management has maintained so far a discreet silence on the subject. But Dr. Koussevitzky cries, "1930 or Never!" So it looks as if the nations of Europe were to be treated to the spectacle of two of the great American orchestras in friendly competition for their attention and favor in the same season.

There can be little doubt that both orchestras may expect interested audiences in Europe. More than one distinguished European music critic has asserted publicly that Europe has no orchestra to compare in technical accomplishment with the Philharmonic-Symphony, the Boston Symphony or the Philadelphia Orchestra. Naturally, then, European music lovers who have heard neither the New York nor the Boston orchestra would be eager to hear both.

And if they are to hear them, what better plan than to hear both in the same season? If one organization followed the other by a year their relative merits might easily be obscured. Let Europeans, by all means, hear both orchestras, and decide for themselves whether America—with the aid largely of European musicians, it is true—has attained a new high standard of performance. Americans will be interested to hear the verdict of the old civilizations.

Concert-Chronicle

Boston's Brahms Festival

FROM Symphony Hall, in the annual booklet, comes the calendar of the Symphony Orchestra for the season begun last Friday and Saturday. Between Oct. 11, 1929, and May 3, 1930, it lists 108 concerts—a full year's work. Boston receives twenty-four pairs of subscription concerts; six supplementary concerts on Monday evenings; six supplementary matinées on Tuesdays; two pairs of young people's concerts; two concerts, on Sunday afternoons, for the Pension Fund of the orchestra—sixty-six concerts in all. Ten, at monthly intervals from November, fall to New York; five to Brooklyn. A fortnight hence, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra go West for ... as far as Chicago and Minneapolis. In February, they go South to Baltimore, Washington and Richmond. In New England, outside Boston, nine concerts are allotted to Cambridge; four to Providence; one apiece to Wellesley, Springfield, Northampton, New Haven, Hartford.

In a sense all this is routine; but across the last page but one is printed in capital letters a material departure from custom. On Sunday afternoon, March 23, a Brahms Festival will begin at Symphony Hall to continue through Saturday evening, March 29. Since Brahms was born in 1833 and died in 1897, it will mark no anniversary; but any and all times are seasonable to pay such a composer honor. No particulars as to programs are yet forthcoming. Presumably the Beethoven Centenary Festival of 1927 will be the model. Brahmsian rarities will, doubtless, be included; while on the choral side the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs are

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

thousands have thrilled to
"FAST LIFE"
co-featuring the 4-receiving Page ready for Dr. Koussevitzky's and Dr. Davison's call. And in such a festival, as those who frequented the Beethoven Concerts may remember, he is above himself.

Pleasures of the Organ

Marcel Dupré ...

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HAS FIRST REHEARSAL

Koussevitzky Greeted Warmly by Musicians—Concert Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra assembled yesterday morning in Symphony Hall for the first rehearsal of the season. Serge Koussevitzky, stepping upon the stage, met with prolonged applause from the standing orchestra who greeted him for the first time as "Doctor," since his recent degree was conferred upon him by Harvard University after the conclusion of the past season.

Dr. Koussevitzky, acknowledging this demonstration, said that it made him happy to see the same personnel before him without a single new face. This, he said, augured a closer ensemble than ever before for the 49th season to come.

The rehearsal began with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, which is also to open the first program of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Other pieces then to be played will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor; Debussy's "La Mer"; and Prelude and Fugue of Pick-Mangiagalli.

...jestic, of poise ...

At Symphony Hall this morning the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky began rehearsals for the new year and for the first pair of concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week. Upon the conductor's appearance the orchestra amused itself by rising and saluting his as "Doctor," the degree he received from Harvard last June. Mr. Koussevitzky was no less amused and returned the compliment by speaking his pleasure in a reassembled orchestra so fit that there was not a single change in personnel.

A Light That Dims

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony Season

The 49th season of Boston Symphony concerts, which will begin at Symphony Hall Friday, Oct 11, promises to be one of the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra. Despite an increase in the price of season tickets, particularly for the Friday series, every place has been taken by subscribers for the 24 Friday afternoons, the 24 Saturday evenings, and the six Monday evenings at Symphony Hall. The New York concerts of the Boston Symphony are again oversubscribed.

A few tickets may still be had for the six Tuesday afternoon concerts in Boston but it seems certain that these, like the other Boston series, will be completely sold out for the season. No city in the entire world supports its orchestra more enthusiastically than Boston. The receipts of the Boston Symphony from sales of tickets for its Boston concerts alone are over half a million dollars a season.

Not a little of the present popularity of the Boston Symphony must be ascribed to the personality of its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who returns for his sixth season here. Attendance at Boston Symphony concerts has for the entire period of their history been very large, but it is today larger than ever before. There is some difference of opinion among musicians about details of Mr Koussevitzky's conducting. But nobody will deny that it is always interesting and stimulating to listen to his highly personal and almost invariably eloquent interpretations of music old and new.

Copland's Symphony

Official announcement from Symphony Hall of plans for the coming season lists the following novelties: a new symphony by Aaron Copland, whom many regard as the most promising of living American composers; a obnoxious as the modernism of his musical style is to the bulk of conservative listeners; a new suite by Prokofieff, from his ballet "L'Enfant Prodigue"; and a new piece by Werhaner Josten, professor of music at Smithple College. Mr Koussevitsky will also, omen the advice of Richard Strauss, perform is a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, a composer whose music has been seldom revived in recent years.

It is reported on good authority that both Prokofieff and Stravinsky have been commissioned to write works for the Boston Symphony as part of its 50th anniversary celebration, in 1930; and that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, still hale and hearty at almost 80, will come from London and conduct as guest one or more numbers from the first program the orchestra played under his baton 50 years earlier.

These new works by Stravinsky and Prokofieff will, it is said, remain the exclusive property of the Boston Symphony, which will control them as it now does Ravel's brilliant arrangement of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," written some years ago at Mr Koussevitzky's request. No official announcement of the anniversary plans has yet been made, but it is said that they include festival performances of Bach's B minor mass, with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society assisting.

Mr Koussevitzky confided to interviewers the other day in New York on landing that he is planning a festival for next Spring, which will, it is said, be devoted to the music of Brahms, including presumably the Brahms "Requiem" as well as the four symphonies of that composer. But this is not yet officially announced.

It is a wholesome sign of the musical times that nothing has yet been said about soloists for the coming season. Mr Koussevitzky's policy is to use only instrumentalists, as a rule, and to engage them only when he wishes to put on the programs a work of great intrinsic value in which they are needed. At the majority of Boston Symphony concerts there is no soloist.

Fewer Soloists

In the old days soloists had to be hired to beguile people into subscribing to a Symphony series. But with a lengthy waiting list for the 1930-31 season and every place at the regular series taken far in advance for this season the orchestra no longer needs soloists as box office attractions. This is a great improvement.

Another improvement Mr Koussevitzky has made in the Symphony concerts is the abolution of applause between movements only in the case of concertos with outside soloists, whom it would be hardly courteous to deprive of the applause they invariably expect after each movement.

Mr Koussevitzky has as a rule performed more ultra modern music than any previous Boston Symphony conductor. He has not neglected the great classics, except for Mozart, with whose music he is not in sympathy to all appearances. But he has displaced composers like Smetana and Grieg from the repertory to make room for novelties, many of which have been disliked by the majority of the audiences at a first hearing. He remarked to an interviewer for the Globe in New York the other day that this season's programs would be "very different from last season's."

He did not explain what he meant, but remembering that during the latter half of last season there was very little new modernist music, owing perhaps to the remarkably cool reception given pieces by Hindemith and others at the beginning of the season; one infers that Koussevitzky is going back to his old way of giving the audience genuinely modern pieces whether or not they were popular with the majority.

One hopes that he is. If new music is not performed by such orchestras as the Boston Symphony, and performed frequently, the art of music will stagnate. Koussevitzky is unquestionably right in principle in performing modernist music. It is to be hoped that he will adhere to the plan he mentioned at first coming to ... ton of giving one, and only one, novelty on each program.

Plan for Boston Symphony Jubilee

Stravinsky and Prokoffiev Are Commissioned to Write for Semi-Centenary

One season more, and in the autumn of 1930 the Boston Symphony Orchestra enters upon its fiftieth year. Only one existing orchestra in America outdates it—the Philharmonic Society of New York with eighty years, there or thereabouts, upon its head. The celebration of this Bostonian jubilee will be large and trustees, conductor and managers are already laying plans. For beginning, Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract as conductor runs through the semi-centenary year, has commissioned new pieces from both Stravinsky and Prokoffiev. They will be written especially for the occasion and they will remain the exclusive property of the orchestra. Unquestionably Stravinsky is the dominant composer of our immediate day; Prokoffiev also sits high in the temple. To give them such commissions is also to re-affirm the liberal courses that through the last twenty-five years have been a chief glory of the orchestra. Celebrating the past, it does not forget to encourage the present.

There are high hopes also that the first conductor of the orchestra may share as well in this celebration of its fiftieth year; may even take the stage to lead it through one or another piece at a commemorative concert, probably a number from his first program. Though his years are many Sir George Henschel (as he later became) is still in excellent health with sufficient strength seemingly for Atlantic voyages and a quasi-festal visit. In London, where he now dwells, and even at his summer house in Scotland, eminent singers still come to him for advice and preparation. He gives both with the old zest. . . . Plausible report further has it that Mr. Koussevitzky will include in the jubilee concerts a performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, with the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe as chorus. It has not been heard in Boston for many years. But of this there is no official confirmation.

One American Killed

Concert-Chronicle

"New, First Times"

FROM Mr. Koussevitzky's ever-courteous hands, in sign of the beginning of a new musical year, comes a list of the new pieces upon his study-table or in mind for performance at the Symphony Concerts. The American items are:

Mason: "Chantecler" (Overture)
Gardner: "Broadway"
Copland: Symphony
Sessions: Symphony
Fairchild: "Chants Nègres"
Gruenberg: "Enchanted Isle"
Josten: "Jungle" (Poem for Orchestra)

A promising list! Mr. Mason's overture, produced last winter, runs in animated vein, everywhere has pleased exacting and unexacting ears. . . . "Broadway," tone-poem or tone-picture, composed by the former violinist, ranked second in the prize-competition won by Bloch's "America." . . . Mr. Copland and Mr. Sessions are the "rising hopes" of the younger generation of American composers. Steadily and with reason Mr. Koussevitzky has encouraged them. More than once at the Symphony Concerts they have justified this fostering. Mr. Blair Fairchild, American composer with a light hand who prefers Paris as dwelling place, is new to Symphony Hall. So also is Mr. Grünberg, though Bostonians have heard elsewhere one or two of his experiments in jazz and other idioms. Mr. Josten of Smith College proved his deserts at the Symphony Concerts late last season; increased them by the setting of Dryden's "Ode for St. Cecelia's Day," produced last week at Worcester. So does Mr. Koussevitzky find room for American composers, in particular, for the young and ripening men. It is the obligation of a conductor, the honor of an artist, so to do.

Next the Europeans' share:

Berg: Three pieces for String Orchestra
Spohr: Suite for Wind Orchestra
Bax: Symphony No. 2
Prokoffiev: Symphony No. 3
Hindemith: Concerto for Wind Instruments
Wetzler: "Baskische Venus"
Hauer: Sinfonietta
Pick-Mangiagalli: Prelude and Fugue
Enesco: Suite
Roussel: Suite (first performance)
Krein: "Chant de David"
Martelli: Bas-Reliefs
Satie: Five Grimaces
Lazar: Concerto Grosso
Schoenberg: Variations

Again a characteristic, justifiable list ... with many an item ... interest. Mr. K... us, believes in ... room. . . . the orch... produced ... folio. . . . lends an ea... ciples; but ... master's Var... the ears last ... three pieces. N... has Schönberg fi... Concerts as compos... Bax, Roussel and E... composers whose new ... London, Paris and A... ceive gladly. . . . Haue... Europe, has made some st... vals of the Society for C... Music. . . . Krein and Pick...

Amusements

IN CASE you have some loose change in your pocket which you don't know what to do with, you might think over sending the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Paris this coming spring. It will cost only $100,000. I am led to understand that such a donation would be looked upon with considerable favor by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men. Come now, show your public spirit.

Concer...

Continued ...

...ns

...d So are respectively ... deserving to be ... Roumanian of P... once before gave ... 'Baskische Venus,' ... from the Basque c... rounds of Germany. ... mended to Mr. Kousse... gotten Spohr—a hund... high-reputed composer. ... still humors to be disco... posthumous scores. . . .

...film ...in- ...om ...an- ...re ...le

Again Mr. Koussevitzky ... faith. For it is the bounden ... the conductor of the Boston ... to inform its audiences ... music of the day; to choose ... far and wide, from old and young ... many faiths and practices. . . . ...thing ... the promised performance of St. ... "Don Quixote" with which the co... tor should excel; the possible produc... of the concert version, choruses inclu... ed, of Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's play, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"—work of the composer's prime—and the prospect again widens. Where Mr. Koussevitzky is, there is vitality and not routine.

...Curtis ...I. Ha... ...hing ...Sec... ...ay; ...ay ...he

Incidents and Prospects

For the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week, Mr. Koussevitzky proposes a Concerto Grosso (Number Ten of Opus Six) for String Orchestra by Handel; a tone-poem, "The Song of David" by a new Russian, Gregory Krein; the familiar Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird" Sibelius's Second Symphony in D major. Gregory Krein is a middle-aged Russian, inclining (as the books have it) toward the ways of Skryabin and also of Ravel, but of more austere and profound nature. A more brilliant brother, Alexander, has overshadowed him, and outside of Moscow his music is little known. These twenty years Sibelius's Second Symphony, in which he first finds original and characteristic voice, has been standard piece in the Bostonian repertory. Now, for the first times, Mr. Koussevitzky will be hear... in it. At Cambridge next Thursday t... conductor's program assembles the C... certo Grosso aforesaid; Debussy's "... Sea"; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

By word of The Crimson, the Har...

U. S. COMPOSERS ARE GIVEN PRAISE

Symphony Leader Compares Work with That of Europeans

Herald Sept. 25

Emphasis will be laid upon the works of young American composers, during the coming symphony season, announced Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, upon his arrival in Boston last night.

Mr. Koussevitsky has just returned from a summer in France and Germany. "I have compared during the summer," he said, "the work of the young American composers with that of the young Europeans, and I must say that I find the former to be doing much more interesting work."

While in Paris, Mr. Koussevitsky was invited to conduct the orchestra of the Opera, an honor which he subsequently declined after being refused the extra rehearsal which he felt the orchestra needed.

He also said that in the near future announcement would be made of the selection of guest conductors for the Boston orchestra and that several distinguished leaders were now under consideration.

Post Oct 2

Festival of Brahms Set For 1930--- Musical Notes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Anticipating by three years the homage which the world of music will undoubtedly pay to Brahms in 1933, the centennial year of his birth, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, seconded by the choral bodies of Harvard and Radcliffe, will present in March of 1930 a Brahms festival. Why, asks Dr. Koussevitzky, should a great musician be honored only in anniversary years?

In addition to the four symphonies of Brahms it is planned to present, with the assistance of the above mentioned choruses from Cambridge, the German requiem, the "Song of Destiny," and the Rhapsody for alto, men's chorus and orchestra. The two piano concertos and the violin concerto are also probabilities, with Arthur Schnabel as soloist in the first instance and in the second the hope of Mr. Harand to repeat the transcendent performance which he and the orchestra gave that work last season. March 23 through 29 are the dates set for the festival.

* * * *

The repertory of the Cosmopolitan ...

The Race of the Orchestras

Monitor Oct 15 '29

MUSICAL history, it now seems likely, will record 1930 as the Year of the Race of the Orchestras. For Serge Koussevitzky, returning from Europe to America, proclaims that his project of leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Europe next spring will not be deferred merely because the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York has decided to make a similar trip under direction of Arturo Toscanini. The Boston orchestra, he explains, is not an imitator. Its slogan, one gathers from what its conductor said, might be, "We Lead; Others Follow."

Only—the Philharmonic-Symphony, apparently, is going to follow simultaneously, when it comes to a European trip. The management of the New York orchestra has announced definitely that it will make the grand musical tour next spring. The Boston Symphony management has maintained so far a discreet silence on the subject. But Dr. Koussevitzky cries, "1930 or Never!" So it looks as if the nations of Europe were to be treated to the spectacle of two of the great American orchestras in friendly competition for their attention and favor in the same season.

There can be little doubt that both orchestras may expect interested audiences in Europe. More than one distinguished European music critic has asserted publicly that Europe has no orchestra to compare in technical accomplishment with the Philharmonic-Symphony, the Boston Symphony or the Philadelphia Orchestra. Naturally, then, European music lovers who have heard neither the New York nor the Boston orchestra would be eager to hear both.

And if they are to hear them, what better plan than to hear both in the same season? If one organization followed the other by a year their relative merits might easily be obscured. Let Europeans, by all means, hear both orchestras, and decide for themselves whether America—with the aid largely of European musicians, it is true—has attained a new high standard of performance. Americans will be interested to hear the verdict of the old civilizations.

Concert-Chronicle

Herald Oct 15

Boston's Brahms Festival

FROM Symphony Hall, in the annual booklet, comes the calendar of the Symphony Orchestra for the season begun last Friday and Saturday. Between Oct. 11, 1929, and May 3, 1930, it lists 108 concerts—a full year's work. Boston receives twenty-four pairs of subscription concerts; six supplementary concerts on Monday evenings; six supplementary matinées on Tuesdays; two pairs of young people's concerts; two concerts, on Sunday afternoons, for the Pension Fund of the orchestra—sixty-six concerts in all. Ten, at monthly intervals from November, fall to New York; five to Brooklyn. A fortnight hence, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra go West for ... as far as Chicago and Minneapolis. In February, they go South to Baltimore, Washington and Richmond. In New England, outside Boston, nine concerts are allotted to Cambridge; four to Providence; one apiece to Wellesley, Springfield, Northampton, New Haven, Hartford.

In a sense all this is routine; but across the last page but one is printed in capital letters a material departure from custom. On Sunday afternoon, March 23, a Brahms Festival will begin at Symphony Hall to continue through Saturday evening, March 29. Since Brahms was born in 1833 and died in 1897, it will mark no anniversary; but any and all times are seasonable to pay such a composer honor. No particulars as to programs are yet forthcoming. Presumably the Beethoven Centenary Festival of 1927 will be the model. Brahmsian rarities will, doubtless, be included; while on the choral side the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs are

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

thousands have thrilled to
"FAST LIFE"
co-featuring the preceding Page

ready for Dr. Koussevitzky's and Dr. Davison's call. And in such a festival, as those who frequented the Beethoven Concerts may remember, he is above himself.

Pleasures of the Organ

Marcel Dupré ...

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HAS FIRST REHEARSAL

Koussevitzky Greeted Warmly by Musicians—Concert Friday

Herald Oct 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra assembled yesterday morning in Symphony Hall for the first rehearsal of the season. Serge Koussevitzky, stepping upon the stage, met with prolonged applause from the standing orchestra who greeted him for the first time as "Doctor," since his recent degree was conferred upon him by Harvard University after the conclusion of the past season.

Dr. Koussevitzky, acknowledging this demonstration, said that it made him happy to see the same personnel before him without a single new face. This, he said, augured a closer ensemble than ever before for the 49th season to come.

The rehearsal began with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, which is also to open the first program of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Other pieces then to be played will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor; Debussy's "La Mer"; and Prelude and Fugue of Pick-Mangiagalli.

Herald Oct 4

At Symphony Hall this morning the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky began rehearsals for the new year and for the first pair of concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week. Upon the conductor's appearance the orchestra amused itself by rising and saluting his as "Doctor," the degree he received from Harvard last June. Mr. Koussevitzky was no less amused and returned the compliment by speaking his pleasure in a reassembled orchestra so fit that there was not a single change in personnel.

A Light That Dims

Music Notes and Comment

Serge Koussevitzky is now on his way to America on the Ile de France, which is to land in New York next Tuesday. The celebrated conductor will immediately come to Boston and shortly assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal.

The 49th season of the orchestra will open in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Oct 11. This will be Koussevitzky's sixth season at its head.

The Friday, Saturday and Monday series are all fully subscribed, but a few desirable seats still remain for the series of six Tuesday afternoon concerts which are to be given in Symphony Hall beginning Dec 10. This series will offer an opportunity to hear the great orchestra, under Koussevitzky, at their best in six standard symphonic programs.

A week from next Sunday, Oct 6, in Symphony Hall at 3:30, Fritz [illegible] will open the season of Sun-

Illegible parts compel Dr. Koussevitzky to defer Krein's "Song of David," announced for the Symphony Concerts this week. Instead, two orchestral fragments of Strauss's opera, "Intermezzo," will be heard for the first times here—"Interlude" and "Waltz-Scene."

Koussevitzky To Play Again On Bass Viol ---Musical Notes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To use Mr. Koussevitzky's own words, "there will no new faces" in the Symphony Orchestra when that body assembles in Symphony Hall next Friday morning for the first rehearsal of the current season. From this band, already moulded to his will andto the least detail his personal instrument, Mr. Koussevitzky expects much this year in the matter of performance, and there is every chance that his expectation will be completely fulfilled. The programmes, which as before will range widely over music old and new, novel and familiar, give promise of more than usual interest.

As soloist as well as conductor Mr. Koussevitzky will once more be heard in Boston this season. For the joint benefit of the Peabody Home for Crippled Children and the Travelers' Aid Society Mr. Koussevitzky will give at Symphony Hall, on October 22, a recital of music for the bass-viol, that instrument upon which he is the outstanding virtuoso of modern times.

Present, Past, Future in The Concert Halls

Trans Oct 24

Iturbi Comes — Programs in Prospect — Koussevitzky at Wellesley

As in a "Close-Up"

To obtain a "close-up" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to feel its pulse, t sense life flooding through it as thro a corporate entity, one may go to Alu næ Hall for the series of concerts Wellesley College. Strangely, the p lude to the experience gives little indic tion of its essential nature. Arriving the hall is like going to a play in Quinc There is a jam of traffic at the gat parking is accomplished with much fus and formality. Within the hall, on watches the members of the orchestr arrange themselves in their confini space behind the square proscenium One wonders whether the violins w have elbow room. Some of the doub basses are tucked away on the left out sight; their brothers of the brass, wh they arrive, will be similarly situated the right. Through this compact fami Dr. Koussevitzky makes his accustom way. The program book, scanned in glance, discloses the evening's music fare—Handel's Concerto Grosso f String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10; Debu sy's "The Sea"; Symphony No. 2, in Major, by Sibelius. The lowered light assist the intimate architecture of th room. One sees as through a crystal— Dr. Koussevitzky silhouetted; the musi cians flooding toward him in concave flux. Music surrounds one like atmosphere.

Thus did we see and feel in Alumnæ Hall last evening at the beginning of Handel's Concerto Grosso. Heard in Symphony Hall, this piece loses much of its intimate personality through space. Heard in Alumnæ Hall, it gained in its qualities of gentleness, suavity, and mellifluousness of sound. The mellowed acoustics of the place wafted every subtle nuance. The strings in vibration throbbed as though alive with blood in their veins. To listen was to experience this pulse in intimate contact. Each division of the piece exuded its distinc character—the "overture" with its broad curves; the "Allegro Moderato" with its silken lilt; the final "Allegro," more angu lar and vigorous. Only the slow move ment somewhat escaped the senses as dissipating vapor. It is a typical Handelian slow movement drawn out to too great lengths. It wastes away with prolonged sweetness. By this same movement the whole concerto loses contact with the listener, is heard in remembrance rather faintly.

To many, Debussy's "The Sea" was fresh discovery. Attribute the phenomenon to whatever magic one may, last evening's audience listened absorbedly throughout. It sat with these wondrous sounds washing over and through it It caught its breath at the close. It applauded with fresh vigor from pleased senses. For this is sensuous music of strangely moving power. In "The Afternoon of a Faun," to differentiate, the listener's experience seems to touch most powerfully the visual sense. One sees the woodland play of light and shadow; one observes the spirited movement of the faun. In "The Sea," it is sound and feeling combined: a mist of light before the eyes, a mist of sound in the ears, a breath of mist upon the cheek—an ecstasy of the senses. One feels a cosmic throb. It stirs one deeply. It cradles one as one would be cradled in the sea. It becomes a part of one's pulse. Musically, it is a mingling of tones which, however piquant and individual, are never at odds with each other. It is music that one absorbs; there are no pricks or bruises. In this way it differs from the modernism that has gone beyond Debussy, from a treatment of mingled tones in movement to a treatment of tone and movement singly. . . . But let others talk of changing styles in composition. Enough that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra provide this experience as something all pervasive and intensely moving.

To many again, Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] fresh discovery upon fresh discovery in the second symphony of Sibelius. This music is no less individual than that of Debussy. It is, however, music in which figuration, development and form such as one might expect in a large symphonic work, have place. It is likewise music of melody—surpassing melody, never usual, never trite always unusual, to our ears at least, and always vital, as witness the poignant and later impassioned third movement. But to say that a composition has form and melody of a high order of course will never describe the music of Sileblius. Better to say that the listener feels in it some great unifying principle and emotional force, obtaining one's attention gradually and eventually engrossing one by its logic and power; and that the means by which this is accomplished—the musical idiom, in short—is peculiar to one composer, Sibelius.

In this Second Symphony, as well as in the music of Handel and Debussy, Dr. Koussevitzky's service was that of drawing together all separate strands, of encompassing and compacting the whole so that we of the audience observed the design in all its completeness and all its power. Dr. Koussevitzky has been known to vary his pace from concert to concert. Last evening, he served as quick and immediate interpreter. N. M. J.

Amusements

The High Cost of Symphonic Music

THE cost of symphonic music seems to be going up. Since such music is now regarded as a necessity, the question is not, shall it be continued? but, how shall it be paid for?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened its season with an appeal for $145,000. This represents an estimated deficit for this season of $100,000, and $45,000 remaining of a deficit of $145,000 for the season of 1928-29. The comparative statement made public by the trustees shows a large increase in the deficit, which in 1927 was $44,000 and in 1928, $87,000.

Receipts have decreased, chiefly because of a falling off in income from concerts and from rentals of Symphony Hall. The Beethoven Festival of 1927 and radiocasting of programs in 1927 and 1928 swelled the receipts for those years. Neither source of revenue was available last season. Payments have increased, chiefly because of increases in orchestra salaries. For this season, prices have been slightly raised.

All the concerts are subscribed. But in order to fill all seats at all concerts, it is necessary to have a famous conductor. Famous conductors cost money. If you try to operate with a less famous conductor, at a smaller salary, there are vacant seats. It is very difficult to economize.

San Francisco has found it so. Alfred Hertz has been conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra for fourteen years. He is a distinguished musician, with a long record as symphonic and operatic conductor. But attendance at his concerts was falling off. He has resigned. San Francisco wanted Bruno Walter to succeed him. Mr. Walter doubtless would draw full houses at all concerts. But Mr. Walter's salary would be very high. He has not been engaged.

There is another method. Years ago Philadelphia, through the efforts largely of the Women's Committee, established a permanent fund for its orchestra. Recently a fund of $3,000,000 has been established to maintain the Cleveland Symphony. Boston is a conservative city. It allows "tag days" for various causes, but it probably would view with alarm a general "drive" for a fund to support its orchestra, which meantime must depend upon the response to the dignified appeals made by the trustees through the program book.

Nevertheless, it would seem that in a democracy a fund subscribed by the general public is the logical solution. Formerly it was the privilege of kings and princes to support the arts. Then it became the prerogative of captains of industry. Nowadays it is perhaps more consonant with the times that all the people should contribute. Of course, there probably will always be one or two munificent benefactors upon whose shoulders falls the main burden. But they are able and willing to bear it; and the sense of community ownership established by a fund to which many persons have contributed is a civic asset.

Concert-Chronicle

New, from Strauss

THE FAMILIAR Richard Strauss—rather than the wholly unfamiliar Gregory Krein stands upon this week's program at Symphony Hall with music as yet unheard in Boston. Excess of errors in score and parts proved the undoing of plans to play the Russian. An excerpt from the two-act opera, "Intermezzo," of 1924, replaces "The Song of David."

This little opera, by sub-title, "A Bourgeois Comedy with Symphonic Interludes," was first heard at Dresden, Nov. 4, 1924, at a "Strauss Week" in celebration of the compos r's sixtiet birthday. The plot is based on an incident in the composer's life. Josef Stransky—not unknown on this side of the sea—Strauss, another conductor and an Italian tenor were seated at a table at an inn in Prague, where they were all engaged in operatic performance. A "lady" approached their table; from the conversation discovered that they were from the opera; addressed them in a request for tickets. Indicating Stransky, the tenor replied, "Herr Straussky will attend to it." Not knowing any of them, the adventuress consulted a telephone book and sent a note to Strauss: "Dear Sweetheart: Do bring me the tickets. Your faithful Mizzi." By this time Strauss was away on a long trip; his wife opened the note; took steps toward securing a divorce. Her lawyer was reluctant and finally succeeded in discovering that Stransky knew the reason for the note, conveyed this knowledge to Frau Strauss, after which a reconciliation followed.

From this material Strauss himself wrote the "book" for an opera. In a dressing room, conductor Robert Storch is preparing for a long trip. He has "words" with his wife, Christina; leaves without "making it up." She becomes moody after her husband's departure, but soon forgets. While tobogganing she collides with the twenty-two-year old Baron Lummer. An innocent flirtation follows, with much dancing at a Bavarian inn. The Baron, whom Madame Storch has assisted—but who has a sweetheart in the village—writes his benefactress a letter asking for the loan of a thousand marks. When she is preparing to put him in his place, the fateful note from Mizzi arrives. The first act ends with the wife in a rage, packing her things, preparing for departure.

In Vienna the Herr Hofkapellmeister Storch is seated with his friends at a table, playing his favorite game of "skat." Thus occupied, he receives a telegram from his wife accusing him of infidelity. His protests by mail and by wire remain unanswered. Finally his friend, Kapellmeister Stroh, comes forward with the solution of the mystery and the opera ends with a reconciliation scene.

Evidently, the chief interest of "Intermezzo" lies in the music; and by easy deduction in the symphonic interludes, sometimes longer than the scenes themselves, which connect the thirteen episodes. "In these interludes," says Richard Specht, Strauss's biographer, "lie the essence and the principal charm of the opera. The waltz, with its delicious piano prelude and the interweaving of the sentimental Bavarian tunes; the delightful description of the card-party, with the witty tone-picture of the mixing of the cards, the striking glissando and the accompanying violin and flute runs which make the tobogganing even more plain to the ear than the scene to the eye, the beautiful evening atmosphere which surrounds the lonely woman as she meditates by her lamp, the malicious atonal burlesque in the description of the young baron, the joyful epilogue which follows the explanation of the misunderstanding—these passages are memorable."

Continued on Following Page

Continued from Preceding Page

Selections from the Interludes are played now and again on symphonic programs. The New York Symphony Orchestra in January, 1928, played four excerpts: (1) The Sleigh-Ride between the first two scenes; (2) The Waltz, representing the dance at the Bavarian inn, beginning at the end of the second scene and continuing through the whole of the third scene; (3) The Interlude preparatory to the scene in Storch's house, where Frau Storch learns of the supposed infidelity of her husband; (4) The Interlude between the last two scenes of the second act. Other conductors (of the New York Philharmonic and of the Chicago Symphony) have played only two—The Waltz and an Interlude out of the first act.

Only the first Interlude will be played at Symphony Hall. It is quiet, meditative music, of Christina sitting at home thinking of her absent husband. The motif of her conjugal love ('cellos, second measure) is the thematic basis. Though the piece remains essentially a reverie, it rises to the heights of an impassioned climax. One need hardly say more than that it is well-made and pleasing throughout. A. H. M.

Programs in Prospect

For the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday, the last before the western journey of the orchestra:

Concerto in D minor for Orchestra and Organ ..... Vivaldi-Sliotl
(Organist, Mr. Snow)
Tone-Poem, "The Jungle" ..... Josten
(First Performances)
Symphony, No. 6, in B minor ("The Pathetic") ..... Chaikovsky

New: First Times, Josten's "Jungle"

TO Vivaldi from the ancients and Chaikovsky of the "Pathetique" Dr. Koussevitzky adds this week, as a novelty, Professor Werner Josten's symphonic poem, "The Jungle," in its "world-première." Professor Josten will be remembered from a well-received performance of several movements of a "Concerto Sacro" last year, and from his own performances of operas of Handel and Monteverdi at Smith College.

"The Jungle" owes its inception to the remarkable series of jungle pictures painted by the French modernist, Henri Julien Rousseau, between 1904 and 1910. From that set Mr. Josten carries one, "Paysage exotique," in his own copy of the score of "The Jungle," as the one which he had most particularly in mind in writing his symphonic poem.

Among modernists, Rousseau is classed as a "primitive." A few sentences from C. J. Bulliet's "Apples and Madonnas" may serve to character him: "Unlike Renoir—unlike Césanne—Rousseau was no evolution from any established 'style' of art. He is the nearest product of a unique inner urge to paint that the modern movement has produced—the nearest genuine 'expressionist'—the nearest 'primitive.' . . . Rousseau's art is primitive in that it came out of an untutored, crude, peasant mind—a mind that may not have been imbecile, as his contemporaries suspected, but that was certainly sub-normal so far as ordered intelligence is concerned." This author also "sees in his work the naivete of African sculptors—quite a different manifestation—a full maturity in a primitive state of development."

To vary the life of old Mother Earth course through his veins. Rousseau and his art thus answer a natural artistic craving of the composer.

But with this material Mr. Josten does not make an objective music. He definitely states that his music is not in any sense based on the music of any primitive land. One rhythm only (three-quarters followed by a triplet of sixteenths) is of native origin, a Voodoo rhythm. For the rest, his symphonic poem intends to convey the emotions which any European or American would experience in entering a tropical jungle such as that indicated by Rousseau's pictures. For his structural framework he uses the old and trusty sonata-form. His orchestra is, of course, a large one.

The first theme section embraces no less than five well-developed motives. These are mostly of an energetic, aggressive character. The first, in the basses, is energetic, passionate, of relentless, driving rhythm; a second, in English horn and French horns, though more meditative, leads to a considerable climax; the first returns in trumpets; three more compass the more active phases, the more glaring colors of jungle life. The second theme section begins "Tranquillo" with a gentle theme rightly taken in flutes. A second division of this section suggests the calls of animals at love-making; a short, songful motif in oboes (the female) answered somewhat more robustly by horns. A third grows intensely passionate. A fourth perhaps deals with natives at their love-making, the males calling in ascending glissandos, the females answering, t[illegible]gh the interval of a seventh in simila descending figures. And in the terrific climax which is engendered, those bent on having their realism may succeed in hearing the lion's roar!

The development, or working-out section combines, recombines, overlays these motifs with each other in a melee which more than ever justifies the title. The recapitulation goes directly from the first motif of the first theme to the second theme. The tranquil portions of this section, however, have become transformed. Gentle themes have become heroic; cooing and wooing have become brutalities. The coda like the development, brings new and sometimes complicated combinations of themes, adds fresh rhythmic insistences. The opening subject is treated in modern "mechanistic" manner. And the whole ends in an orgy of Voodooistic furore.

That Professor Josten is interested in this type of material becomes further evident from his plans for the present year. Smith College grants him this year his "sabbatical" year of absence. To Europe he will repair shortly after the present performances of his new work, there to engage in the composition of a ballet-opera, also on an African subject. The call of the jungle, it would seem, he has not yet fully answered. A. H. M.

Amusements

Music Notes and Comment

Serge Koussevitzky is now on his way to America on the Ile de France, which is to land in New York next Tuesday. The celebrated conductor will immediately come to Boston and shortly assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal.

The 49th season of the orchestra will open in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Oct 11. This will be Koussevitzky's sixth season at its head.

The Friday, Saturday and Monday series are all fully subscribed, but a few desirable seats still remain for the series of six Tuesday afternoon concerts which are to be given in Symphony Hall beginning Dec 10. This series will offer an opportunity to hear the great orchestra, under Koussevitzky, at their best in six standard symphonic programs.

A week from next Sunday, Oct 6, in Symphony Hall at 3:30, Fritz Kreisler will open the season of Sun-

Illegible parts compel Dr. Koussevitzky to defer Krein's "Song of David," announced for the Symphony Concerts this week. Instead, two orchestral fragments of Strauss's opera, "Intermezzo," will be heard for the first times here—"Interlude" and "Waltz-Scene."

Koussevitzky To Play Again On Bass Viol ---Musical Notes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To use Mr. Koussevitzky's own words, "there will no new faces" in the Symphony Orchestra when that body assembles in Symphony Hall next Friday morning for the first rehearsal of the current season. From this band, already moulded to his will andto the least detail his personal instrument, Mr. Koussevitzky expects much this year in the matter of performance, and there is every chance that his expectation will be completely fulfilled. The programmes, which as before will range widely over music old and new, novel and familiar, give promise of more than usual interest.

As soloist as well as conductor Mr. Koussevitzky will once more be heard in Boston this season. For the joint benefit of the Peabody Home for Crippled Children and the Travelers' Aid Society Mr. Koussevitzky will give at Symphony Hall, on October 22, a recital of music for the bass-viol, that instrument upon which he is the outstanding virtuoso of modern times.

Present, Past, Future in The Concert Halls

Iturbi Comes — Programs in Prospect — Koussevitzky at Wellesley

As in a "Close-Up"

To obtain a "close-up" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to feel its pulse, to sense life flooding through it as through a corporate entity, one may go to Alumnæ Hall for the series of concerts at Wellesley College. Strangely, the prelude to the experience gives little indication of its essential nature. Arriving at the hall is like going to a play in Quincy. There is a jam of traffic at the gate; parking is accomplished with much fuss and formality. Within the hall, one watches the members of the orchestra arrange themselves in their confining space behind the square proscenium. One wonders whether the violins will have elbow room. Some of the double basses are tucked away on the left out of sight; their brothers of the brass, when they arrive, will be similarly situated on the right. Through this compact family Dr. Koussevitzky makes his accustomed way. The program book, scanned in a glance, discloses the evening's musical fare—Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10; Debussy's "The Sea"; Symphony No. 2, in D Major, by Sibelius. The lowered lights assist the intimate architecture of the room. One sees as through a crystal—Dr. Koussevitzky silhouetted; the musicians flooding toward him in concave flux. Music surrounds one like atmosphere.

Thus did we see and feel in Alumnæ Hall last evening at the beginning of Handel's Concerto Grosso. Heard in

The High Cost of Symphonic Music

THE cost of symphonic music seems to be going up. Since such music is now regarded as a necessity, the question is not, shall it be continued? but, how shall it be paid for?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened its season with an appeal for $145,000. This represents an estimated deficit for this season of $100,000, and $45,000 remaining of a deficit of $145,000 for the season of 1928-29. The comparative statement made public by the trustees shows a large increase in the deficit, which in 1927 was $44,000 and in 1928, $87,000.

Receipts have decreased, chiefly because of a falling off in income from concerts and from rentals of Symphony Hall. The Beethoven Festival of 1927 and radiocasting of programs in 1927 and 1928 swelled the receipts for those years. Neither source of revenue was available last season. Payments have increased, chiefly because of increases in orchestra salaries. For this season, prices have been slightly raised.

All the concerts are subscribed. But in order to fill all seats at all concerts, it is necessary to have a famous conductor. Famous conductors cost money. If you try to operate with a less famous conductor, at a smaller salary, there are vacant seats. It is very difficult to economize.

San Francisco has found it so. Alfred Hertz has been conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra for fourteen years. He is a distinguished musician, with a long record as symphonic and operatic conductor. But attendance at his concerts was falling off. He has resigned. San Francisco wanted Bruno Walter to succeed him. Mr. Walter doubtless would draw full houses at all concerts. But Mr. Walter's salary would be very high. He has not been engaged.

There is another method. Years ago Philadelphia, through the efforts largely of the Women's Committee, established a permanent fund for its orchestra. Recently a fund of $3,000,000 has been established to maintain the Cleveland Symphony. Boston is a conservative city. It allows "tag days" for various causes, but it probably would view with alarm a general "drive" for a fund to support its orchestra, which meantime must depend upon the response to the dignified appeals made by the trustees through the program book.

Nevertheless, it would seem that in a democracy a fund subscribed by the general public is the logical solution. Formerly it was the privilege of kings and princes to support the arts. Then it became the prerogative of captains of industry. Nowadays it is perhaps more consonant with the times that all the people should contribute. Of course, there probably will always be one or two munificent benefactors upon whose shoulders falls the main burden. But they are able and willing to bear it; and the sense of community ownership established by a fund to which many persons have contributed is a civic asset.

Concert-Chronicle

New, from Strauss

THE FAMILIAR Richard Strauss—rather than the wholly unfamiliar Gregory Krein stands upon this week's program at Symphony Hall with music as yet unheard in Boston. Excess of errors in score and parts proved the undoing of plans to play the Russian. An excerpt from the two-act opera, "Intermezzo," of 1924, replaces "The Song of David."

This little opera, by sub-title, "A Bourgeois Comedy with Symphonic Interludes," was first heard at Dresden, Nov. 4. 1924, at a "Strauss Week" in celebration of the compos r's sixtiet birthday. The plot is based on an incident in the composer's life. Josef Stransky—not unknown on this side of the sea—Strauss, another conductor and an Italian tenor were seated at a table at an inn in Prague, where they were all engaged in operatic performance. A "lady" approached their table; from the conversation discovered that they were from the opera; addressed them in a request for tickets. Indicating Stransky, the tenor replied, "Herr Straussky will attend to it." Not knowing any of them, the adventuress consulted a telephone book and sent a note to Strauss: "Dear Sweetheart: Do bring me the tickets. Your faithful Mizzi." By this time Strauss was away on a long trip; his wife opened the note; took steps toward securing a divorce. Her lawyer was reluctant and finally succeeded in discovering that Stransky knew the reason for the note, conveyed this knowledge to Frau Strauss, after which a reconciliation followed.

From this material Strauss himself wrote the "book" for an opera. In a dressing room, conductor Robert Storch is preparing for a long trip. He has "words" with his wife, Christina; leaves hair previously and the men who were caught simply didn't pay any attention to the warning. The ring leaders are in jail now, but they'll be out soon.

"This won't business. They'll have to work a little harder, that's all. There's plenty of stock on hand that the agents couldn't get and if they need any more they

In Vienna the Herr Hofkapellmeister Storch is seated with his friends at a table, playing his favorite game of "skat." Thus occupied, he receives a telegram from his wife accusing him of infidelity. His protests by mail and by wire remain unanswered. Finally his friend, Kapellmeister Stroh, comes forward with the solution of the mystery and the opera ends with a reconciliation scene.

Evidently, the chief interest of "Intermezzo" lies in the music; and by easy deduction in the symphonic interludes, sometimes longer than the scenes themselves, which connect the thirteen episodes. "In these interludes," says Richard Specht, Strauss's biographer, "lie the essence and the principal charm of the opera. The waltz, with its delicious piano prelude and the interweaving of the sentimental Bavarian tunes; the delightful description of the card-party, with the witty tone-picture of the mixing of the cards, the striking glissando and the accompanying violin and flute runs which make the tobogganing even more plain to the ear than the scene to the eye, the beautiful evening atmosphere which surrounds the lonely woman as she meditates by her lamp, the malicious atonal burlesque in the description of the young baron, the joyful epilogue which follows the explanation of the misunderstanding—these passages are memorable."

Continued on Following Page

Continued from Preceding Page

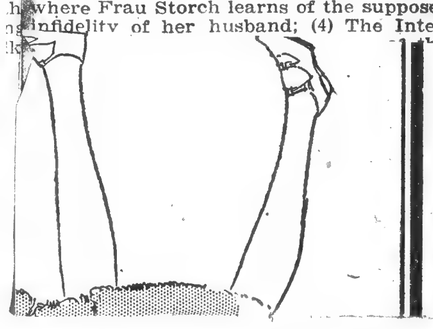
Selections from the Interludes are played now and again on symphonic programs. The New York Symphony Orchestra in January, 1928, played four excerpts: (1) The Sleigh-Ride between the first two scenes; (2) The Waltz, representing the dance at the Bavarian inn, beginning at the end of the second scene and continuing through the whole of the third scene; (3) The Interlude preparatory to the scene in Storch's house, where Frau Storch learns of the supposed infidelity of her husband; (4) The Inter-



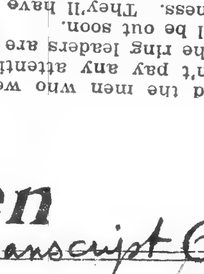
reen

New: First Times, Josten's "Jungle"

TO Vivaldi from the ancients and Chaikovsky of the "Pathetique" Dr. Koussevitzky adds this week, as a novelty, Professor Werner Josten's symphonic poem, "The Jungle," in its "world-première." Professor Josten will be remembered from a well-received performance of several movements of a "Concerto Sacro" last year, and from his own performances of operas of Handel and Monteverdi at Smith College.

"The Jungle" owes its inception to the remarkable series of jungle pictures painted by the French modernist, Henri Julien Rousseau, between 1904 and 1910. From that set Mr. Josten carries one, "Paysage exotique," in his own copy of the score of "The Jungle," as the one which he had most particularly in mind in writing his symphonic poem.

Among modernists, Rousseau is classed as a "primitive." A few sentences from C. J. Bulliet's "Apples and Madonnas" may serve to character him: "Unlike Renoir—unlike Césanne—Rousseau was no evolution from any established 'style' of art. He is the nearest product of a unique inner urge to paint that the mod-'ern move[illegible]t has produced—the nearest gen[illegible]xpressionist'—the nearest 'prim[illegible]. Rousseau's art is p[illegible] it came out of an unpeasant mind—a mind been imbecile, as his pected, but that was so far as ordered ned." This author the naivete of a different mani- in a primitive



The pictures give Mr. Josten his point of departure. They are chosen partly because Mr. Josten whole-heartedly likes them; partly because he wants as subject matter for his own writing something that is removed from the artificialities of modern civilization. For him (we presume rather for his music) no steam-heat and no mechanistic theories, no modern plumbing or hot-house æsthetics. He would prefer primitive lands, where he can plant his bare feet on virgin soil and feel the magnetic forces of old Mother Earth course through his veins. Rousseau and his art thus answer a natural artistic craving of the composer.

But with this material Mr. Josten does not make an objective music. He definitely states that his music is not in any sense based on the music of any primitive land. One rhythm only (three-quarters followed by a triplet of sixteenths) is of native origin, a Voodoo rhythm. For the rest, his symphonic poem intends to convey the emotions which any European or American would experience in entering a tropical jungle such as that indicated by Rousseau's pictures. For his structural framework he uses the old and trusty sonata-form. His orchestra is, of course, a large one.

The first theme section embraces no less than five well-developed motives. These are mostly of an energetic, aggressive character. The first, in the basses, is energetic, passionate, of relentless, driving rhythm; a second, in English horn and French horns, though more meditative, leads to a considerable climax; the first returns in trumpets; three more compass the more active phases, the more glaring colors of jungle life. The second theme section begins "Tranquillo" with a gentle theme rightly taken in flutes. A second division of this section suggests the calls of animals at love-making; a short, songful motif in oboes (the female) answered somewhat more robustly by horns. A third grows intensely passionate. A fourth perhaps deals with natives at their love-making, the males calling in ascendin[illegible] glissandos, the females answering, t[illegible]gh the interval of a seventh in simil[illegible] descending figures. And in the terrific climax which is engendered, those bent on having their realism may succeed in hearing the lion's roar!

The development, or working-out section combines, recombines, overlays these motifs with each other in a melee which more than ever justifies the title. The recapitulation goes directly from the first motif of the first theme to the second theme. The tranquil portions of this section, however, have become transformed. Gentle themes have become heroic; cooing and wooing have become brutalities. The coda like the development, brings new and sometimes complicated combinations of themes, adds fresh rhythmic insistences. The opening subject is treated in modern "mechanistic" manner. And the whole ends in an orgy of Voodooistic furore.

That Professor Josten is interested in this type of material becomes further evident from his plans for the present year. Smith College grants him this year his "sabbatical" year of absence. To Europe he will repair shortly after the present performances of his new work, there to engage in the composition of a ballet-opera, also on an African subject. The call of the jungle, it would seem, he has not yet fully answered. A. H. M.

and recounts ces with de-events have
There were realm of con-whom he had accepted the reign depart-cession to Sir n 1912 he re-he received a ssinated

ufus B. Tuxeteran

War veteran liest residents, ne, Lake Atti-age of ninety-in Amesbury, 7, 1862, was n Tewkesbury
e couple cele-wedding anniee years in the t of this period y B, 40th New taken prisoner as confined in ond, Va. Mr. ence at Ford's when President

ves two daugh-nd Mrs. James sons, Clarence ad, Frank H. each, Fla., and his town oses much of rough space gained in its suavity, and The mellowed ed every sub-in vibration ith blood in o experience itact. Each its distinc

h its broad o" with its more angu slow move senses as a typical awn out to away with ame move-es contact nembrance

Sea" was phenom-may, last bsorbedly wondrous ough it close. It pleased music (s Afte
the most sees hadow;
ment of nd and before ears, a an ec-cosmic es one ea. It ically, owever
t odds at one ises.
rnism from a ement vement chang-h that pro-

GE

To many again, Dr. Koussevitzky piled fresh discovery upon fresh discovery in the second symphony of Sibelius. This music is no less individual than that of Debussy. It is, however, music in which figuration, development and form such as one might expect in a large symphonic work, have place. It is likewise music of melody—surpassing melody, never usual, never trite always unusual, to our ears at least, and always vital, as witness the poignant and later impassioned third movement. But to say that a composition has form and melody of a high order of course will never describe the music of Sileblius. Better to say that the listener feels in it some great unifying principle and emotional force, obtaining one's attention gradually and eventually engrossing one by its logic and power; and that the means by which this is accomplished—the musical idiom, in short—is peculiar to one composer, Sibelius.

In this Second Symphony, as well as in the music of Handel and Debussy, Dr. Koussevitzky's service was that of drawing together all separate strands, of encompassing and compacting the whole so that we of the audience observed the design in all its completeness and all its power. Dr. Koussevitzky has been known to vary his pace from concert to concert. Last evening, he served as quick and immediate interpreter. N. M. J.

A New Italian About to Make Bostonian Bow

To Begin the Orchestral Year, Mr. Koussevitzky Presents Pick-Mangiagalli

TO ITALY, to a composer as yet untried "at these concerts," Mr. Koussevitzky turns for his first novelty of the season. Not frequently of late has an Italian been heard at Symphony Hall. As if in compensation, the honor of a place on a program beginning a new musical year, goes to a son of Milan via Vienna. Beethoven and Debussy, in thrice-tried numbers, fill the rest of the list. With them is announced, for the first time in America, Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli's "Prelude e Fuga per Orchestra," Opus 47. From him only smaller works have thus far been heard in Boston, though Chicago, Philadelphia, Cincinnati have listened to him orchestrally. For information one turns inevitably to the writings of Guido M. Gatti, chief apostle of modern Italian music in journals on both sides of the Atlantic. In these words Mr. Gatti begins an article on Pick-Mangiagalli in The Musical Quarterly:

> One who should make no account, while reviewing the spiritual and formal factors in the works of Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, of the master's long sojourn in Vienna and of the influence that the Viennese artistic and social environment exerted on the development of his personality, would renounce a priori one of the keys that the critic has at his disposal for deciphering, as his appointed task, the artist's personality per se and in relation to others. After all, our love of country will not suffer if we keep well in view the artist's education in Vienna, when we have once established the points wherein Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli is heart and soul Italian, although born in Bohemia.

All of which requires a biographical note in explanation. Pick-Mangiagalli, though of Italian stock, was born at Strakowitz, in Bohemia, July 10, 1883. He studied at Prague, Milan, Vienna. At the Milan Conservatory his teachers were Appiani for piano, Ferroni for composition. He graduated in 1903 and went immediately to Vienna. There he made his début as pianist, and there he remained for a number of the formative years of his life. Viennese influence has thus been as potent with him as Italian training and temperament.

Mr. Gatti discovers two consequences of this sojourn in Vienna. First, Pick-Mangiagalli assimilated thoroughly the forms in use in the works of the great Viennese, particularly Brahms. This influence is said to have been all-powerful. Nor did the Viennese waltz fail to make impression. Secondly, says Mr. Gatti, he was influenced by "the absorption of the habits of thought and expression typical to the town-bred man, specific characteristics peculiar to the town, that lend to Vienna an original and singularly Southern physiognomy that make it seem like a Latin oasis amidst the Teutonic-Magyar life and culture so much in evidence just outside its gates." And in the London Musical Times Mr. Gatti has written: "The most marked features of this life are a noisy but never vulgar exuberance; a levity in the consideration of life's problems which is never empty frivolity but which is almost identical with an epicurean optimism of decided Mediterranean origin; a humor free from bitterness, and nearly always tending to the grotesque, the caricature and the masque, rather than the philosophy of life (as, e. g., is the case with English humor); lastly, for the other side of the medal, a facile melancholy, lovers' nostalgia, languid sighs proceeding from a boat borne on the grateful waters of the stately Danube, and inevitably gliding into the rhythms of a slow waltz." Outside the schools and apart from the composers, this Viennese life became second nature to Pick-Mangiagalli; was so thoroughly absorbed into his own musical personality that only with difficulty can it be called an influence.

Pick-Mangiagalli has made reputation both as pianist and as composer. He began publishing soon after his graduation from the Milan Conservatory. He has written much for piano; a considerable amount of chamber music; in the dramatic forms of opera and ballet, and for orchestra. In his early works have been noted, "elegance of line and delicacy of harmony." From the first much of his work has been "in the kingdom of the masquerade." The heroes of the Viennese carnival, of the Italian commedia dell 'arte, are his heroes. Both in the early piano works and later in the ballets and orchestral scores, one comes across Columbine, Pierrot, Harlequin, and the rest of them—"nothing but masks."

His orchestral mastery was acquired from Wagner and Strauss rather than from French sources. He can thus hardly be classed with the younger experimentalists. "He is disposed," says Mr. Gatti, man in the program-book of the Philadelphia Orchestra, "toward the traditional ways of Richard Strauss, Dukas, Rimsky-Korsakov and the earlier Stravinsky of "The Fire-Bird," though sometimes he swings back into the past and reminds us of Wagner the omnipresent or even of Grieg." In the same vein, Mr. Gatti, writing of one of Pick-Mangiagalli's best-known most famous orchestral piece, the Nocturne and Fantastic Rondo" of 1914, counts it "a score so full of character that it takes its place beside the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas or the Fire-Art Works of Stravinsky. . . . for the skill with which certain effects of almost brutal chiaroscuro are produced." Like Strauss, Pick-Mangiagalli is skilled in the manipulation of mass effects. No less, however, has he a keen ear for the savors of individual instrument. His kinship to Strauss be it further said, is more through the fantastic "Till Eulenspiegel" than the more grandiose canvases of the German.

The Prelude and Fugue, Opus 47, which is to be heard for the first time in this country on Friday and Saturday, was published in 1927—a very recent work. It stands in the key of C major. It employs the usual large orchestra of the present day. A figure, a "preluding figure" after the manner of the old contrapuntists, one might say, is at once announced by all the violins. This figure, now as foreground, now as background, dominates, in true prelude-style, the whole of the composition. It is such a figure, however, as a Strauss rather than a Bach might have invented. For, beginning upon the lowest G of the violins, in three measures it makes its far-flung ascent through as many octaves. Almost at the start, there are rhythmic punctuations from winds in the modern manner. Trumpets, marcato, sound a virile, triumphant sort of motif as the first climax is reached. The orchestra subsides, violas alone playing darkly and softly the dominant figure, while woodwinds sing a far gentler song. Again a climax with the trumpet motif and again subsidence to the gentler music, this time somewhat more expanded. Horns have luscious harmonies in preparing for the final climax—of course with development of the trumpet motif and vigorous working of the "preluding figure."

In the fugue one may suspect the presence of the composer's characteristic humor. His subject is common place of common places—nothing more or less than a full octave of the simple C major scale, played in plain, rhythmically unadorned, stodgy dotted quarters, from tenor C to middle C, by a bass clarinet. When the bassoon takes the scale as "answer," the bass-clarinet continues with counter-subject, playful, piquant, almost more worked than the subject itself. Later when it appears in higher registers, this counter-subject will be bright, sparkling, full of verve. But when it first enters in low register in bass-clarinet, it is nothing short of grotesque diablerie. An oboe and a clarinet each sing subject and counter subject, ending the "exposition."

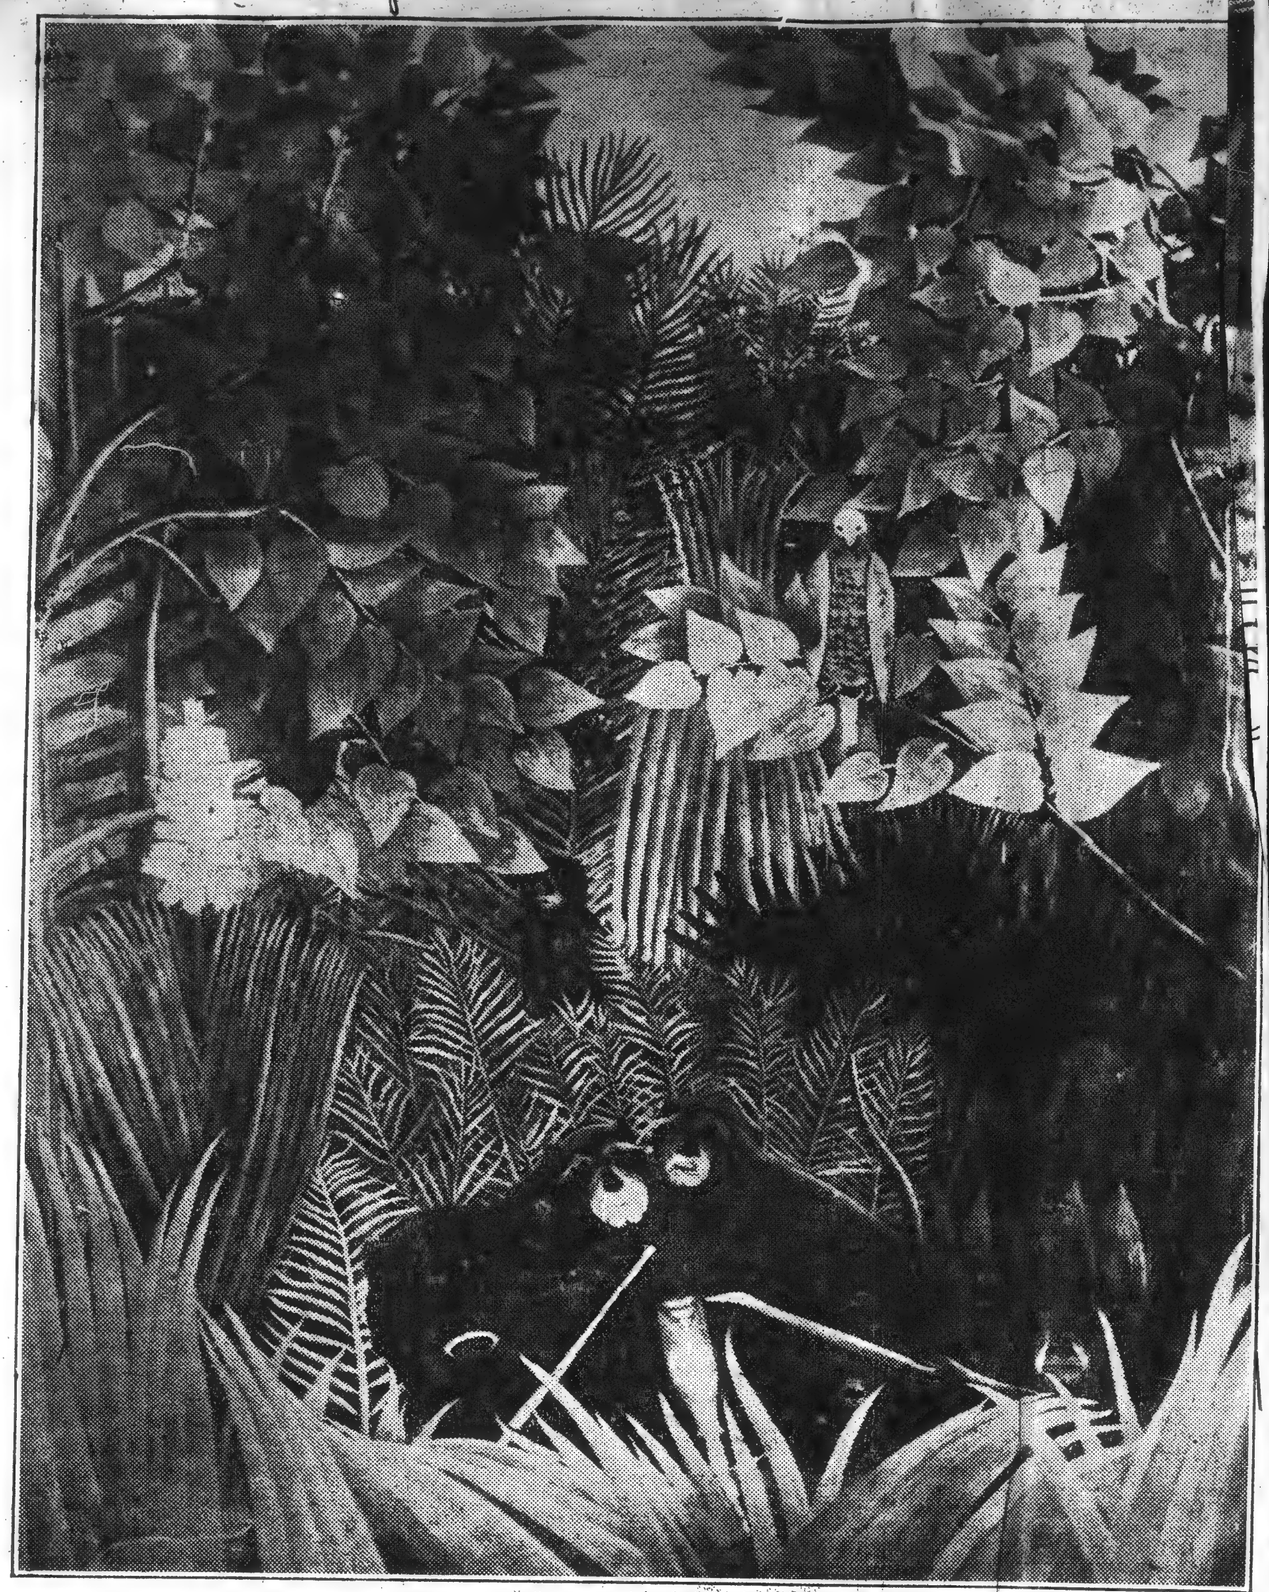
From this point the fugue proceeds through bright and witty episodes based chiefly on the counter-subject, and weighty, mock-serious entries of the scale-subject. It is an exceedingly well-ordered fugue. Further, it hides its academic skill in the rapid succession of light, gay moods. It builds up—in orthodox fashion—a strong climax on a pedal on the dominant, G. This in turn leads to a coda which grows more and more animated in rhythm; uses the simple scale figure faster and faster, ends in a series of swirling ascents of scale passages. . . . Even the practise-material of our infant may yield music!

A. H.

Boston Transcript

Fear's Fetid Field

Oct 26



"Foret Exotique" (Colby)

Henri Roussel's Picture, Which Suggested to Werner Josten the Symphonic Movement, "Jungle," Played This Week at the Symphony Concerts

(By Courtesy of The Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library)

A SEASON On Boston Boards N SUGGESTED

Koussevitzky, in Answer to a Question During Interview, Voices Proposal Believed Not Impossible

Oct 27 Globe

(Photo by Caro)
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

By STEPHEN SOMERVELL

A short Summer season of opera in Boston by a company whose singers would be the finest obtainable at the time, whose orchestra would be none other than the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and whose conductor would be Serge Koussevitzky! There is an idea to stir the imagination of opera enthusiasts not only in Boston but all over the world—an idea which, if ever it were brought to fruition, might make of Boston an operatic Mecca.

This sensational idea probably has not even been considered yet by those who could make it possible; to the newly-returned conductor himself it seemed to occur merely in the form of a question: "Why should not such a thing be possible here in Boston?" Yet many a brilliant undertaking has sprung from beginnings no less casual.

It was toward the close of an interview that the writer put to Mr Koussevitzky a question which, no doubt, every interviewer has insisted upon asking him since the conductor first became subjected to the attentions of that inquisitive fraternity—or, at any rate, since he first became known predominantly as a symphony conductor.

Cites Experiences

"Would you not like to conduct in opera if a sufficiently attractive opportunity were to present itself?"

"Well," Mr Koussevitzky replied, "I have, as you probably know, done a great deal of operatic conducting at one time or another, in Russia and in other European countries. It is an interesting and stimulating task, but not without irritating features. Too often the conductor is at the mercy of the whims and vanity of spoiled and inefficient singers; too often he is faced with inferior orchestras and the impossibility of securing adequate rehearsal. It was this last reason which, only last Summer, for example, led me to cancel my engagement to conduct Musorgsky's 'Boris Godounoff' at the Paris Opera.

"Unexpectedly pleasant experiences, for all that, occasionally fall to the lot of the visiting conductor of opera," Mr Koussevitzky continued. "In Lisbon, on one occasion, I found one of the most unpromising orchestras that it has ever been my ill-fortune to encounter. I had practically to teach most of the players their instruments (I have, of course, made it my business to master the technique of most of the orchestral instruments), and I fear I was no easy or polite taskmaster. Imaginé my astonishment, therefore on approaching the rostrum to begin the overture on the opening night, to find my path and the rostrum itself strewn with flowers. It was the men of the orchestra—the same men whom I had so mercilessly bullied—that had provided them and were now applauding me vociferously. I was extremely touched."

Makes Suggestion

"Do you think that we in Boston may ever have an opportunity of hearing your work as an opera conductor?" Mr Koussevitzky was asked.

"How is that possible?" was the rejoinder. "Our concerts in Boston, Cambridge, New York and many other cities, and our numerous rehearsals for these concerts, demand the whole of my time and strength. Any additional activities during the season would be unthinkable."

"But here is an idea for you," he said suddenly, as though inspired, "if you are so interested in an opera season of Boston's own. Why should it not be possible, in May or June, when the Symphony concerts are over, to give some operatic performances of a hitherto unheard-of quality. We have a world-famous orchestra. There is your opera house. We could engage the best singers available and with the same careful rehearsals that we give to our symphony programs we could secure results that would be worth bearing. Of course this is mere speculation, but not, I think, an entirely unreasonable one."

It goes without saying that Mr Koussevitzky has brought back with him, as usual, a goodly collection of new and unknown works. Nearly all of them are, of course, by contemporary composers.

"Music is a living art, not a dead one," he said. "I shall continue to devote an important part of my programs to examples of the most recent music. I shall do so, not only in order to keep the essential fact of music's constant growth and change before the minds of symphony audiences, but also with the object of enabling them to enjoy the stimulating experience of hearing, side by side with older music of long-established worth, new music which is of significance, both intrinsically and as

A New Italian About to Make Bostonian Bow

To Begin the Orchestral Year, Mr. Koussevitzky Presents Pick-Mangiagalli

TO ITALY, to a composer as yet untried "at these concerts," Mr. Koussevitzky turns for his first novelty of the season. Not frequently of late has an Italian been heard at Symphony Hall. As if in compensation, the honor of a place on a program beginning a new musical year, goes to a son of Milan via Vienna. Beethoven and Debussy, in thrice-tried numbers, fill the rest of the list. With them is announced, for the first time in America, Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli's "Prèlude e Fuga per Orchestra," Opus 47. From him only smaller works have thus far been heard in Boston, though Chicago, Philadelphia, Cincinnati have listened to him orchestrally. For information one turns inevitably to the writings of Guido M. Gatti, chief apostle of modern Italian music in journals on both sides of the Atlantic. In these words Mr. Gatti begins an article on Pick-Mangiagalli in The Musical Quarterly:

> One who should make no account, while reviewing the spiritual and formal factors in the works of Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, of the master's long sojourn in Vienna and of the influence that the Viennese artistic and social environment exerted on the development of his personality, would renounce a priori one of the keys that the critic has at his disposal for deciphering, as his appointed task, the artist's personality per se and in relation to others. After all, our love of country will not suffer if we keep well in view the artist's education in Vienna, when we have once established the points wherein Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli is heart and soul Italian, although born in Bohemia.

All of which requires a biographical note in explanation. Pick-Mangiagalli, though of Italian stock, was born at Strakowitz, in Bohemia, July 1[illegible]. He studied at Prague, Milan, [illegible]. At the Milan Conservatory his t[illegible] were Appiani for piano, Ferroni f[illegible] position. He graduated in 1903 a[illegible] immediately to Vienna. There h[illegible] his début as pianist, and there [illegible] mained for a number of the fo[illegible] years of his life. Viennese influen[illegible] thus been as potent with him as [illegible] training and temperament.

Mr. Gatti discovers two conseq[illegible] of this sojourn in Vienna. First, [illegible] Mangiagalli assimilated thorough[illegible] forms in use in the works of the [illegible] Viennese, particularly Brahms. T[illegible] fluence is said to have been all-po[illegible] Nor did the Viennese waltz fail to[illegible] impression. Secondly, says Mr. [illegible] he was influenced by "the absorp[illegible] the habits of thought and expressi[illegible] cal to the town-bred man, specific c[illegible] acteristics peculiar to the town, tha[illegible] lend to Vienna an original and singu[illegible] larly Southern physiognomy that make[illegible] it seem like a Latin oasis amidst th[illegible] Teutonic-Magyar life and culture so [illegible] nuch in evidence just outside its gates." And in the London Musical Times Mr. Gatti has written: "The most marked features of this life are a noisy but never vulgar exuberance; a levity in the consideration of life's problems which is never empty frivolity but which is almost identical with an epicurean optim[illegible]sm of decided Mediterranean origin; a humor free from bitterness, and nearly always tending to the grotesque, the caricature and the masque, rather than the philosophy of life (as, e. g., is the case with English humor); lastly, for the other side of the medal, a facile melancholy, lovers' nostalgia, languid sighs proceeding from a boat borne on the ateful waters of the stately Danube, nd inevitably gliding into the rhythms f a slow waltz." Outside the schools nd apart from the composers, this Vinnese life became second nature to ick-Mangiagalli; was so thoroughly absorbed into his own musical personality that only with difficulty can it be called an influence.

Pick-Mangiagalli has made reputation both as pianist and as composer. He began publishing soon after his graduation from the Milan Conservatory. He has written much for piano; a considerable amount of chamber music; in the dramatic forms of opera and ballet, and for orchestra. In his early works have been noted, "elegance of line and delicacy of harmony." From the first much of his work has been "in the kingdom of the masquerade." The heroes of the Viennese carnival, of the Italian commedia dell 'arte, are his heroes. Both in the early piano works and later in the ballets and orchestral scores, one comes across Columbine, Pierrot, Harlequin, and the rest of them—"nothing but masks."

His orchestral mastery was acquired from Wagner and Strauss rather than from French sources. He can thus hardly be classed with the younger experimentalists. "He is disposed," says Mr. [illegible]man in the program-book of the Philadelphia Orchestra, "toward the traditional ways of Richard Strauss, Dukas, Rimsky-Korsakov and the earlier Stravinsky of "The Fire-Bird," though sometimes he swings back into the past and reminds us of Wagner the omnipresent or even of Grieg." In the same vein, Mr. Gatti, writing of one of Pick-Mangiagalli's best-known most famous orchestral piece, the Nocturne and Fantastic Rondo" of 1914, counts it a score so full of character that it takes its place beside the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas or the Fire-Art Works of Stravinsky. . . . for the skill with which certain effects of almost brutal chiaroscuro are produced." Like Strauss, Pick-Mangiagalli is skilled in the manipulation of mass effects. No less, however, has he a keen ear for the savors of individual instrument. His kinship to Strauss be it further said, is more through the fantastic "Till Eulenspiegel" than the more grandiose canvases of the German

The Prelude and Fugue, Opus 47, which is to be heard for the first time in this country on Friday and Saturday, was published in 1927—a very recent work. It stands in the key of C major. It employs the usual large orchestra of the present day. A figure, a "preluding figure" after the manner of the old contrapuntists, one might say, is at once announced by all the violins. This figure, now as foreground, now as background, dominates, in true prelude-style, the whole of the composition. It is such a figure, however, as a Strauss rather than a Bach might have invented. For, beginning upon the lowest G of the violins, in three measures it makes its far-flung ascent through as many octaves. Almost at the start, there are rhythmic punctuations from winds in the modern manner. Trumpets, marcato, sound a virile, triumphant sort of motif as the first climax is reached. The orchestra subsides, violas alone playing darkly and softly the dominant figure, while woodwinds sing a far gentler song. Again a climax with the trumpet motif and again subsidence to the gentler music, this time somewhat more expanded. Horns have luscious harmonies in preparing for the final climax—of course with development of the trumpet motif and vigorous working of the "preluding figure."

In the fugue one may suspect the presence of the composer's characteristic humor. His subject is common place of common places—nothing more or less than a full octave of the simple C major scale, played in plain, rhythmically unadorned, stodgy dotted quarters, from tenor C to middle C, by a bass clarinet. When the bassoon takes the scale as "answer," the bass-clarinet continues with counter-subject, playful, piquant, almost more worked than the subject [illegible]. Later when it appears in [illegible] ters, this [illegible]

Oct 27 29 Sl

SUMMER OPERA SEASON IN BOSTON SUGGESTED

Koussevitzky, in Answer to a Question During Interview, Voices Proposal Believed Not Impossible

Oct 27 Globe

(Photo by Caro)
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

By STEPHEN SOMERVELL

A short Summer season of opera in Boston by a company whose singers would be the finest obtainable at the time, whose orchestra would be none other than the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and whose conductor would be Serge Koussevitzky! There is an idea to stir the imagination of opera enthusiasts not only in Boston but all over the world—an idea which, if ever it were brought to fruition, might make of Boston an operatic Mecca.

This sensational idea probably has not even been considered yet by those who could make it possible; to the newly-returned conductor himself it seemed to occur merely in the form of a question: "Why should not such a thing be possible here in Boston?" Yet many a brilliant undertaking has sprung from beginnings no less casual.

It was toward the close of an interview that the writer put to Mr Koussevitzky a question which, no doubt, every interviewer has insisted upon asking him since the conductor first became subjected to the attentions of that inquisitive fraternity—or, at any rate, since he first became known predominantly as a symphony conductor.

Cites Experiences

"Would you not like to conduct in opera if a sufficiently attractive opportunity were to present itself?"

"Well," Mr Koussevitzky replied, "I have, as you probably know, done a great deal of operatic conducting at one time or another, in Russia and in other European countries. It is an interesting and stimulating task, but not without irritating features. Too often the conductor is at the mercy of the whims and vanity of spoiled and inefficient singers; too often he is faced with inferior orchestras and the impossibility of securing adequate rehearsal. It was this last reason which, only last Summer, for example, led me to cancel my engagement to conduct Musorgsky's 'Boris Godounoff' at the Paris Opera.

"Unexpectedly pleasant experiences, for all that, occasionally fall to the lot of the visiting conductor of opera," Mr Koussevitzky continued. "In Lisbon, on one occasion, I found one of the most unpromising orchestras that it has ever been my ill-fortune to encounter. I had practically to teach most of the players their instruments (I have, of course, made it my business to master the technique of most of the orchestral instruments), and I fear I was no easy or polite taskmaster. Imagine my astonishment, therefore on approaching the rostrum to begin the overture on the opening night, to find my path and the rostrum itself strewn with flowers. It was the men of the orchestra—the same men whom I had so mercilessly bullied—that had provided them and were now applauding me vociferously. I was extremely touched."

Makes Suggestion

"Do you think that we in Boston may ever have an opportunity of hearing your work as an opera conductor?" Mr Koussevitzky was asked.

"How is that possible?" was the rejoinder. "Our concerts in Boston, Cambridge, New York and many other cities, and our numerous rehearsals for these concerts, demand the whole of my time and strength. Any additional activities during the season would be unthinkable."

"But here is an idea for you," he said suddenly, as though inspired, "if you are so interested in an opera season of Boston's own. Why should it not be possible, in May or June, when the Symphony concerts are over, to give some operatic performances of a hitherto unheard-of quality. We have a world-famous orchestra. There is your opera house. We could engage the best singers available and with the same careful rehearsals that we give to our symphony programs we could secure results that would be worth hearing. Of course this is mere speculation, but not, I think, an entirely unreasonable one."

It goes without saying that Mr Koussevitzky has brought back with him, as usual, a goodly collection of new and unknown works. Nearly all of them are, of course, by contemporary composers.

"Music is a living art, not a dead one," he said. "I shall continue to devote an important part of my programs to examples of the most recent music. I shall do so, not only in order to keep the essential fact of music's constant growth and change before the minds of symphony audiences, but also with the object of enabling them to enjoy the stimulating experience of hearing, side by side with older music of long-established worth, new music which is of significance, both intrinsically and as

Boston Transcript Oct 26

Fear's Fetid Field

(Colby)

"Foret Exotique"

Which Suggested to Werner Josten the Symphonic Movement, Played This Week at the Symphony Concer

(Courtesy of The Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library)

an indication of the way in which the history of the art is shaping itself in our own day. And lastly, but not least, I shall do it in order to give encouragement and stimulation to those whose labors and talents are keeping the art alive and vigorous. Not all the young men whose works we perform are geniuses, of course, but all have produced something worth hearing. I regard the ever-increasing demand for tickets for the Symphony concerts, which are entirely sold out, as a proof that my policy, and that of the trustees, is appreciated by the public."

Lauds Americans

An increased acquaintance with the work of the young American composers of today has brought Mr Koussevitzky to the opinion that they are considerably more promising than their European contemporaries. He finds them superior, if not in solidity of musical culture, at least in originality and in freshness of inspiration. Several works by American composers will be performed this season, including symphonies by Aaron Copland (whom Mr Koussevitzky regards as one of the most interesting of them all), and the equally promising Roger Sessions, Samuel Gardner's "Broadway," Gruenberg's "Enchanted Isle," Fairchild's "Chants Negres," and a new symphony by Burlingame Hill.

Among the European novelties, besides those which the first concerts have already brought forth, there will be a remarkable Third Symphony by Prokofieff (very different from the "Classical Symphony"), a Second Symphony by the British composer, Arnold Bax, a Concerto for wind instruments by Hindemith, Three Pieces for String Orchestra by Alban Berg (composer of the opera "Wozzek"), a set of Variations by Arnold Schoenberg, Suites by Enesco and Roussel (the latter announced as a world premiere), pieces by Wetzler, Hauer and Martelli, a Concerto Grosso by Philippe Lazar, and "Five Grimaces" by the whimsical Eric Satie, who, though no longer living, is still too little heard.

"European Novelties"

Two further "European novelties" to be heard this season are by composers far from modern.

These are an unpublished suite for wind orchestra by Ludwig Spohr, a younger contemporary of Beethoven, and Bach's enigmatic masterpiece, "Die Kunst der Fuge," as orchestrated by Wolfgang Graeser, a brilliant young musician and scholar who died by his own hand last year at the age of 22. This work has hitherto been regarded as unplayable, and as nothing more than an elaborate series of exercises in the intricacies of fugal composition, in which Bach lavished all his marvelous technical skill and demonstrated every possible contrapuntal device. In Graeser's version, however, it has had during the past year a phenomenal success all over Germany, and has proved itself, by the testimony of those who have heard it, to be exceedingly great music, and not merely a technical tour de force.

In other respects, too, this will be an interesting series of concerts. Mr Koussevitzky plans a festival for the latter part of the season, for he has formed the opinion that some such musical celebration as the unforgettable Beethoven Festival, though not necessarily on so large a scale, should be held here once every two years. Brahms is the composer to be honored during the current season. But Mr Koussevitzky will not add a word to the little that is publicly known at present concerning the way in which the orchestra will celebrate, in 1930, its 50th anniversary.

"All I can tell you is that it will be a most brilliant commemoration," he said.

"Conductorless Orchestras"

"Do you expect that the much-discussed plan of a European concert tour for the orchestra will mature next Summer?" Mr Koussevitzky was asked.

"I hope so," he replied, "for we are impatiently awaited over there. No other American orchestra enjoys nearly so great a renown in Europe as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its fame reached the old world first in the days of Nikisch and has not diminished since. We should be assured of a most enthusiastic welcome."

"Conductorless orchestras," says Mr Koussevitsky, such as have been organized with varying success in places as far apart as Moscow and New York, are an admirable idea."

And the brilliant conductor of the Bosto nSymphony Orchestra went on to explain this unexpected opinion by means of a paradox.

"Once an orchestra of this kind has trained itself into readiness to give an acceptable concert, it is in excellent condition to be taken over by a capable conductor. The sense of individual responsibility with which, in theory at least, each player in such on orchestra becomes inspired, is an undoubted stimulus to conscientious, thoughtful and sensitive work. If an orchestra imbued with this spirit were to come into the hands of a first-rate conductor, it would be likely, other things being equal, to give performa[nce] superior to those of a body of players trained merely in habits of precision and alert obedience.

"But there is a good deal of bluff in this notion of the so-called 'conductorless orchestra.' There is really no such thing. The players all keep their eyes glued upon the concert master; he directs them with motions of his head, his shoulder, his violin. Though he does not bear the name, the concert master becomes in effect the conductor of the orchestra. But with such an arrangement it takes 20 rehearsals to produce a result that a good conductor can effect in two."

Mr Koussevitzky is once again a resident of Jamaica Plain. There upon a wooded height near the pond he has a rambling house furnished with a sedate respectability and a solid comfort that would surprise many who, seeing in him the restless apostle of a disturbing modernism, would picture him, at home, unfurling a Satanic tail, removing the deceptively elegant shoes that conceal cloven hoofs, and perching himself upon up-to-the-minute Parisian furniture inspired by the diagrams in a textbook of geometry.

But alas for the dramatic proprieties!

In a large and restful, albeit somewhat old-fashioned parlor, furnished with cushioned chairs and settees, a phonograph, and a round table whereon, under a shaded lamp, lie neatly disposed a manuscript score of Gregoire Krein's "Chant de David," a box of Turkish cigarettes, and some trial "proofs" of records newly made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is a bland and courteous gentleman who greets the reviewer.

In conversation, though he speaks often with a warmth and intensity of phrase and manner that bespeak the true enthusiast, his urbanity is seldom disturbed, even by the recollection of an occasional dissenting voice amid the almost unanimous praise lavished upon him by the critics of two continents. But he does not pretend to be totally unmoved by adverse criticism, though he may disagree with it.

"I am the only musician who reads his press notices and admits it!" he declares with charming candor.

It has sometimes been charged against Mr Koussevitzky that his readings of the classics are unconventional. To this charge he replies with a challenge:

"Take the score with you when next I am to perform a symphony of—Beethoven, for example. Follow the score, measure for measure, as the orchestra performs it, and you will see with what minute fidelity I obey every direction of the composer. Every piano, every forte, each diminuendo or crescendo indicated in the score is faithfully made, every tempo indication closely followed.

"That, in fact, is the test that Darius Milhaud once made in Paris. He took the orchestral scores with him to one of my concerts. Afterwards he came to me in great perplexity and said: 'You have done everything that the composers directed by their markings, and nothing that they did not. How it is, then, that your interpretations sound so different from those of other conductors?'

"The reason is, of course, that an infinite number of different degrees of softness may be understood by the term piano, and that forte to one conductor may mean moderately loud and to another extremely loud, while to the same conductor the same terms at different moments may bear somewhat different meanings. It is thus that the individuality of the conductor may express itself while he remains entirely faithful to the espressed intentions of the composer."

Individual Problem

And finally Mr Koussevitzky [gives] this dictum to critics in g[eneral]:

"When you have to judge of the [merits] of a performance, first try to put yourself in the artist's place and discover his intention. Then ask yourself whether the artist has succeeded in realizing it. The degree of his success in this is the measure of his excellence as an artist. No individual conception of the manner of interpreting a given work can be condemned as wrong or regarded as exclusively right. Each artist of musical culture and experience is entitled to his own view. All depends on the ability and the eloquence with which he fulfills his own intent."

Perhaps this may be as good a place as any, since some of Mr Koussevitzky's ideas on interpretation have just been recorded, to set down another comment which may help to illuminate his art. Apropos of a set of "Bas-Reliefs" by Martelli which will be performed, the conductor remarked:

"I myself always feel and render music as a species of bas-relief, with that firm yet fluid plasticity so characteristic of sculpture. Especially in the music of Handel and Brahms do I feel this quality, and it is in their music, particularly, that I try to let my conducting express this idea of the bas-relief."

Koussevitzky on Interpretation

(Garo)

The Conductor Acknowledges His Doctor's Degree from Harvard with a Brief Discourse, Hitherto Only Privately Printed, on His Art

OF all the arts, music and poetry are pre-eminently those that may be brought into closest union with one another . Such a connection is surely well-founded, for at the beginning poetry and music formed a united and indivisible whole. In remote times they existed in a united and indivisible tonal art, and their separation took place rather late. One cannot, on a sound basis, consider painting as the mother of poetry, or affirm that literature gave birth to architecture. To admit that would seem—if not an obvious absurdity—in any case a great paradox. But, if we make a parallel between poetry and music, the situation changes. Between these two arts there is an extraordinary relationship and an astonishing nearness.

Contrary to artistic "biological" history, one may on an equal basis follow the rise of poetry out of music's bosom or consider the inverse—the birth of music from poetry. Both directions will lead us to the same demonstrations and conclusions. Neither contemporary philology nor contemporary musicology—excepting a few individual suppositions—are endowed with the scientific power of proving the priority, that is, the supremacy, of one of these arts over the other.

But both modern philology and modern musical research agree that once poetry and music formed one indivisible art that dwelt in the midst of one united element. The disjunction of poetry and music happened a long time ago, and each of these arts led its self-existence and developed independently of the other; but their passionate attraction remained forever. Poetry always longs to be united to music, so that it tries from time to time to become music endeavoring to incarnate itself into it. This was the case with the symbolist poets not so long ago. ("De la musique avant toutes choses."—Verlaine.)

Music, in its manifestation, yearns toward poetical expression. Lyricism is indispensable both for music and for poetry. The loss of lyrical fire consumes, and deprives of its soul, poetry and music in the same measure. No matter how much they have sought, during the course of their history, ways independent of each other, yet they are fatally doomed to the same nature, like twins, and not only to the same spiritual nature but to the material, too. It is not by chance that the technics of verse instrumentation have been created and become so commonly necessary that it may be doubted whether any modern poet ignores them. The same may be said in reference to poetical rhythm, the technics of which are nearly analogous to the construction of musical rhythm; or of the meaning of poetical intonation, which again is nearly similar to musical intonation.

It is easy to bring together music and poetry. Both have one aim, if you remember the poet's words:

> "Go on and hasten
> To fill again my hungry soul
> With music."
> (Pushkin: "Mozart and Salieri.")

We do not intend to make a parallel between poetry and music in order to talk about their common features, but in order to distinguish one fundamental peculiarity which divides them: poetry is silent music. Its meaning is in the unexpressed and untold. Music is the singing voice of poetry: Let us again remember the poet's verses:

> "Keep still thy voice and disappear
> And hide thy heart and dreams."
> (Tutchev: "Silentium.")

This is the real reciprocal relation between poetry and music. When they are incorporated in concrete words, their relation becomes as if inverse. As much as they attract each other before their incarnation in form and images, when they still dwell in the state of element, so much do they repulse each other and part, when taking a literary or tonal shape. This erotic union and disjunction (which reminds one of the myth of Androgene) is like a symbol, eternally repeating itself and calling to remembrance the bygone existing unity and the rupture which once occurred.

When poetry incorporates itself into verses, it needs tranquility: it seems to be ashamed of its literary nudity and demands silence. On the contrary, music, when it takes a concrete shape, appears to be chained by quietness and violently claims to be expressed in real tones. Only bad verses aspire to be pronounced, playing with the sonority of words; good verses are fond of stillness and silence. In music, we observe the opposite phenomenon; only bad music is hostile to its tonal expression—that is, music which contents itself with its outlines (Papiermusik). Good music requires to be unchained in reproduction. Recited poetry nearly always sounds rhetorical; therefore good verses must be read to oneself, and not aloud.

Music which does not sound appears to be a dead world and loses its significance; its meaning dwells only in the tonal realization. Verses which are not even read (let alone not pronounced) do not lose their active power, but keep in a mysterious manner the ascendancy of poetry. Goethe and Petrarch do not lose their power and strength, but are independent of the fact whether they are remembered and read.

In music it is quite different. Upperformed works form dead layers, which are covered with more dead layers, and contemporary errors are often explained by ignorance and by not listening to the past. That is why poetry and music, being so much akin one to another, part on the basis of some fundamental feature. Music gave birth to the art of interpretation, creating it in its own sphere, as a second and auxiliary art, which poetry does not know at all. In poetry, interpretation is very artificial and changes into dramatic pose—a pose because it appears an imitation of theatrical art, from which poetical interpretation must borrow, for, in its sphere, as an organic art, it cannot arise.

an indication of the way in whi history of the art is shaping in our own day. And lastly, b least, I shall do it in order t encouragement and stimulati those whose labors and talen keeping the art alive and vig
Not all the young men whose we perform are geniuses, of but all have produced something hearing. I regard the ever-inc demand for tickets for the Syn concerts, which are entirely so as a proof that my policy, ar of the trustees, is appreciated public."

Lauds Americans

An increased acquaintance w work of the young America posers of today has brought M sevitzky to the opinion that t considerably more promising th European contemporaries. F them superior, if not in sol musical culture, at least in or and in freshness of inspiratio eral works by American c will be performed this season ing symphonies by Aaron (whom Mr Koussevitzky re one of the most interesting all), and the equally promisi Sessions, Samuel Gardner's way," Gruenberg's "Enchan Fairchild's "Chants Negres, new symphony by Burlingam

Among the European nov sides those which the first have already brought forth, be a remarkable Third Sym Prokofieff (very different "Classical Symphony"), Symphony by the British Arnold Bax, a Concerto for struments by Hindemith, Th for String Orchestra by Al (composer of the opera "Wo set of Variations by Arnol berg, Suites by Enesco an (the latter announced as a miere), pieces by Wetzler, F Martelli, a Concerto Grosso ippo Lazar, and "Five Grim the whimsical Eric Satie, wh no longer living, is still heard.

"European Novelties

Two further "European nov be heard this season are posers far from modern.

These are an unpublished wind orchestra by Ludwig younger contemporary of Be and Bach's enigmatic mas
"Die Kunst der Fuge," as orch by Wolfgang Graeser, a brillia musician and scholar who die own hand last year at the ag
This work has hitherto been as unplayable, and as nothi than an elaborate series of e in the intricacies of fugal co tion, in which Bach lavished all his marvelous technical skill and demonstrated every possible contrapuntal device. In Graeser's version, however, it has had during the past year a phenomenal success all over Germany, and has proved itself, by the testimony of those who have heard it, to be exceedingly great music, and not merely a technical tour de force.

In other respects, too, this will be an interesting series of concerts. Mr Koussevitzky plans a festival for the latter part of the season, for he has formed the opinion that some such musical celebration as the unforgettable Beethoven Festival, though not necessarily on so large a scale, should be held here once every two years.
Brahms is the composer to be honored during the current season. But Mr Koussevitzky will not add a word to the little that is publicly known at present concerning the way in which the orchestra will celebrate, in 1930, its 50th anniversary.

"All I can tell you is that it will be a most brilliant commemoration," he said.

"Conductorless Orchestras"

"Do you expect that the much-discussed plan of a European concert tour for the orchestra will mature next Summer?" Mr Koussevitzky was asked.

"I hope so," he replied, "for we are impatiently awaited over there. No other American orchestra enjoys nearly so great a renown in Europe as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its fame reached the old world first in the days of Nikisch and has not diminished since. We should be assured of a most enthusiastic welcome."

"Conductorless orchestras," says Mr Koussevitsky, such as have been organized with varying success in places as far apart as Moscow and New York, are an admirable idea."

And the brilliant conductor of the Bosto nSymphony Orchestra went on to explain this unexpected opinion by means of a paradox.

"Once an orchestra of this kind has trained itself into readiness to give an acceptable concert, it is in excellent condition to be taken over by a capable conductor. The sense of individual responsibility with which, in theory at least, each player in such on orchestra becomes inspired, is an undoubted stimulus to conscientious, thoughtful and sensitive work. If an orchestra imbued with this spirit were to come into the hands of a first-rate conductor, it would be likely, other things being equal, to give performances superior to those of a body of ly in habits of predience.

d deal of bluff
so-called 'con-here is really ers all keep concert mas-with motions of shoulder, his violin.
does not bear the name,
oncert master becomes in effect ne conductor of the orchestra. But with such an arrangement it takes 20 rehearsals to produce a result that a good conductor can effect in two."

Mr Koussevitzky is once again a resident of Jamaica Plain. There upon a wooded height near the pond he has a rambling house furnished with a sedate respectability and a solid comfort that would surprise many who, seeing in him the restless apostle of a disturbing modernism, would picture him, as home, unfurling a Satanic tail, removing the deceptively elegant shoes that conceal cloven hoofs, and perching himself upon up-to-the-minute Parisian furniture inspired by the diagrams in a textbook of geometry.

But alas for the dramatic proprieties!

In a large and restful, albeit somewhat old-fashioned parlor, furnished with cushioned chairs and settees, a phonograph, and a round table whereon, under a shaded lamp, lie neatly disposed a manuscript score of Gregoire Krein's "Chant de David," a box of Turkish cigarettes, and some trial "proofs" of records newly made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is a bland and courteous gentleman who greets the reviewer.

In conversation, though he speaks often with a warmth and intensity of phrase and manner that bespeak the true enthusiast, his urbanity is seldom disturbed, even by the recollection of an occasional dissenting voice amid the almost unanimous praise lavished upon him by the critics of two continents. But he does not pretend to be totally unmoved by adverse criticism, though he may disagree with it.

"I am the only musician who reads his press notices and admits it!" he declares with charming candor.

It has sometimes been charged against Mr Koussevitzky that his readings of the classics are unconventional. To this charge he replies with a challenge:

"Take the score with you when next I am to perform a symphony of—Beethoven, for example. Follow the score, measure for measure, as the orchestra performs it, and you will see with what minute fidelity I obey every direction of the composer. Every piano, every forte, each diminuendo or crescendo indicated in the score is faithfully made, every tempo indication closely followed.

"That, in fact, is the test that Darius Milhaud once made in Paris. He took the orchestral scores with him to one of my concerts. Afterwards he came to me in great perplexity and said: 'You have done everything that the composers directed by their markings, and nothing that they did not. How it is, then, that your interpretations sound so different from those of other conductors?'

"The reason is, of course, that an infinite number of different degrees of softness may be understood by the term piano, and that forte to one conductor may mean moderately loud and to another extremely loud, while to the same conductor the same terms at different moments may bear somewhat different meanings. It is thus that the individuality of the conductor may express itself while he remains entirely faithful to the espressed intentions of the composer."

Individual Problem

And finally Mr Koussevitzky this dictum to critics in g
"When you have to judge of the of a performance, first try to put self in the artist's place and dis his intention. Then ask you whether the artist has succeede realizing it. The degree of his cess in this is the measure of his cellence as an artist. No individual conception of the manner of interpreting a given work can be condemned as wrong or regarded as exclusively right.
Each artist of musical culture and experience is entitled to his own view.
All depends on the ability and the eloquence with which he fulfills his own intent."

Perhaps this may be as good a place as any, since some of Mr Koussevitzky's ideas on interpretation have just been recorded, to set down another comment which may help to illuminate his art. Apropos of a set of "Bas-Reliefs" by Martelli which will be performed, the conductor remarked:

"I myself always feel and render music as a species of bas-relief, with that firm yet fluid plasticity so characteristic of sculpture. Especially in the music of Handel and Brahms do I feel this quality, and it is in their music, particularly, that I try to let my conducting express this idea of the bas-relief."

Koussevitzky on Interpretation

(Garo)

The Conductor Acknowledges His Doctor's Degree from Harvard with a Brief Discourse, Hitherto Only Privately Printed, on His Art

OF all the arts, music and poetry are pre-eminently those that may be brought into closest union with one another . Such a connection is surely well-founded, for at the beginning poetry and music formed a united and indivisible whole. In remote times they existed in a united and indivisible tonal art, and their separation took place rather late. One cannot, on a sound basis, consider painting as the mother of poetry, or affirm that literature gave birth to architecture. To admit that would seem—if not an obvious absurdity—in any case a great paradox. But, if we make a parallel between poetry and music, the situation changes. Between these two arts there is an extraordinary relationship and an astonishing nearness.

Contrary to artistic "biological" history, one may on an equal basis follow the rise of poetry out of music's bosom or consider the inverse—the birth of music from poetry. Both directions will lead us to the same demonstrations and conclusions. Neither contemporary philology nor contemporary musicology—excepting a few individual suppositions—are endowed with the scientific power of proving the priority, that is, the supremacy, of one of these arts over the other.

But both modern philology and modern musical research agree that once poetry and music formed one indivisible art that dwelt in the midst of one united element. The disjunction of poetry and music happened a long time ago, and each of these arts led its self-existence and developed independently of the other; but their passionate attraction remained forever. Poetry always longs to be united to music, so that it tries from time to time to become music endeavoring to incarnate itself into it. This was the case with the symbolist poets not so long ago. ("De la musique avant toutes choses."—Verlaine,)

Music, in its manifestation, yearns toward poetical expression. Lyricism is indispensable both for music and for poetry. The loss of lyrical fire consumes, and deprives of its soul, poetry and music in the same measure. No matter how much they have sought, during the course of their history, ways independent of each other, yet they are fatally doomed to the same nature, like twins, and not only to the same spiritual nature but to the material, too. It is not by chance that the technics of verse instrumentation have been created and become so commonly necessary that it may be doubted whether any modern poet ignores them. The same may be said in reference to poetical rhythm, the technics of which are nearly analogous to the construction of musical rhythm; or of the meaning of poetical intonation, which again is nearly similar to musical intonation.

It is easy to bring together music and poetry. Both have one aim, if you remember the poet's words:

> "Go on and hasten
> To fill again my hungry soul
> With music."
> (Pushkin: "Mozart and Salieri.")

We do not intend to make a parallel between poetry and music in order to talk about their common features, but in order to distinguish one fundamental peculiarity which divides them: poetry is silent music. Its meaning is in the unexpressed and untold. Music is the singing voice of poetry: Let us again remember the poet's verses:

> "Keep still thy voice and disappear
> And hide thy heart and dreams."
> (Tutchev: "Silentium.")

This is the real reciprocal relation between poetry and music. When they are incorporated in concrete words, their relation becomes as if inverse. As much as they attract each other before their incarnation in form and images, when they still dwell in the state of element, so much do they repulse each other and part, when taking a literary or tonal shape. This erotic union and disjunction (which reminds one of the myth of Androgene) is like a symbol, eternally repeating itself and calling to remembrance the bygone existing unity and the rupture which once occurred.

When poetry incorporates itself into verses, it needs tranquility: it seems to be ashamed of its literary nudity and demands silence. On the contrary, music, when it takes a concrete shape, appears to be chained by quietness and violently claims to be expressed in real tones. Only bad verses aspire to be pronounced, playing with the sonority of words; good verses are fond of stillness and silence. In music, we observe the opposite phenomenon; only bad music is hostile to its tonal expression—that is, music which contents itself with its outlines (Papiermusik). Good music requires to be unchained in reproduction. Recited poetry nearly always sounds rhetorical; therefore good verses must be read to oneself, and not aloud.

Music which does not sound appears to be a dead world and loses its significance; its meaning dwells only in the tonal realization. Verses which are not even read (let alone not pronounced) do not lose their active power, but keep in a mysterious manner the ascendancy of poetry. Goethe and Petrarch do not lose their power and strength, but are independent of the fact whether they are remembered and read.

In music it is quite different. Upperformed works form dead layers, which are covered with more dead layers, and contemporary errors are often explained by ignorance and by not listening to the past. That is why poetry and music, being so much akin one to another, part on the basis of some fundamental feature. Music gave birth to the art of interpretation, creating it in its own sphere, as a second and auxiliary art, which poetry does not know at all. In poetry, interpretation is very artificial and changes into dramatic pose—a pose because it appears an imitation of theatrical art, from which poetical interpretation must borrow, for, in its sphere, as an organic art, it cannot arise.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Galliard-Steinberg, Sonata in G Major; Martelli, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs; Strauss, An Alpine Symphony.

Martelli's Suite was performed for the first time in this country. It was said that the performance yesterday was the first anywhere but in the note furnished by the composer, this Suite is included in the list of compositions that have been performed "many times in Paris and in the French provinces." Now the Suite was composed in 1928; it has certainly not been performed as yet by any one of the leading orchestras of Paris.

Martelli, a Corsican by birth, studied at the Paris Conservatory and now lives in Paris. He is 35 years old; he must have passed the yeasty period as a composer. Although educated musically in Paris, he apparently has not been influenced by the French school that insists on clarity even in impressionistic works and on a certain finesse in harmonic schemes and in orchestration. Perhaps these desirable characteristics are revealed in his other compositions; no doubt he thought that an Assyrian subject demanded a more or less barbaric treatment; but the Assyrians though they delighted in noisy music were far from being barbarians; on the contrary their culture was noteworthy. There may be a Corsican school of music unknown to us, which influenced Martelli in his youth. It would have been an impossible task for him to reproduce veritable musical effects as the Assyrians produced them and enjoyed them. He simply endeavored to translate into tones four bas-reliefs that had impressed him as Liszt and others attempted to do the same with pictures.

The four movements of his Suite, all of them short, were suggested by a winged Jinnee, or spirit good or evil, eagle-headed before the Sacred Tree; a Dance before a personage seated, crowned by a tiara and robed in an embroidered tunic; a Lion and a Lioness in their Lair; and for a finale, the Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal, a mighty man in his day and generation.

It is a pity that before each movement a photograph of the suggesting bas relief could not have been thrown upon a screen. Then some in the audience after each orchestral transcription could have said "Marvellous! Marvellous"; others exclaiming "Not a bit like it." It would be easy to say that Martelli had set himself an impossible task; it is only just to reply that the music showed imagination, which, after all, is indispensable to a composition purposing to be pictorial; if the different movements were to some musically crude from a technical standpoint, or, while showing a certain skill, only affectedly eccentric, should they be hastily dismissed as vain and impotent? The question is not whether this music is truly Assyrian—for who knows the precise nature of the music, except that the tonal scheme was founded on mathematical relations of planets as formulated by astrologers and astronomers? The question is this; putting aside any thought of race or nation, did the music by itself, without any association, impress the senses or the mind?

Personally we answer "yes," but no two hearers are affected in exactly the same manner except by an exciting rhythm. The tavern music that made one man merry, another mad, aroused in Sir Thomas Browne a deep spirit of devotion. Martelli's Dance, with its hypnotic rhythmic monotony, its wild snatches of melody haunts the memory. As for the lion, one might say as Demetrius at the play of "Pyramus and Thisby," performed by the hardhanded man of Athens, "Well roar'd, lion." And there were passages in the Finale —but not in the conventional March section—that were much more than ingenious.

The music by Galliard—tinkered adriotly and enlarged in its proportions by Steinberg—is delightful in its gaiety, also in the suavity of the third movement. The lively pace taken by Dr. Kousevitzky in the first Allegro, although the indication reads Allegro non troppo, displayed the remarkable technical proficiency of the orchestra. Although Galliard was of French parentage and educated musically by Italians living in Germany before he made London his home, how English this music is in the jollity of the fast movements. Simple, direct as this Sonata is, is it not more truly music than the bombastic Symphony by Strauss, superbly performed as this Alpine adventure was? An Alpine symphony. It and its composer remind one of Reuben Pettingill of Waterbury, Me., as described by Artemus Ward:

"He was an extraordinarily skilful young man in the use of a common clasp-knife.

"With that simple weapon he could make from soft wood, horses, dogs, cats, etc. He carved excellent soldiers also.

"I remember his masterpiece.

"It was 'Napoleon Crossing the Alps.'

"Looking at it critically, I should say it was rather short of Alps."

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The Brahms Festival will begin with the concerts of Friday afternoon, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 22. Academic Festival Overture. Symphony No. 3, F major. Symphony No. 2, D major.

6

As an auxiliary art, interpretation is, above all, most closely connected with music. Interpretation manifests itself in two directions. On one side, it serves as a link, becomes the intermediary step between hearer and author. Its most important aim, here, is the creation of a contact between author and public. In this direction, interpretation only then reaches its goal when it produces a real, living contact, when it becomes that vehicle through which the aesthetic value established by the author is transmitted to the public directly and with a greater power. The greater receptivity the interpretation arouses in its listeners, the more perfect will it be. The power of conviction will dominate in the struggle and victory over indifference, and passive receptivity peculiar to the public, generally formed of a casual assembly of people of heterogeneous culture, different tastes, and artistic habits.

Good interpretation leads the public to one denominator, seeming to make homogeneous the mixed crowd, bringing it to one level of receptivity. The impression is that the mass is transformed into one single listener. The first instant of contact created by the good interpreter is the moment of smoothing, of bringing the listeners' minds to some single artistic level. It is the gathering of all the heterogeneity and motley of artistic tastes into one focus, which, in this meaning, resembles the interpreter himself. If that aim is not immediately reached, one must consider the interpretation to have failed and all that follows later is destined also to failure—the contact cannot arise.

The performance will go in one direction. The listeners' receptivity, instead of yearning toward unity, will diverge more and more from the interpretation and will be scattered in the audience itself, provoking, at last, a complete discordance between interpreter and audience. What is called mutual misunderstanding will then happen. The reason is not at all in the fact that the performed music or the interpreter is bad. The cause is quite different: It is the absence of a will in the interpreter, the absence of that power which urges the public to submit itself willingly, or even unwillingly if this is necessary. The performed work may be excellent, but the contact does not arise if the will of interpretation is absent in the interpreter. And the inverse: The performed piece may be of a low artistic quality, but if the interpreter's will is obvious the contact with the listeners will arise in any circumstance.

The matter of second moment in interpretation is the attraction toward the interpreter of the listeners brought to one level of receptivity. This attraction must increase with such strength that, in the end, it has brought the hearer to a complete subordination. If this complete subordination is reached, it gives birth to what is called an immediate receptivity, which overcomes both satiety and indifference and even the peculiar, professional feeling—that is, puts the listeners into an immediate contact with living music and its expression. This is the interpreter's great victory—creating such receptivity on the part of the audience.

Then happens the "awaking"—the listener trying to return to his customary state. If this is easy for him, the whole matter is concluded; if the return to the previous state becomes difficult, sometimes quite impossible, then a very important thing has happened. Awaking from his musical sleep, the listener faces reality, which takes a new shape, an unusual one. As if the world had partly changed, life possesses a new value. A spiritual enrichment has taken place. For the interpreter this is the highest reward, highest step to which interpretation may ascend.

When speaking of interpretation in this direction, we mentioned the listener's willing and unwilling submission. The willing submission arises when the interpreter creates a contact between hearer and author, in conditions habitual to the listeners—this means when the interpreter's performance of a work does not contradict the opinion which the listener has already formed about it.

The forcible submission occurs when the contact arises, not between author and public, but between the public and the interpreter himself, independently of the author and against the public's will, in unusual conditions, when the performance is quite new to the audience, when all the traditions referring to the performance of this work are broken. The forcible submission is, of course, the most difficult. This is individual interpretation, in distinction to the first, which we may consider as objective. Had one to settle the question in favor of one of them (a matter of principle and convictions), one would, of course, vote for a bright, powerful, individual interpretation rather than for a weak, helpless, objective one.

Interpretation is not an art by itself, but an auxiliary one, greatly dependent on the general conditions of musical creation in this or that epoch. What we consider a stylistic performance is the link between musical performance and musical creation—this link being determined in relation to some definite epoch. A stylistic performance, of any quality, can always be only more or less precise. There is no solid basis to the argument that this or that style of our period coincides with previous performances. It is always a matter of guess-work and conventions. The quality of a stylistic performance always depends not so much on traditions as on the sagacity and culture of the interpreter himself.

A good interpreter commands not only the styles of different epochs, but also the composer's styles of one period. At the same time he does not copy anything at all. An interpreter, who possesses a style of his own, creates his performance by uniting past traditions in the shape they reached us with the technics of our time. Neither Bach's nor Beethoven's tempi and dynamics are in accordance with our tempi and dynamics, and to copy servilely the previous performance would mean to retard modernity forcibly and artificially, achieving only dullness; for it is not possible to turn life backward. In a performance of classical work, seeming sometimes free, the departure from the past serves more to transmit the character and meaning of the work than a servile imitation of this past.

Continued on page [illegible], column [illegible]

Dr. Koussevitzky

Continued from Preceding Page

To speak the truth, one must consider interpretation a very young art (in the sense of orchestral conducting). It was born at the end of the nineteenth century and really flourished only in our time. It is a mistake to think that the great conductors of the past were better than the contemporary ones. There is much more solid ground to suppose that such excellent conductors of the nineteenth century as Hans von Bülow or Hector Berlioz would be unable to do anything with the modern orchestra and modern music. Their technics are indivisibly connected with the romantic period, and in our time they would be weak, helpless, just as some winner at a London derby in the nineteenth century, were he even the most marvelous jockey of his time, would not be able to use an aeroplane instead of his horse and replace Lindbergh.

If in Wagner's and Berlioz's time the technics of orchestral conducting were not clear, in such measure as it was then possible to contest the independent part played by a conductor, now these technics of orchestral conducting have reached such fruition that they may, with justice, be considered an independent musical science. Wagner and Berlioz, had one to judge by the testimony of their contemporaries, were excellent conductors; but both, trying to confine to a definite theory the technics of orchestral conducting, could only write a few pages about it. Now, the development of these technics, and their explanation, would need the writing of great scientific and theoretical works.

The technics of a modern conductor are not less complicated and precise than the technics of a modern virtuoso, and the quality of orchestral playing does not depend any less on the fingers, wrist and hand of the conductor than a violinist or a pianist depends on his instrument. The art of a virtuoso is in the submission to himself only of one instrument, on which he plays, and in his union with it. The conductor's technics are not connected immediately with the instruments, but with two groups of living men, toward whom his will is directed. His art is to transform the first group into one vibrating instrument, sounding as if he played on it, not conventionally, but with his own hands and fingers; and the second group, which is the public, the conductor yearns to change into one listener.

Thus, in the form in which it now exists ,interpretation is a new kind of art. It is a product of our time, appearing to be one of the achievements of the twentieth century. The conductor's creation, today, is an offering to the treasury of spiritual values of mankind, on an equal basis with the work of the scientist, the architect, and the painter-creator. The musician interpreter causes the fusion of all the manifestations of the modern man's activity, out of which modern culture is built. Being a painter, he is at the same time an organizer and an educator in the world of the beautiful. He belongs to those happy promoters of mankind who help to vanquish everyday gray existence, lifting it to the ideals towards which life tends.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 23 1929

The Doctor's Response

CONDUCTOR ON CONDUCTING

"One must consider interpretation a very young art (in the sense of orchestral conducting). It was born at the end of the 19th century and really flourished only in our time.

"There is much more solid ground to suppose that such excellent conductors of the 19th century as Hans von Bulow or Hector Berlioz would be unable to do anything with the modern orchestra and modern music. Their technics are indivisibly connected with the romantic period, and in our time would be weak and helpless."

Koussevitzky in acknowledging his doctor's degree from Harvard.

The Man With the Baton

ORCHESTRAL interpretation, declares Serge Koussevitzky in a paper written on his receiving the degree of Doctor of Laws from Harvard University, is an achievement of the twentieth century. Defined, it is a contact brought about between the person directing the players and the people who constitute the house. It is something new on each occasion, always advancing beyond the past and always contradicting any opinions the hearer may happen to have formed. It demands from the artist holding the baton a knowledge of the time in which this or that composer flourished, yet it never repeats what has been said before, never justifies itself by tradition, never imitates historic models.

From the material of discussion, which is a good deal condensed, a reader must suppose Dr. Koussevitzky to be thinking rather strictly of performance in the concert hall and to be counting that of the opera house out. At any rate, when he speaks about music, he seems to mean music in the pure form of sound; generally, too, instrumental sound, dissociated altogether from the theater and the stage and without alloy of dramatic action. The point he evidently intends to make is, that whereas two centuries of composers, from Bach to Debussy, wrote for the orchestra, but a quarter of a century of conductors have really possessed a method for properly handling their works.

Or, to combine assertion and definition, only since about the year 1900 has the man with the stick known that his principal concern is neither his book nor his musicians, but his audience; neither the pages of a score nor the hands and lips of a hundred more or less executants, but the ears of some 3000 listeners. As soon as he understood that, he became an interpreter and was in a position to develop a technique of his art.

With what names this development is chiefly associated, Dr. Koussevitzky in his brief study does not say. Perhaps cities, better than men, would account for the matter. Moscow, Vienna, Berlin, Paris, London and Boston might illustrate it in outline. An interpreter who came up to all that Dr. Koussevitzky's definition demands would presumably be one who could present a suite of Bach's, a symphony of Beethoven's or a tone-picture of Debussy's to the conviction and satisfaction of the public of them all.

—Monitor (Editorial)
Jan. 29, 1929

Boston Criticisms — Oct.
Colonel Oct 12

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the 49th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; Pick-Mangiagalli, Prelude and Fugue (first time in Boston); Debussy, "La Mer"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C minor.

Orchestra and audience welcomed Dr. Koussevitzky's return by standing and applauding heartily.

The only unfamiliar composition on the program was Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue. The name of the composer was not unknown here for Mr. Toscanini early in 1921 brought out the Notturno and Rondo Fantastico when he led La Scala orchestra in Symphony hall. Piano pieces and songs by the Czech-Italian composer have also been heard here.

The announcement that a prelude and fugue for orchestra by any contemporary composer would be played as a rule strikes terror to the stoutest soul, for this form of composition aften turns out to be only a musical exercise to prove that the writer has made sound studies and wishes to be taken seriously; often having few or no ideas, shunning emotion, striving anxiously after unimpeachable conformity to established rules rather than seeking loveliness, or by the pouring of new and sparkling wine into the old bottles of the school to quicken the spirit of the hearer.

And as Pick-Mangiagalli's father was a Czech, his mother an Italian, the question arose by which national inheritance would he be influenced—or by combining what is sometimes described as "German thoughtfulness" and Italian grace and soaring lyricism, would he come to grief, falling between the two. One remembered the sad case of the man who purchased in a second-hand shop a frock coat that had belonged to a clergyman and a pair of trousers that had been cast off by a man given to the races, cards and strong drink. The coat inspired the purchaser with the desire to rescue perishing souls; the trousers urged his feet to tread the paths of sin. Hence a spiritual conflict that was terrible; it turned the wearer into a Laodicean, incapable of good works, held back by pious coat-tails from ruinous diversions and all fleshly lusts.

Pick-Mangiagalli no doubt was not bothered by thought of parentage or early environment. Educated musically at the Milan conservatory, appreciated as a composer first in Germany, he sat down and wrote an interesting, unusual, exciting Prelude and Fugue, which was recognized by the audience, first of all as music. The liveliness of the Prelude was not without classic dignity. There were little episodes in the stirring rush and agreeable orchestral chatter that were suave and beautiful, relieving but not checking by undue sentimentalism the continuous flow. The fugue with its scale subject was daringly planned. Not once was there the thought of perfunctory, obligatory development and filling out of the scheme; the whole movement, exciting, and at the end impressive, was as one spontaneous, mighty musical outburst. The audience felt this at once. Seldom has a composition by a man unknown to the great majority of the hearers been so favorably received and honestly enjoyed.

When Debussy's "La Mer" was first performed here in the consulship of Dr. Muck no hand clapped hand at the Friday afternoon concert. Yesterday the performance deserved heartier applause than it received. Is it not possible that each hearer had his and her idea of what the sea should sound like, and was somewhat disappointed in Debussy's impressions? Did the audience expect to be thrilled by the "spasm of the sky and the shatter of the sea" or to be soothed by lapping waters as in Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," which might be taken for a description of a summer sail on a Nantasket excursion boat?

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the music by Beethoven is justly famous. It is not every conductor who can so eloquently reveal the different phases of romanticism illustrated yesterday by Beethoven, Debussy and Pick-Mangiagalli. But suppose Beethoven's fifth symphony were to be performed only once in four or five years? Would it not then gain in majesty? Dwellers near lofty mountain peaks are too familiar with them to realize their sublimity.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, for strings, op. 6 No. 10. Gregoir Krein "Chant de David," Symphonic poem (first time in the United States), Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird," Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D ma[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS 49TH SEASON

Koussevitzky and Players Given Cordial Welcome

Conductor Assumes Title of "Dr" From Harvard Honorary Degree

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 49th season yesterday afternoon with the first of the 24 Friday subscription concerts, for which every season ticket was, as usual, sold far in advance. The audience gave conductor and players a cordial welcome, applauding warmly at every opportunity before and during the performance of a program which included Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, a new Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's C minor Symphony.

A glance at the first page of the program disclosed only one remarkable change from last season. The conductor's name is now for the first time given as Dr Serge Koussevitzky. He received an honorary degree last June from Harvard. He also holds an honorary degree from Brown.

The personnel of the orchestra, save for the return of Mr Thillois and the resignation of Paul Shirley, is unaltered from last season, though in several instances the ranking of players is changed.

There were very few new faces in the audience. Anyone who relinquishes season tickets for the Friday concerts does so with the knowledge that it will be difficult to obtain seats for a later season, so greatly does the demand exceed the supply. The Saturday and Monday series are likewise sold out for the season, as the six Tuesday concerts seem certain to be also.

Dr Koussevitzky, returning for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument; and to an audience assembled in large measure by the power of his remarkable personality. The present position of the Boston Symphony, as an orchestra again unsurpassed in the world, has been won by his hard and intense effort.

When he came here in 1924 the Boston Symphony had not recovered from the disruptions brought about as an indirect and lamentable consequence of the World War. After five years he has seen it acknowledged everywhere as restored to the front rank among orchestras, though not to its once undisputed preeminence. Something of this may have been in the minds of many of those who rose to their feet to honor him at his first entrance yesterday.

A financial statement from the trustees, inserted in yesterday's programs, bore witness to the high cost of maintaining such an orchestra. The deficit on last season, with every ticket sold, was $145,493.68; of which sum $101,487.67 has been contributed. The trustees conclude their tables of receipts and payments with this appeal:

"We request this year toward deficits $100,000, which comprises the deficit for the ensuing year, plus the $45,000 deficit carried over from last year."

The prices of season tickets for this year have been considerably increased, so that the receipts from concerts will be larger than before. Contributions toward the deficit should be sent to E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon st, Boston. Small as well as large gifts are welcomed.

Three of the four numbers on yesterday's program were from the standard repertory of the orchestra. Of Beethoven's overture and symphony little needs to be said. Dr Koussevitzky's eloquent and individual interpretations of them are familiar to Boston audiences. The orchestra played better than it has usually done at the opening of the season. There were very few details in the performance to indicate that the orchestra had recently reassembled after being scattered since last May.

Debussy's "La Mer," once regarded as a formless impressionist piece, full of daring, if evanescent harmonies, now seems clear and straightforward, with a simplicity and economy of style which recalls such classics as Mozart. Its melodies are now as obvious as its composer's indebtedness to such Russians as Musorgsky and Rimsky Korsakov. Dr Koussevitzky quite rightly stresses the dramatic vigor of much of this score. Writing about "The Sea" even Debussy could scarce avoid boisterous moments.

The novelty, Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, proved to be an agreeable trifle, despite the austere suggestions of the title. The subject of the fugue is an ordinary scale, not one of the pregnant motives found in Bach. The prelude is a facile and sentimental rhapsody saved temporarily from banality by its more or less up-to-date harmonies.

The composer, an Italian by tradition and heredity, though born in Czech-Slovakia, has written other sophisticated salon pieces, some of which have been heard in Boston. No doubt he did not take this prelude and fugue with what Arnold called "high seriousness." His music is easy to listen to, but difficult to remember afterward.

The program announced for next week includes a Handel Concerto Grosso, opus 6, No. 10; "The Song of David," by an unknown Russian composer named Krein; the familiar suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird," and Sibelius' Second Symphony. P. R.

Concert-Chronicle

Beginning in Cambridge

INTO Cambridge went the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening for its first concert of the season in the university town. Out of the first two Boston programs, the list of the evening was compounded—Handel's Tenth Concerto Grosso for Strings, to be played in Boston today and tomorrow; Debussy's three sketches "The Sea," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, out of last week's program. No more receptive audience does the orchestra find than this on the Harvard campus. Twice—in response to a program of three numbers—applause was such as to cause Dr. Koussevitzky to ask the orchestra to rise to its feet in acknowledgment. Both Debussy's sketches and Beethoven's Symphony gave such occasion. But pleasure also came from the Conecrto of Handel with its stately, majestic overture; its playful, rollicking fugue; its suave "air" in quasi-sarabande rhythm; its bouncing, roisterouse finale.

Would Debussy's music of the sea make its same impression if the composer had not decided to give it a title, had not associated it with the sea, had allowed it to stand as merely three symphonic sketches? It is an idle question perhaps. But certainly the whole is a play of tones as much as it is aural picture of the incessantly varying aspects of a huge expanse of water. And just possibly the subconscious attempt of many a hearer at trying to determine for himself just what particular aspect of the sea the composer had in mind at a given time, keeps him from that fullest surrender to the music, the pure sense impression which these sketches demand. That Debussy had no such definite portrayal in mind is evident from his uncertainty as to titles for the different movements—fully discussed in the program book. For Debussy's "The Sea" is free and untrammelled play of tones, as free and boundless as the sea itself.

One reflects also upon the course which this music—most of Debussy's music—has run in the mind of the concert goer. Time was when it sounded strange, incoherent, baffling. Then came full appreciation. And now one can hear that Debussy is too this, or too that; that qualities which were once denied him reside in him in too great abundance! And yet the searcher for beauty can hardly fail to find it in every measure of this score. But beauty, it has been said, resides more in the eyes of the beholder than in the thing he beholds. Where is there better example than in Debussy? And that the eye (in this case the ear) for beauty was not lacking at Cambridge, applause gave ample proof.

Of the fifth symphony of Beethoven what fresh comment can be made? With a smile one thinks both of the elderly gene try, Progress and Think.

Continued on Following Page

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

tleman who left the concert before its performance "because he did not like it" and of the university youth who assures one in tones of awed reverence that if all the music in the world were to be destroyed save one piece, he could be content if that one piece were this same fifth symphony! Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it is an esentially noble one. One thinks about various interpretations of this symphony, both as actually heard, and as at one time or another imagined—including that one of Dr. Koussevitzky with which he began his conductorship here five years ago. But one does not find one to match the superb elevation which clothes these readings of this symphony in the fall of 1929. Small wonder that an audience lingered to do homage to conductor and men.

A. H.

SYMPHONY BEGINS THE NEW SEASON

Orchestra the Same to a Man as That of Last Year

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An orchestra the same to a man and an audience as nearly unchanged as so large a company could well be from one season to the next were certain items on the programme aside from the familiar features of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. The conductor, too, was the same—yet called by a different name. Each of the many references to him in the programme book described hm, not as plain Mr., but as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Thus has the honorary degree conferred upon him last June by Harvard University been heeded at Symphony Hall.

"EGMONT" OUTSTANDING

Dr. Koussevitzky, as he is henceforth to be, made for this initial pair of concerts a programme that achieved unity after a somewhat unusual fashion. The first piece yesterday afternoon was by Beethoven: the Overture to "Egmont"; and that composer's Fifth Symphony served for ending. Between stood a Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, new name at the Symphony Concerts, and Debussy's "La Mer," performed at them now these nine times.

Post Oct 12

At the outset let it be said that the most arresting performance of the afternoon was that of the "Egmont" Overture. A whole column of newspaper print might be devoted to a summing-up of its many excellencies. Suffice it, however, to say that it was in rare degree vital, elastic, dramatically suggestive, yet always musical. Only an orchestra of the highest attainments could have so vivified and freshened these long familiar measures, while only a conductor of genius as well as of rare skill could have directed it to such a feat. Yet the audience, absorbed for the moment in finding its next-door neighbor once more by its respective side, apparently noticed these marvels but little. A mere ripple of applause served for comment on them.

Pick-Mangiagalli Wins Favor

Far more enthusiastic was the reception accorded the new piece of the afternoon. Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, half Italian by blood and wholly so by present residence although a Czech by birth, was introduced to Boston a few seasons ago by Mr. Toscanini and the orchestra of La Scala. As a composer he belongs to the right rather than the left wing. The older principles and procedures suit his requirements.

His Prelude is well designed, sonorous (at times almost to blatancy) and melodious; hardly distinctive or distinguished. His Fugue, which has for its subject nothing else than an ascending scale of C major, answered of course by that of G, is ingenious, well planned and ably executed. Not surprising is it that this piece, most brilliantly played, should have found immediate favor.

Debussy on Decline

From the Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun" through the Nocturnes and "La Mer" to the final three "Images," Debussy's major orchestral pieces decline steadily in inventiveness, even as they progress in adroitness of workmanship. On some ears "La Mer" already palls, even in a performance as sympathetic as that of yesterday. Finally Dr. Koussevitzky's unorthodox nd generally triumphant way with the ifth Symphony is well-known to Bosonians. The stirring performance of he Finale yesterday afternoon proked the accustomed storm of apause.

In such wise was the 49th season of e Boston Symphony Orchestra begun.

Boston Criticisms — Oct.
Globe Oct 12

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the 49th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; Pick-Mangiagalli, Prelude and Fugue (first time in Boston); Debussy, "La Mer"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C minor.

Orchestra and audience welcomed Dr. Koussevitzky's return by standing and applauding heartily.

The only unfamiliar composition on the program was Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue. The name of the composer was not unknown here for Mr. Toscanini early in 1921 brought out the Notturno and Rondo Fantastico when he led La Scala orchestra in Symphony hall. Piano pieces and songs by the Czech-Italian composer have also been heard here.

The announcement that a prelude and fugue for orchestra by any contemporary composer would be played as a rule strikes terror to the stoutest soul, for this form of composition often turns out to be only a musical exercise to prove that the writer has made sound studies and wishes to be taken seriously; often having few or no ideas, shunning emotion, striving anxiously after unimpeachable conformity to established rules rather than seeking loveliness, or by the pouring of new and sparkling wine into the old bottles of the school to quicken the spirit of the hearer.

And as Pick-Mangiagalli's father was a Czech, his mother an Italian, the question arose by which national inheritance would he be influenced—or by combining what is sometimes described as "German thoughtfulness" and Italian grace and soaring lyricism, would he come to grief, falling between the two. One remembered the sad case of the man who purchased in a second-hand shop a frock coat that had belonged to a clergyman and a pair of trousers that had been cast off by a man given to the races, cards and strong drink. The coat inspired the purchaser with the desire to rescue perishing souls; the trousers urged his feet to tread the paths of sin. Hence a spiritual conflict that was terrible; it turned the wearer into a Laodicean, incapable of good works, held back by pious coat-tails from ruinous diversions and all fleshly lusts.

Pick-Mangiagalli no doubt was not bothered by thought of parentage or early environment. Educated musically at the Milan conservatory, appreciated as a composer first in Germany, he sat down and wrote an interesting, unusual, exciting Prelude and Fugue, which was recognized by the audience, first of all as music. The liveliness of the Prelude was not without classic dignity. There were little episodes in the stirring rush and agreeable orchestral chatter that were suave and beautiful, relieving but not checking by undue sentimentalism the continuous flow. The fugue with its scale subject was daringly planned. Not once was there the thought of perfunctory, obligatory development and filling out of the scheme; the whole movement, exciting, and at the end impressive, was as one spontaneous, mighty musical outburst. The audience felt this at once. Seldom has a composition by a man unknown to the great majority of the hearers been so favorably received and honestly enjoyed.

When Debussy's "La Mer" was first performed here in the consulship of Dr. Muck no hand clapped hand at the Friday afternoon concert. Yesterday the performance deserved heartier applause than it received. Is it not possible that each hearer had his and her idea of what the sea should sound like, and was somewhat disappointed in Debussy's impressions? Did the audience expect to be thrilled by the "spasm of the sky and the shatter of the sea" or to be soothed by lapping waters as in Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," which might be taken for a description of a summer sail on a Nantasket excursion boat?

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the music by Beethoven is justly famous. It is not every conductor who can so eloquently reveal the different phases of romanticism illustrated yesterday by Beethoven, Debussy and Pick-Mangiagalli. But suppose Beethoven's fifth symphony were to be performed only once in four or five years? Would it not then gain in majesty? Dwellers near lofty mountain peaks are too familiar with them to realize their sublimity.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, for strings, op. 6 No. 10. Gregoir Krein "Chant de David," Symphonic poem (first time in the United States), Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird," Sibelius, Symphony No. 2. D ma[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS 49TH SEASON

Koussevitzky and Players Given Cordial Welcome

Conductor Assumes Title of "Dr" From Harvard Honorary Degree

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 49th season yesterday afternoon with the first of the 24 Friday subscription concerts, for which every season ticket was, as usual, sold far in advance. The audience gave conductor and players a cordial welcome, applauding warmly at every opportunity before and during the performance of a program which included Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, a new Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's C minor Symphony.

A glance at the first page of the program disclosed only one remarkable change from last season. The conductor's name is now for the first time given as Dr Serge Koussevitzky. He received an honorary degree last June from Harvard. He also holds an honorary degree from Brown.

The personnel of the orchestra, save for the return of Mr Thillois and the resignation of Paul Shirley, is unaltered from last season, though in several instances the ranking of players is changed.

There were very few new faces in the audience. Anyone who relinquishes season tickets for the Friday concerts does so with the knowledge that it will be difficult to obtain seats for a later season, so greatly does the demand exceed the supply. The Saturday and Monday series are likewise sold out for the season, as the six Tuesday concerts seem certain to be also.

Dr Koussevitzky, returning for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument; and to an audience assembled in large measure by the power of his remarkable personality. The present position of the Boston Symphony, as an orchestra again unsurpassed in the world, has been won by his hard and intense effort.

When he came here in 1924 the Boston Symphony had not recovered from the disruptions brought about as an indirect and lamentable consequence of the World War. After five years he has seen it acknowledged everywhere as restored to the front rank among orchestras, though not to its once undisputed preeminence. Something of this may have been in the minds of many of those who rose to their feet to honor him at his first entrance yesterday.

A financial statement from the trustees, inserted in yesterday's programs, bore witness to the high cost of maintaining such an orchestra. The deficit on last season, with every ticket sold, was $145,493.68; of which sum $101,487.67 has been contributed. The trustees conclude their tables of receipts and payments with this appeal:

"We request this year toward deficits $100,000, which comprises the deficit for the ensuing year, plus the $45,000 deficit carried over from last year."

The prices of season tickets for this year have been considerably increased, so that the receipts from concerts will be larger than before. Contributions toward the deficit should be sent to E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon st, Boston. Small as well as large gifts are welcomed.

Three of the four numbers on yesterday's program were from the standard repertory of the orchestra. Of Beethoven's overture and symphony little needs to be said. Dr Koussevitzky's eloquent and individual interpretations of them are familiar to Boston audiences. The orchestra played better than it has usually done at the opening of the season. There were very few details in the performance to indicate that the orchestra had recently reassembled after being scattered since last May.

Debussy's "La Mer," once regarded as a formless impressionist piece, full of daring, if evanescent harmonies, now seems clear and straightforward, with a simplicity and economy of style which recalls such classics as Mozart. Its melodies are now as obvious as its composer's indebtedness to such Russians as Musorgsky and Rimsky Korsakov. Dr Koussevitzky quite rightly stresses the dramatic vigor of much of this score. Writing about "The Sea" even Debussy could scarce avoid boisterous moments.

The novelty, Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, proved to be an agreeable trifle, despite the austere suggestions of the title. The subject of the fugue is an ordinary scale, not one of the pregnant motives found in Bach. The prelude is a facile and sentimental rhapsody saved temporarily from banality by its more or less up-to-date harmonies.

The composer, an Italian by tradition and heredity, though born in Czech-Slovakia, has written other sophisticated salon pieces, some of which have been heard in Boston. No doubt he did not take this prelude and fugue with what Arnold called "high seriousness." His music is easy to listen to, but difficult to remember afterward.

The program announced for next week includes a Handel Concerto Grosso, opus 6, No. 10; "The Song of David," by an unknown Russian composer named Krein; the familiar suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird," and Sibelius' Second Symphony. P. R.

Concert-Chronicle

Beginning in Cambridge

INTO Cambridge went the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening for its first concert of the season in the university town. Out of the first two Boston programs, the list of the evening was compounded—Handel's Tenth Concerto Grosso for Strings, to be played in Boston today and tomorrow; Debussy's three sketches "The Sea," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, out of last week's program. No more receptive audience does the orchestra find than this on the Harvard campus. Twice—in response to a program of three numbers—applause was such as to cause Dr. Koussevitzky to ask the orchestra to rise to its feet in acknowledgment. Both Debussy's sketches and Beethoven's Symphony gave such occasion. But pleasure also came from the Conecrto of Handel with its stately, majestic overture; its playful, rollicking fugue; its suave "air" in quasi-sarabande rhythm; its bouncing, roisterouse finale.

Would Debussy's music of the sea make its same impression if the composer had not decided to give it a title, had not associated it with the sea, had allowed it to stand as merely three symphonic sketches? It is an idle question perhaps. But certainly the whole is a play of tones as much as it is aural picture of the incessantly varying aspects of a huge expanse of water. And just possibly the subconscious attempt of many a hearer at trying to determine for himself just what particular aspect of the sea the composer had in mind at a given time, keeps him from that fullest surrender to the music, the pure sense impression which these sketches demand. That Debussy had no such definite portrayal in mind is evident from his uncertainty as to titles for the different movements—fully discussed in the program book. For Debussy's "The Sea" is free and untrammelled play of tones, as free and boundless as the sea itself.

One reflects also upon the course which this music—most of Debussy's music—has run in the mind of the concert goer. Time was when it sounded strange, incoherent, baffling. Then came full appreciation. And now one can hear that Debussy is too this, or too that; that qualities which were once denied him reside in him in too great abundance! And yet the searcher for beauty can hardly fail to find it in every measure of this score. But beauty, it has been said, resides more in the eyes of the beholder than in the thing he beholds. Where is there better example than in Debussy? And that the eye (in this case the ear) for beauty was not lacking at Cambridge, applause gave ample proof.

Of the fifth symphony of Beethoven what fresh comment can be made? With a smile one thinks both of the elderly gen-

Continued on Following Page

e try, Progress and Thrift. The

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

tleman who left the concert before its performance "because he did not like it" and of the university youth who assures one in tones of awed reverence that if all the music in the world were to be destroyed save one piece, he could be content if that one piece were this same fifth symphony! Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it is an esentially noble one. One thinks about various interpretations of this symphony, both as actually heard, and as at one time or another imagined—including that one of Dr. Koussevitzky with which he began his conductorship here five years ago. But one does not find one to match the superb elevation which clothes these readings of this symphony in the fall of 1929. Small wonder that an audience lingered to do homage to conductor and men. A. H.

SYMPHONY BEGINS THE NEW SEASON

Orchestra the Same to a Man as That of Last Year

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An orchestra the same to a man and an audience as nearly unchanged as so large a company could well be from one season to the next were certain items on the programme aside from the familiar features of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. The conductor, too, was the same—yet called by a different name. Each of the many references to him in the programme book described hm, not as plain Mr., but as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Thus has the honorary degree conferred upon him last June by Harvard University been heeded at Symphony Hall.

"EGMONT" [illegible] STANDING

Dr. Koussevitz[illegible] forth to be [illegible] of concerts [illegible] unity after[illegible] ion. The [illegible] noon was [illegible] ture to "E[illegible] Fifth Sym[illegible] Between [illegible] Pick-Ma[illegible] Symphon[illegible] Mer," perfo[illegible] nine times.

Post Oct 12

At the outset let it be said that the most arresting performance of the afternoon was that of the "Egmont" Overture. A whole column of newspaper print might be devoted to a summing-up of its many excellencies. Suffice it, however, to say that it was in rare degree vital, elastic, dramatically suggestive, yet always musical. Only an orchestra of the highest attainments could have so vivified and freshened these long familiar measures, while only a conductor of genius as well as of rare skill could have directed it to such a feat. Yet the audience, absorbed for the moment in finding its next-door neighbor once more by its respective side, apparently noticed these marvels but little. A mere ripple of applause served for comment on them.

Pick-Mangiagalli Wins Favor

Far more enthusiastic was the reception accorded the new piece of the afternoon. Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, half Italian by blood and wholly so by present residence although a Czech by birth, was introduced to Boston a few seasons ago by Mr. Toscanini and the orchestra of La Scala. As a composer he belongs to the right rather than the left wing. The older principles and procedures suit his requirements.

His Prelude is well designed, sonorous (at times almost to blatancy) and melodious; hardly distinctive or distinguished. His Fugue, which has for its subject nothing else than an ascending scale of C major, answered of course by that of G, is ingenious, well planned and ably executed. Not surprising is it that this piece, most brilliantly played, should have found immediate favor.

Debussy on Decline

From the Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun" through the Nocturnes and "La Mer" to the final three "Images," Debussy's major orchestral pieces decline steadily in inventiveness, even as they progress in adroitness of workmanship. On some ears "La Mer" already palls, even in a performance as sympathetic as that of yesterday. Finally Dr. Koussevitzky's unorthodox and generally triumphant way with the Fifth Symphony is well-known to Bostonians. The stirring performance of the Finale yesterday afternoon provoked the accustomed storm of applause.

In such wise was the 49th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begun.

Oct 19
Herald

929

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, op. 6, No. 10. R. Strauss, Interlude from the opera "Intermezzo" (first time in Boston). Stravinsky, Suite from the ballet "The Fire-Bird." Sibelius, Symphony no. 2. The "Waltz Scene" from "Intermezzo" which had been announced for performance, was not played. Without this piece the concert was too long. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the symphony was heard for the first time.

Strauss's "Intermezzo" was suggested by a domestic misunderstanding in consequence of a letter which was intended for a colleague of the same name. Strauss's wife raged and talked of divorce. In the opera—the libretto was written by the composer—Strauss is brought on the stage as Conductor Storch; his wife as Mme. Storch. This was not the first time that Strauss made use of his Pauline for his own musical glorification. In the "Domestic" Symphony he portrays her musically as whimsical, capricious, irritating; now shrewish, now seductive; nor does he hesitate to picture in sensuous strains their reconciliation and fond embracing. What relation this Interlude has to the action of the play is unknown to those who have not heard the opera. It has been said by a German thinking deeply that the "spiritual presentation of the action lies chiefly with the orchestra between acts." The Interlude heard yesterday is suave, melodious, richly colored, without rising to any height of emotion. Whether it portrays Mme. Strauss-Storch after the comforting explanation, or is simply music, must be left to the imagination of the hearer. If it is a musical portrait of Pauline she was evidently in an amiable mood; or, perhaps, the suspected husband was soothing his wife with honeyed words. Whatever the "meaning" of the music, if it has other than musical significance, the audience enjoyed the Interlude which gained in worth by the beauty of the performance.

The "Fire-Bird" selections suffer less than those from other ballets by Stravinsky when the concert hall is substituted for the theatre. The more fanatical Stravinskyites for this reason, and on account of the more orthodox nature of the music, are accustomed to speak slightly, in a condescending manner, of the music; to dismiss it as influenced greatly by Rimsky-Korsakov. They contemptuously characterize "The Fire-Bird" as "academic"; which is in their eyes the unpardonable sin; yet the persistentaly hammered rhythm in the Infernal Dance of Katschei's subjects is prophetic of rhythms in the "Sacre de Printemps." The former suite is grateful to the ear; interesting without reference to the story on the stage where the attention is more or less concentrated on the movements of mimes and dancers; nor is this music so inevitably associated with action as is the music of "Petrouchka" or of the "Sacre de Printemps." The performance yesterday was brilliant.

It is a question whether Sibelius in his earlier compositions was not injured in the public mind by the insistence of his admirers on his nationality, expressing, they said, the spirit of Finland; melancholy landscapes, the angry sea, the cries of gulls; as though his music had a specific geographical, topographical, botanical, and ornithological value. Some dwelt on Finland groaning and rebellious under the oppression of years. Mr. Schneevoight tells us that the intention of Sibelius in this symphony was to depict the pastoral life of his countrymen: the thought of a brutal ruler that brought timidity; then the awakening of national feeling and at last the entrance of hope and deliverance into their breasts. As the old Frenchman said: "How many things there are in a minuet," so Mr. Schneevoight speaks of this symphony. A composer may be a zealous patriot, but his appeal to the world must be universal, not simply national. When the libretto of "Tosca" was shown to an Italian composer, not Puccini, he turned to the scene in the last act where the tenor should pour out his soul and asked Verdi how he would treat the subject. Verdi smiled and said: "I should write some music." Is it not possible that Sibelius said to himself, "I'll write a second symphony"? Might he not have written it at Vienna, Paris, Milan, even in Terre Haute; for his is a virile, sombre nature, a musician of imposing individuality, who would feel the urge to write whether he were in Helsingfors or Eisleben? It will be observed that in his symphonies he does not make liberal use of folk-music to assert his nationality, and it is fair to believe that in his symphonies he expresses what he himself feels with his stormy nature, his fits of melancholy without the laborious attempt to put Finland on the musical map. One wishes that he would revise, shorten the last movement. The hearer feels at least three times that the great climax is building, that it arrives; and each time is disappointed by the appearance of intermediate measures that seem inconsequential, detrimental to the structure and what should be the final overwhelming effect. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the symphony was intensely dramatic.

Strauss, Stravinsky, Sibelius, all fine fellows in their different ways. Yet the concerto of Handel, nearly 200 years old, by the tender beauty, the spiritual and noble sentiment of the Air; by the spontaneous vivacity and fire of the quick movements—the light and frolicsome grace of the final Allegro—revealed the great, superb master. Who dares to prophesy the fate of Strauss, Stravinsky and Sibelius 200 years from now?

The concert will be repeated tonight, the program of Oct. 25, 26, will be as follows: Vivaldi, concerto D minor, for orchestra and organ; Josten, "Jungle," symphonic poem; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 6 ("Pathetic.")

STRADIVARIUS QUARTET

The Stradivarius string quartet (Messrs. Wolfinsohn, Pochon Moldavan, Warburg), will, through the generosity of Mrs. Edward C. Moore, give a concert in Paine hall, Cambridge, next Tuesday evening. Haydn, quartet, G major, op. 77, No. 1; Schelling, Berceuse pour un Enfant malade, and Gazal (Persian melody), Brahms, quartet, C minor, op. 51, No. 1. This concert will be free and open to the public.

Post Oct 19

STRAUSS' MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Interlude From Opera "Intermezzo" Gives Pleasure

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With conductor and orchestra at top bent and a programme of uncommon interest, the latter something that may scarcely be said for its immediate predecessor, the Symphony Concert of yesterday proved intrinsically more of an occasion than that of a week ago.

The audience, too, recovered from the apathy or absorption in other concerns that characterized its attitude at the opening concert, applauded throughout the afternoon with a spontaneity and fervor born of genuine pleasure in both music and performance.

FROM STRAUSS' OPERA

Handel of the tenth Concerto Grosso, Handel of stately periods and of vibrant or singing strings, began the concert. To him succeeded, not the new Russian Krein but the familiar Richard Strauss in an unfamiliar piece, an interlude from his opera "Intermezzo," while Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite in its fourth and most brilliant performance under Dr. Koussevitzky and Sibelius' Second Symphony in its first under his direction concluded the list.

"Intermezzo," last but one of the operas of Strauss, is as yet unknown on this side of the Atlantic, though it enjoys considerable popularity in the Teutonic countries and even the summer visitor to Germany may hear it in the occasional Strauss festival under the composer's direction.

Based on Episode in Own Life

The book, based on an episode in Strauss' life, is also of his own making.

Its theme is a domestic misunderstanding brought about by a letter addressed to the composer although intended for another and opened by his temperamental wife, the resulting threat of separation and final reconciliation when the composer-conductor, professionally occupied in Vienna, had hurried back to his Bavarian home. The piece is, in short, a modern comedy with music, and the voice parts when such prosaic matters as telephone conversations are in hand, lapse into ordinary speech, orchestrally accompanied. The chief musical burden is borne by symphonic interludes. That played yesterday follows the scene in which Frau Strauss (she is Frau Storch in the play) muses sentimentally over a handsome young baron of chance acquaintance and then on her absent husband, with general reflections upon the lonesome lot of wives left at home while their lords do the work of the world.

A homely enough scene is this, foreign to the usual atmosphere of "grand opera;" and here, as throughout the opera, Strauss' music is perfectly suited to text and situation. There are no heroics, only a lyric theme, gentle and reflective, developed with rare contrapuntal skill and brought to a sonorous statement by an orchestra shot through with the ravishing tonal tints of which Strauss was long ago past master.

Sibelius' Second

When George Schneevoigt, himself a Finn and an intimate of the composer, conducted Sibelius' Second Symphony at a pair of symphony concerts in the spring of 1924 he disclosed to the editor of the programme-book and to an interviewer or two the poetic background of the music. From him we learned that this Symphony pictures Finland first happy under Swedish rule, then groaning under Russian domination but hoping, in the finale, for a champion and a deliverer. A Finn of the Finns, Sibelius in this nobly tragic symphony is by no means merely parochial. His music voices the sufferings, the struggles and the aspirations of all mankind.

Yesterday a Russian led it, but for the moment Dr. Koussevitzky might have been of the oppressed, not of the oppressing race. Deeply he felt and fully he conveyed the music's changing moods and brought it at the close to an apotheosis, a glory of tone and exaltation of utterance such as Symphony Hall has seldom heard, whatever the piece and whoever the conductor.

Herald Oct 19

Second Program of Boston Symphony

FOR the novelty of his second program of the season, Dr. Koussevitzky had purposed to introduce Gregoire Krein, young Russian composer, to Boston Symphony audiences by means of a symphonic poem, "Chant du David." At the tenth hour, this was dropped from the list. The official reason was that the parts were not legible: an explanation susceptible of more than one interpretation. For this piece was substituted the first Interlude from Richard Strauss's opera domestica, "Intermezzo."

These measures were heard for the first time in Boston at the concert of Oct. 18. If they add nothing to our knowledge of Strauss, they are welcome for their familiar aspect. They represent the Viennese, sentimental, uxorious Strauss of the earlier symphonic domestic pieces. Never distinguished for his taste, the composer in this opera has utilized another incident of his home life. The particular interlude played at Symphony Hall represents the faithful wife at home, thinking of her departed consort. The atmosphere is tenderly reflective. The material is worthy of the operetta stage, but in Strauss's handling and Strauss's orchestra it assumes a charming glow. A very successful piece of writing, which was received politely by the audience.

Before this Interlude, the string choirs of the orchestra had proved in a Handel Concerto Grosso—Op. 6, No. 10—that they have lost none of their sheen during the summer. Dr. Koussevitzky proved at the same time that he has not overcome his liking for lingering over each phrase—sometimes over each note—in a slow movement. It was Irving Weil, we believe, who said that when slow movements are played slower, Koussevitzky will play them.

Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite, which followed the Strauss item, was played with that extraordinary lambency which this orchestra has achieved under Dr. Koussevitzky. This performance set a new high mark of virtuosity for the season, and roused the Friday afternoon audience to its first real awareness. The men finally shared the applause with the conductor.

There was also a remarkably cordial reception for the Second Symphony of Sibelius, which occupied the second half of the program. Nor was this entirely because of its compelling conclusion. For throughout the orchestra had sung with fervency the lay of the composer. This was Boston's first hearing of the Koussevitzkyan interpretation of this symphony, which was last heard at Symphony Hall more than five years ago from Georg Schnéevoigt, the Finnish conductor who is supposed to speak with authority of Sibelius's scores. So far as recollection of that occasion is reliable, it may be said that without going to Mr. Schnéevoigt's dynamic extremes, Dr. Koussevitzky achieved a performance certainly no less effective. Finland is near enough to Russia, and the Sibelius of the Second Symphony to Tchaikovsky, to be taken to the [illegible] of the Boston conductor. In [illegible]sic he is not to be surpassed.

L. A. S.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATUR

FINE PROGRAM BY SYMPHONY

Oct 19

Strauss Interlude Is Heard For the First Time in Boston

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the second Symphony program of the season at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon with Handel's exquisite Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra. It swept the large audience into a mood that glowed with delight to the end of the last allegro.

Interlude from "Intermezzo" followed, a domestic comedy, according to the program, by Richard Strauss. Boston has not heard this number before, and Dr. Koussevitzky interpreted it charmingly, giving full rein to the dialogue, which is amusingly obvious, and delicately integrating the symphonic interludes.

Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire-Bird" brought warm applause. Founded on an old Russian legend, it provides a colorful and intriguing sequence, with its scenes laid in an enchanted garden. Princesses are at play with golden apples, a magic bird dances, and the finale is particularly interesting and impressive.

Through the four familiar movements of Sibelius's familiar second symphony, the audience followed with pronounced appreciation. Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were heartily applauded.

The program will be repeated this evening.

Record Oct 19

Twelve

STRAUSS AND STRAVINSKY AT THE SYMPHONY

From Handel to Strauss, Sibelius and Stravinsky runs the course of this week's Symphony concerts. And it is Richard Strauss who affords the sole new and novel contribution to the program.

This interlude from his "Intermezzo," originally a two-act opera, has hitherto been entirely unheard in Boston, though it was written well prior to 1924. Though the interlude is all too brief to give great insight into the little opera itself, it stands out as rather typical of Strauss.

Naturally, it is well made music, naturally it is pleasing, and admirers of Strauss will not be surprised to hear some of its sardonic and satirical sonorities. It is acid, piquant, mischievous music, and Strauss does such things passing well.

For the rest, Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra earned well deserved plaudits for their reading of Handel's "Concerto Grosso," and did as well, or even better, with the infinite contrast of Stravinsky's "Fire Bird." Nor did Mr. Koussevitzky lag behind with Sibelius' "Second Symphony." All in all, it was a concert notable for things decidedly well done.

STRAUSS NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Intermezzo" Interlude Is Heard First Time Here

Suite From Stravinsky's "Firebird" Wins Unusual Applause

Globe Oct 19

Dr Koussevitzky has substituted on the program of this week's Symphony concerts an orchestral interlude from n Richard Strauss' opera, "Intermezzo," h for the new piece by Krein announced y for performance. Nothing from this t opera produced in 1924 has hitherto been heard in Boston, though excerpts have been played by other American orchestras.

The rest of the program included a Handel Concerto Grosso, the Suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird," and Sibelius' Second Symphony. It was noteworthy that the conservative Friday audience, to which the music of Stravinsky has usually appeared obnoxious, yesterday recalled the conductor repeatedly after the "Fire-bird" suite, until he bade the players rise to share in the applause.

"Intermezzo" is an operatic comedy about a misunderstanding between a musician and his wife which threatens to result in a divorce, but ends with a reconciliation. The libretto, written by Strauss himself, is said to be based on an incident in his own family life. His penchant for musical autobiography can be noted also in the tone poems, "Sinfonia Domestica" and "Ein Heldenleben." The fragment played yesterday represents the wife who thinks herself to have lost her husband's love sitting alone and brooding over her sorrows.

Strauss has written it with t superb musical craftsmanship th lends an air of distinction even his less inspired work. The them lack originality, and the harmony consistently Wagnerian in charact yet this Interlude is effective. would be more so in its operatic co text.

The three numbers by living composers on yesterday's program would suffice to show how mistaken the writers of musical history are when they group composers and works chronologically instead of in accordance with the character of the music itself. Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, writen before 1909 belongs definitely to the 20th century, despite the many traces it contains of the influence of his teacher Rimsky Korsakov.

Beside it Strauss' Interlude, written within the past decade, seems curiously old fashioned; as indeed it would if compared with Strauss' "Electra," or "Till Eulenspiegel." Sibelius's Second Symphony, which was composed in 1901, though it has the originality of style that characterises nearly all of the great Finnish composer's work, suggests at times too strongly such 19th century writers as Tchaikovsky.

Strauss and Sibelius were born in the 1860s, and Stravinsky in 1882, so that they are chronologically almost contemporaries. But the whole style and mood of "The Firebird" is alien to that of the Strauss and Sibelius works heard yesterday. Stravinsky has his moments of honeyed melody. He does not in "The Firebird" approach the daring polyharmony and polytonality of his later works. But he never indulges in bombast or sentiment.

Now, the secondary 19th century composers, all strongly influenced by Beethoven and Wagner, almost invariably fail to attain the heroic eloquence and the intense emotion of those masters, and fall unawares into bombast and sentimentality. Stravinsky does not in "The Firebird" want to be heroic or intense. He is trying merely to be clever and interesting and original. When he wrote "The Firebird" he was, save for Satie and Ravel, almost alone in cultivating these rather than the characteristic 19th century musical virtues.

Today, 20 years after, nearly the entire younger generation of composers has passed through this phase of cleverness, and entered on the one now in vogue of trying to recapture 18th Century musical moods like those of the Handel concerto which began yesterday's concert.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave eloquent readings of all these works. The performance had indeed in the main a clarity and accuracy of style which has not always distinguished the playing of the Boston Symphony in recent seasons. It seemingly represented a highly successful effort on the part of the players to give the conductor exactly what he wanted.

And yet in many places, such as the Lento movement of the Handel, one was actively dissatisfied with the result. Dr Koussevitzky's way of shaping a melody too often smooths or shatters its contours. He likes contrasts between very rapid, very slow tempi, and strongly marked rhythms. Like most performers with a highly personal style he sometimes stresses his qualities until they seem to make his defects more glaring.

There is no questioning that Koussevitzky is a conductor of genius. But one cannot help sometimes questioning his taste.

P. R.

Oct 19. Herald

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, op. 6, No. 10. R. Strauss, Interlude from the opera "Intermezzo" (first time in Boston). Stravinsky, Suite from the ballet "The Fire-Bird." Sibelius, Symphony no. 2. The "Waltz Scene" from "Intermezzo" which had been announced for performance, was not played. Without this piece the concert was too long. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the symphony was heard for the first time.

Strauss's "Intermezzo" was suggested by a domestic misunderstanding in consequence of a letter which was intended for a colleague of the same name. Strauss's wife raged and talked of divorce. In the opera—the libretto was written by the composer—Strauss is brought on the stage as Conductor Storch; his wife as Mme. Storch. This was not the first time that Strauss made use of his Pauline for his own musical glorification. In the "Domestic" Symphony he portrays her musically as whimsical, capricious, irritating; now shrewish, now seductive; nor does he hesitate to picture in sensuous strains their reconciliation and fond embracing. What relation this Interlude has to the action of the play is unknown to those who have not heard the opera. It has been said by a German thinking deeply that the "spiritual presentation of the action lies chiefly with the orchestra between acts." The Interlude heard yesterday is suave, melodious, richly colored, without rising to any height of emotion. Whether it portrays Mme. Strauss-Storch after the comforting explanation, or is simply music, must be left to the imagination of the hearer. If it is a musical portrait of Pauline she was evidently in an amiable mood; or, perhaps, the suspected husband was soothing his wife with honeyed words. Whatever the "meaning" of the music, if it has other than musical significance, the audience enjoyed the Interlude which gained in worth by the beauty of the performance.

The "Fire-Bird" selections suffer less than those from other ballets by Stravinsky when the concert hall is substituted for the theatre. The more fanatical Stravinskyites for this reason, and on account of the more orthodox nature of the music, are accustomed to speak slightly, in a condescending manner, of the music; to dismiss it as influenced greatly by Rimsky-Korsakov. They contemptuously characterize "The Fire-Bird" as "academic"; which is in their eyes the unpardonable sin; yet the persistentaly hammered rhythm in the Infernal Dance of Katschei's subjects is prophetic of rhythms in the "Sacre de Printemps." The former suite is grateful to the ear; interesting without reference to the story on the stage where the attention is more or less concentrated on the movements of mimes and dancers; nor is this music so inevitably associated with action as is the music of "Petrouchka" or of the "Sacre de Printemps." The performance yesterday was brilliant.

It is a question whether Sibelius in his earlier compositions was not injured in the public mind by the insistence of his admirers on his nationality, expressing, they said, the spirit of Finland; melancholy landscapes, the angry sea, the cries of gulls; as though his music had a specific geographical, topographical, botanical, and ornithological value. Some dwelt on Finland groaning and rebellious under the oppression of years. Mr. Schneevoight tells us that the intention of Sibelius in this symphony was to depict the pastoral life of his countrymen: the thought of a brutal ruler that brought timidity; then the awakening of national feeling and at last the entrance of hope and deliverance into their breasts. As the old Frenchman said: "How many things there are in a minuet," so Mr. Schneevoight speaks of this symphony. A composer may be a zealous patriot, but his appeal to the world must be universal, not simply national. When the libretto of "Tosca" was shown to an Italian composer, not Puccini, he turned to the scene in the last act where the tenor should pour out his soul and asked Verdi how he would treat the subject. Verdi smiled and said: "I should write some music." Is it not possible that Sibelius said to himself, "I'll write a second symphony"? Might he not have written it at Vienna, Paris, Milan, even in Terre Haute; for his is a virile, sombre nature, a musician of imposing individuality, who would feel the urge to write whether he were in Telsingfors or Eisleben? It will be observed that in his symphonies he does not make liberal use of folk-music to assert his nationality, and it is fair to believe that in his symphonies he expresses what he himself feels with his stormy nature, his fits of melancholy without the laborious attempt to put Finland on the musical map. One wishes that he would revise, shorten the last movement. The hearer feels at least three times that the great climax is building, that it arrives; and each time is disappointed by the appearance of intermediate measures that seem inconsequential, detrimental to the structure and what should be the final overwhelming effect. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the symphony was intensely dramatic.

Strauss, Stravinsky, Sibelius, all fine fellows in their different ways. Yet the concerto of Handel, nearly 200 years old, by the tender beauty, the spiritual and noble sentiment of the Air; by the spontaneous vivacity and fire of the quick movements—the light and frolicsome grace of the final Allegro—revealed the great, superb master. Who dares to prophesy the fate of Strauss, Stravinsky and Sibelius 200 years from now?

The concert will be repeated tonight, the program of Oct. 25, 26, will be as follows: Vivaldi, concerto D minor, for orchestra and organ; Josten, "Jungle," symphonic poem; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 6 ("Pathetic.")

STRADIVARIUS QUARTET

The Stradivarius string quartet (Messrs. Wolfinsohn, Pochon Moldavan, Warburg), will, through the generosity of Mrs. Edward C. Moore, give a concert in Paine hall, Cambridge, next Tuesday evening. Haydn, quartet, G major, op. 77, No. 1; Schelling, Berceuse pour un Enfant malade, and Gazal (Persian melody), Brahms, quartet, C minor, op. 51, No. 1. This concert will be free and open to the public.

Post Oct 19

STRAUSS' MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Interlude From Opera "Intermezzo" Gives Pleasure

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With conductor and orchestra at top bent and a programme of uncommon interest, the latter something that may scarcely be said for its immediate predecessor, the Symphony Concert of yesterday proved intrinsically more of an occasion than that of a week ago.

The audience, too, recovered from the apathy or absorption in other concerns that characterized its attitude at the opening concert, applauded throughout the afternoon with a spontaneity and fervor born of genuine pleasure in both music and performance.

FROM STRAUSS' OPERA

Handel of the tenth Concerto Grosso, Handel of stately periods and of vibrant or singing strings, began the concert. To him succeeded, not the new Russian Krein but the familiar Richard Strauss in an unfamiliar piece, an interlude from his opera "Intermezzo," while Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite in its fourth and most brilliant performance under Dr. Koussevitzky and Sibelius' Second Symphony in its first under his direction concluded the list.

"Intermezzo," last but one of the operas of Strauss, is as yet unknown on this side of the Atlantic, though it enjoys considerable popularity in the Teutonic countries and even the summer visitor to Germany may hear it in the occasional Strauss festival under the composer's direction.

Based on Episode in Own Life

The book, based on an episode in Strauss' life, is also of his own making.

Its theme is a domestic misunderstanding brought about by a letter addressed to the composer although intended for another and opened by his [illegible] mental wife, the resulting [illegible] separation and final reconciliation when the composer-conductor, [illegible] occupied in Vienna, had [illegible] to his Bavarian home. [illegible] short, a modern comedy. [illegible] and the voice parts [illegible] matters as telephone [illegible] in hand, lapse into [illegible] orchestrally accompanied [illegible] musical burden is followed and [illegible] interludes. That [illegible] the scene in [illegible] he is Frau [illegible] baron of [illegible] sentimentally [illegible] lot of wives [illegible] their lords do the [illegible]

A homely enough scene is this, foreign to the usual atmosphere of "grand opera;" and here, as throughout the opera, Strauss' music is perfectly suited to text and situation. There are no heroics, only a lyric theme, gentle and reflective, developed with rare contrapuntal skill and brought to a sonorous statement by an orchestra shot through with the ravishing tonal tints of which Strauss was long ago past master.

Sibelius' Second

When George Schneevoigt, himself a Finn and an intimate of the composer, conducted Sibelius' Second Symphony at a pair of symphony concerts in the spring of 1924 he disclosed to the editor of the programme-book and to an interviewer or two the poetic background of the music. From him we learned that this Symphony pictures Finland first happy under Swedish rule, then groaning under Russian domination but hoping, in the finale, for a champion and a deliverer. A Finn of the Finns, Sibelius in this nobly tragic symphony is by no means merely parochial. His music voices the sufferings, the struggles and the aspirations of all mankind.

Yesterday a Russian led it, but for the moment Dr. Koussevitzky might have been of the oppressed, not of the oppressing race. Deeply he felt and fully he conveyed the music's changing moods and brought it at the close to an apotheosis, a glory of tone and exaltation of utterance such as Symphony Hall has seldom heard, whatever the piece and whoever the conductor.

Monitor Oct 19

Second Program of Boston Symphony

FOR the novelty of his second program of the season, Dr. Koussevitzky had purposed to introduce Gregoire Krein, young Russian composer, to Boston Symphony audiences by means of a symphonic poem, "Chant du David." At the tenth hour, this was dropped from the list. The official reason was that the parts were not legible: an explanation susceptible of more than one interpretation. For this piece was substituted the first Interlude from Richard Strauss's opera domestica, "Intermezzo."

These measures were heard for the first time in Boston at the concert of Oct. 18. If they add nothing to our knowledge of Strauss, they are welcome for their familiar aspect. They represent the Viennese, sentimental, uxorious Strauss of the earlier symphonic domestic pieces. Never distinguished for his taste, the composer in this opera has utilized another incident of his home life. The particular interlude played at Symphony Hall represents the faithful wife at home, thinking of her departed consort. The atmosphere is tenderly reflective. The material is worthy of the operetta stage, but in Strauss's handling and Strauss's orchestra it assumes a charming glow. A very successful piece of writing, which was received politely by the audience.

Before this Interlude, the string choirs of the orchestra had proved in a Handel Concerto Grosso—Op. 6, No. 10—that they have lost none of their sheen during the summer. Dr. Koussevitzky proved at the same time that he has not overcome his liking for lingering over each phrase—sometimes over each note—in a slow movement. It was Irving Weil, we believe, who said that when slow movements are played slower, Koussevitzky will play them.

Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite, which followed the Strauss item, was played with that extraordinary lambency which this orchestra has achieved under Dr. Koussevitzky. This performance set a new high mark of virtuosity for the season, and roused the Friday afternoon audience to its first real awareness. The men finally shared the applause with the conductor.

There was also a remarkably cordial reception for the Second Symphony of Sibelius, which occupied the second half of the program. Nor was this entirely because of its compelling conclusion. For throughout the orchestra had sung with fervency the lay of the composer. This was Boston's first hearing of the Koussevitzkyan interpretation of this symphony, which was last heard at Symphony Hall more than five years ago from Georg Schnéevoigt, the Finnish conductor who is supposed to speak with authority of Sibelius's scores. So far as recollection of that occasion is reliable, it may be said that without going to Mr. Schnéevoigt's dynamic extremes, Dr. Koussevitzky achieved a performance certainly no less effective. Finland is near enough to Russia, and the Sibelius of the Second Symphony to Tchaikovsky, to be taken to the [illegible] of the Boston conductor. In [illegible]sic he is not to be surpassed.

L. A. S.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATUR

FINE PROGRAM BY SYMPHONY

Oct 19

Strauss Interlude Is Heard For the First Time in Boston

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the second Symphony program of the season at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon with Handel's exquisite Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra. It swept the large audience into a mood that glowed with delight to the end of the last allegro.

Interlude from "Intermezzo" followed, a domestic comedy, according to the program, by Richard Strauss. Boston has not heard this number before, and Dr. Koussevitzky interpreted it charmingly, giving full rein to the dialogue, which is amusingly obvious, and delicately integrating the symphonic interludes.

Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire-Bird" brought warm applause. Founded on an old Russian legend, it provides a colorful and intriguing sequence, with its scenes laid in an enchanted garden. Princesses are at play with golden apples, a magic bird dances, and the finale is particularly interesting and impressive.

Through the four familiar movements of Sibelius's familiar second symphony, the audience followed with pronounced appreciation. Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were heartily applauded.

The program will be repeated this evening.

SILVER [illegible]

Record Oct 19

Twelve

STRAUSS AND STRAVINSKY AT THE SYMPHONY

From Handel to Strauss, Sibelius and Stravinsky runs the course of this week's Symphony concerts. And it is Richard Strauss who affords the sole new and novel contribution to the program.

This interlude from his "Intermezzo," originally a two-act opera, has hitherto been entirely unheard in Boston, though it was written well prior to 1924. Though the interlude is all too brief to give great insight into the little opera itself, it stands out as rather typical of Strauss.

Naturally, it is well made music, naturally it is pleasing, and admirers of Strauss will not be surprised to hear some of its sardonic and satirical sonorities. It is acid, piquant, mischievous music, and Strauss does such things passing well.

For the rest, Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra earned well deserved plaudits for their reading of Handel's "Concerto Grosso," and did as well, or even better, with the infinite contrast of Stravinsky's "Fire Bird." Nor did Mr. Koussevitzky lag behind with Sibelius' "Second Symphony." All in all, it was a concert notable for things decidedly well done.

STRAUSS NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Intermezzo" Interlude Is Heard First Time Here

Suite From Stravinsky's "Firebird" Wins Unusual Applause

Globe Oct 19

Dr Koussevitzky has substituted on the program of this week's Symphony concerts an orchestral interlude from n Richard Strauss' opera, "Intermezzo," h for the new piece by Krein announced e for performance. Nothing from this t opera produced in 1924 has hitherto been heard in Boston, though excerpts have been played by other American orchestras.

The rest of the program included a Handel Concerto Grosso, the Suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird," and Sibelius' Second Symphony. It was noteworthy that the conservative Friday audience, to which the music of Stravinsky has usually appeared obnoxious, yesterday recalled the conductor repeatedly after the "Fire-bird" suite, until he bade the players rise to share in the applause.

"Intermezzo" is an operatic comedy about a misunderstanding between a musician and his wife which threatens to result in a divorce, but ends with a reconciliation. The libretto, written by Strauss himself, is said to be based on an incident in his own family life. His penchant for musical autobiography can be noted also in the tone poems, "Sinfonia Domestica" and "Ein Heldenleben." The fragment played yesterday represents the wife who thinks herself to have lost her husband's love sitting alone and brooding over her sorrows.

Strauss has written it with the superb musical craftsmanship that lends an air of distinction even to his less inspired work. The themes lack originality, and the harmony is consistently Wagnerian in character, yet this Interlude is effective. It would be more so in its operatic context.

The three numbers by living composers on yesterday's program would suffice to show how mistaken the writers of musical history are when they group composers and works chronologically instead of in accordance with the character of the music itself. Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, writen before 1909 belongs definitely to the 20th century, despite the many traces it contains of the influence of his teacher Rimsky Korsakov.

Beside it Strauss' Interlude, written within the past decade, seems curiously old fashioned; as indeed it would if compared with Strauss' "Electra," or "Till Eulenspiegel." Sibelius's Second Symphony, which was composed in 1901, though it has the originality of style that characterises nearly all of the great Finnish composer's work, suggests at times too strongly such 19th century writers as Tchaikovsky.

Strauss and Sibelius were born in the 1860s, and Stravinsky in 1882, so that they are chronologically almost contemporaries. But the whole style and mood of "The Firebird" is alien to that of the Strauss and Sibelius works heard yesterday. Stravinsky has his moments of honeyed melody. He does not in "The Firebird" approach the daring polyharmony and polytonality of his later works. But he never indulges in bombast or sentiment.

Now, the secondary 19th century composers, all strongly influenced by Beethoven and Wagner, almost invariably fail to attain the heroic eloquence and the intense emotion of those masters, and fall unawares into bombast and sentimentality. Stravinsky does not in "The Firebird" want to be heroic or intense. He is trying merely to be clever and interesting and original. When he wrote "The Fire-bird" he was, save for Satie and Ravel, almost alone in cultivating these rather than the characteristic 19th century musical virtues.

Today, 20 years after, nearly the entire younger generation of composers has passed through this phase of cleverness, and entered on the one now in vogue of trying to recapture 18th Century musical moods like those of the Handel concerto which began yesterday's concert.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave eloquent readings of all these works. The performance had indeed [illegible] the main a clarity and accuracy [illegible]tyle which has not always distinguished the playing of the Boston [illegible]ny in recent seasons. It seemed [illegible]resented a highly successful [illegible]e part of the players to give [illegible]r exactly what he wanted. [illegible] many places, such as [illegible]vement of the Handel, [illegible]y dissatisfied with the [illegible]ssevitzky's way of [illegible]o often smooths or [illegible] He likes con[illegible]apid, very slow [illegible]rked rhythms. [illegible]with a highly [illegible]nes stresses [illegible]m to make [illegible]at Koussevitzky's genius. But [illegible]es questioning

P R.

Pleasures of A Melodious Musical Day

Dr. Koussevitzky Leads His Virtuoso Orchestra Into Paths of Song

A TUNEFUL afternoon, said the old ladies, yesterday at Symphony Hall, when they came forth cheerfully from Handel, Strauss, Stravinsky (in young years), even Sibelius, likewise caught young. Their juniors of all ages agreed with them. The outcome was an uncommonly applausive matinée, with the orchestra twice on its feet—after Stravinsky's Suite and Sibelius's Symphony—and plentiful recalls for Dr. Koussevitzky. An afternoon also of rare orchestral virtuosity, were not that happy condition becoming habit at Symphony Hall. In the stately overture to Handel's Concerto-Grosso, No. 10, in D minor, the string choir excelled itself in full-throated, deep-bodied, large-rounded tone. In the succeeding air, it was rich-voiced, plastic, lustrous. Lightly, incisively, in the final numbers, it made play with Handel's figures. The woodwinds clothed beauty / with beauty in the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet of "The Fire-Bird." Their tone wound shining through his harmonic mists. Often they gained a roundness of phrase, a softness of accent, magical to hear in the tone-poet's world of enchantment. The whole orchestra smoldered, pulsed, glowed, through the successive stages of the lush Interlude from Strauss's operatic comedy, "Intermezzo"; went stripped, clean-edged, pungent, through the austerer Second Symphony of Sibelius. Not only did virtuosi play, but little masters of style, in tone and accent differentiating composer from composer, piece from piece.

Yet the fates, as their habit is, took passing penalty. Dr. Koussevitzky hears this orchestra; with reason rejoices in it, as a creator looks upon his creation, stirred within, so close is it to his ideal. As one plunging a hand into silk and velvet, so his ear feels this sensuous beauty. And Handel unfolds his deep-toned, upswelling, full-spaced melody. Or Strauss sings luxuriant in curve, texture, color. Or Stravinsky weaves his rainbow webs of fluttering brightness, sings soft the tender song of girl-princesses, by legend and love both touched. Being of responsive temperament above most, Dr. Koussevitzky hears such music spell-bound; would prolong the rapture.

The consequence is less a sentimentalizing of the composer's page than a half-unconscious slowing of the pace for sheer sensuous delight in beautiful sound. The conductor dragged a little Handel's spacious progress; held fast to Strauss's expanding periods when, for their own good, they might have been quicker released; drew out the flow of Stravinsky's liquid measures until they became ever so little sirupy. For the first time in many hearings of Stravinsky's Suite, it was possible to wish for a quick, rougher-coated section in the midst of this soft twitter of birds and princesses. It is hard to blame the conductor; the enchantment of such orchestral song beguiles him as it beguiles the rest of us. Yet a less lingering pace would dispel risk of surfeit.

Save only Strauss's "Interlude," all these pieces were familiar. In fact, though "first times in Boston" stood under this fragment of "Intermezzo," most of us had heard its like before, especially in these, the composer's ageing, years. He may invent next to nothing through this nostalgic meditation, in lamp-lit stillness, of madame over her cherished, absent husband. As so much musical substance, it may be little above that other "Meditation" which is sweetmeat in Massenet's "Thais." Yet how astute and resourceful is the old master's treatment! At exactly the right moment, the horns enter, or re-enter, to deepen and gild the mounting melody; or the harmony thickens; or pace and accent broaden, while climax begins to coil. The old hand, but still the master-hand at every manipulation. For each of us his own sins against a "pure" or a "classic" taste. Some there are who have found these slow-mounting, thick-waisted, luxuriant Straussian crescendi irresistible from the days of "Death and Transfiguration," which were the eighteen-nineties to the days of "Intermezzo" which are these nineteen-twenties. Again they were unashamed.

Handel must have written these Concerti Grossi with a prideful magnificence. He had turned well into his fifties, yet how full was his composing quiver! Our young men and maidens have much to say of sonorities. Though only a choir of strings produce them, they are manifold in this Overture, dated 1739. Rationally the bond between modernists and ancients is close. Spare also are these sonorities, with only a little of the harmonic vesture that was to thicken, a century later, into romantic luxuriance. Stately as well—the ear-mark of Handel (and his Georgian age), ceremoniously marshalling his hearers into his music. The strings sing his Air and to stateliness are added spaciousness and serenity. No less the prideful flow. Like the prayerful noblemen and burghers in old Flemish pictures, Handel must aspire as one with a dignity to keep. Not too much will he relax it, even when he bows his hearers out again to a light-figured, light-rhythmed finale. For Bach the jigging when a suite must end. Throughout economy of means—another modernist trait—and a wealth of accomplishment, not always so certain in the younger brethren of these days. A full man was "Mr. Handel," as the Georgians called him, and a various. We should know other sides of his music—say, his dances.

There is a magic in this Suite from "The Fire Bird" that the years and repetition do not lessen. Like the old Handel, the young Stravinsky seems to compose in readiness and ease. What he wills that he may forthwith accomplish. For aught any one knows, he may have "toiled terribly" at this "Danced Leg end." Yet the magical quality of it suggests a music passively engendered in the composer for as passive pleasure in the hearer. These sweet-scented, smooth-flowing, diatonic Russian or oriental melodies ooze forth like a perfume or an unguent caressing the senses. The harmonic dress, filtered through the chromatic Skriabin, Rimsky, Wagner, becomes drug-like under this magic of the young Stravinsky; soothes ears, iludes fancy. Luminous glamour over all, in its turn also magical, is the orchestral vesture, sheen upon sheen, as though the choirs or the separate instruments were veils rising or descending. Then of a sudden that drum-stroke at the beginning of the Finale—and forthwith more than hint of the firm-outlined, sharp-edged, high- rhythmed Stravinsky that was to write "Petrushka" and "Le Sacre." The soft visioning is rent; the magic is dispersed; here, at seven and twenty goes Igor trying out his power.

For the first time, yesterday, before an audience in America, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted in Sibelius's Second Symphony. Quickly his version stood charactered. The piece dates from 1902. In the quarter of a century since elapsed, Sibelius has written much in moods and manner of which this Symphony in D major is foreshadowing. Dr. Koussevitzky's predecessors at Symphony Hall, knowing little of that subsequent music, or thinking poorly of it, preferred to disregard it when they played the earlier piece. They related this Second Symphony to past rather than future, proceeding from a Sibelius who had not yet renounced Russian or German models. Or else they played it quite literally in the black and white upon the staves. Whichever the method, they passed over, or under-emphasized, the traits already marking Sibelius as highly individual composer or anticipating him in the full quality of his later years. Their Sibelius sounded clearest in the sonorous close. Any able composer of the turn into the twentieth century might have written it. In "Finlandia," Sibelius himself renewed the vein.

On the other side of the account they saw "through a glass, darkly," the singularities of the first and the second movement.

Not so Dr. Koussevitzky. Throughout the Symphony, save in that unescapable close, he is all for Sibelius as later years and later work set him apart among composers—for the Sibelius of stripped motivs, meagerly developed, abruptly put by, from one brief life to another returning; of thin-spun, acid harmonies; of an orchestra used as single instruments rather than as rounded choirs, used sparingly withal and in pale colors; of well marked idiosyncracies, like the wood-winds plangent against the low whirr of the violins; of bitter and mel ancholy, or fierce and gusty, moods, lightsome only when he bethinks himself of the Finnish folk. That is to say, the conductor does the same office upon this Second Symphony as he did last year upon the Third. He illuminates and enhances its individual quality; at every possible opportunity, finds and sounds clear the Sibelian note of the later symphonies; vitalizes and dramatizes withal. The imaginative hearer may fit what background he likes to this Second Symphony. Such fancies can be as far apart as the nationalistic and the pastoral programs cited in the program-book. There remain a sad-struck beauty, a darksome power, a pungent savor; a manner of expression like to none other in music contained. Such a Sibelius Dr. Koussevitzky conjures out of this Symphony in D major. It is enough to distinguish any performance.

H. T. P.

Dr. Koussevitzky Again as Virtuoso

Giving Pleasure as Composer, Transcriber and Player Of the Double Bass

THE double bass has conquered. Even the outward aspects of a Koussevitzkian concert may now be compared only with those of the best attended Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall. One remembers when Dr. Koussevitzky gave his first recital in Boston, the audience, so it seemed, was confined to the curious and the well-wishers, and the group of them was none too large. Witness in contrast the scene last night. Every seat taken. On the stage the familiar enclosures making room for two more blocks of seats. But there the comparison stops. For unlike the mixed audiences of Sunday afternoons to hear a Kreisler or a McCormack, society—with a capital S—had taken it over. And the scene which greeted the eye was not too different from that which for two weeks every winter greets it at the Boston Opera House. Fortuhate indeed the charity, in this case the Elizabeth Peabody House, which is able to muster such support.

And it is the artist rather than the cause that draws people into concert halls. Worthy charities, popular causes, have gone begging for an audience if the artist does not possess that magnetic power which compels people to leave other things to come to hear him. That Dr. Koussevitzky possesses such power was proved more abundantly than ever last evening. Nor must one forget the presence of that excellent bass, Mr. Fraser Gange.

Mozart twice, Bruch, Brahms, Koussevitzky stood upon the program. From a Mozartian concerto for bassoon, Dr. Koussevitzky made transcription for his favored instrument, added to it a cadenza which explored the heights and the depths of that instrument. The cynic may wave aside the idea of Mozart on a double bass; Mozart, the composer of grace and lightness and fluent utterance. But Mozart from Dr. Koussevitzky and his double bass, last evening sounded more characteristic than it sometimes does from many an instrument which fairly invites Mozartian utterance. Suavity of melody, delicacy of phrasing and nuance, rapidity of speech, none of these could be denied this concerto for the ponderous instrument.

There followed an aria, also of Mozart, for baritone with double-bass obbligato and small orchestra, "Per qüesta bella mano." This is a concert-aria written by Mozart at Vienna in 1791 for two of his personal friends: Gerl, who sang Sarastro in "The Magic Flute"; and Pischlberger, a celebrated Viennese player upon the double bass. There have been those who have tried to prove by internal evidence that the obbligato was written for some higher-pitched instrument than the double bass. The fact, however, that he wrote, "Für Gerl und Pischlberger" should be sufficient answer to such theorizing. The piece is exactly what one would expect of an air which Mozart wrote for two friends. Each has his opportunity to show his skill. The music is pleasant. It does not allow attention to wander. Mr. Gange, Dr. Koussevitzy, and with them Mr. Burgin and a group of Symphony men, were surely at one with Mozartian desires.

Came next Dr. Koussevitzky's version of Max Bruch's setting of the ancient Hebrew melody, "Kol Nidrei." And with it came warmth of feeling, beauty of tone, such as one did not associate with the double bass until Dr. Koussevitzky's first concert two years ago.

Mr. Gange had his chief opportunity of the evening in a group of four songs of Brahms: "Vier Ernste Gesänge, Op. 121" (four "serious songs"). More often one would like to hear these songs. They are set to Bible texts, two from the cynical, pessimistic Ecclesiastes, where all is vanity; where the writer is not certain that man is better than the beasts of the field, in that all die the same death; where he praises death as more to be desired than life; from the apocryphical Ecclesiasticus, a song in the same vein; and lastly, as if Brahms were washing his hands of such gloom, a song on the famous passage from First Corinthians, "If I spake with the tongue of men and angels and had not love. . . ." Brahms himself, from the New Testament, is giving the answer to the doubt-laden preacher of the Old. And the songs are perfect expression of the ideas of the solemn texts. They are, purely as music, gems of the first order of magnitude. Happily, one can continue, and say that Mr. Gange was high priest in the temple of Brahms and the Book. His artistry and intelligence with his songs are seldom matched.

Finally came Dr. Koussevitzky and his concerto. It has been heard before at his concerts. It too is pleasant and often expressive music. It ranges wide through the possibilities of the instrument. One would not go far wrong in calling it a complete exposition of the many capabilities of the double bass—and they are far more than is usually realized. Of course Dr. Koussevitzky played it with skill; of course, as performer quite as much as composer, he drew the unexpected from his bass; of course he gave music and instrument the loving and the ardent touch. And also, of course, applause was deafening and long-continued.

A. H. M.

DR KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS DOUBLE BASS

Benefit Concert Draws a Brilliant Audience

A very large and extremely fashionable audience attended a double bass recital given by Serge Koussevitzky at Symphony Hall last night. The concert, in which the eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was assisted by Fraser Gange, baritone; Pierre Luboshutz, accompanist, and a small contingent of Symphony men under Richard Burgin as conductor, was given for the joint benefit of the Elizabeth Peabody House and the Travelers' Aid Society of Boston.

Dr Koussevitzky's surprisingly delicate virtuousity upon an instrument usually associated with a useful but inconspicuous function in the orchestra is, by now, well known in Boston. He opened his program last night with a transcription of Mozart's Concerto for Bassoon (Koechel No. 191). He played this graceful and charming work with taste and admirable restraint, though he did not, until a later stage of the concert, reach the pinnacle of his powers. Bowing so delicate as Dr Koussevitzky's doubtlessly needs for its full display a poise which cannot be attained at the very outset of a recital. A certain excess of portamento was noticeable, though this may be unavoidable in an instrument on which the hand has often to travel great distances between one note and the next.

Dr Koussevitzky played a subordinate role tactfully in Mozart's Aria for baritone and doube-bass obligato with small orchestra—a relatively unimportant work which Mr Gange sang with taste. Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," so popular with violinists, offered Dr Koussevitzky (in his own transcription) the opportunity to display to the full the warmth and flexibility of his tone and phrasing in cantilen, and he availed himself of the opportunity amply, drawing from his instrument sounds like those of a richer cello. His own Concerto, which closed the concert, displayed abundantly the player's varied and brilliant resources of technique and style.

Mr Gange's admirable and moving performance of Brahms' "Ernste Gesaenge" was one of the high points of the evening. This is very great music, and the baritone sang it with moving sincerity and artistic insight. He was very warmly applauded and responded with an intelligent and vivacious rendering of Strauss' "Heimliche Aufforderung."

Dr Koussevitzky was applauded enthusiastically and presented with a wreath of laurel. A reception to him and to Mrs Koussevitzky followed the close of the concert.

RECITAL BY MASTER OF BASS VIOL

Koussevitzky Plays for Two Worthy Charities

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A concert designed to benefit the Elizabeth Peabody House Association and the Travellers' Aid Society brought to Symphony Hall last evening an audience accurately describable as large and distinguished. These two worthy charities might of themselves have lured a fashionable gathering, but there was an additional and most potent magnet in the person of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky making his third Boston appearance as soloist upon the double bass; in short, in the capacity in which he has had no rival in modern times.

PLAYS OWN CONCERTO

More varied than those of Mr. Koussevitzky's other concerts was the programme of last evening. With Pierre Luboshutz to aid him as piano accompanist, Dr. Koussevitzky was heard in his own transcriptions of a concerto for bassoon by Mozart and of Bruch's violoncello piece "Kol Nidrei," as well as in his own unprecedentedly difficult concerto for double-bass. Accompanied by an orchestra of 16 symphony men under the direction of Richard Burgin, Fraser Gange, baritone, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, displayed their several abilities in an air by Mozart, provided with double-bass obbligato and for interim Mr. Gange and Mr. Luboshutz had the stage to themselves while the former sang the last and greatest of the songs of Brahms, the Four Serious Songs to scriptural texts, Opus 121.

Each of the pieces by Mozart, performed last evening, is in a sense a musical curiosity, seldom brought to public notice. The slow movement of the bassoon concerto is, in fact, Mozart at his best; he alone might have written it. The finale of the concerto and the aria with double-bass obbligato are less distinctive, yet Mozart, it is hardly necessary to add, could not be commonplace even in his most workaday moments. By Dr. Koussevitzky this same slow movement of the concerto was beautifully played, or rather sung, his ponderous instrument taking on here the quality of a 'cello, while in the finale and in the obbligato to the air, it capered in a manner to belie its bulk.

A singer of the declamatory type, Mr. Gange is scarcely the ideal vocalist for the suavities of Mozart. Better suited to his abilities were the songs of Brahms to which he gave an impressive interpretation. Mr. Luboshutz's accompaniments were, in every instance, of remarkable quality. Throughout the evening the enthusiasm of the audience was at high pitch.

MUSIC

KOUSSEVITZKY

A very large audience went last night to Symphony hall to hear Mr. Koussevitzky play the double bass, also to help the Elizabeth Peabody House Association and the Travelers' Aid Society.

They had, in some respects, a curious evening of it, for during the first half of the concert they heard musicians of quality in the ungrateful roles of substitutes. Mr. Koussevitzky, for instance, in the opinion of experts a master at the double bass, they heard doing his best with that double bass to make it fill the place of a bassoon. For Mozart, no less, wrote a concerto for bassoon, with accompaniment for instruments in variety—which variety Mr. Pierre Luboshutz, at the piano, supplied as well as he could. Of the solo part, Mr. Koussevitzky made something very sweet.

Mr. Fraser Gange, like Mr. Luboshutz, doing his best, drove his nice baritone voice deep down as he could to meet the demands of a low bass voice in Mozart's aria, "Per questa bella mano." Mr. Koussevitzky playing a florid obligato. Mr. Burgin led a small orchestra delightfully. It brought refreshment, that orchestra with every instrument holding to its most satisfactory place.

In Bruck's "Kol Nidrei" Mr. Koussevitzky tried conclusions with a 'cello. Here he met his most happy results. Low tones abounded, of a glorious richness, and the upper tones, surely not a double bass's best, sounded not amiss in Bruck's sombre liturgical music.

In the second half of the concert the artists confined themselves more comfortably to the instruments at their command. Mr. Gange, indeed, in Brahms's "Four Serious Songs," found music so nicely adapted to his excellent voice that he might safely have ventured to trust more completely Brahms's vocal line and the biblical texts; they stand in no need of dramatic betterments. And Mr. Koussevitzky played next his own concerto, a work already known and praised for its musical grace and its skilful use of his instrument's capabilities.

The audience showed pleasure all the evening.

R. R. G.

Pleasures of A Melodious Musical Day

Dr. Koussevitzky Leads His Virtuoso Orchestra Into Paths of Song

A TUNEFUL afternoon, said the old ladies, yesterday at Symphony Hall, when they came forth cheerfully from Handel, Strauss, Stravinsky (in young years), even Sibelius, likewise caught young. Their juniors of all ages agreed with them. The outcome was an uncommonly applausive matinée, with the orchestra twice on its feet—after Stravinsky's Suite and Sibelius's Symphony—and plentiful recalls for Dr. Koussevitzky. An afternoon also of rare orchestral virtuosity, were not that happy condition becoming habit at Symphony Hall. In the stately overture to Handel's Concerto-Grosso, No. 10, in D minor, the string choir excelled itself in full-throated, deep-bodied, large-rounded tone. In the succeeding air, it was rich-voiced, plastic, lustrous. Lightly, incisively, in the final numbers, it made play with Handel's figures. The woodwinds clothed beauty with beauty in the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet of "The Fire-Bird." Their tone wound shining through his harmonic mists. Often they gained a roundness of phrase, a softness of accent, magical to hear in the tone-poet's world of enchantment. The whole orchestra smoldered, pulsed, glowed, through the successive stages of the lush Interlude from Strauss's operatic comedy, "Intermezzo"; went stripped, clean-edged, pungent, through the austerer Second Symphony of Sibelius. Not only did virtuosi play, but little masters of style, in tone and accent differentiating composer from composer, piece from piece.

Yet the fates, as their habit is, took passing penalty. Dr. Koussevitzky hears this orchestra; with reason rejoices in it, as a creator looks upon his creation, stirred within, so close is it to his ideal. As one plunging a hand into silk and velvet, so his ear feels this sensuous beauty. And Handel unfolds his deep-toned, upswelling, full-spaced melody. Or Strauss sings luxuriant in curve, texture, color. Or Stravinsky weaves his rainbow webs of fluttering brightness, sings soft the tender song of girl-princesses, by legend and love both touched. Being of responsive temperament above most, Dr. Koussevitzky hears such music spell-bound; would prolong the rapture.

The consequence is less a sentimentalizing of the composer's page than a half-unconscious slowing of the pace for sheer sensuous delight in beautiful sound. The conductor dragged a little Handel's spacious progress; held fast to Strauss's expanding periods when, for their own good, they might have been quicker released; drew out the flow of Stravinsky's liquid measures until they became ever so little sirupy. For the first time in many hearings of Stravinsky's Suite, it was possible to wish for a quick, rougher-coated section in the midst of this soft twitter of birds and princesses. It is hard to blame the conductor; the enchantment of such orchestral song beguiles him as it beguiles the rest of us. Yet a less lingering pace would dispel risk of surfeit.

Save only Strauss's "Interlude," all these pieces were familiar. In fact, though "first times in Boston" stood under this fragment of "Intermezzo," most of us had heard its like before, especially in these, the composer's ageing, years. He may invent next to nothing through this nostalgic meditation, in lamp-lit stillness, of madame over her cherished, absent husband. As so much musical substance, it may be little above that other "Meditation" which is sweetmeat in Massenet's "Thais." Yet how astute and resourceful is the old master's treatment! At exactly the right moment, the horns enter, or re-enter, to deepen and gild the mounting melody; or the harmony thickens; or pace and accent broaden, while climax begins to coil. The old hand, but still the master-hand at every manipulation. For each of us his own sins against a "pure" or a "classic" taste. Some there are who have found these slow-mounting, thick-waisted, luxuriant Straussian crescendi irresistible from the days of "Death and Transfiguration," which were the eighteen-nineties to the days of "Intermezzo" which are these nineteen-twenties. Again they were unashamed.

Handel must have written these Concerti Grossi with a prideful magnificence. He had turned well into his fifties, yet how full was his composing quiver! Our young men and maidens have much to say of sonorities. Though only a choir of strings produce them, they are manifold in this Overture, dated 1739. Rationally the bond between modernists and ancients is close. Spare also are these sonorities, with only a little of the harmonic vesture that was to thicken, a century later, into romantic luxuriance. Stately as well—the ear-mark of Handel (and his Georgian age), ceremoniously marshalling his hearers into his music. The strings sing his Air and to statelliness are added spaciousness and serenity. No less the prideful flow. Like the prayerful noblemen and burghers in old Flemish pictures, Handel must aspire as one with a dignity to keep. Not too much will he relax it, even when he bows his hearers out again to a light-figured, light-rhythmed finale. For Bach the jigging when a suite must end. Throughout economy of means—another modernist trait—and a wealth of accomplishment not always so certain in the younger brethren of these days. A full man was "Mr. Handel," as the Georgians called him, and a various. We should know other sides of his music—say, his dances.

There is a magic in this Suite from "The Fire Bird" that the years and repetition do not lessen. Like the old Handel, the young Stravinsky seems to compose in readiness and ease. What he wills that he may forthwith accomplish. For aught any one knows, he may have "toiled terribly" at this "Danced Leg end." Yet the magical quality of it suggests a music passively engendered in the composer for as passive pleasure in the hearer. These sweet-scented, smooth-flowing, diatonic Russian or oriental melodies ooze forth like a perfume or an unguent caressing the senses. The harmonic dress, filtered through the chromatic Skriabin, Rimsky, Wagner, becomes drug-like under this magic of the young Stravinsky; soothes ears, iludes fancy. Luminous glamour over all, in its turn also magical, is the orchestral vesture, sheen upon sheen, as though the choirs or the separate instruments were veils rising or descending. Then of a sudden that drum-stroke at the beginning of the Finale—and forthwith more than hint of the firm-outlined, sharp-edged, high-rhythmed Stravinsky that was to write "Petrushka" and "Le Sacre." The soft visioning is rent; the magic is dispersed; here, at seven and twenty goes Igor trying out his power.

For the first time, yesterday, before an audience in America, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted in Sibelius's Second Symphony. Quickly his version stood charactered. The piece dates from 1902. In the quarter of a century since elapsed, Sibelius has written much in moods and manner of which this Symphony in D major is foreshadowing. Dr. Koussevitzky's predecessors at Symphony Hall, knowing little of that subsequent music, or thinking poorly of it, preferred to disregard it when they played the earlier piece. They related this Second Symphony to past rather than future, proceeding from a Sibelius who had not yet renounced Russian or German models. Or else they played it quite literally in the black and white upon the staves. Whichever the method, they passed over, or under-emphasized, the traits already marking Sibelius as highly individual composer or anticipating him in the full quality of his later years. Their Sibelius sounded clearest in the sonorous close. Any able composer of the turn into the twentieth century might have written it. In "Finlandia," Sibelius himself renewed the vein.

On the other side of the account they saw "through a glass, darkly," the singularities of the first and the second movement.

Not so Dr. Koussevitzky. Throughout the Symphony, save in that unescapable close, he is all for Sibelius as later years and later work set him apart among composers—for the Sibelius of stripped motivs, meagerly developed, abruptly put by, from one brief life to another returning; of thin-spun, acid harmonies; of an orchestra used as single instruments rather than as rounded choirs, used sparingly withal and in pale colors; of well marked idiosyncracies, like the wood-winds plangent against the low whirr of the violins; of bitter and melancholy, or fierce and gusty, moods, lightsome only when he bethinks himself of the Finnish folk. That is to say, the conductor does the same office upon this Second Symphony as he did last year upon the Third. He illuminates and enhances its individual quality; at every possible opportunity, finds and sounds clear the Sibelian note of the later symphonies; vitalizes and dramatizes withal. The imaginative hearer may fit what background he likes to this Second Symphony. Such fancies can be as far apart as the nationalistic and the pastoral programs cited in the program-book. There remain a sad-struck beauty, a darksome power, a pungent savor; a manner of expression like to none other in music contained. Such a Sibelius Dr. Koussevitzky conjures out of this Symphony in D major. It is enough to distinguish any performance.

H. T. P.

DR KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS DOUBLE BASS

Benefit Concert Draws a Brilliant Audience

Boston Eve. Oct. 23

A very large and extremely fashionable audience attended a double bass recital given by Serge Koussevitzky at Symphony Hall last night. The concert, in which the eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was assisted by Fraser Gange, baritone; Pierre Luboshutz, accompanist, and a small contingent of Symphony men under Richard Burgin as conductor, was given for the joint benefit of the Elizabeth Peabody House and the Travelers' Aid Society of Boston.

Dr Koussevitzky's surprisingly delicate virtuousity upon an instrument usually associated with a useful but inconspicuous function in the orchestra is, by now, well known in Boston. He opened his program last night with a transcription of Mozart's Concerto for Bassoon (Koechel No. 191). He played this graceful and charming work with taste and admirable restraint, though he did not, until a later stage of the concert, reach the pinnacle of his powers. Bowing so delicate as Dr Koussevitzky's doubtlessly needs for its full display a poise which cannot be attained at the very outset of a recital. A certain excess of portamento was noticeable, though this may be unavoidable in an instrument on which the hand has often to travel great distances between one

Dr Koussevitzky played a subordinate role tactfully in Mozart's Aria for baritone and doube-bass obligato with small orchestra—a relatively unimportant work which Mr Gange sang with taste. Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," so popular with violinists, offered Dr Koussevitzky (in his own transcription) the opportunity to display to the full the warmth and flexibility of his tone and phrasing in cantilen, and he availed himself of the opportunity amply, drawing from his instrument sounds like those of a richer celio. His own Concerto, which closed the concert, displayed abundantly the player's varied and brilliant resources of technique and style.

Mr Gange's admirable and moving performance of Brahms' "Ernste Gesaenge" was one of the high points of the evening. This is very great music, and the baritone sang it with moving sincerity and artistic insight. He was very warmly applauded and responded with an intelligent and vivacious rendering of Strauss' "Heimliche Aufforderung."

Dr Koussevitzky was applauded enthusiastically and presented with a wreath of laurel. A reception to him and to Mrs Koussevitzky followed the close of the concert.

Dr. Koussevitzky Again as Virtuoso

Giving Pleasure as Composer, Transcriber and Player Of the Double Bass

THE double bass has conquered. Even the outward aspects of a Koussevitzkian concert may now be compared only with those of the best attended Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall. One remembers when Dr. Koussevitzky gave his first recital in Boston, the audience, so it seemed, was confined to the curious and the well-wishers, and the group of them was none too large. Witness in contrast the scene last night. Every seat taken. On the stage the familiar enclosures making room for two more blocks of seats. But there the comparison stops. For unlike the mixed audiences of Sunday afternoons to hear a Kreisler or a McCormack, society—with a capital S—had taken it over. And the scene which greeted the eye was not too different from that which for two weeks every winter greets it at the Boston Opera House. Fortunate indeed the charity, in this case the Elizabeth Peabody House, which is able to muster such support.

And it is the artist rather than the cause that draws people into concert halls. Worthy charities, popular causes, have gone begging for an audience if the artist does not possess that magnetic power which compels people to leave other things to come to hear him. That Dr. Koussevitzky possesses such power was proved more abundantly than ever last evening. Nor must one forget the presence of that excellent bass, Mr. Fraser Gange.

Mozart twice, Bruch, Brahms, Koussevitzky stood upon the program. From a ...zartian concerto for bassoon, Dr. Koussevitzky made transcription for his favored instrument, added to it a cadenza which explored the heights and the depths of that instrument. The cynic may wave aside the idea of Mozart on a double bass; Mozart, the composer of grace and lightness and fluent utterance. But Mozart from Dr. Koussevitzky and his double bass, last evening sounded more characteristic than it sometimes does from many an instrument which fairly invites Mozartian utterance. Suavity of melody, delicacy of phrasing and nuance, rapidity of speech, none of these could be denied this concerto for the ponderous instrument.

There followed an aria, also of Mozart, for baritone with double-bass obbligato and small orchestra, "Per questa bella mano." This is a concert-aria written by Mozart at Vienna in 1791 for two of his personal friends: Gerl, who sang Sarastro in "The Magic Flute"; and Pischlberger, a celebrated Viennese player upon the double bass. There have been those who have sought to prove by internal evidence that the obbligato was written for some higher-pitched instrument than the double bass. It is idle, however, that he wrote, "Für meinen Freund Pischlberger" should be sufficient answer to such theorizing. The aria is exactly what one would expect of the pen which Mozart wrote for two friends. Each has his opportunity to display his skill. The music is pleasant. It does not allow attention to wander. Baritone, Dr. Koussevitzy, and with Dr. Burgin and a group of Symphony men, were surely at one with Mozart's desires.

Next Dr. Koussevitzky's version of Bruch's setting of the ancient Hebrew melody, "Kol Nidrei." And with it is the warmth of feeling, beauty of cantilena as one did not associate with the double bass until Dr. Koussevitzky's playing of it two years ago.

Mr. Gange had his chief opportunity following in a group of four songs by Brahms (Opus 121, "Vier Ernste Gesänge, Op. 121," or "four side-serious songs"). More often than not St. like to hear these songs. Brahms turned to Bible texts, two from Ecclesiastes, the most pessimistic Ecclesiastes, the book of vanity; where the writer is convinced that to be dead is better than the living, that man is better than the beasts, that all go to the same field, in that all die the dust is made of and to dust returns, in quite where he praises death as the consummation desired than life; from the Book of Wisdom, from the Ecclesiasticus, a song in praise of famous men. The last, and lastly, as if Brahms would wash his hands of such gloom, Mr. Gange sang the famous passage from Corinthians, "If I spake with the tongues of men and of angels and had not love. . . ." Brahms himself, from the New Testament, is giving the answer to the doubt-laden preacher of the Old. And the songs are perfect expression of the ideas of the solemn texts. They are, purely as music, gems of the first order of magnitude. Happily, one can continue, and say that Mr. Gange was high priest in the temple of Brahms and the Book. His artistry and intelligence with his songs are seldom matched.

Finally came Dr. Koussevitzky and his concerto. It has been heard before at his concerts. It too is pleasant and often expressive music. It ranges wide through the possibilities of the instrument. One would not go far wrong in calling it a complete exposition of the many capabilties of the double bass—and they are far more than is usually realized. Of course Dr. Koussevitzky played it with skill; of course, as performer quite as much as composer, he drew the unexpected from his bass; of course he gave music and instrument the loving and the ardent touch. And also, of course, applause was deafening and long-continued.

A. H. M.

AL BY ASTER OF BASS VIOL

Koussevitzky Plays for Two Worthy Charities

Oct. 23

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A concert designed to benefit the Elizabeth Peabody House Association and the Travellers' Aid Society brought to Symphony Hall last evening an audience accurately describable as large and distinguished. These two worthy charities might of themselves have lured a fashionable gathering, but there was an additional and most potent magnet in the person of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky making his third Boston appearance as soloist upon the double bass; in short, in the capacity in which he has had no rival in modern times.

PLAYS OWN CONCERTO

More varied than those of Mr. Koussevitzky's other concerts was the programme of last evening. With Pierre Luboshutz to aid him as piano accompanist, Dr. Koussevitzky was heard in his own transcriptions of a concerto for bassoon by Mozart and of Bruch's violoncello piece "Kol Nidrei," as well as in his own unprecedentedly difficult concerto for double-bass. Accompanied by an orchestra of 16 symphony men under the direction of Richard Burgin, Fraser Gange, baritone, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, displayed their several abilities in an air by Mozart, provided with double-bass obbligato and for interim Mr. Gange and Mr. Luboshutz had the stage to themselves while the former sang the last and greatest of the songs of Brahms, the Four Serious Songs to scriptural texts, Opus 121.

Each of the pieces by Mozart, performed last evening, is in a sense a musical curiosity, seldom brought to public notice. The slow movement of the bassoon concerto is, in fact, Mozart at his best; he alone might have written it. The finale of the concerto and the aria with double-bass obbligato are less distinctive, yet Mozart, it is hardly necessary to add, could not be commonplace even in his most workaday moments. By Dr. Koussevitzky this same slow movement of the concerto was beautifully played, or rather sung, his ponderous instrument taking on here the quality of a 'cello, while in the finale and in the obbligato to the air, it capered in a manner to belie its bulk.

A singer of the declamatory type, Mr. Gange is scarcely the ideal vocalist for the suavities of Mozart. Better suited to his abilities were the songs of Brahms to which he gave an impressive interpretation. Mr. Luboshutz's accompaniments were, in every instance, of remarkable quality. Throughout the evening the enthusiasm of the audience was at high pitch.

Herald Oct 23

MUSIC

KOUSSEVITZKY

A very large audience went last night to Symphony hall to hear Mr. Koussevitzky play the double bass, also to help the Elizabeth Peabody House Association and the Travelers' Aid Society.

They had, in some respects, a curious evening of it, for during the first half of the concert they heard musicians of quality in the ungrateful roles of substitutes. Mr. Koussevitzky, for instance, in the opinion of experts a master at the double bass, they heard doing his best with that double bass to make it fill the place of a bassoon. For Mozart, no less, wrote a concerto for bassoon, with accompaniment for instruments in variety—which variety Mr. Pierre Luboshutz, at the piano, supplied as well as he could. Of the solo part Mr. Koussevitzky made something very sweet.

Mr. Fraser Gange, like Mr. Luboshutz, doing his best, drove his nice baritone voice deep down as he could to meet the demands of a low bass voice in Mozart's aria, "Per questa bella mano," Mr. Koussevitzky playing a florid obligato. Mr. Burgin led a small orchestra delightfully. It brought refreshment, that orchestra with every instrument holding to its most satisfactory place.

In Bruck's "Kol Nidrei" Mr. Koussevitzky tried conclusions with a 'cello. Here he met his most happy results. Low tones abounded, of a glorious richness, and the upper tones, surely not a double bass's best, sounded not amiss in Bruck's sombre liturgical music.

In the second half of the concert the artists confined themselves more comfortably to the instruments at their command. Mr. Gange, indeed, in Brahms's "Four Serious Songs," found music so nicely adapted to his excellent voice that he might safely have ventured to trust more completely Brahms's vocal line and the biblical texts; they stand in no need of dramatic betterments. And Mr. Koussevitzky played next his own concerto, a work already known and praised for its musical grace and its skilful use of his instrument's capabilities.

The audience showed pleasure all the evening.

R. R. G.

10

Symphony

To Chaikovsky Over Vivaldi And a Jungle

Transcript Oct 26

Dr. Koussevitzky Transfigures The "Pathetic" Symphony, Mr. Josten Falls Short

IF the devotees of Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony will pardon the word, it was ever so little amusing to watch the effect of the March Movement upon the audience yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Though thirty-odd years have gnawed at the music, though the Anglo-American world that hears it oftenest, has changed to a post-war from a fin-de-siécle mentality (as it used to be called), there is not a little to be said for the other divisions of "The Pathetic." This third movement, however, has dwindled—or rather swelled—into an exhibitional exercise in rhythms and sonorities wherewith conductor and orchestra play upon the nerves of audiences. They stay or speed the pace; tighten or relax the rhythm; now in advance and now in recession, at last attain the climax. And tense and titillating is the excitement of most hearers. This effect, moreover, is intrinsic in the music. Not that Chaikovsky deliberately contrived it. He was too honest and, in composition, too fervid, to do that. There was in him, none the less, a melodramatic instinct; in this March Movement he gave it spontaneous play.

The proof was the stronger on Friday, since Dr. Koussevitzky refrained from every exhibitional stroke. He manipulated neither pace nor rhythm, neither sonorities nor climax. He measured his own zeal more discreetly than in previous performances hereabouts. He eschewed altogether the frenzies of various rivals and predecessors. The whole movement could hardly have been played more simply and straightforwardly. Yet the nervous effect upon the audience was changeless. Excitement loosed applause that no rule or custom might check. The progress of the Symphony was stayed; the clapping was general; with a wave of his hands toward the orchestra, the conductor acknowledged it. Yet had Honegger or Bartók signed these pages, not a few who clapped loudest would have called them blatant; while some who now put by wit for thrill, would have said: "The procession is coming, hooray!"

When Dr. Koussevitzky re-played, last year, Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, possibly the composer's masterwork, a new temperance was audible from his version. The like quality distinguishes throughout his present reading of "The Pathetic." Time was when he prepared obviously the entrance of the songful theme in the first movement; by pace, emphasis and color clothed it to the utmost with sentimental melancholy. Yesterday it came and went without exaggeration; diffused its own suggestion, not of rankness, but, in the curve that Dr. Koussevitzky lent it, of a decadent sweetness proper to the composer's time and mood. Similarly with the turbulent passages in the movement. Though one began with a drum-stroke—Mr. Ritter was at the top of his form—like a virtuoso pistol-shot, it was prelude to agitation, not frenzy.

Again in the second "five-four" movement, how shrewdly Dr. Koussevitzky held the main ... ent of the trio in suspension, th... eath, the reiterated drum-beat mi... it. At the end, too, the conduct... measures droop into lassitude of pace and tone—another of Chaikovsky's fin-de-siècle moods and devices. (Nearer to us nowadays is the shrill, nervous energy of the ensuing March.) Rather too much Dr. Koussevitzky muted the gong-stroke that is summons of fate in the Finale; while with sympathetic understanding he tightened the rhythm and held fast to the loose-drawn melody. And in the end there was that dying into a silence of extinction which is Chaikovsky's diminuendo transfigured into work of imagination.

In some ears at least, "The Pathetic" gained much by this temperate performance. They were prepared to be bored; they found themselves interested and eager. Notoriously Chaikovsky is a loose constructionist in symphonic form. Less he developed his melodies than strung them in sequences, to be vitalized by contrast. Out of devoted instinct for the music, Dr. Koussevitzky veiled this fault and gave Chaikovsky a semblance of symphonic coherence rather than of tone-poem-like alternations. To equally good purpose he clothed the whole Symphony—except that melodramatic March Movement—with clear romantic quality. It is custom to call "The Pathetic" self-revelation, usually with "morbid" for prefixed adjective. Chaikovsky, however, lived and worked in a Russian time and society that still liked to wear, and could wear with illusion, the romantic robes that Pushkin borrowed from Byron. If Piotyr Ilich confessed himself in "The Pathetic," he also romanticized himself; so made his Symphony less personal and more poignant. Dr. Koussevitzky caught and communicated this larger note. He also reduced to a minimum the exhibitional element that has become over-much the custom of virtuoso-conductors, each trying to outdo the others, at the expense of the composer. Sensitively, rather than morbidly, Chaikovsky now released his moods of melancholy, transport and despair. It is only the truth to say that with the Fifth Symphony, last year, and now with "The Pathetic," Dr. Koussevitzky restores to Chaikovsky a just romantic stature.

The concert began with Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra with Organ, wherein we might know the pleasure of the ancient style as an Italian of the beginning of the eighteenth century practiced it, provided also in the twentieth with a superlative orchestra to give him voice. Vivaldi may take his exercise in a more or less formal counterpoint, or in the virtuoso-display of his choirs; but sooner rather than later, he returns to the warm and full-voiced melody, the suave and courtly progress, the sensuous address that in him were second nature. Easy-going with a good craftsman's skill is this Concerto. Give it a virtuoso-orchestra, at every turn susceptible and glorifying, and it is as easy listening. Let it pass for a light pleasure of the symphonic day. There is room for such.

The middle piece was the new piece—"Jungle: Symphonic Movement for Full Orchestra," written by Professor Werner Josten of Smith College, with good memories of his "Concerto Sacro" in Symphony Hall last spring and of his "Ode for Saint Cecilia's Day," three weeks back at Worcester, to raise expectation. He chanced upon a picture, reproduced in this newspaper on Page Seven of Part Five, painted by the semi-primitive, semi-decadent, peasant-Parisian, Henri Rousseau — sub-normal Baudelaire in grotesque, luxuriant, horrific visioning. He labelled it "Exotic Forest"; into it conjured a jungle of lush, fetid vegetation, uncanny birds and beasts, dim pool and brazen sky. It stirred Mr. Josten's imagination, awakened sensations that he would transmute into tones in this "Symphonic Movement," shapen, freely, to sonata-form. He employs for sonority and color a full twentieth-century orchestra, sufficiently percussive. He proceeds from short motivs. He relies for suggestion upon rhythm and color; enforces contrast and climax. Technically, his "Symphonic Movement" is the work of a well-practised, well-furnished composer, gaining variety in unity. Less than do most of the younger generation, when they would "go" primitive, does he hark back to Stravinsky of "Le Sacre."

Not in construction but in suggestion does Mr. Josten, under a single hearing, fall short of his design. Certain of his pages should diffuse the close air, the rank heat, the dripping moisture of the jungle. Others should convey its close-packed immensity holding the wanderer in oppressed thrall. Others, again, should echo the amorous or contentious murmur of hidden bird and beast, now seductive, again raucous. Above all into the imagination of the hearer should creep the fear of the solitary, thus encompassed. It steals upon him, penetrates and shakes him; obsesses him with foul dreads; whirls him, frenetic yet impotent, into the tonal vertigo of the close. This one and that who has traversed, not tropical jungles, but Northern forests, knows the mounting and suffocating delirium of these sensations. To such, though it be a hard saying, Mr. Josten seems to have experienced them only at the study-table, under the lamp, for the making of music. Nor does he give that music the direct and instant impact upon the receptive hearer that distinguished, in widely different fields both the "Concerto Sacro" and the Cecilian Ode. In "Jungle," a borrowed obsession chokes him.

H. T. P.

It is the present unwritten law of the Symphony Concerts that no applause shall interrupt the progress of a symphony. But yesterday, as in fact in past performances of the "Pathetic" under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, the audience could not contain itself when the mounting excitements of the third movement had run their course. Here listeners, gripped and held taut as seldom they may be by any musical performance, had out of sheer necessity to seek release in the clapping of hands. Nor did the conductor show any disposition to curb these plaudits. Incidentally, when this Scherzo-March is played as yesterday it was played, the only possible complement to it is the movement that the composer created for his Finale. Another climax of the conventional sort would have been a psychological mistake if not an esthetic error.

Josten's "Jungle"

As the outstanding figure in the department of music at Smith College Mr. Josten has earned both the praise and the gratitude of music-lovers by his tastefully prepared and eloquently performed revivals of operas by Handel and Monteverde. That a musician of his leanings should have composed the symphonic poem made known yesterday is a bit surprising. Inspired by a painting, "Foret exotique," of Henri Rousseau, Mr. Josten's piece, by the composer's own confession, seeks "to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle with its lures, terrors, primitive love and ferocious death."

To this end the composer has assembled a huge orchestra, and in the employment of it relies upon all manner of startling rhythmic, dynamic and percussive effects. A "lion's roar" is listed among the instruments although Dr. Koussevitzky, who cares not overmuch for naturalistic effects, hardly permitted this contrivance to sound its more blood-curdling note.

That Mr. Josten gains here and there an effect of suspensive terror may not be denied. But would not his music serve best as tonal background to a film, a pantomime or some such situation on the spoken stage as Eugene O'Neil has invented in his "Emperor Jones"? As a piece of music "Jungle" has hardly the thematic interest or the organic life to enable it to stand squarely on its own feet.

Mr. Josten, who was present in the hall, was summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky and was cordially applauded by the audience.

Herald

ATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1

MU

Symphony Concert

BY PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Vivaldi, Concerto, D minor, for orchestra with organ (edited by Siloti. Josten, "Jungle," symphonic poem (first performance), Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 6, B minor, "Pathetic."

Werner Josten, teacher of fugue and composition at Smith College, wrote "Jungle" last year. The subject was not suggested to him by any tale of adventure; not even by H. M. Tomlinson's famous book of his experiences in Brazil, nor by the marvellous description of the Eastern jungle in "Gallion's Reach." Mr. Josten saw a picture by Henri Rousseau, who began to paint when he was 40 years old; he was ridiculed, his exhibited paintings were badly hung; all sorts of obstacles were put in his way; he was wretchedly poor to the day of his death in 1910. And now the once despised pictures command a high price. Rousseau did not find it necessary to visit a jungle. Studies in the Jardin des Plantes at Paris were sufficient for his purpose, as Auber did not visit Naples for "local color" when he wrote characteristically Neapolitan music for scenes in "La Muette de Portici." Mr. Josten informs us that the music of his symphonic poem "tries to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love and ferocious death." One might reasonably say that no music can give so vivid impressions of jungle life as does the prose of Tomlinson, Paul Morand or Andre Gide; but given Mr. Josten's program, any hearer who is willing to meet him half way will admit that he has written admirably to express in tones that program; and this without any desire to be sensational. His themes are his own with the exception of a Voodoo rhythmic motive; nor does he content himself merely with episodes loosely connected; the work is firmly knit, it has form and substance. Mr. Josten not only has musical ideas in plenty; he has imagination; he realizes in music what he saw in Rousseau's picture. No doubt the music is more picturesque, more impressive than the painting. From the beginning to the end there is the assurance of a savagery, a wildness in tones that does not depend at all on laboriously sought-out dissonances or ear-splitting tonal explosions. A huge orchestra is employed. Probably the instrument "the lion roar" appears for the first time in the orchestra. (It is a greatly enlarged edition of boyhood's plaything, known as "the Devil's Fiddle," by some as "the bull fiddle.") But the effectiveness of Mr. Josten's score does not rest on attempts at realism, any more than the sheep in Strauss's "Don Quixote," are the commanding feature in that tone-poem. As among African tribes, so in this symphonic poem, drums have their meaning, at times sinister and portentous, but the work gives the impression that the melodic figures, the developments, the harmonic schemes, the contrasts—note the haunting sensuality of the love episode—were all conceived as a whole.

"Jungle" is an uncommonly interesting work, none the less so because it comes from a teacher at Smith College who delights in the revival of operas by Monteverde and Handel; finds inspiration in poems by Shelley and Baudelaire; hymns the praise of the "Quene of Paradys" and has not forgotten Dryden's "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day."

929

SIC

Dr. Koussevitzky, as is his habit, took great pains in the preparation of the performance. Although the music presents many technical difficulties, the performance was a brilliant one. The composer was deservedly called to the platform.

Vivaldi's concerto was the first composition conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston. It is worth hearing more than once if only for the beautiful slow movement. The other movements deserve respectful attention, especially from those who loudly, one might say blatantly, proclaim that the history of music began only with the coming of Stravinsky. Handel, Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms—they are all "old hat"; though some condescend to speak favorably of Mozart. No doubt these extollers of ultra-modern music, making no discrimination in their wild-eyed eulogy, would sniff disdainfully at the superbly dramatic performance of the "Pathetic" symphony and dismiss the great Russian whose appeal is universal, as a maker of tunes, possibly prefacing "tunes" by the word "vulgar," or saying that this music is "too obvious." It is the fashion in some quarters to extol Rimsky-Korsakov at the expense of Tchaikovsky, but the latter was a man of a far deeper nature who was not ashamed to sound his own joy and unhappiness, his delight in life and his dread of death. So that his own emotions make their way to the hearts of his hearers.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The next concerts will be on Nov. 8 and 9, for the orchestra will be away next week. The program of the fourth pair of concerts will comprise Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543), Gruenberg's Symphonic poem "The Enchanted Isle" (first time in Boston), Spohr's Nocturne, a suite for wind instruments (probably a first performance here) and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

Traveler Oct 26

SYMPHONY IN THIRD CONCERT

"Jungle," a Symphonic Poem, Introduced for First Time

Between an 18th century Vivaldi concerto, and the familiar Tchaikovsky vitzky, in his third concert program at citzky, in his third concert program at Symphony hall yesterday, introduced "Jungle," a symphonic poem by one of the younger American composers, Werner Josten.

Perhaps there could be no more difficult test than this, for preceded by the melodic simplicity of the earlier musical metaphor, and followed by the soul-stirring Tchaikovsky, this cacophony of sound and harmonic dissonanace stands forth in yet bolder contrast.

It has become fashionable and easy to dismiss these novelties as unimportant, yet out of the many moderns who have found a place on Mr. Koussevitzky's programs, Mr. Josten's "Jungle" stands well toward the top of the list.

Mr. Josten's inspiration is from the jungle picture of Rousseau, "Foret Exotique" and within its measures there is the feeling of the flaming color and luxuriant growth of tropical wilds, the persuasive and mysterious rhythm of voodooism, the lion's roar, and burning days underneath an African sun. A striking piece of realism, yet there is form and substance, too, and here and there flashes of real beauty.

The composer presents his themes with authority and sincerity, yet it will take time to disentangle the true from the false and the merely grotesque from the distinctive. The themes are developed with care, and "Jungle" has a right to be judged as a musical movement of interesting worth. The work was well received and Mr. Josten came to the platform in acknowledgment.

The opening Vivaldi concerto, with its swelling organ and jolly finale, seemed very like Bach, to whom it was indeed attributed for many years, although, despite its charming and imitative phrasing, it had its dull moments.

Of the Tchaikovzky "Pethetic," there is nothing left to be said. Its brooding majesty, its sombre beauty have been much misunderstood and often condemned. As Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra presented it yesterday it remains a great musical and emotional experience. The audience so far forgot itself as to interrupt the reading after the third and martial movement with a burst of applause.

Globe Oct 26, 1929

JOSTEN'S "JUNGLE" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Smith Professor's New Tone Poem Heard

Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony Remarkably Well Performed

"Jungle," a symphonic movement for orchestra by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith College, was the novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program. Dr Koussevitzky again delighted the audience with his remarkably fine interpretation of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony. The concert began with Vivaldi's D minor concerto.

Mr Josten's program note about his "Jungle" explains that it was written last year, "inspired by a painting 'Foret exotique,' by Henri Rousseau." Its form is sonata-allegro. Except for a Voodoo rhythmic motive, no native melodies or themes are used. "The music tries to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures terrors, primitive love, and ferocious death."

Those who have not seen the painting which inspired Mr Josten may perhaps form an idea of the Africa he wished his music to suggest by reading Joseph Conrad's "Heart of Darkness." Henri Rousseau is said to have gotten his ideas of the jungle from the Jardin des Plantes, the famous botanic garden in Paris. But to Conrad, the African wilderness was a thing remembered as well as imagined.

One missed in Mr Josten's music the intensity of dread and mystery which Conrad's story gives. The subjective impressions of a single listener to music are too much governed by the accidents of memory to be worth much as measures of a new work of art. But the only jungle one listener saw yesterday with the mind's eye was the charmingly artificial and conventionalized one which graced the stage of the Wilbur Theatre here at the first Boston performances of Shaw's "Androcles and the Lion," in 1915.

One noted in Mr Josten's music many suggestions of the music of other present day writers. There were for instance hints of Respighi, and of the Stravinsky rhythms that seemed so startling when one first met their full impact in "Le Sacre." "Jungle" is clearly and simply written. The modernistic musical idiom. The scoring for orchestra could be bettered. There was too much noise and too little sonority. Let Mr Josten study once again the score of "Petruchka."

The general impression left at a first hearing was that "Jungle" is an up-to-date version of the sort of music American college teachers have been writing for half a century or more. Its inspiration is derived with eclectic impartiality, from more than one European model. But it lacks originality and power.

No other conductor known to Boston audiences has been able to equal Dr Koussevitzky in the music of Tchaikovsky. As hitherto, one might justly exhaust a dictionary of superlatives in praise of his reading of Tchaikosky's Sixth Symphony. He conveys both the letter and the true spirit of this music with overwhelming force. It is music so perfectly attuned to his own temperament that one never for a moment feels the personality of the conductor obtruded between composer and listener.

Dr Koussevitzky, with marvelous musical tact, even contrives to cover up many of the faults and defects in Tchaikovsky's work. Yet, in the face of his genius, and of an audience obviously deeply stirred by music and performance, one can only repeat that this symphony is not to be mentioned in the same breath with the masterpieces of Mozart, or of Brahms, and protest that is is too often played at these concerts.

The Vivaldi concerto, arranged by Siloti, seems to be Dr Koussevitzky's ustomary choice for beginning a rogram in a new city. It was the rst thing he ever conducted in Bos-n, Oct 10, 1924. It will next Tues-ay be the first piece he conducts at is first appearance in Chicago with he Boston Symphony.

Yesterday's performance displayed he virtuosity of the strings in the rchestra to advantage, though one oticed at least one faulty attack, nd other minor flaws. But one felt hat an amiable and pleasing ancient iece had been inflated into something was never meant to be. There ould be a smaller orchestra. This oncerto is frankly a light piece, ritten, it would seem, for display f technique rather than to stir the epths of a listener's heart. Siloti nd Koussevitzky between them have ut it a spurious eloquence which de-rives it of its native grace.

There are no Symphony concerts in oston until Nov 8 and 9. The orches-a is to visit Buffalo, Chicago, Minne-polis, Indianapolis and Pittsburg ithin the next week.

P. R.

JRDAY, OCTOBER 26,

"PATHETIC" AN EPIC BY SYMPHONY

Astounding Performance at Dr. Koussevitzky's Hands

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The memorable portion of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was not the playing, notable in kind, of Vivaldi's stately Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ as edited by Alexander Siloti, or the first hearing of Werner Josten's symphonic poem, "Jungle." It was the astounding performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

GRIPS LISTENERS

In this performance Dr. Koussevitzky, with the orchestra to aid him at every turn, exhibited in remarkable degree the ability to make the familiar, even that which has become stale and trite, new and engrossing. Not that in such deeds he necessarily adds to the music anything that legitimately is not in it. Rather he brings to complete revelation and fulfillment intended effects that, by comparison, the ordinary performance merely hints at or suggests.

10

Symphony

To Chaikovsky Over Vivaldi And a Jungle

Transcript Oct 26

Dr. Koussevitzky Transfigures The "Pathetic" Symphony, Mr. Josten Falls Short

IF the devotees of Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony will pardon the word, it was ever so little amusing to watch the effect of the March Movement upon the audience yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Though thirty-odd years have gnawed at the music, though the Anglo-American world that hears it oftenest, has changed to a post-war from a fin-de-siécle mentality (as it used to be called), there is not a little to be said for the other divisions of "The Pathetic." This third movement, however, has dwindled—or rather sweiled—into an exhibitional exercise in rhythms and sonorities wherewith conductor and orchestra play upon the nerves of audiences. They stay or speed the pace; tighten or relax the rhythm; now in advance and now in recession, at last attain the climax. And tense and titillating is the excitement of most hearers. This effect, moreover, is intrinsic in the music. Not that Chaikovsky deliberately contrived it. He was too honest and, in composition, too fervid, to do that. There was in him, none the less, a melodramatic instinct; in this March Movement he gave it spontaneous play.

The proof was the stronger on Friday, since Dr. Koussevitzky refrained from every exhibitional stroke. He manipulated neither pace nor rhythm, neither sonorities nor climax. He measured his own zeal more discreetly than in previous performances hereabouts. He eschewed altogether the frenzies of various rivals and predecessors. The whole movement could hardly have been played more simply and straightforwardly. Yet the nervous effect upon the audience was changeless. Excitement loosed applause that no rule or custom might check. The progress of the Symphony was stayed; the clapping was general; with a wave of his hands toward the orchestra, the conductor acknowledged it. Yet had Honegger or Bartók signed these pages, not a few who clapped loudest would have called them blatant; while some who now put by wit for thrill, would have said: "The procession is coming, hooray!"

When Dr. Koussevitzky re-played, last year, Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, possibly the composer's masterwork, a new temperance was audible from his version. The like quality distinguishes throughout his present reading of "The Pathetic." Time was when he prepared obviously the entrance of the songful theme in the first movement; by pace, emphasis and color clothed it to the utmost with sentimental melancholy. Yesterday it came and went without exaggeration; diffused its own suggestion, not of rankness, but, in the curve that Dr. Koussevitzky lent it, of a decadent sweetness proper to the composer's time and mood. Similarly with the turbulent passages in the movement. Though one began with a drum-stroke—Mr. Ritter was at the top of his form—like a virtuoso pistol-shot, it was prelude to agitation, not frenzy.

Again in the second "five-four" movement, how shrewdly Dr. Koussevitzky held the main element of the trio in suspension, the [illegible] heath, the reiterated drum-beat mi[illegible] of it. At the end, too, the conductor [illegible] measures droop into lassitude of pace and tone—another of Chaikovsky's fin-de-siècle moods and devices. (Nearer to us nowadays is the shrill, nervous energy of the ensuing March.) Rather too much Dr. Koussevitzky muted the gong-stroke that is summons of fate in the Finale; while with sympathetic understanding he tightened the rhythm and held fast to the loose-drawn melody. And in the end there was that dying into a silence of extinction which is Chaikovsky's diminuendo transfigured into work of imagination.

In some ears at least, "The Pathetic" gained much by this temperate performance. They were prepared to be bored; they found themselves interested and eager. Notoriously Chaikovsky is a loose constructionist in symphonic form. Less he developed his melodies than strung them in sequences, to be vitalized by contrast. Out of devoted instinct for the music, Dr. Koussevitzky veiled this fault and gave Chaikovsky a semblance of symphonic coherence rather than of tone-poem-like alternations. To equally good purpose he clothed the whole Symphony—except that melodramatic March Movement—with clear romantic quality. It is custom to call "The Pathetic" self-revelation, usually with "morbid" for prefixed adjective. Chaikovsky, however, lived and worked in a Russian time and society that still liked to wear, and could wear with illusion, the romantic robes that Pushkin borrowed from Byron. If Piotyr Ilich confessed himself in "The Pathetic," he also romanticized himself; so made his Symphony less personal and more poignant. Dr. Koussevitzky caught and communicated this larger note. He also reduced to a minimum the exhibitional element that has become over-much the custom of virtuoso-conductors, each trying to outdo the others, at the expense of the composer. Sensitively, rather than morbidly, Chaikovsky now released his moods of melancholy, transport and despair. It is only the truth to say that with the Fifth Symphony, last year, and now with "The Pathetic," Dr. Koussevitzky restores to Chaikovsky a just romantic stature.

The concert began with Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra with Organ, wherein we might know the pleasure of the ancient style as an Italian of the beginning of the eighteenth century practiced it, provided also in the twentieth with a superlative orchestra to give him voice. Vivaldi may take his exercise in a more or less formal counterpoint, or in the virtuoso-display of his choirs; but sooner rather than later, he returns to the warm and full-voiced melody, the suave and courtly progress, the sensuous address that in him were second nature. Easy-going with a good craftsman's skill is this Concerto. Give it a virtuoso-orchestra, at every turn susceptible and glorifying, and it is as easy listening. Let it pass for a light pleasure of the symphonic day. There is room for such

The middle piece was the new piece—"Jungle: Symphonic Movement for Full Orchestra," written by Professor Werner Josten of Smith College, with good memories of his "Concerto Sacro" in Symphony Hall last spring and of his "Ode for Saint Cecilia's Day," three weeks back at Worcester, to raise expectation. He chanced upon a picture, reproduced in this newspaper on Page Seven of Part Five, painted by the semi-primitive, semi-decadent, peasant-Parisian, Henri Rousseau—sub-normal Baudelaire in grotesque, luxuriant, horrific visioning. He labelled it "Exotic Forest"; into it conjured a jungle of lush, fetid vegetation, uncanny birds and beasts, dim pool and brazen sky. It stirred Mr. Josten's imagination, awakened sensations that he would transmute into tones in this "Symphonic Movement," shapen, freely, to sonata-form. He employs for sonority and color a full twentieth-century orchestra, sufficiently percussive. He proceeds from short motivs. He relies for suggestion upon rhythm and color; enforces contrast and climax. Technically, his "Symphonic Movement" is the work of a well-practised, well-furnished composer, gaining variety in unity. Less than do most of the younger generation, when they would "go" primitive, does he hark back to Stravinsky of "Le Sacre."

Not in construction but in suggestion does Mr. Josten, under a single hearing, fall short of his design. Certain of his pages should diffuse the close air, the rank heat, the dripping moisture of the jungle. Others should convey its close-packed immensity holding the wanderer in oppressed thrall. Others, again, should echo the amorous or contentious murmur of hidden bird and beast, now seductive, again raucous. Above all into the imagination of the hearer should creep the fear of the solitary, thus encompassed. It steals upon him, penetrates and shakes him; obsesses him with foul dreads; whirls him, frenetic yet impotent, into the tonal vertigo of the close. This one and that who has traversed, not tropical jungles, but Northern forests, knows the mounting and suffocating delirium of these sensations. To such, though it be a hard saying, Mr. Josten seems to have experienced them only at the study-table, under the lamp, for the making of music. Nor does he give that music the direct and instant impact upon the receptive hearer that distinguished, in widely different fields both the "Concerto Sacro" and the Cecilian Ode. In "Jungle," a borrowed obsession chokes him.

H. T. P.

It is the present unwritten law of the Symphony Concerts that no applause shall interrupt the progress of a symphony. But yesterday, as in fact in past performances of the "Pathetic" under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, the audience could not contain itself when the mounting excitements of the third movement had run their course. Here listeners, gripped and held taut as seldom they may be by any musical performance, had out of sheer necessity to seek release in the clapping of hands. Nor did the conductor show any disposition to curb these plaudits. Incidentally, when this Scherzo-March is played as yesterday it was played, the only possible complement to it is the movement that the composer created for his Finale. Another climax of the conventional sort would have been a psychological mistake if not an esthetic error.

Josten's "Jungle"

As the outstanding figure in the depart of music at Smith College Mr. Josten has earned both the praise and the gratitude of music-lovers by his tastefully prepared and eloquently performed revivals of operas by Handel and Monteverde. That a musician of his leanings should have composed the symphonic poem made known yesterday is a bit surprising. Inspired by a painting, "Foret exotique," of Henri Rousseau, Mr. Josten's piece, by the composer's own confession, seeks "to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love, and ferocious death."

To this end the composer has assembled a huge orchestra, and in the employment of it relies upon all manner of startling rhythmic, dynamic and percussive effects. A "lion's roar" is listed among the instruments although Dr. Koussevitzky, who cares not overmuch for naturalistic effects, hardly permitted this contrivance to sound its most blood-curdling note.

That Mr. Josten gains here and there an effect of suspensive terror may not be denied. But would not his music serve best as tonal background to a film, a pantomime or some such situation on the spoken stage as Eugene O'Neil has invented in his "Emperor Jones"? As a piece of music "Jungle" has hardly the thematic interest or the organic life to enable it to stand squarely on its own feet.

Mr. Josten, who was present in the hall, was summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky and was cordially applauded by the audience.

ATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1

MU

Symphony Concert

BY PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Vivaldi, Concerto, D minor, for orchestra with organ (edited by Siloti. Josten, "Jungle"; symphonic poem (first performance), Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 6, B minor, "Pathetic."

Werner Josten, teacher of fugue and composition at Smith College, wrote "Jungle" last year. The subject was not suggested to him by any tale of adventure; not even by H. M. Tomlinson's famous book of his experiences in Brazil, nor by the marvellous description of the Eastern jungle in "Gallion's Reach." Mr. Josten saw a picture by Henri Rousseau, who began to paint when he was 40 years old; he was ridiculed, his exhibited paintings were badly hung; all sorts of obstacles were put in his way; he was wretchedly poor to the day of his death in 1910. And now the once despised pictures command a high price. Rousseau did not find it necessary to visit a jungle. Studies in the Jardin des Plantes at Paris were sufficient for his purpose, as Auber did not visit Naples for "local color" when he wrote characteristically Neapolitan music for scenes in "La Muette de Portici." Mr. Josten informs us that the music of his symphonic poem "tries to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love and ferocious death." One might reasonably say that no music can give so vivid impressions of jungle life as does the prose of Tomlinson, Paul Morand or Andre Gide; but given Mr. Josten's program, any hearer who is willing to meet him half way will admit that he has written admirably to express in tones that program, and this without any desire to be sensational. His themes are his own with the exception of a Voodoo rhythmic motive; nor does he content himself merely with episodes loosely connected; the work is firmly knit, it has form and substance. Mr. Josten not only has musical ideas in plenty; he has imagination; he realizes in music what he saw in Rousseau's picture. No doubt the music is more picturesque, more impressive than the painting. From the beginning to the end there is the assurance of a savagery, a wildness in tones that does not depend at all on laboriously sought-out dissonances or ear-splitting tonal explosions. A huge orchestra is employed. Probably the instrument "the lion roar" appears for the first time in the orchestra. (It is a greatly enlarged edition of boyhood's plaything, known as "the Devil's Fiddle," by some as "the bull fiddle.") But the effectiveness of Mr. Josten's score does not rest on attempts at realism, any more than the sheep in Strauss's "Don Quixote," are the commanding feature in that tone-poem. As among African tribes, so in this symphonic poem, drums have their meaning, at times sinister and portentous, but the work gives the impression that the melodic figures, the developments, the harmonic schemes, the contrasts—note the haunting sensuality of the love episode—were all conceived as a whole.

"Jungle" is an uncommonly interest-

JRDAY, OCTOBER 26,

"PATHETIC" AN EPIC BY SYMPHONY

Astounding Performance at Dr. Koussevitzky's Hands

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The memorable portion of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was not the playing, notable in kind, of Vivaldi's stately Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ as edited by Alexander Siloti, or the first hearing of Werner Josten's symphonic poem, "Jungle." It was the astounding performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

GRIPS LISTENERS

In this performance Dr. Koussevitzky, with the orchestra to aid him at every turn, exhibited in remarkable degree the ability to make the familiar, even that which has become stale and trite, new and engrossing. Not that in such deeds he necessarily adds to the music anything that legitimately is not in it. Rather he brings to complete revelation and fulfillment intended effects that, by comparison, the ordinary performance merely hints at or suggests.

[illegible] ed, at first coming to Mr.

[illegible] IN [illegible] ONCERT

[illegible] Symphonic [illegible]duced for [illegible] Time

[illegible] century Vivaldi con- [illegible] amiliar Tchaikovsky [illegible]d concert program at [illegible]d concert program at yesterday, introduced [illegible]honic poem by one of [illegible]rican composers, Wer-

[illegible] could be no more dif- [illegible] this, for preceded by [illegible]nplicity of the earlier [illegible]r, and followed by the [illegible]haikovsky, this caco- [illegible]l and harmonic dissonorth in yet bolder con-

[illegible]me fashionable and easy [illegible]se novelties as unimport- [illegible]f the many moderns who [illegible] place on Mr. Koussevitms, Mr. Josten's "Jungle" [illegible] oward the top of the list. [illegible]'s inspiration is from the [illegible]re of Rousseau, "Foret Exo- within its measures there is [illegible] of the flaming color and [illegible]rowth of tropical wilds, the [illegible] and mysterious rhythm of [illegible] the lion's roar, and burning [illegible]rneath an African sun. A [illegible]iece of realism, yet there is [illegible] substance, too, and here and [illegible]hes of real beauty.

[illegible]omposer presents his themes [illegible]nority and sincerity, yet it will [illegible]e to disentangle the true from [illegible]e and the merely grotesque [illegible]e distinctive. The themes are [illegible]d with care, and "Jungle" has to be judged as a musical move- [illegible]f interesting worth. The work [illegible]ll received and Mr. Josten came platform in acknowledgment.

opening Vivaldi concerto, with [illegible]elling organ and jolly finale, [illegible] very like Bach, to whom it was [illegible] attributed for many years, al- [illegible]h, despite its charming and imi- [illegible]phrasing, it had its dull moments. the Tchaikovzky "Pethetic," there [illegible]thing left to be said. Its brooding [illegible]sty, its sombre beauty have been [illegible]h misunderstood and often con- [illegible]ned. As Mr. Koussevitzky and the [illegible]estra presented it yesterday it [illegible]ains a great musical and emotional [illegible]erience. The audience so far forgot [illegible]elf as to interrupt the reading after [illegible]e third and martial movement with burst of applause.

929

SIC

ing work, none the less so because it comes from a teacher at Smith Colleg who delights in the revival of oper by Monteverde and Handel; finds spiration in poems by Shelley and Bay laire; hymns the praise of the "Quer Paradys" and has not forgotten den's "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day."

Dr. Koussevitzky, as is his habit great pains in the preparation performance. Although the mu sents many technical difficult performance was a brilliant o composer was deservedly call platform.

Vivaldi's concerto was the position conducted by Dr. K in Boston. It is worth h than once if only for the b movement. The other m serve respectful attentio from those who loudly, blatantly, proclaim that music began only with Stravinsky. Handel, B Schumann, Brahms—t hat"; though some co favorably of Mozart. extollers of ultra-mo no discrimination eulogy, would sniff superbly dramatic "Pathetic" sympho great Russian who as a maker of tu "tunes" by the ing that this m is the fashion tol Rimsky-Kor Tchaikovsky, b of a far dee ashamed to s happiness, h dread of dea ions make his hearers.

The con The next and 9, fo next wee pair of Symph berg's [illegible] isle" turne (prob Strauss's customary choice for beginning a program in a new city. It was the first thing he ever conducted in Boston, Oct 10, 1924. It will next Tuesday be the first piece he conducts at his first appearance in Chicago with the Boston Symphony.

Yesterday's performance displayed the virtuosity of the strings in the orchestra to advantage, though one noticed at least one faulty attack, and other minor flaws. But one felt that an amiable and pleasing ancient piece had been inflated into something it was never meant to be. There should be a smaller orchestra. This concerto is frankly a light piece, written, it would seem, for display of technique rather than to stir the depths of a listener's heart. Siloti and Koussevitzky between them have lent it a spurious eloquence which deprives it of its native grace.

There are no Symphony concerts in Boston until Nov 8 and 9. The orchestra is to visit Buffalo, Chicago, Minneapolis, Indianapolis and Pittsburg within the next week.

P. R.

26, 1929 Globe Oct 2[illegible]

JOSTEN'S "JUNGLE" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Smith Professor's New Tone Poem Heard

Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony Remarkably Well Performed

"Jungle," a symphonic movement for orchestra by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith College, was the novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program. Dr Koussevitzky again delighted the audience with his remarkably fine interpretation of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony. The concert began with Vivaldi's D minor concerto.

Mr Josten's program note about his "Jungle" explains that it was written last year, "inspired by a painting 'Foret exotique,' by Henri Rousseau." Its form is sonata-allegro. Except for a Voodoo rhythmic motive, no native melodies or themes are used. "The music tries to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love, and ferocious death."

Those who have not seen the painting which inspired Mr Josten may perhaps form an idea of the Africa he wished his music to suggest by reading Joseph Conrad's "Heart of Darkness." Henri Rousseau is said to have gotten his ideas of the jungle from the Jardin des Plantes, the famous botanic garden in Paris. But to Conrad, the African wilderness was a thing remembered as well as impagined.

One missed in Mr Josten's music the intensity of dread and mystery which Conrad's story gives. The subjective impressions of a single listener to music are too much governed by the accidents of memory to be worth much as measures of a new work of art. But the only jungle one listener saw yesterday with the mind's eye was the charmingly artificial and conventionalized one which graced the stage of the Wilbur Theatre here at the first Boston performances of Shaw's "Androcles and the Lion," in 1915.

One noted in Mr Josten's music many suggestions of the music of other present day writers. There were for instance hints of Respighi, and of the Stravinsky rhythms that seemed so startling when one first met their full impact in "Le Sacre." "Jungle" is clearly and simply written, in modernistic musical idiom. The scoring for orchestra could be bettered. There was too much noise and too little sonority. Let Mr Josten study once again the score of "Petruchka."

The general impression left at a first hearing was that "Jungle" is an up-to-date version of the sort of music American college teachers have been writing for half a century or more. Its inspiration is derived with eclectic impartiality, from more than one European model. But it lacks originality and power.

No other conductor known to Boston audiences has been able to equal Koussevitzky in the music of Tchaikovsky. As hitherto, one might justifiably exhaust a dictionary of superlatives in praise of his reading of Tchaikosky's Sixth Symphony. He conveys both the letter and the true spirit of this music with overwhelming force. It is music so perfectly attuned to his own temperament that one never for a moment feels the personality of the conductor obtruded between composer and listener.

Dr Koussevitzky, with marvelous musical tact, even contrives to cover up many of the faults and defects in Tchaikovsky's work. Yet, in the face of his genius, and of an audience obviously deeply stirred by music and performance, one can only repeat that this symphony is not to be mentioned in the same breath with the masterpieces of Mozart, or of Brahms, and protest that is is too often played at these concerts.

The Vivaldi concerto, arranged by Siloti, seems to be Dr Koussevitzky's

JOSTEN HEARS OWN WORK AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

THE Symphony concerts of this week list a program extraordinarily assorted as to style and period of music. First there is the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor for organ and orchestra, edited by Alexander Siloti. This classic art has scarcely ceased to sound when one's ears are assailed by the modernism of a Werner Josten, whose symphonic poem, "Jungle," received its first performance. Following the intermission comes the intensely nervous Tchaikovsky of the "Pathetic" Symphony.

Here is certainly no "unit" program, yet it results in an interesting concert. Josten's piece has many pages hauntingly beautiful. Others seem to us ineffective, even dull. They seem to betray an uncertainty of purpose. On the other hand, this futility might have been merely apparent, a result of a performance which did not seem to us distinguished. A first hearing gave no clue, at any rate, to the eventual stature of this piece, which attempts to depict in tones the feeling of a white man in the jungle.

The score is frankly imitative of various natural sounds. The harmonic treatment is modern, the orchestration free. Josten is "influenced" much by the French impressionists, by Rimsky-Korsakov and by the ubiquitous Stravinsky. He was present at the matinee concert to receive the plaudits of the audience. One could not help wondering how he liked the performance.

The Vivaldi concert gave unmitigated pleasure. Mr. Koussevitzky fancies the early Italians and with reason. Bostonians are much in his debt for his revival of this beautiful music. In the sharply contrasted excitement of Tchaikovsky, our conductor is equally at home. It is almost needless to add that the performance of the symphony yesterday was magnificent.

The Atlanta Journal
December 1, 1929.
The Journal Covers Dixie Like the Dew

MUSIC DRAMA and ART

BY MABELLE S. WALL

D. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY brought over his Symphonic Orchestra from Boston on Thursday, last, playing at Carnegie Hall in the eevning, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening and a matinee at Carnegie on Saturday. This was their first New York visit of the season.

He has a wonderfully drilled and homogeneus ensemble and his interpretations are of that scholarly quality that always give satisfaction, alike to the mind and the ear. He chose, on this occasion, to open his program with Beethoven's Overture to Egmont and followed it with Ravel's "Five Children's Pieces" from his Mother Goose Suite. In the latter the refinement of Ravel's characterization of these pieces was sympathetically delivered by this splendid conductor and his men.

In "Till Eulenspiegel," which, by the way, we have heard its composer, Richard Strauss, conduct, lacked a certain vigorousness and contrast that we heard in its former rendition. A broad, contained and just reading of the Beethoven Symphony No. 6, in B minor, was given by this distinguished visiting orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
NEWS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pays New York First Visit Of Season and Scores Hit

BY OLEY SPEARS

NEW YORK, Nov. 30.—The Boston Symphony orchestra made its first visit here this season in Carnegie hall this past week. That this famous organization has again come into its own was evidenced by the capacity audience to greet it and the superb performances put forward under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. There is a certain "air" to these concerts by the Boston orchestra, perhaps indefinable, but something that does not attach to most of the important concerts heard here; a certain "superior" air, as it were. Phillip Hale, the eminent Boston critic, is still writing the program notes for these concerts and the make-up of the program itself has not changed a whit in many, many years. Thus the Boston orchestra is an institution and its concerts heard here, some 10 times each season, are among the real events of this busy musical center.

Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra began this program; after a fine rendition of this lovely, old music the program presented something modern in Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle." The composer must have been gratified at the beautiful performance of his music at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky. Called to the stage, Mr. Gruenberg bowed his acknowledgements time after time. To close this interesting concert was Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 (Pathetic).

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

D. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY brought over his Symphonic Orchestra from Boston on Thursday, last, playing at Carnegie Hall in the eevning, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening and a matinee at Carnegie on Saturday. This was their first New York visit of the season.

He has a wonderfully drilled and homogeneus ensemble and his interpretations are of that scholarly quality that always give satisfaction, alike to the mind and the ear. He chose, on this occasion, to open his program with Beethoven's Overture to Egmont and followed it with Ravel's "Five Children's Pieces" from his Mother Goose Suite. In the latter the refinement of Ravel's characterization of these pieces was sympathetically delivered by this splendid conductor and his men.

In "Till Eulenspiegel," which, by the way, we have heard its composer, Richard Strauss, conduct, lacked a certain vigorousness and contrast that we heard in its former rendition. A broad, contained and just reading of the Beethoven Symphony No. 6, in B minor, was given by this distinguished visiting orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Next Sunday we shall have an opportunity to compare the playing of the invincible Boston Symphony Orchestra with one of the more insignificant organizations, or at least one so considered by the critics of Gotham, whose judgment, in the opinion of the polloi, is always final. It is not a member of the "big three," for there belong there only the Boston and Philadelphia symphonies and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, as they call it now.

The Detroit has to take its place in the long list where we find such names as the Chicago, the Cincinnati, the Cleveland, the Minneapolis, and as many more as any particular critic may have heard, and even in this list its proper place is as yet undetermined.

This lack of ranking, of course, exists among the "big three" also. Last year, perhaps, the Boston Symphony, because of its superior playing of the Bloch Symphonic Poem, was given the advantage of the doubt as to which of the three should be placed at the head of the list. But this list has never been threatened with the inscribing of a name additional.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch merely belongs to a small group of conductors always welcome in New York to give that city an opportunity to differentiate between its best and all the rest. There Mr. Gabrilowitsch has been on occasion a guest-conductor, but always with the accent placed on the "guest" by those arbiters who settle such matters once and for all. Perhaps it has never occurred to any of them that the orchestral game of today, like the game of football, may be subject to the ups and downs of chance and change.

Drawing Comparisons.

As a musician Mr. Gabrilowitsch has nothing to lose by a comparison with Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Mengelberg (or whoever the conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony may happen to be), or with Mr. Stokowsky. He has a high and unquestioned reputation as a pianist, while as a composer he has written perhaps as much or as little as any of the others.

He took charge of the Detroit Symphony when it walked with a decided limp, and he has trained it until now it has the vigor of a real runner.

Compared choir by choir with the others, it will not always show to advantage. Its violins are not of the very best, as a choir, but its concert master is superior to that of the New York orchestra, while displaying a greater tone, if less dexterity, than the concert master of the Boston Symphony. The violas are a superior lot, but the 'cellos, unless they have improved within the last year, are inferior to those of both the New York and Boston orchestras, particularly as the former has recently secured from the Chicago Symphony as its principal 'cellist Alfred Wallenstein, who is by all odds the best orchestral 'cellist in the country.

A High Spirit.

Among the woodwinds Laurent of the Boston Symphony doubtless holds the palm; but that choir as well as the brass is, in the Detroit gathering, quite strong. But in the back field the Detroit basses have been relatively weak, which makes little difference to the general public, for few pay any attention to the basses—a disregarded lot, taken on tolerance at best.

But the spirit of an orchestra counts almost as much as its personnel. And this spirit Mr. Gabrilowitsch has moulded in the Detroit Symphony so carefully that one can almost regard it as his spirit. His men neither hate him nor fear him; they respect him as a fine conductor and they love him as their friend. No conductor is more highly regarded by the men who serve him, unless it be Stock of Chicago.

And so we have every reason to expect a fine concert—a concert that the most conservative may call good, although he may balk at comparatives. For Mr. Gabrilowitsch has made a program that will give his gauge as a musician and that of his orchestra as an instrument. And, besides, he is going to play the second piano concerto of Mozart with the orchestral accompaniment directed by Assistant Conductor Victor Kolar. There may be a surprise in waiting for some of those who think that there is nothing worth while west of Springfield, Mass.

Some Program Notes

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

Boston Programs.

Since Mr. Koussevitzky, as is his custom about this time of year, is taking a brief vacation, the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be conducted this week Friday and Saturday, by the concert master and deputy director, Richard Burgin. For the assisting artist, Jacques Thibaud. Mr. Burgin, himself a violinist, should be a sympathetic conductor in the Violin Concerto No. 3, by Saint-Saens. The orchestral numbers will include the Suite from "The Golden Cockerel," Rimsky-Korsakoff; the Symphony, No. 2, in E flat major, Borodin; and the Symphonic Dances from the opera, "The Basque Venus," Wetzler.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

12

NOV 10

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the sixth concert of its 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin, the concert master, conducted. Jacques Thibaud was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, suite from "Le Coq d'Or"; Borodin, Symphony, B minor, No. 2; Saint-Saens, Violin Concerto No. 3, B minor; Wetzler, Symphonic Dance in Basque style from "The Basque Venus," an opera based on a story by Merimee. (First time in Boston.)

Some dismiss Borodin as an amateur in music; accomplished in his own profession; no doubt "fond of music", but far inferior to the other members of the "Big Five". Thus they do him gross injustice, as Handel unjustly slighted Gluck, saying that his own cook knew more about counterpoint. Borodin had not the academic training of Balakirev and Rimsky-Korsakov, but he wrote songs of exquisite beauty; there is the symphony played yesterday; there are pages of "Prince Igor"; there is a charming string quartet. No doubt in all these works, except the songs, a learned professor could point out some technical flaws, shortcomings and so on, but Borodin had musical ideas, imaginative, poetic; he was not slavishly bound to the theory that extreme nationalism is all-important; he knew and was proud of his country's history; he realized the value of Russian and Asiatic folk-songs; but he knew that music to endure for a time must pass national boundaries; that oriental flavoring must be for orthodox forms to please western ears; for nothing in music so quickly palls on the so-called civilized world as extreme and obstinate exoticism. Take the symphony in B minor, for example, of which The Finale is the least important section.

Only a composer of a poetic nature, a lover of the beautiful which includes fancy, could have written the Scherzo, the Andante, and much of the opening Allegro. In these pages there are fine harmonic and instrumental expressions that are Borodin's, not another's. The Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" preceded, delightful music in large part, but chiefly so by reason of piquant instrumentation. The difference does not lie in the fact that Rimsky-Korsakov's music is for the opera house; Borodin's for the concert hall; it lies in the musical nature of the two men. Borodin while he was writing his symphony was also at work on his opera. It is not surprising that there are measures in the symphony that recall the Polovtsian dances with chorus in "Prince Igor"; but there is nothing in the symphony that can be called strictly operatic; nor is Rimsky-Korsakov in his happiest mood when he attempts in any one of his works to be strictly symphonic, although he put himself under a rigorous course of counterpoint, when he found out that he needed this instruction.

Mr. Wetzler, knowing that the scene of Merimee's "La Venus d'Ille" is not far from the Basque country, helped himself reasonably to Biscayan rhythms. He chose the Fandango, though it is especially a Spanish dance; the Zortzico, a complicated dance in which many join toward the end; Espatadantz, a Basque sword dance that admits pantomime; and for a Finale the Arin-Arin, the last figure of the Zortzico.

The suite derived from the opera was first performed at Hamburg under Dr. Muck's leadership. The Chicago orchestra gave the first performance in this country last February. The opera itself was produced at Leipsic last November.

As is the case with most suites when the dances are not in strong contrast, the earlier pages of Mr. Wetzler's symphonic dance are the most striking, the most musically interesting. When he comes to the furious pages of the Finale, there is chiefly a monstrous din in which distinctive rhythms are lost. The Fandango and the Zortziko are those portions of the work which are the most pleasing to the hearer; those which are most creditable to the composer. How closely this music expresses the Biscayan spirit and emotions is not for a New Englander who knows that land only through tales of travellers and novelists, and through illustrated print to say. Ten years ago last April Mr Laparra's "Basque Sunday" was performed here at a symphony concert The composer was the pianist. The Scherzo was suggested by the game o Pelote. In the last movement there were allusion to the "Arin-Arin" an the "Espatadantza," but Mr. Laparr said that his aim was not so much t reconstitute the rhythms as to expres the musical sentiment evoked in hi by certain Biscayan aspects and cu toms. In Pierne's suites from his mu for Coti's "Ramuntcho," selectio played at a symphony concert early 1922—"Rhapsody" was first perform here by the Boston Orchestra Club early as 1910—there are Biscayan da rhythms. Laparra's music is p turesque, worthy of the man that wr the opera, "La Habanera." But the s ple measure in which Azucena, wl she is dragged by Ferrando before Count di Luna, sings of her homel bring Biscay nearer to us.

Saint-Saens is held in slight rep by the young lions who today roar t opinions about music, but he wrote effective violin concerto, three pi concertos out of his five that are wo hearing, chamber music of excellent quality, a witty opera "Phryne" and other music that is not negligible. His third violin concerto still gives pleasur especially when it is played by Mr. Thi baud, the most aristocratic of violinis now before our public. Yesterday was recalled many times.

Mr. Burgin had firm control of orchestra. He conducted tastefully, v spirit, with authority. The concert be repeated tonight. The prograr next week will be as follows: F Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for st Fairchild, "Chants Negres" (first in Boston). Ravel, Bolero (first ti Boston), Schumann, Symphony major, No. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

LET US TURN the pages to a quarter century ago—the music seasons of 1904-1905-1906. Prices at Carnegie then ranged from 75 cents to $2.50 per seat. With a little special searching, we have unearthed some enlightening figures from the official box-office receipt books. They tell a significant, perhaps even strange, story of economic conditions conditioning the public activities of artists during those post mauve decade seasons. Thus—

On the afternoon of Nov. 27, 1904, the august Oratorio Society sang to the tune of $73.75; business improved the same evening, with $728.25 in the till. But Christmas week concerts of the O. S. yielded, respectively, $2,400.75 and $2,681.

On Feb. 23, '05, a special concert by the Gottlieb Musical Family netted the munificent sum of $12.

Other record-breaking events in this direction were concerts by the Banks Glee Club ($12.50); Volpe Symphony Orchestra (($9.00!); the same orchestra a month later (two concerts—receipts $25.50 and $90.50); Young Peoples Symphony ($13.85); Philadelphia Orchestra, Fritz Scheel conductor ($180.50—To-day, under Stokowski, bids as high as $500 are offered for subscriptions to the Philadelphia Orchestra's New York concerts).

On the upper side of things: Recital by Ignace Jan Paderewiski, March 25, 1905 ($6,102), the high spot for the three years of which we are narrating; recitals by Emma Calve ($3,827 and $3,140.50); recital by Marcella Sembrich ($4,747.50); recital by Emma Eames ($2,860); joint recital by Emma James and Eugene Ysaye, billed as "The Great Event" ($2,139.50), less than Eames alone; three recitals by Ysaye ($866.75, $1,563.75, $2,130); joint recital by Ysaye and Eugene D'Albert ($3,206), despite blizzard weather; Kubelik ($2,113.50); Hofmann and Kreisler ($1,397.50); Hofmann alone, snowy weather ($831.50—$659.75); Kreisler alone, still snowing ($324.25); Alfred Reisenauer ($466.25).

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, what with snow and slush, had hard sledding in establishing securely its New York foothold, with receipts ranging from $736 (Dec. 8, 1904) to $1,473 (Jan. 21, 1905). The New York Symphony, similar climatics prevailing, playing to $1,528.75 (Feb. 4, 1905) and $2,457 (Dec. 18, 1904). Russian Symphony, Christmas Eve, 1904—receipts $145.50. Sousa's Band—Dec. 4, 1904 ($1,477.25); Dec. 6 ($1,341.25); Christmas Day matinee, snowing ($560.25); Christmas Night, continued snow ($631.50).

The story is but slightly told. We wonder if, say in 1960, our successor will look back upon the days of to-day, seeking to see how we spent our money on the purchase of musical niceties. By that time we will be enjoying our well earned rest . . . .

Ravel Bolero Wins Plaudits

Joseph Maurice Ravel is the hero of the hour at this week's Symphony concerts. For now Boston first hears his remarkable tour de force, his ingenious musical inventions upon the "Bolero" theme.

By use of drums and lower strings pizzicato, by the introduction of a flute, then a bassoon and clarinet, Ravel begins the slow, sultry measures of his Spanish dance. Repetition is piled upon repetition, yet monotony is evaded. The strict bolero form is adhered to, yet about it is woven music that every major orchestra in the land will be playing before long.

Measure by measure, theme by theme, new instruments join in; the suspense heightens, the tension grows until at last the music breaks out into fire and flame. Ravel has accomplished the bolero of boleros!

Technical resource and ingenuity went into its making, but that fact is not unduly apparent to the listener. M. Ravel is too fine a musician for that. In the bolero, he proves himself a genius as well. And Mr. Koussevitzky is no mean interpreter of the piece.

Also played for the first time on the program are Bailr Fairchild's "Chants Negres."

MUSIC
Monitor Dec 6

Boston Symphony Concert

Only Maurice Ravel, we are satisfied, among composers living today, could make a Friday afternoon subscription audience in Symphony Hall, Boston, stamp its feet on the floor in unrestrained delight. This feat he accomplished at the concert of Dec. 6, when Serge Koussevitzky made "Bolero" the climactic point of his seventh program. It probably was the first time in symphonic history in Boston that such a demonstration had been made by the Friday subscribers in favor of a piece of music.

Yet anybody present could hardly be surprised, for the incorrigible Ravel, using the simplest material and the most obvious methods, has nonchalantly produced a flabbergasting opus. As is known, "Bolero" consists of a tune of Spanish flavor, endlessly repeated over a monotonous and insistent percussive rhythm; but repeated with a crescendo extending over 20 minutes until the rocket bursts with a dazzling modulation into E major.

Nobody but Ravel would have thought of this civilisé device; certainly no one else could have so executed it. It is calculated to stir audiences to uncontrolled enthusiasm. If those who today applaud so furiously wonder tomorrow whether the music is worthy of their devotion, that cannot disturb the smile on the lips of M. Ravel.

Preceding this novelty there was a first performance of a score by Blair Fairchild, called "Chants Nègres," Mr. Fairchild is one of the Parisian colony of American expatriates. This score is made from some piano pieces. The sections are six in number, and the themes seem faithful to the title. There is little development, but the orchestration is calculated to preserve the character of the material.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, in G, again taking opportunity to exhibit his strings, which are probably unequalled today. He closed it with a brilliant and endearing performance of Schumann's Second Symphony; one of those performances which through their poetic urge and revealing ardor force us out of old indifferences. There will be some to complain that this is not the Schumann they know. But others will rejoice that the composer can be made so contemporary.

L. A. S.

Pleasures from The Symphonic Day and Scene

Return of Dr. Koussevitzky Ravel's "Bolero" Stirs Excitements

IN Carnegie Hall, when Mr. Toscanini and his orchestra played Ravel's "Bolero" for the first time in New York, some, excited beyond restraint, rose and shouted. In Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, when Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra played the piece for the first time in Boston, as many, similarly excited, sat and stamped. In New York keen ears detected a few hisses interposed; in Boston, if there were any, none pierced the circumambient din. Since the Friday of Horowitz's début as pianist, no such torrents of applause have swept over Symphony Hall, to toss up orchestra and conductor as on the crest of a wave. More interesting to watch and feel was the mounting tension through the audience, as Ravel reiterated his Bolero-rhythm above a changeless chord; repeated his twofold dance-melody unvaried in intervals, key and pitch; dressed it in vivider and vivider instrumental colors, ever ampler or more diverse; drove and measured it up an unbroken crescendo twenty minutes' long, until the concert-hall throbbed with that Spanish tune and with it all the air was pungent. A glance—and some were sitting with rigid bodies. Another glance—and some were clenching hands as though the sounds irresistibly tautened them. A third—and a few seemed nervously trying to break through a spell no longer to be endured. Then—is it eleven measures from the end?—the snapping of the tension by a stroke of imagination that also may be stroke of genius—a modulation into the flaming key of E major; a final blazing tumult: the instant's pause before the floodgate of release is opened. For once, in Symphony Hall on a Friday, a scene for description.

By this time, everyone who keeps pace with the world knows the story of "Bolero," how Ida Rubinstein, the Parisian mime and dancer, commissioned new pieces for an impending tour from various Parisian composers, Ravel included; how he wrote his dance-scene and held his tongue, as did all others in preparation and rehearsals concerned: how on an evening in November of last year at the Opéra it whipped to silence and then to outcry an audience all unaware; how Paris rang with that experience, and thereafter European city after European city; how New York took up the running —and now Boston joins the hue and cry. Was it better or worse brought to voice in Symphony Hall than in other celebrated concert-rooms? If worse, then marvellous must have been performances elsewhere.

Not a detail escaped Dr. Koussevitzky or such ears as chose to hear. He beat the rhythm hard, bright, tense, unmitigated. He flung the sinuous dance-melody into high relief, yet without variation or shadow of turning. On the instant he made a new timbre flash; a new group flesh the unescapable tune. Ravel's bass soon, Ravel's insidious clarinet, Ravel's insolent saxophones, darted at the ear. From power to power, the crescendo ascended unrelaxed, suspensive, clamant. At the modulation, with a great sweep of his arms, like a magician smashing his potent crystal into a hundred glittering fragments, the conductor released the final whirl. . . . The smoky room was cleared; the woman no longer danced upon the table; from hands to hands the men had ceased to toss her. They had even sheathed their knives.

Triple—from composer, conductor, orchestra—proceeded this magical tour de force. For no other phrase of nearly fits it. Spell-like it plays upon hearers; holds them under a magic cy the changeful and the changeless; ie magnanimous frenzy cuts them free. tingles upon the aural nerves; producer physical as well as mental sensation It is the spell, if one likes, of a mechanized age. But is a composer to be proached because he is of his own tim and can ply his particular magic? Co sider also the magician's skill, to stabili the melody—shape, substance, cours to subtilize a seeming rhythmic direct ness; to choose, place and adjust th ever-changing instrumental vesture upo that crescendo in ceaseless motion; to find and set alight the breaking point. Not skill merely, or only resource; but imagination edging close to genius, dry, and narrow, again if one likes, all wit and all style, but genius none the less. This age in a Spanish dance-tune and a miracle of craft, with Ravel at five-and-fifty to put it there. Merlin is precedent for elderly necromancers.

Since the opening concerts of the season, with Pick-Mangiagalli's Fugue, Dr. Koussevitzky has not had so fortunate a day with novel pieces. One, possibly, two, to each pair of concerts and with reason. Shall we not hear the music of our own time, as we read its books, look upon its pictures, seek out its plays? The concert-hall is no moated grange of masterpieces. The new matter, the new methods and manners, have come to stay the while, however restlessly and barrenly we now use them. And Mr. Blair Fairchild's "Negro Songs" were neither savorless nor sterile. No dilettante, which is the customary reproach to his music, wrote them—possibly because he remembered, rather than tried to invent, his musical matter. Scraps of negro songs, the titles even long forgotten, floated and fused across his mind—five in sum, one syncopated and shrill; another jazzily irregular; a third with a clarinet hollow-voiced through a "blues"; this plaintive; that simpler and flowing. And all restated tersely; some sharp-voiced, some gentle; both with the rhythms, harmonies, timbres of these days of dissonance. By this time even a matinée audience at Symphony Hall agrees to them, applaud-

SYMPHONY IS BRILLIANT IN 'BOLERO'

By MOSES SMITH

THE Symphony program of this week includes an intoxicant that is still strictly legal—a new piece by Maurice Ravel called "Bolero." As played yesterday for the first time in Boston it caused a sedate Friday afternoon audience to stamp the floor and applaud steadily for several minutes. Such a demonstration in Boston is equivalent to a riot in New York.

Ravel's music is an excellent illustration of the power of monotonous repetition, when ingeniously employed. Here the French master uses an old dance form, sets forth a simple tune and repeats it steadily, with drum beats setting the rhythmic pattern, over and over again for fully 15 minutes. There is no change in harmony; but as the piece develops, instrumental color is varied, the orchestration becomes constantly richer, more glaring, and there is a continuous, maddening crescendo until, shortly before the end, there is just one modulation of harmony. Then a ferocious presto—and the music is done.

The effect is prodigious. Perhaps, as has been suggested, this is not great music, in the sense that one will enjoy it repeatedly after many listenings. But as a tour de force it is unequalled in modern musical literature—which is saying a great deal. Only a Ravel could have conieived it, and certainly only a Ravel could have executed his conception with such audacious brilliance.

Besides this music, Fairchild's "Chants Negres," played for the first time anywhere, paled. The work of an American composer, now living in Paris, this is a simple recitation of several songs from negro sources, set down without much embellishment and, on the whole, rather charmingly.

Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto and Schumann's Second Symphony completed the program.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Dec 6

For Cantabrigians

LAST evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra again journeyed to Cambridge to give a concert in Sanders Theater at Harvard. Then and there it played two pieces from the orchestral repertory of the past two months, two pieces also which stand upon the Boston programs of today and tomorrow—Bach's "Brandenburg" concerto No. 3 for strings, Schumann's symphony in C major, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss's rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

For beginning Dr. Koussevitzky grouped strings around him in a great half-circle for the playing of Bach's hearty concerto. Two movements there are, both in rapid tempi. The second proceeds at greater speed, more fleetly, than the first. To hear Bach thus employing strings is to marvel at the mountains of sonority which it is possible to draw from this single orchestral choir, at the kaleidoscopic variety of tonal [illegible] but what a [illegible] ling tints! Again, to hear Bach's concerto is not to witness a juggler playing with a bag of contrapuntal tricks, but to hear a master of an elaborate language speaking that language with ease, with fluency, with eloquent resourcefullness. Finally, to hear Dr. Koussevitzky and his men with this music is to experience again the joys of living as expressed by this master of a by-gone day.

Schumann's symphony in C major comes to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as relative novelty. Not since the second year of Mr. Monteux's regime has it been heard. One singles out particularly vivacious scherzo, exceedingly characteristic of one aspect of Schumann's writing; an Adagio which in its expressive principal theme is epitome of Schumann the romanticist. Further it is hardly to the point to anticipate the performance and the review of the concerts of today and tomorrow.

As always, Ravel's suite of "My Mother the Goose," as the French will have it, gave pleasure. "Five Children's Pieces" is sub-title. Whether the children which Ravel has in mind are too sophisticated to be real children, as is sometimes said, is beside the point. Any child will enjoy the squeaking little voice of "Hop o' My Thumb," or the exotic jangle and the hearty tune of the Empress of the Pagodas, or the objectively pictured conversations of Beauty and the Beast, or the splendors of the Fairy Garden. But mostly, children are not called upon to hear these pieces. And for us adults they are unalloyed delight. At least as we hear them from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky's version of "Till Eulenspiegel" is a masterpiece of interpretative characterization. Straussian humors are many and various in this tone poem. Not one of them is clouded, not one of them vague or pointless as we hear them in this season of 1929-30. And the hearer who does not chuckle or at least feel inward amusement is dull or listless hearer indeed. The bright gleam on many a face in this Cantabrigian audience gave sufficient proof that such hearers are in the minority in the university city.

A. H. M.

ing Mr. Fairchil s orchestral songs because in them ran interest and pleasure. Call them, not modernistic subtleties, but modernistic incisiveness, to homely flavor adapted.

An old master began, a romantic master ended, the afternoon. So scant is the symphonic baggage of Bach, who hardly foresaw the twentieth-century concert-hall from the salons of Cöthen or the organ-loft of St. Thomas's, that the conductor must return again and again to the Brandenburg pieces. Yesterday it was the Third Concerto, in G major, for strings only; in two divisions with no slow song, outside two middle measures, to part them. A high-spirited and a quick-fingered Bach wrote this music, dividing and sub-dividing his groups—the trick is by no means a modern one; giving them subjects to play with and figures to toss about; pulling them up with chords and unisons and tuttis; sending them racing off again. The juggling game of counterpoint played to the hilt by a Bach who, for once, is more of his time than of the ages, whom nobody could possibly "revere" as he takes his tonal pastime. The zest of living ran in him as he wrote this Concerto in a whirl of subjects, figures, accents. And now the manifold volume and color that a conictor, like Dr. Koussevitzky, draws from his string choir enhances and diversifies him. It is doubtful whether the "private band" of his royal highness, the Margrave of Brandenburg, could match them.

Hitherto the conductor has been fortunate in his choosings from Schumann. He has put by the pieces faded and thinned under time and change, like the overtures to "Manfred" or "Genoveva"; revived the vernal warmths, exuberant or musing, of the Symphony in B-flat; released the lyric, dreamful, cherishing voice of the connubial Symphony; given "The Rhenish" moments of sonorous state. The singing, sentimental, rhapsodizing quality in Schumann sets Dr. Koussevitzky aglow. These sympathetic heats melt orchestral thickness, smooth away instrumental clumsiness. So sounded, yesterday, the slow and ardent song, deep-felt, of the Symphony in C major; the lusty, upspringing, forward-thrusting Finale. Even Dr. Koussevitzky, outpouring himself, might not resuscitate the first two movements. The melancholy Schumann at Dresden took thought of Mendelssohn shining afar; forgot his song, was fain to write counterpoint. To it time has not been kind. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky returned and the Symphony Concerts alive again.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY IN CLASSICAL OPENER

By MOSES SMITH

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Tuesday afternoon series of concerts at Symphony Hall in a "strictly" classical program. Serge Koussevitzky, having in mind a unifying principle for these concerts, as in past seasons, chose outstanding works of three great classical masters—Bach, Mozart and Beethoven.

The opportunity is thus given youthful people to become acquainted with the standard symphonic repertoire without being shocked by ultra-modern novelties. Similarly with those ancient or conservative souls to whose ears the very name of a Schonberg or a Hindemith gives offense. Both classes were well represented in the large audience—in fact, they were the audience.

This excellent plan of devoting a separate group of concerts to established masterpieces is rendered all the more effective in that the performances are usually the best of all the various series that the orchestra gives. As in the case of yesterday's program, which included Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, Mozart's E-flat major Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, the numbers are almost always chosen from pieces that have been previously played at regular pairs of subscription concerts and, in many cases, at Monday evening concerts.

It is consequently redundant to say the performances were all brilliant. The audience enjoyed itself, but was not as enthusiastic as the quality of the performance merited.

Herald
MUSIC

Dec. 1 TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday series took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, G major for strings; Mozart's Symphony, E flat major (K. 543); Beethoven's Symphony, C minor, No. 5. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

These compositions were all played by the orchestra this season, and the perfection of the performances has already been praised. The playing of a symphony by Mozart tests the proficiency of an orchestra severely, more so than any excerpt from Wagner's music dramas or any wild work of an ultra-modern. It also tests the taste and musical sensitiveness of a conductor. How successfully leader and players meet this test was again made known; as was the brilliancy of the string section in Bach's concerto. The audience that filled all parts of the hall was enthusiastic over the program and the performance.

The object of these Tuesday afternoon concerts is to show symphonic development from the time of Bach to the present day. May one venture to remark that it might be interesting to present with a reduced orchestra works by the lesser known contemporaries of Bach and Mozart? Haydn, of course, is represented in the series of 24 concerts, but only a few, two or three, of his many symphonies are performed in the course of years and they are repeated again and again. One of the earlier symphonies by Mozart would be a refreshing novelty: there are works by him, not dignified by the name of symphonic, that, wholly unknown to these audiences, would be refreshingly novel. And is it not possible that frequent performances of Beethoven's symphonies are injurious to the symphonies themselves, making them too familiar so that their great value is taken as a matter of course?

The next concert of the Tuesday series will be on Jan. 7. H. L. M.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE GOES WILD

Post Dec 7

Cheers and Stamps at End of Ravel's "Bolero"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Excitement reigned at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. Staid dowagers stamped their feet and cheered, behaved as people generally behave only at athletic contests and political rallies. And all for a piece of music, a piece of slender content and obvious design but contrived with an almost devilish ingenuity: the new "Bolero" of Maurice Ravel.

SIXTEEN REPETITIONS

Written for Ida Rubinstein and first danced by her in Paris in November, 1928, this "Bolero" had its American premiere as concert-piece in New York last month at the hands of M. Toscanini and the Philmarmonic-Symphony, and a scene similar to that described above was then enacted in Carnegie Hall.

So much for the effect of "Bolero," as Ravel simply names it. And the piece itself? That story is soon told. From the snare drum is heard the bolero rhythm that, once begun, is never dropped: dum - diddilly-dum-dum-dum-dum, dum - diddilly-iddilly-iddilly-dum-dum. A flute begins the tune, commonplace enough of itself. Repetitions follow, 16 in all, with fuller and fuller instrumentations, until the full force of the orchestra is attained. Save for a brief and startling lapse into E-major near the close the piece runs all in the key of C. Essentially the music does not change, it merely swells and expands, but by the time it is done the reiterated rhythm and the subtly planned crescendo has aroused the listeners, or at least the more impressionable among them, to such a pitch that, once the goading, maddening sound has ceased, they must shout their release. No more than a musical showman's trick, perhaps, but what other composer living or dead could have turned it so well?

There was another new piece yesterday, and in its first performance anywhere: "Chants Negres," by Blair Fairchild, formerly of Boston, now of Paris and New York. In the excitement over Ravel, Mr. Fairchild was forgotten—but he would have been forgotten almost as speedily under any circumstances, for his composition is negligible interest and value. A few "popular" melodies of Negroid type are strung together without development, harmonized and orchestrated in accordance with contemporary formulae but with scant distinction.

There were classics, too: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for the beginning and Schumann's Second Symphony for the close. Not before had Mr. Koussevitzky conducted here this most substantial if not most rewarding of the Schumann four. A piece of moments in this C major Symphony, with dull stretches between, though of these moments—the glib play of the Scherzo, the soaring violins of the Adagio and the lusty energies of the Finale oddly forecasting Brahms—Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra made the most.

From George Copeland for what purports to be his only concert of pianopieces in Boston this season, at Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 17.

Valse Brilliante—Posthumous Nocturne..Chopin
Minuet ..... Respighi
Adagio ..... Grazioli
Symphonic Studies .....Schumann
Gnossienne ..... Satie
Prelude—Moonlight—Goldfish—Evening in Granada—Puck's Dance.....Debussy
For Two Pianos:
Rithmo—Sentimento—Gracia .....Infante
Dance from The Ballet, "Love the Sorcerer" .....De Falla
Aragonesa ..... Cassado
Tango ..... Albeniz
Rhapsody, "España".....Chabrier-Copeland
(Assisting Pianist: W. Heyl)

The first of the two annual concerts for the increase of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra is announced for Sunday afternoon, Dec. 29 at Symphony Hall. Once again Wagner will provide the program: the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser;" the Prelude to "Tristan;" Senta's Ballad, Elisabeth's Greeting, Isolde's last speech, from these operas, to be sung by Mme. Austral; other numbers. Is it permissible to suggest that it would be a pleasure to hear from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra a long overlooked piece at Symphony Hall—Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll?"

Miss Harrison Presents

Mr. Slonimsky has made his usual terse, ingenious and amusing program notes for the concert of Beatrice Harrison, the eminent violoncellist, with the Chamber Orchestra of Boston in Hancock Hall (St. James Avenue) next Monday evening. One of the chosen pieces is an arrangement for violoncello and small orchestra, is the Melody, composed

CHEERS HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ravel's New Bolero Makes a Sensation

Conservative Audience Stirred by Modernist Piece of Music

Ravel's new Bolero, the latest work of the celebrated French modernist composer, played at yesterday's Symphony concert for the first time in Boston, caused a demonstration such as no piece of music, new or old, has hitherto elicited from the Friday subscribers. They clapped it loud and long. Many in the audience banged their seats up and down. There were even a few cheers. The only comparable incident in the past 20 years, and perhaps in the whole history of these concerts, now in their 49th season, was the great demonstration two years ago at the Boston debut of the pianist Horowitz.

Those familiar with the atmosphere at these Friday afternoon concerts, which are attended for the most part by socially prominent women, will realize how very extraordinary an event yesterday's demonstration was. An audience in which white-haired women are in a majority, where mild and decorous handclapping is the only usual method of showing enthusiasm, actually tried to behave like a football crowd, and over what?

Why, over one of those modernist pieces about which Dr Koussevitzky and the management of the orchestra are said to receive hundreds of protests from outraged subscribers whenever the conductor puts one on a program. One turns for a parallel to memories of the amazing events of Nov 11, 1918, when, for instance, a little group of these same women were observed marching up West st in Boston each beating lustily on a tin dishpan.

The piece that loosed this strange tumult of approval was written two years ago for the noted dancer, Ida Rubinstein, and enthusiastically received by her Parisian audiences. The concert version of it heard yesterday made a similar sensation in the audience the other day in New York, when Mr Toscanini conducted it at a concert of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

A bolero is, of course, a Spanish dance, with a characteristic, strongly marked simple rhythm. Ravel's bolero, according to an able technical analysis of the score made by A. H. Meyer, is built up of two musical sentences, each composed of an eight-measure phrase and a nine-measure phrase, with a single measure of interlude between the sentences. These sentences are built up into a musical paragraph containing 72 measures, which is repeated four times with increasingly intense and sonorous orchestration, leading up to a brief and brilliant closing climax. The construction and workmanship of this bolero are masterly. No more cleverly written piece of music exists.

The whole piece is one long crescendo. Its foundation is a constantly beating rhythm in the drums, which of itself would almost, as the drum in O'Neill's play, "The Emperor Jones," does, sustain the mood of suspense and nervous tension. Over this are heard monotonous snatches of melody from different instruments. At a first hearing one almost overlooks the contrasting themes revealed by study of the score, so overwhelming is the cumulative effect of the numerous repetitions.

The piece is an assault on the nervous system of the listener, subtle and brutal. It depends for its effect chiefly on the fact, a commonplace of musical psychology, that the ear is peculiarly sensitive to emphatic repetitions of strong, simply grouped stresses. The third movement of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" and the drum beat underlying the middle section of the second movement of that symphony are well-known musical examples of the same psychological phenomenon. But Ravel is a subtler musician than Tschaikowsky, and possessed of a more fastidious taste. He is also a better musical craftsman.

For an analogy to this piece let us turn to Poe's tales of horror, which still affect strongly even a reader familiar with Poe's cold-blooded explanation of just how he set about getting his effects. This sort of thing succeeds in being thrilling, but can hardly be deemed the highest form of art.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra made the most of the remarkable opportunity Ravel's musical tour de force afforded them.

The other novelty of the afternoon, Blair Fairchild's orchestral arrangement of his "Chants Negres," written for the piano, was eclipsed by the Ravel. It is, however, well written and interesting, if wholly artificial, music in the modern manner.

Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, which began the concert, has a vitality, a rhythmic urge, more profoundly and permanently moving than the cleverly calculated musical thriller of Ravel. Schumann's Second Symphony, the other number on the program, was given an eloquent if not always wholly accurate performance. P. R.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE Dec 7

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the seventh concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, Fairchild, "Chants Negres" (first performance). Ravel, Bolero (first time in Boston). Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2. Mr. Theodorowicz was the concert master in Mr. Burgin's absence.

Mr. Fairchild's "Chants Negres" was originally a piano piece. Orchestrated, it is not a favorable example of a class of musical compositions thought by purists to be ignoble, or at least unworthy of a place on the program of a symphony concert. It all depends on whether these compositions are musically interesting even when they are rhythmically exciting. Mr. Fairchild took some old airs—he cannot remember the titles of the songs nor were they all familiar to the audience yesterday—took them, exposed them in a row and dressed them more or less fantastically but without conspicuous skill in harmonic or orchestral invention, though he once in a sentimental section obtained a pleasing effect by the use of the lower notes of flutes. The composer apparently wished to be aggressively modern. His work is episodic—perhaps he intended it to be. The songs might have been bound together by more interesting measures, and have had a more rhapsodic setting. The technical crudeness, the lack of coherency in the planning and the ineffectual straining after effect were all too evident. Yet Mr. Fairchild wrote a bravura cadenza for clarinet which gave Mr. Hamelin an opportunity to show his skill, and for that one was grateful.

Ravel's "Bolero" is an amazing tour de force with a stroke of genius, viz., the unexpected fortissimo modulation near the end. The side drum at the beginning gives the rhythm and maintains it through the long crescendo. The theme, repeated enedlessly in the same key (until the modulation) Ravel's, or was he indebted to some Spanish or Biscayan tune? It is not one of special significance; it cannot be called strikingly piquant or sensuous at the first hearing; but after solo instruments follow the flute in playing it, after it is heard from groups of instruments and finally from the whole orchestra, one finds Ravel's use of it as extraordinarily effective as it is ingenious. Monotony when it serves a master it exciting. Even the endless repitition of a folk tune, especially an oriental one, or the constant rhythm given out by a percussion instrument, as drums in Africa which have so strongly affected travellers; or the steady beating of the drum in the trio of the "Pathetic" symphony's second movement, or dripping of water at regular intervals—all these play on the nerves and more or less excite. A long crescendo of music in one and the same key was employed by composers long before Ravel was born. Rossini, before him Jomelli (they say), knew the power of a long crescendo; Rossini used the same form of it indifferently for Don Basilio expatiating on the growth and spread of a slanderous report, and for the entrance of Othello bent on murdering the fair Desdemona. But no one has so cunningly directed the march of a crescendo, so varied and ornamented a simple figure as Ravel in this "Bolero." It would be idle to ask whether this dance has great musical value. It certainly excites and in a genuinely and uncommonly musical manner. This was proved yesterday when a roar of applause followed the final chord and was long continued; when the audience, not content with furious clapping of hands, stamped on the floor. One would not have been surprised to hear shrill whistling in approval or noisy squeals of joy from floor and balconies.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra thus triumphed gloriously in the production of the "Bolero." A loftier, a more purely musical triumph was the incomparable performance of Schumann's second symphony, which as often interpreted without poetic feeling and played perfunctorily in the past, seemed the least interesting, the least inspired of Schumann's four. Yesterday there was a revelation. The strings in years past would not have had the crispness, the clearness, the swiftness in expression that yesterday characterized the Scherzo, nor had the Adagio been sung with such tenderness, beauty, eloquence as it was under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. And so, there was fresh life and strength given to the other movements that are not to be ranked with those already mentioned. The familiar concerto of Bach was played with tonal sturdiness alternating with a sparkling lightness; played in a spirit of enthusiasm that still cared for clarity and contrast in details.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryantha." Arnold Bax, Symphony No. 2 (first performance). Liszt, Piano concerto, No. 1 (Jose Iturbi, pianist). Respighi, "The Pines of Rome."

The Tide of Concerts Yet Running Full

Refuge for The Conservative, Miss Harrison's Return, Yehudi and Boston

Trans. Dec 6

THERE ARE those who find little interest and take little pleasure in symphonic music unless it is confined to classics, ancient or modern, and to established pieces, say Debussy's, written in recent times. Obviously and reasonably Dr. Koussevitzky cannot restrict to such numbers the programs of the regular Symphony Concerts. Were he to do so, they would become, to many more listeners, monotonous and tedious; while he would crib himself; overlook the present; put by that honorable and longstanding policy of the Symphony Orchestra that ordains liberal and catholic programs. Consequently devotees of classic and "standard" pieces sometimes turn discontented and restless; complain that they cannot get their fill; repine because to hear their classics, they must also listen, between times, to modernists.

To few such, seemingly, has it occurred that there is outlet for their desires and refuge from their irritations—in the series of six supplementary matinées by conductor and orchestra on Tuesdays. This year, they begin next week, to continue at monthly intervals or less, until the end of April. Again Dr. Koussevitzky proposes to assemble programs from classical composers and irreproachable moderns. The first is witness—a Brandenburg Concerto of Bach; a Symphonw from Mozart; another Symphony out of Beethoven—all more or less familiar, all long hallowed. The five succeeding programs, gradually drawing nearer our own time, will not depart from this guiding principle. A few partisans of the old order in symphonic music, being also quickly intelligent, have discovered their paradise in these Tuesday matinées; sit at them contentbeside the youngsters who are finding their way amongst the symphonic guide posts. More that now chafe would be similarly soothed and forgive the eminent conductor the preferences they now attribute to him. Consider also the gain in leisure with a truce to complaint and no occasion to write letters to editors.

Forthcoming programs

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony concerts of next week on Dec 13 and 14:

Overture to The Opera, "Euryanthe"....Weber
Symphony, No. 2, in E minor and C.....Bax
Concerto, No. 1, in E-flat major for Piano with Orchestra.....Liszt
(Pianist: Mr. Iturbi)
Symphonic Suite, "Pines of Rome"...Respighi

Mr. Bax's Symphony, dedicated to the conductor, will be played for the first times in public—rare course for an English composer with London ready and waiting. By this time Mr. Iturbi needs no introduction; while once more, doubtless to the general satisfaction, the treasures of the Legionaries will shake the pines of the Appian Way.

FIRST TUESDAY OF SYMPHONY

ON POST, WEDNES Dec. 11

Series of Six Matinees Opens With Crowded Hall

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction in the first of the season's series of Tuesday concerts which this year will number six instead of five, as heretofore. As in past seasons the conductor will draw his programmes from the standard repertory, the "classics," old and new, observing an historical chronology. Thus the programme of yesterday contained Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings, Mozart's Symphony in E-flat and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

Since each of these pieces has been heard this season at the concerts of the regular series, there is no need to discuss in detail at this time either the works or their performance. Again Dr. Koussevitzky imparted a stirring vigor to the Concerto of Bach. Once more his reduced orchestra made Mozart's score altogether beautifully transparent, finding a deeper note in the Adagio and tossing off the playful figures of the finale as so many jets of water sparkling in the sun. And as on many another occasion the conductor was both eloquent and understanding with the Symphony of Beethoven. The audience, which filled the hall, was enthusiastic, applauding especially the two symphonies.

Incidents and Prospects

Dec 9

The evening audience at the Symphony Concerts is less prone than its predecessor of the matinée to excitement for excitement's sake. Last Saturday, besides much talk and some reading had prepared it, in degree, for Ravel's "Bolero." Consequently, there was no tumult or stamping at the end of piece and performance; but round after round of sharp, persistent, general applause across which some heard, or believed they heard, an occasional cheer. As was, Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled again and again, and the orchestra shared with him the final wave of plaudits. During the performance, the rising tension of the audience under Ravel's reiterations and crescendo was as interesting to watch as it had been on Friday. It manifested itself, first, when the saxophones pounce upon the dance melody; rose again when the horns broaden and deepen it; ran higher when the strings sharpen the rhythm into fierce bite; so drive it, fierce, to the end. Then some cool-blooded observers suspected the sharpest tension of all in the snare drummer, who begins to tap out the rhythm in the first measure and continues to tap it out, ceaseless and unchanged, until he is caught into the orchestral flood around.

SYMPHONY IN CLASSICAL OPENER

By MOSES SMITH

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Tuesday afternoon series of concerts at Symphony Hall in a "strictly" classical program. Serge Koussevitzky, having in mind a unifying principle for these concerts, as in past seasons, chose outstanding works of three great classical masters—Bach, Mozart and Beethoven.

The opportunity is thus given youthful people to become acquainted with the standard symphonic repertoire without being shocked by ultra-modern novelties. Similarly with those ancient or conservative souls to whose ears the very name of a Schonberg or a Hindemith gives offense. Both classes were well represented in the large audience—in fact, they were the audience.

This excellent plan of devoting a separate group of concerts to established masterpieces is rendered all the more effective in that the performances are usually the best of all the various series that the orchestra gives. As in the case of yesterday's program, which included Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, Mozart's E-flat major Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, the numbers are almost always chosen from pieces that have been previously played at regular pairs of subscription concerts and, in many cases, at Monday evening concerts.

It is consequently redundant to say the performances were all brilliant. The audience enjoyed itself, but was not as enthusiastic as the quality of the performance merited.

Dec. 11

N POST, WEDNES

FIRST TUESDAY OF SYMPHONY

Series of Six Matinees Opens With Crowded Hall

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction in the first of the season's series of Tuesday concerts, which this year will number six instead of five, as heretofore. As in past seasons the conductor will draw his programmes from the standard repertory, the "classics," old and new, observing an historical chronology. Thus the programme of yesterday contained Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings, Mozart's Symphony in E-flat and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

Since each of these pieces has been heard this season at the concerts of the regular series, there is no need to discuss in detail at this time either the works or their performance. Again Dr. Koussevitzky imparted a stirring vigor to the Concerto of Bach. Once more his reduced orchestra made Mozart's score altogether beautifully transparent, finding a deeper note in the Adagio and tossing off the playful figures of the finale as so many jets of water sparkling in the sun. And as on many another occasion the conductor was both eloquent and understanding with the Symphony of Beethoven. The audience, which filled the hall, was enthusiastic, applauding especially the two symphonies.

Incidents and Prospects

The evening audience at the Symphony Concerts is less prone than its predecessor of the matinée to excitement for excitement's sake. Last Saturday, besides much talk and some reading had prepared it, in degree, for Ravel's "Bolero." Consequently, there was no tumult or stamping at the end of piece and performance; but round after round of sharp, persistent, general applause across which some heard, or believed they heard, an occasional cheer. As was, Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled again and again, and the orchestra shared with him the final wave of plaudits. During the performance, the rising tension of the audience under Ravel's reiterations and crescendo was as interesting to watch as it had been on Friday. It manifested itself, first, when the saxophones pounce upon the dance melody; rose again when the horns broaden and deepen it; ran higher when the strings sharpen the rhythm into fiercer bite; so drive it, fierce, to the end. Even some cool-blooded observers suspected the sharpest tension of all in the snare drummer, who begins to tap out the rhythm in the first measure and continues to tap it out, ceaseless and unchanged, until he is caught into the orchestral flood around.

MUSIC

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday series took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, for strings; Mozart's Symphony in E flat major (K. 543); Beethoven's Symphony, C minor, No. 5. Koussevitzky conducted.

These compositions were all played by the orchestra this season, and the perfection of the performances has already been praised. The playing of a symphony by Mozart tests the proficiency of an orchestra severely, more than any excerpt from Wagner's music-dramas or any wild work of an ultra-modern. It also tests the taste and musical sensitiveness of a conductor. How successfully leader and players met this test was again made manifest; as was the brilliancy of the string section in Bach's concerto. The audience that filled all parts of the hall was enthusiastic over the program and the performance.

The object of these Tuesday afternoon concerts is to show symphonic development from the time of Bach to the present day. May one venture to remark that it might be interesting to present with a reduced orchestra works by the lesser known contemporaries of Bach and Mozart? Haydn, of course, is represented in the series of 24 concerts, but only a few, two or three, of his many symphonies are performed in the course of years and they are repeated again and again. One of the earlier symphonies by Mozart would be a refreshing novelty: there are works by him, not dignified by the name of symphonic, that, wholly unknown to these audiences, would be refreshingly novel. And is it not possible that frequent performances of Beethoven's symphonies are injurious to the symphonies themselves, making them too familiar so that their great value is taken as a matter of course?

The next concert of the Tuesday series will be on Jan. 7. H. L. M.

The Tide of Concerts Yet Running Full

Refuge for The Conservative, Miss Harrison's Return, Yehudi and Boston

Trans.—Dec 6

THERE ARE those who find little interest and take little pleasure in symphonic music unless it is confined to classics, ancient or modern, and to established pieces, say Debussy's, written in recent times. Obviously and reasonably Dr. Koussevitzky cannot restrict to such numbers the programs of the regular Symphony Concerts. Were he to do so, they would become, to many more listeners, monotonous and tedious; while he would crib himself; overlook the present; put by that honorable and longstanding policy of the Symphony Orchestra that ordains liberal and catholic programs. Consequently devotees of classic and "standard" pieces sometimes turn discontented and restless; complain that they cannot get their fill; repine because to hear their classics, they must also listen, between times, to modernists.

To few such, seemingly, has it occurred that there is outlet for their desires and refuge from their irritations—in the series of six supplementary matinées by conductor and orchestra on Tuesdays. This year, they begin next week, to continue at monthly intervals or less, until the end of April. Again Dr. Koussevitzky proposes to assemble programs from classical composers and irreproachable moderns. The first is Witness—a Brandenburg Concerto of Bach; a Symphonw from Mozart; another Symphony out of Beethoven—all more or less familiar, all long hallowed. The five succeeding programs, gradually drawing nearer our own time, will not depart from this guiding principle. A few partisans of the old order in symphonic music, being also quickly intelligent, have discovered their paradise in these Tuesday matinées; sit at them contentedly beside the youngsters who are finding their way amongst the symphonic guideposts. More that now chafe would be similarly soothed and forgive the eminent conductor the preferences they now attribute to him. Consider also the gain in leisure with a truce to complaint and no occasion to write letters to editors.

Forthcoming programs

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony concerts of next week on Dec. 13 and 14:

Overture to The Opera, "Euryanthe"....Weber
Symphony, No. 2, in E minor and C.....Bax
Concerto, No. 1, in E-flat major for Piano with Orchestra.....Liszt
(Pianist: Mr. Iturbi)
Symphonic Suite, "Pines of Rome"...Respighi

Mr. Bax's Symphony, dedicated to the conductor, will be played for the first times in public—rare course for an English composer with London ready and waiting. By this time Mr. Iturbi needs no introduction; while once more, doubtless to the general satisfaction, the trea of the Legionaries will shake the pine of the Appian Way.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE GOES WILD

Post Dec 7

Cheers and Stamps at End of Ravel's "Bolero"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Excitement reigned at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. Staid dowagers stamped their feet and cheered, behaved as people generally behave only at athletic contests and political rallies. And all for a piece of music, a piece of slender content and obvious design but contrived with an almost devilish ingenuity: the new "Bolero" of Maurice Ravel.

SIXTEEN REPETITIONS

Written for Ida Rubinstein and first danced by her in Paris in November, 1928, this "Bolero" had its American premiere as concert-piece in New York last month at the hands of M. Toscanini and the Philmarmonic-Symphony, and a scene similar to that described above was then enacted in Carnegie Hall.

So much for the effect of "Bolero," as Ravel simply names it. And the piece itself? That story is soon told. From the snare drum is heard the bolero rhythm that, once begun, is never dropped: dum - diddilly-dum-dum-dum-dum, dum - diddilly-iddilly-iddilly-dum-dum. A flute begins the tune, commonplace enough of itself. Repetitions follow, 16 in all, with fuller and fuller instrumentations, until the full force of the orchestra is attained. Save for a brief and startling lapse into E-major near the close the piece runs all in the key of C. Essentially the music does not change, it merely swells and expands, but by the time it is done the reiterated rhythm and the subtly planned crescendo has aroused the listeners, or at least the more impressionable among them, to such a pitch that, once the goading, maddening sound has ceased, they must shout their release. No more than a musical showman's trick, perhaps, but what other composer living or dead could have turned it so well?

There was another new piece yesterday, and in its first performance anywhere: "Chants Negres," by Blair Fairchild, formerly of Boston, now of Paris and New York. In the excitement over Ravel, Mr. Fairchild was forgotten—but he would have been forgotten almost as speedily under any circumstances, for his composition is of negligible interest and value. A few "popular" melodies of Negroid type are strung together without development, harmonized and orchestrated in accordance with contemporary formulae but with scant distinction.

There were classics, too: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for the beginning and Schumann's Second Symphony for the close. Not before had Mr. Koussevitzky conducted here this most substantial if not most rewarding of the Schumann four. A piece of moments in this C major Symphony, with dull stretches between, though of these moments—the glib play of the Scherzo, the soaring violins of the Adagio and the lusty energies of the Finale oddly forecasting Brahms—Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra made the most.

From George Copeland for what purports to be his only concert of pianopieces in Boston this season, at Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 17.

Valse Brilliante—Posthumous Nocturne..Chopin
Minuet ..... Respighi
Adagio ..... Grazioli
Symphonic Studies .....Schumann
Gnossienne ..... Satie
Prelude—Moonlight—Goldfish—Evening in Granada—Puck's Dance.....Debussy
For Two Pianos:
Rithmo—Sentimento—Gracia .....Infante
Dance from The Ballet, "Love the Sorcerer" .....De Falla
Aragonesa ..... Cassado
Tango ..... Albeniz
Rhapsody, "España".....Chabrier-Copeland
(Assisting Pianist: W. Heyl)

The first of the two annual concerts for the increase of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra is announced for Sunday afternoon, Dec. 29 at Symphony Hall. Once again Wagner will provide the program: the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhaüser;" the Prelude to "Tristan;" Senta's Ballad, Elisabeth's Greeting, Isolde's last speech, from these operas, to be sung by Mme. Austral; other numbers. Is it permissible to suggest that it would be a pleasure to hear from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra a long overlooked piece at Symphony Hall—Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll?"

Miss Harrison Presents

Mr. Slonimsky has made his usual terse, ingenious and amusing program notes for the concert of Beatrice Harrison, the eminent violoncellist, with the Chamber Orchestra of Boston in Hancock Hall (St. James Avenue) next Monday evening. One of the chosen pieces is an arrangement for violoncello and small orchestra, is the Melody, composed

CHEERS HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ravel's New Bolero Makes a Sensation

Conservative Audience Stirred by Modernist Piece of Music

Ravel's new Bolero, the latest work of the celebrated French modernist composer, played at yesterday's Symphony concert for the first time in Boston, caused a demonstration such as no piece of music, new or old, has hitherto elicited from the Friday subscribers. They clapped it loud and long. Many in the audience banged their seats up and down. There were even a few cheers. The only comparable incident in the past 20 years, and perhaps in the whole history of these concerts, now in their 49th season, was the great demonstration two years ago at the Boston debut of the pianist Horowitz.

Those familiar with the atmosphere at these Friday afternoon concerts, which are attended for the most part by socially prominent women, will realize how very extraordinary an event yesterday's demonstration was. An audience in which white-haired women are in a majority, where mild and decorous handclapping is the only usual method of showing enthusiasm, actually tried to behave like a football crowd, and over what?

Why, over one of those modernist pieces about which Dr Koussevitzky and the management of the orchestra are said to receive hundreds of protests from outraged subscribers whenever the conductor puts one on a program. One turns for a parallel to memories of the amazing events of Nov 11, 1918, when, for instance, a little group of these same women were observed marching up West st in Boston each beating lustily on a tin dishpan.

The piece that loosed this strange tumult of approval was written two years ago for the noted dancer, Ida Rubinstein, and enthusiastically received by her Parisian audiences. The concert version of it heard yesterday made a similar sensation in the audience the other day in New York, when Mr Toscanini conducted it at a concert of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

A bolero is, of course, a Spanish dance, with a characteristic, strongly marked simple rhythm. Ravel's bolero, according to an able technical analysis of the score made by A. H. Meyer, is built up of two musical sentences, each composed of an eight-measure phrase and a nine-measure phrase, with a single measure of interlude between the sentences. These sentences are built up into a musical paragraph containing 72 measures, which is repeated four times with increasingly intense and sonorous orchestration, leading up to a brief and brilliant closing climax. The construction and workmanship of this bolero are masterly. No more cleverly written piece of music exists.

The whole piece is one long crescendo. Its foundation is a constantly beating rhythm in the drums, which of itself would almost, as the drum in O'Neill's play, "The Emperor Jones," does, sustain the mood of suspense and nervous tension. Over this are heard monotonous snatches of melody from different instruments. At a first hearing one almost overlooks the contrasting themes revealed by study of the score, so overwhelming is the cumulative effect of the numerous repetitions.

The piece is an assault on the nervous system of the listener, subtle and brutal. It depends for its effect chiefly on the fact, a commonplace of musical psychology, that the ear is peculiarly sensitive to emphatic repetitions of strong, simply grouped stresses. The third movement of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" and the drum beat underlying the middle section of the second movement of that symphony are well-known musical examples of the same psychological phenomenon. But Ravel is a subtler musician than Tschaikowsky, and possessed of a more fastidious taste. He is also a better musical craftsman.

For an analogy to this piece let us turn to Poe's tales of horror, which still affect strongly even a reader familiar with Poe's cold-blooded explanation of just how he set about getting his effects. This sort of thing succeeds in being thrilling, but can hardly be deemed the highest form of art.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra made the most of the remarkable opportunity Ravel's musical tour de force afforded them.

The other novelty of the afternoon, Blair Fairchild's orchestral arrangement of his "Chants Negres," written for the piano, was eclipsed by the Ravel. It is, however, well written and interesting, if wholly artificial, music in the modern manner.

Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, which began the concert, has a vitality, a rhythmic urge, more profoundly and permanently moving than the cleverly calculated musical thriller of Ravel. Schumann's Second Symphony, the other number on the program, was given an eloquent if not always wholly accurate performance. P. R.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald Dec 7

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the seventh concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, Fairchild, "Chants Negres" (first performance). Ravel, Bolero (first time in Boston). Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2. Mr. Theodorowicz was the concert master in Mr. Burgin's absence.

Mr. Fairchild's "Chants Negres" was originally a piano piece. Orchestrated, it is not a favorable example of a class of musical compositions thought by purists to be ignoble, or at least unworthy of a place on the program of a symphony concert. It all depends on whether these compositions are musically interesting even when they are rhythmically exciting. Mr. Fairchild took some old airs—he cannot remember the titles of the songs nor were they all familiar to the audience yesterday—took them, exposed them in a row and dressed them more or less fantastically but without conspicuous skill in harmonic or orchestral invention, though he once in a sentimental section obtained a pleasing effect by the use of the lower notes of flutes. The composer apparently wished to be aggressively modern. His work is episodic—perhaps he intended it to be. The songs might have been bound together by more interesting measures, and have had a more rhapsodic setting. The technical crudeness, the lack of coherency in the planning and the ineffectual straining after effect were all too evident. Yet Mr. Fairchild wrote a bravura cadenza for clarinet which gave Mr. Hamelin an opportunity to show his skill, and for that one was grateful.

Ravel's "Bolero" is an amazing tour de force with a stroke of genius, viz., the unexpected fortissimo modulation near the end. The side drum at the beginning gives the rhythm and maintains it through the long crescendo. It is the theme, repeated enedlessly in the same key (until the modulation) Ravel's, or was he indebted to some Spanish or Biscayan tune? It is not one of special significance; it cannot be called strikingly piquant or sensuous at the first hearing; but after solo instruments follow the flute in playing it, after it is heard from groups of instruments and finally from the whole orchestra, one finds Ravel's use of it as extraordinarily effective as it is ingenious. Monotony when it serves a master it exciting. Even the endless repitition of a folk tune, especially an oriental one, or the constant rhythm given out by a percussion instrument, as drums in Africa which have so strongly affected travellers; or the steady beating of the drum in the trio of the "Pathetic" symphony's second movement, or dripping of water at regular intervals—all these play on the nerves and more or less excite. A long crescendo of music in one and the same key was employed by composers long before Ravel was born. Rossini, before him Jomelli (they say), knew the power of a long crescendo; Rossini used the same form of it indifferently for Don Basilio expatiating on the growth and spread of a slanderous report, and for the entrance of Othello bent on murdering the fair Desdemona. But no one has so cunningly directed the march of a crescendo, so varied and ornamented a simple figure as Ravel in this "Bolero." It would be idle to ask whether this dance has great musical value. It certainly excites and in a genuinely and uncommonly musical manner. This was proved yesterday when a roar of applause followed the final chord and was long continued; when the audience, not content with furious clapping of hands, stamped on the floor. One would not have been surprised to hear shrill whistling in approval or noisy squeals of joy from floor and balconies.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra thus triumphed gloriously in the production of the "Bolero." A loftier, a more purely musical triumph was the incomparable performance of Schumann's second symphony, which as often interpreted without poetic feeling and played perfunctorily in the past, seemed the least interesting, the least inspired of Schumann's four. Yesterday there was a revelation. The strings in years past would not have had the crispness, the clearness, the swiftness in expression that yesterday characterized the Scherzo, nor had the Adagio been sung with such tenderness, beauty, eloquence as it was under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. And so there was fresh life and strength given to the other movements that are not to be ranked with those already mentioned. The familiar concerto of Bach was played with tonal sturdiness alternating with a sparkling lightness; played in a spirit of enthusiasm that still cared for clarity and contrast in details.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryantha." Arnold Bax, Symphony No. 2 (first performance). Liszt, Piano concerto, No. 1 (Jose Iturbi, pianist). Respighi, "The Pines of Rome."

Dr. Koussevitzky And the "Classics"

THE classics. Thus have the programs for Tuesday afternoons come to be known at Symphony Hall; to play "classics" at that time is Dr. Koussevitzky's intent. And for the hearing of them there is an audience in Boston both ripe and ready. Yesterday they assembled for the season's first concert of this, the most youthful series of the orchestra. In one aspect this audience is like every other audience for Symphony concerts in Boston—it fills all the available seats. Aside from this, the Tuesday audience is its distinctive own. It has not the hearers, who surfeited from much hearing of the "masterpieces," turn a "superior" front toward them; nor those whose chief joy in music is the repeated hearing and rehearing of these same works (though such would find themselves admirably at home on Tuesdays); nor yet those who, with sophisticated mind and sharpened ears, are always lying in wait, ready to drink in the delights of the latest novelty. In the main, it is an assemblage of "the people," a company to whom the spreading fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the report that on Tuesdays are played only things long tried and fully proven, has brought the desire to add to their lives the hearing of such music. An eager company, healthily active in their listening.

To them yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky brought three works which are classic of the classic. In every one of the debated senses of the word do they deserve the much-used and much-abused adjective. No composers have won greater approbation than Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Bach's Brandenburg concertos, the third of which was yesterday's, are upon the heights of his orchestral work; Mozart's symphony in E-flat is among the three "great" ones of the year 1788; Beethoven's "Fifth" is the symphony which by general consent our schools and colleges, doing their bit toward musical "appreciation," first feed the youth of the land.

The glories of Bach have been expounded in season and out of season. They are real glories still. They survive even their friends. Who would not warm to that sea of sonorities which in great billows surged toward him which again glintingly receded, yesterday afternoon? Who could remain unaffected by the drive of the rhythm, the sparkle of the figures? This was a Bach, not of dry-as-dust commentators, but a living and very vital "modern." And an audience unspoiled rose to him.

For each, its kind. Three works yesterday assembled the orchestra in three seatings. For Bach the strings grouped around the conductor, 'cellos taking the place usually occupied by wood-winds. Indeed from those wood-wind players one or two, adept upon the 'cello also, were added to the massed 'cellists. For Mozart, played according to Dr. Koussevitzky's wise custom by little more than half a "modern" orchestra, double-basses came "in close" (as baseball fans would say) to be near the rest of the diminished strings. And the transparent lightness of Mozart came with a double transparency after the resounding Bach.

And finally, with Beethoven, the orchestra in their usual places. The "knocking of fate" sounded; and in its time, lyric melody answered. Again, 'cellos and violas sang that most lovely melody which seems so spontaneous and natural but which cost Beethoven so much labor; and winds and brasses proclaimed in reply. Further, winds and strings alike sounded the humors of a scherzo; and double-basses with agility played passages which their brethren had once declared impossible. And finally, a burst of glory from brasses ended the concert, even as the glories of strings had begun it.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Saturday Theatre Review

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN SPECIAL CONCERT

Will Give Extra Performance Here for Relief of Russian Exiles

A special non-subscription performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Friday afternoon, January 10, at 2.30 at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc. The program, which will consist of selections from the principal Russian composers, will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with Benno Rabinoff as violin soloist.

Two Pieces Fresh to Bostonian Ears

For The Symphony Concerts Fairchild's Negro Songs, Ravel's Bolero

SELDOM has a conductor more skillfully balanced his program than has Dr. Koussevitzky in the chosen pieces of the present week. There are two works from composers tried and proven—Bach and Schumann. Likewise there are two works new to the Symphony Concerts. Of the two older pieces, one is by the master contrapuntal classicist, the other by one of the most ardent romanticists. Of the two novelties, one has achieved a note which has kept it in the public prints; while the published record of the other seems to be nil. These two works are Ravel's "Bolero" and Blair Fairchild's "Chants Negres."

So much has been printed about Ravel's "Bolero" that it may seem superfluous to add more; yet a brief summary of reviews may be supplemented with a brief look at the score. "Bolero" was first produced at the Paris Opéra in November, 1928, as a ballet for Ida Rubinstein, with Walter Straram conducting. Its success was instantaneous, eclipsed that of other numbers on the program, was repeated across Europe. As to that, reports from Vienna as from Paris (to mention only two cities) are in agreement. "A stroke of genius, musically, scenically, choreographically," says one reviewer.

There is no plot, no program. A Spanish dancer mounts a table, grows more and more energetic and eager as the rhythms of a bolero continue; the spectators around the table catch the fever, brawl and fight with knives in attempts to capture the dancer; the whole progresses from heat to heat. That is all. For this dance-scene Ravel has provided the music.

To the usual large orchestra of the present well supplied with percussion, are added an oboe d'amore, a small clarinet in E-flat three saxophones. Reviewers have hung all manner of variants upon the simple statement that "Bolero" consists of a huge crescendo of repetitions of a single sixteen-measure theme. One account reports "almost twenty" such repetitions, another says "about fifteen." Hence refuge to the score—which contained sobering information: (1) the sentence is not sixteen measures long; (2) there are two contrasting sentences rather than only one, and in contrasting harmonies; (3) the unit of repetition is far larger than one of these sentences. All of which the following analysis will show.

"Bolero" begins with an introduction of four measures in which drums and lower strings pizzicato on a C-major chord establish the characteristic bolero rhythm. This rhythm and this chord reinforced later by a small trumpet, continues throughout the entire piece until the breath-taking change of harmony near the end. After these four measures a flute gently plays the first sentence. This is articulated into two phrases, the first of eight measures, the second of nine. It is followed by a single measure of interlude before it is repeated. It is Spanish in implications, sinuous in line, abounding in varied rhythms. After the flute has played it, it is repeated in entirety by a clarinet. The measure of interlude is again added. Now comes the contrasting sentence, also of phrases of eight and nine measures, plus an interlude of one measure. This suggests harmonies of the minor dominant (G minor) and in its second four measures is more aggressively rhythmed than the rest of the thematic material. By a stroke of genius it is given to a bassoon, and is at once repeated by the small clarinet in E-flat. It is well known that a bolero is made of two portions, each of which is repeated. Ravel, it is thus seen, has been scrupulously careful to maintain this form. And the seventy-two measures thus far played (after the introduction) are the unit of repetition.

Further, the astute Ravel would hardly have been so naive as to employ a square-toed, sixteen-measure sentence, or a multiple thereof, for manifold repetition. This seventy-two measure unit is another matter entirely. Four times the orchestra plays this unit. The first playing has already been outlined. The second time we hear such instruments as the trombone and a saxophone. Each successive eighteen measures brings a new instrument a little more intense than the previous one. Thereafter single instruments give way to combinations of instruments, the crescendo growing and growing with diabolically clever resourcefulness until the tension is almost unbearable, when a change to the brilliant key of E major at once resolves that tension and sweeps the listener to the close. This is the course of "Bolero."

America—and Paris

Blair Fairchild was born in the Bostonian suburb of Belmont, June 23, 1877. He studied music at Harvard with John Knowles Paine and Walter Raymond Spalding. He continued his studies at Florence, Italy, under Buonamici. From 1901 until 1903 he was in the diplomatic service at Constantinople and elsewhere in the Near East. Then he went to Paris to study music further with Widor and Ganaye, and has lived there ever since. He is a prolific composer. Many of his works reflect his travels. Thus there are the three symphonic poems, "Zal," "Shah Féridoun," "Tamineh," all based on Persian legends; the cycle of nine songs, "A Bagdad Lover," the seven songs, collectively entitled, "Les Amours de Hafiz," the eight songs, "Les Quatrains d'Al-Ghazali," his collection of twelve Persian folk-songs. He has written an orchestral tone-poem, "East and West." And, reflecting his Italian residence, there are six sets of "Stornelli Toscani." In 1919 he was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, because of his activities in relief work during the war.

Latterly Mr. Fairchild has turned to native American music. In 1927 the Parisian publishing house of Durand brought out a set of his piano pieces under the title "Cinq Chants Nègres." Mr. Koussevitzky now has the manuscript orchestral score of the "Chants Nègres," which in this new dress have grown from five to six, with incidental expansions here and there. Mr. Fairchild's orchestra contains no unusual instruments such as that of Ravel, but includes a xylophone and a piano as well as a harp. He directs that the six short pieces be played without interruption.

These six "negro songs" have no titles other than the usual tempo indications All of them show excellent knowledge of the negro idiom in some form or other breathe its spirit. All of them show the workmanship of a skilled musician, variety and deftness of scoring, subtlety of harmonization, and above all, a willingness to stop when he is through. One of the "songs" contains only twenty-seven measures. (I) Vivo, ma non troppo. After a short rhythmical introduction, the oboe plays a bright little theme, melodious, gently syncopated. There is a screaming contrast for flutes in minor thirds. The first is developed by the whole orchestra, the second effectively by a horn quartet; the first furnishes conclusion. This "song," slightly expanded, appears again as the sixth of the set. In the version for piano it appears only as the last of the set, not at the beginning. (II) Molto Andante. An English horn and a clarinet play a plaintive melody that might well be a "spiritual." It is taken up by strings, sensitively harmonized, then by a flute. After a short but strong climax it at once subsides. (III) Allegro, with the further direction "mecanico." Oboe and clarinet play the "jazziest" theme so far encountered. It is delightfully irregular in its placement of accents, piquant in its harmonies. The single theme is developed entirely by repetition. It includes a considerable cadenza for piano. (IV) Teneroso. After a few gentle introductory measures in flutes, an English horn takes a simple but expressive melody. It sings itself—and the movement is spent. (V) Number Five begins Lento with a "blues" as rhapsodic cadenza for clarinet. Then, Allegro, it proceeds with an energetic syncopated theme. There is much change of tempo and many contrasting motifs The orchestral portion as well as the cadenza must be called rhapsodic. Then for [illegible] there is repetition of th[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

Concert-Calender

Forthcoming Programs

FROM Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 20 and 21:

Petite Suite ..... Roussel
Piece for Harp and Orchestra, "Féerie" ..... Tournier
(Harpist: Bernard Zighera)
Suite, No. 2, from The Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë" ..... Ravel
Symphony in E minor, "From The New World" ..... Dvorak

Roussel's "Little Suite," new to the Symphony Concerts, runs in the light vein that of late he has cultivated—scholarship and wit, ancientry and grace. Mr. Zighera, one of the virtuosi of the orchestra, deserves the opportunity that Tournier's piece will afford him. Ravel's Suite is battlehorse for both conductor and orchestra. In Boston Dvorak's Symphony is still unstaled by over-performance. Since Mr. Monteux's time it has not been played at Symphony Hall.

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the concert on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 29, to increase the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra. All the numbers come from Wagner's operas; in three, Mme. Austral, in her true field at last, will be assisting singer:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"
Senta's Ballad from "The Flying Dutchman"
Bacchanal, "The Hill of Venus," from "Tannhäuser"
Elisabeth's Air, "Dich, Theure Halle!" from "Tannhäuser"
Introduction to Act III. of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Ride of the Valkyrs from "The Valkyr"
Prelude and Closing Scene (Mme. Austral) from "Tristan and Isolde"

Music Notes and Comment

Jose Iturbi, the noted Spanish pianist who will play Liszt's E flat concerto at this week's Boston Symphony concerts in the regular series, made his Boston debut last Monday afternoon at the Statler Hotel in a charity concert. He then proved himself a pianist of the very first rank, to be counted with Gieseking and Horowitz among outstanding artists of the present generation. He was born at Valencia in 1895, studied in that city, Barcelona, and Paris. He won a first prize at the Paris Coinservatoire, where he was a pupil of Staub, at the age of 17. He was later head of the piano department in the Geneva Conservatory, a position once held by Liszt. For the past few years he has been a concert pianist, winning a great reputation in Europe and South America. He is now engaged on his first American tour, which includes appearances as soloist with the Philadelphia, Chicago, and New York Philharmonic Orchestras, as well as the Boston Symphony.

The new symphony by the English composer Bax, which will be played at this week's Symphony concerts for the first time anywhere, is dedicated to Dr Koussevitzky. It is described as "Second Symphony, in E minor and C" in the score.

Third Symphony Concert

The third in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Sanders theatre was given on Thursday evening of last week. This was the program: Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for String Orchestra; Schumann: Symphony No. 2 in C major; Ravel: ("Mother Goose"). Five Children's Pieces; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28.

Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, though magnificently played, proved not especially interesting. There are many other things by him that show more of his genius. At one time the Suite in D was one of the favorite Bach numbers on many orchestral programs, the air and gavotte being especially enjoyable. Why not revive this suite in the near future? It will be as fully enjoyed by many of the younger generation of symphony patrons as it was years ago by our ancestors.

Schumann's second symphony was played here for the first time under Dr. Koussevitzky, if memory serves. Not as interesting as the first one, it nevertheless has many pages of inspiration, and the work is always recalled with the two trios in the scherzo. The performance was ideal in every way.

"Mother Goose" in her French dress little resembles the character that American children hold in mind, yet in a Parisian atmosphere she shines brilliantly, as the performance fully attested. And the concert ended with one of the best portrayals of Strauss' musical picture of the mischievous "Till" that can be remembered.

The fourth concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, January 16. It is understood that at this concert Alexander Glazounov, distinguished Russian composer, will appear as guest conductor in a program of his own compositions.

H. J. Storer.

CLASSICS HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bach, Beethoven and Mozart Fill Program

Dr. Koussevitzky filled the program for the first concert of the Boston Symphony's Tuesday series with great classics. Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, Mozart's Symphony in E flat, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony were the chosen works. An audience which completely filled Symphony Hall listened attentively, but applauded with a notable lack of warmth.

The Bach concerto, one of the masterpieces of music which seem imperishable, was written for an orchestra much smaller than the one which played it yesterday, and including a harpsichord, strangely omitted yesterday. In Mozart's E flat Symphony Dr Koussevitzky reduced the size of the orchestra to that for which the composer wrote. For Beethoven he used the full orchestra, though Beethoven had not so many players in mind. These two symphonies are, of course, among the best known, as well as the greatest, ever written.

One was reminded yesterday of what Maj Higginson, according to Bliss Perry's admirable biography, gave as his reason for withdrawing (after the departure of Dr Muck) his support from the Boston Symphony, which he had founded and sustained for 36 seasons. It was impossible, so Maj Higginson believed, to secure another conductor who like Muck could do full justice to both the great classics and to modern music. And impossible it has thus far turned out to be.

It is commonplace to say that Mozart's instrumental music, like his vocal music, must be perfectly sung if it is to make its effect. The interpreter must understand and render Mozart's melody. No dramatic climaxes, no sensationally original interpretations are possible in Mozart. No weakness of technique can be concealed by the player or singer of his music. Dr Koussevitzky took great pains with this symphony in E flat. The orchestra, except that the wind instruments played too loudly, and that some attacks were not clean cut, played well enough. But the performance was melodically inadequate and disappointing.

Dr Koussevitzky's highly eloquent and personal style of interpretation was better suited to Beethoven than to either Mozart or Bach. He felt and rendered much of the intensely dramatic quality of the music. But the slow movement marked andante con moto, was taken as an adagio, and the famous transition from scherzo to finale was dragged out in a needless endeavor to gain an effect.

In such pieces as Ravel's Bolero and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony," Dr Koussevitzky is certainly a supremely fine conductor. But with the great classics of the period which ends with Beethoven he is often, as he was yesterday, an uneven and disappointing interpreter.

P. R.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Dr. Koussevitzky And the "Classics"

THE classics. Thus have the programs for Tuesday afternoons come to be known at Symphony Hall; to play "classics" at that time is Dr. Koussevitzky's intent. And for the hearing of them there is an audience in Boston both ripe and ready. Yesterday they assembled for the season's first concert of this, the most youthful series of the orchestra. In one aspect this audience is like every other audience for Symphony concerts in Boston—it fills all the available seats. Aside from this, the Tuesday audience is its distinctive own. It has not the hearers, who surfeited from much hearing of the "masterpieces," turn a "superior" front toward them; nor those whose chief joy in music is the repeated hearing and rehearing of these same works (though such would find themselves admirably at home on Tuesdays); nor yet those who, with sophisticated mind and sharpened ears, are always lying in wait, ready to drink in the delights of the latest novelty. In the main, it is an assemblage of "the people," a company to whom the spreading fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the report that on Tuesdays are played only things long tried and fully proven, has brought the desire to add to their lives the hearing of such music. An eager company, healthily active in their listening.

To them yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky brought three works which are classic of the classic. In every one of the debated senses of the word do they deserve the much-used and much-abused adjective. No composers have won greater approbation than Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Bach's Brandenburg concertos, the third of which was yesterday's, are upon the heights of his orchestral work; Mozart's symphony in E-flat is among the three "great" ones of the year 1788; Beethoven's "Fifth" is the symphony which by general consent our schools and colleges, doing their bit toward musical "appreciation," first feed the youth of the land.

The glories of Bach have been expounded in season and out of season. They are real glories still. They survive even their friends. Who would not warm to that sea of sonorities which in great billows surged toward him which again glintingly receded, yesterday afternoon? Who could remain unaffected by the drive of the rhythm, the sparkle of the figures? This was a Bach, not of dry-as-dust commentators, but a living and very vital "modern." And an audience unspoiled rose to him.

For each, its kind. Three works yesterday assembled the orchestra in three seatings. For Bach the strings grouped around the conductor, 'cellos taking the place usually occupied by wood-winds. Indeed from those wood-wind players one or two, adept upon the 'cello also, were added to the massed 'cellists. For Mozart, played according to Dr. Koussevitzky's wise custom by little more than half a "modern" orchestra, double-basses came "in close" (as baseball fans would say) to be near the rest of the diminished strings. And the transparent lightness of Mozart came with a double transparency after the resounding Bach.

And finally, with Beethoven, the orchestra in their usual places. The "knocking of fate" sounded; and in its time, lyric melody answered. Again, 'cellos and violas sang that most lovely melody which seems so spontaneous and natural but which cost Beethoven so much labor; and winds and brasses proclaimed in reply. Further, winds and strings alike sounded the humors of a scherzo; and double-basses with agility played passages which their brethren had once declared impossible. And finally, a burst of glory from brasses ended the concert, even as the glories of strings had begun it.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Saturday Theatre Review

Two Pieces Fresh to Bostonian Ears

For The Symphony Concerts Fairchild's Negro Songs, Ravel's Bolero

SELDOM has a conductor more skillfully balanced his program than has Dr. Koussevitzky in the chosen pieces of the present week. There are two works from composers tried and proven—Bach and Schumann. Likewise there are two works new to the Symphony Concerts. Of the two older pieces, one is by the master contrapuntal classicist, the other by one of the most ardent romanticists. Of the two novelties, one has achieved a note which has kept it in the public prints; while the published record of the other seems to be nil. These two works are Ravel's "Bolero" and Blair Fairchild's "Chants Negres."

So much has been printed about Ravel's "Bolero" that it may seem superfluous to add more; yet a brief summary of reviews may be supplemented with a brief look at the score. "Bolero" was first produced at the Paris Opéra in November, 1928, as a ballet for Ida Rubinstein, with Walter Straram conducting. Its success was instantaneous, eclipsed that of other numbers on the program, was repeated across Europe. As to that, reports from Vienna as from Paris (to mention only two cities) are in agreement. "A stroke of genius, musically, scenically, choreographically," says one reviewer.

There is no plot, no program. A Spanish dancer mounts a table, grows more and more energetic and eager as the rhythms of a bolero continue; the spectators around the table catch the fever, brawl and fight with knives in attempts to capture the dancer; the whole progresses from heat to heat. That is all. For this dance-scene Ravel has provided the music.

To the usual large orchestra of the present well supplied with percussion, are added an oboe d'amore, a small clarinet in E-flat three saxophones. Reviewers have hung all manner of variants upon the simple statement that "Bolero" consists of a huge crescendo of repetitions of a single sixteen-measure theme. One account reports "almost twenty" such repetitions, another says "about fifteen." Hence refuge to the score—which contained sobering information: (1) the sentence is not sixteen measures long; (2) there are two contrasting sentences rather than only one, and in contrasting harmonies; (3) the unit of repetition is far larger than one of these sentences. All of which the following analysis will show.

"Bolero" begins with an introduction of four measures in which drums and lower strings pizzicato on a C-major chord establish the characteristic bolero rhythm. This rhythm and this chord reinforced later by a small trumpet, continues throughout the entire piece until the breath-taking change of harmony near the end. After these four measures a flute gently plays the first sentence. This is articulated into two phrases, the first of eight measures, the second of nine. It is followed by a single measure of interlude before it is repeated. It is Spanish in implications, sinuous in line, abounding in varied rhythms. After the flute has played it, it is repeated in entirety by a clarinet. The measure of interlude is again added. Now comes the contrasting sentence, also of phrases of eight and nine measures, plus an interlude of one measure. This suggests harmonies of the minor dominant (G minor) and in its second four measures is more aggressively rhythmed than the rest of the thematic material. By a stroke of genius it is given to a bassoon, and is at once repeated by the small clarinet in E-flat. It is well known that a bolero is made of two portions, each of which is repeated. Ravel, it is thus seen, has been scrupulously careful to maintain this form. And the seventy-two measures thus far played (after the introduction) are the unit of repetition.

Further, the astute Ravel would hardly have been so naive as to employ a square-toed, sixteen-measure sentence, or a multiple thereof, for manifold repetition. This seventy-two measure unit is another matter entirely. Four times the orchestra plays this unit. The first playing has already been outlined. The second time we hear such instruments as the trombone and a saxophone. Each successive eighteen measures brings a new instrument a little more intense than the previous one. Thereafter single instruments give way to combinations of instruments, the crescendo growing and growing with diabolically clever resourcefulness until the tension is almost unbearable, when a change to the brilliant key of E major at once resolves that tension and sweeps the listener to the close. This is the course of "Bolero."

America—and Paris

Blair Fairchild was born in the Bostonian suburb of Belmont, June 23, 1877. He studied music at Harvard with John Knowles Paine and Walter Raymond Spalding. He continued his studies at Florence, Italy, under Buonamici. From 1901 until 1903 he was in the diplomatic service at Constantinople and elsewhere in the Near East. Then he went to Paris to study music further with Widor and Ganaye, and has lived there ever since. He is a prolific composer. Many of his works reflect his travels. Thus there are the three symphonic poems, "Zal," "Shah Féridoun," "Tamineh," all based on Persian legends; the cycle of nine songs, "A Bagdad Lover," the seven songs, collectively entitled, "Les Amours de Hafiz," the eight songs, "Les Quatrains d'Al-Ghazali," his collection of twelve Persian folk-songs. He has written an orchestral tone-poem, "East and West." And, reflecting his Italian residence, there are six sets of "Stornelli Toscani." In 1919 he was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, because of his activities in relief work during the war.

Latterly Mr. Fairchild has turned to native American music. In 1927 the Parisian publishing house of Durand brought out a set of his piano pieces under the title "Cinq Chants Nègres." Mr. Koussevitzky now has the manuscript orchestral score of the "Chants Nègres," which in this new dress have grown from five to six, with incidental expansions here and there. Mr. Fairchild's orchestra contains no unusual instruments such as that of Ravel, but includes a xylophone and a piano as well as a harp. He directs that the six short pieces be played without interruption.

These six "negro songs" have no titles other than the usual tempo indications All of them show excellent knowledge of the negro idiom in some form or other breathe its spirit. All of them show the workmanship of a skilled musician, variety and deftness of scoring, subtlety of harmonization, and above all, a willingness to stop when he is through. One of the "songs" contains only twenty-seven measures. (I) Vivo, ma non troppo. After a short rhythmical introduction, the oboe plays a bright little theme, melodious, gently syncopated. There is a screaming contrast for flutes in minor thirds. The first is developed by the whole orchestra, the second effectively by a horn quartet; the first furnishes conclusion. This "song," slightly expanded, appears again as the sixth of the set. In the version for piano it appears only as the last of the set, not at the beginning. (II) Molto Andante. An English horn and a clarinet play a plaintive melody that might well be a "spiritual." It is taken up by strings, sensitively harmonized, then by a flute. After a short but strong climax it at once subsides. (III) Allegro, with the further direction "mecanico." Oboe and clarinet play the "jazziest" theme so far encountered. It is delightfully irregular in its placement of accents, piquant in its harmonies. The single theme is developed entirely by repetition. It includes a considerable cadenza for piano. (IV) Teneroso. After a few gentle introductory measures in flutes, an English horn takes a simple but expressive melody. It sings itself—and the movement is spent. (V) Number Five begins Lento with a "blues" as rhapsodic cadenza for clarinet. Then, Allegro, it proceeds with an energetic syncopated theme. There is much change of tempo and many contrasting motifs The orchestral portion as well as the cadenza must be called rhapsodic. Then

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

Concert-Calender

Forthcoming Programs

FROM Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 20 and 21:

Petite Suite ..... Roussel
Piece for Harp and Orchestra, "Féerie" ..... Tournier
(Harpist: Bernard Zighera)
Suite, No. 2, from The Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë" ..... Ravel
Symphony in E minor, "From The New World" ..... Dvorak

Roussel's "Little Suite," new to the Symphony Concerts, runs in the light vein that of late he has cultivated—scholarship and wit, anciently and grace. Mr. Zighera, one of the virtuosi of the orchestra, deserves the opportunity that Tournier's piece will afford him. Ravel's Suite is battlehorse for both conductor and orchestra. In Boston Dvorak's Symphony is still unstaled by over-performance. Since Mr. Monteux's time it has not been played at Symphony Hall.

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the concert on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 29, to increase the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra. All the numbers come from Wagner's operas; in three, Mme. Austral, in her true field at last, will be assisting singer:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"
Senta's Ballad from "The Flying Dutchman"
Bacchanal, "The Hill of Venus," from "Tannhäuser"
Elisabeth's Air, "Dich, Theure Halle!" from "Tannhäuser"
Introduction to Act III. of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Ride of the Valkyrs from "The Valkyr"
Prelude and Closing Scene (Mme. Austral) from "Tristan and Isolde"

Music Notes and Comment

Jose Iturbi, the noted Spanish pianist who will play Liszt's E flat concerto at this week's Boston Symphony concerts in the regular series, made his Boston debut last Monday afternoon at the Statler Hotel in a charity concert. He then proved himself a pianist of the very first rank, to be counted with Gieseking and Horowitz among outstanding artists of the present generation. He was born at Valencia in 1895, studied in that city, Barcelona, and Paris. He won a first prize at the Paris Coinservatoire, where he was a pupil of Staub, at the age of 17. He was later head of the piano department in the Geneva Conservatory, a position once held by Liszt. For the past few years he has been a concert pianist, winning a great reputation in Europe and South America. He is now engaged on his first American tour, which includes appearances as soloist with the Philadelphia, Chicago, and New York Philharmonic Orchestras, as well as the Boston Symphony.

The new symphony by the English composer Bax, which will be played at this week's Symphony concerts for the first time anywhere, is dedicated to Dr Koussevitzky. It is described as "Second Symphony, in E minor and C" in the score.

Third Symphony Concert

The third in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Sanders theatre was given on Thursday evening of last week. This was the program: Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for String Orchestra; Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C major; Ravel: ("Mother Goose"). Five Children's Pieces; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28.

Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, though magnificently played, proved not especially interesting. There are many other things by him that show more of his genius. At one time the Suite in D was one of the favorite Bach numbers on many orchestral programs, the air and gavotte being especially enjoyable. Why not revive this suite in the near future? It will be as fully enjoyed by many of the younger generation of symphony patrons as it was years ago by our ancestors.

Schumann's second symphony was played here for the first time under Dr. Koussevitzky, if memory serves. Not as interesting as the first one, it nevertheless has many pages of inspiration, and the work is always recalled with the two trios in the scherzo. The performance was ideal in every way.

"Mother Goose" in her French dress little resembles the character that American children hold in mind, yet in a Parisian atmosphere she shines brilliantly, as the performance fully attested. And the concert ended with one of the best portrayals of Strauss' musical picture of the mischievous "Till" that can be remembered.

The fourth concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, January 16. It is understood that at this concert Alexander Glazounov, distinguished Russian composer, will appear as guest conductor in a program of his own compositions.

H. J. Storer

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN SPECIAL CONCERT

Will Give Extra Performance Here for Relief of Russian Exiles

A special non-subscription performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Friday afternoon, January 10, at 2.30 at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc. The program, which will consist of selections from the principal Russian composers, will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with Benno Rabinoff as violin soloist.

CLASSICS HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bach, Beethoven and Mozart Fill Program

Dr. Koussevitzky filled the program for the first concert of the Boston Symphony's Tuesday series with great classics. Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, Mozart's Symphony in E flat, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony were the chosen works. An audience which completely filled Symphony Hall listened attentively, but applauded with a notable lack of warmth.

The Bach concerto, one of the masterpieces of music which seem imperishable, was written for an orchestra much smaller than the one which played it yesterday, and including a harpsichord, strangely omitted yesterday. In Mozart's E flat Symphony Dr Koussevitzky reduced the size of the orchestra to that for which the composer wrote. For Beethoven he used the full orchestra, though Beethoven had not so many players in mind. These two symphonies are, of course, among the best known, as well as the greatest, ever written.

One was reminded yesterday of what Maj Higginson, according to Bliss Perry's admirable biography, gave as his reason for withdrawing (after the departure of Dr Muck) his support from the Boston Symphony, which he had founded and sustained for 36 seasons. It was impossible, so Maj Higginson believed, to secure another conductor who like Muck could do full justice to both the great classics and to modern music. And impossible it has thus far turned out to be.

It is commonplace to say that Mozart's instrumental music, like his vocal music, must be perfectly sung if it is to make its effect. The interpreter must understand and render Mozart's melody. No dramatic climaxes, no sensationally original interpretations are possible in Mozart. No weakness of technique can be concealed by the player or singer of his music. Dr Koussevitzky took great pains with this symphony in E flat. The orchestra, except that the wind instruments played too loudly, and that some attacks were not clean cut, played well enough. But the performance was melodically inadequate and disappointing.

Dr Koussevitzky's highly eloquent and personal style of interpretation was better suited to Beethoven than to either Mozart or Bach. He felt and rendered much of the intensely dramatic quality of the music. But the slow movement marked andante con moto, was taken as an adagio, and the famous transition from scherzo to finale was dragged out in a needless endeavor to gain an effect.

In such pieces as Ravel's Bolero and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony," Dr Koussevitzky is certainly a supremely fine conductor. But with the great classics of the period which ends with Beethoven he is often, as he was yesterday, an uneven and disappointing interpreter.

P. R.

Koussevitzky Offers New Symphony by Bax

Arnold Bax's Symphony No. 2, dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, had its first performance in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Dec. 13, as the principal item in the eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For some reason, possibly to make it harder, Bax describes this symphony as written "in E minor and C major"; a novel designation which has served to rouse a deal of discussion already. The fact seems to be that the composer has hesitated between the two keys. E minor has rather the edge in the first movement, but C major wins out in the end.

The symphony, for full orchestra, is in three movements, an Allegro Moderato, an Andante and an Allegro Feroce. The first movement is the most impressive. It abounds in thematic material and is marked by the atmospheric quality that inheres in all Bax's music. The form is roughly regular, with diversions ad lib which nevertheless are fused into unity. There are of course evidences of the influence of Rimsky, Debussy, Wagner, Strauss; but there is nothing that could be called imitative. This music is characteristic. Faërie rules, but this imaginative world nevertheless is substantial. If you tried to demolish it, you would find it necessary to use mechanical drills, as they do in taking apart the old Federal Building in Boston.

The Andante falls off in invention and in treatment, though no doubt if heard without the preceding movement it would strike us as charming. The Finale starts off ferociously enough, to conclude with a pianissimo. Shall Bax be accused of writing an English "Pathetic"? He himself has said that the end "should be very broad indeed, with a kind of oppressive catastrophic mood." That "oppressive" sense, a sense of struggle, pervades in fact the whole work. But we are glad the composer has not provided us with an elaborate program. His music is interesting and impressive as music.

The composer also had expressed confidence that this work would receive "a finer first performance than any previous work of mine." Without making comparisons, it may be said that one cannot imagine a finer performance than it received. The orchestra played brilliantly in this, as it had played in Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, which opened the concert —a highly dramatized reading of a highly dramatic piece of music.

When Arturo Toscanini led his orchestra from La Scala in a triumphal tour of the United States, in the season of 1920-21 ,the visitors felt, according to the Italian conductor's biographer, Tobia Nicotra, that with all their successes elsewhere, they had not won the accolade until the approval of the Boston public had been bestowed upon them. This flattering opinion evidently is not shared by José Iturbi and Dr. Koussevitzky. For this Spanish pianist, acclaimed a master-interpreter of Mozart, was presented to the Boston Symphony audience in the Liszt E flat Concerto.

He had an ovation, it is true, with handclapping starting before the final notes and with "Bravos" resounding; but what conservatory graduate cannot win an ovation with this sort of music? It is true that he displayed a wondrous technique; but wondrous technique runs in the streets. It is true that he employed an unexpected delicacy of touch and purity of phrasing, as they say Joseffy used to do; but it is also true that he used an exaggerated rubato.

A pity, that a great orchestra and a (by report) great pianist should be thus thrown away.

The final item listed on the program was Respighi's "Pines of Rome," but whether the nightingale was in good voice you will never learn from this reporter. L. A. S

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
DEC 5

Symphony Concert In Aid of Russians

A special non-subscription performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Friday afternoon, January 10, at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc. The program, which will consist of selections from the principal Russian composers, will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, with Benno Rabinoff violin soloist.

Full Afternoon, New Symphony, New Virtuoso

Trans. Dec 14

Bax Running High and Rich, Iturbi for Fineness, Romantic Moods

A WEEK ago Ravel's devil's dance taught the matinée audience at Symphony Hall to stamp out its pleasure—with feet, upon the floor. Such response may have suited "Bolero"; but the assembled matrons and juniors (as the advertisements have it) learned their lesson too well. Mr. Iturbi, playing Liszt's Concerto in E-flat (1855) with the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was as far as might be from that orchestra whipping out Ravel's tour de force (1928). A bolero happens to be Spanish dance; Mr. Iturbi happens to be Spanish pianist. Therewith ends any conceivable bond between the two. The matinée audience, taking pleasure in the newcomer, stamped out two recalls for him after as many more bestowed by hands. Every mother of a family knows her reactions when the baby does a "cute" thing for the first time, when subsequently it has become a habit. It is needless to press that analogy.

Speculative bystanders, having little to occupy their minds while the succeeding "Pines of Rome" belabored their ears, fell to wondering how much of the applause wreathed around Mr. Iturbi belonged also to Liszt's once hackneyed, now neglected, Concerto. A fat paragraph of pianists played it at the Symphony Concerts between 1885 and 1913. Since that time, the venerable "programist" waited nearly seventeen years before he could reprint favorite pages about "the concerto with a triangle" and to the greater glory of its tinkle. Nobody nowadays excites himself about that instrument. Indeed it is rather hard to descry or to hear when a modernist brings up, like a general of artillery, whole batteries of percussion. Much more in the Concerto precludes any excitement over it in December, 1929. Elderly men like to tell how "the great generation" of romantic pianists ended it in no rush of dazzling bravura but in lordly pomp of tone and motion, slowly expanding. . Once upon a time it was accounted a marvel of difficult exaction, whereat Herr Toch, handing his newest Concerto to Mr. Sanromá, would probably smile over his shoulder. The books tell with what stately breadth the opening measures used to unfold upon sympathetic ears; how the Scherzo struck sparks, not merely from the triangle; how the whole piece passed for a tour de force of power and brilliance, a romantic fantasia in concerto-disguise.

Nobody, unless, possibly, Mr. Horowitz could now play "Liszt in E-flat" (as they used to call it) in that voice and style and not sound shamming and hollow. The musical times change; we mortals with them; for the while they are not kind to the mid-nineteenth-century romantics. Mr. Iturbi, who has a mind and uses it, made no attempt to recall that golden age, as if it were really golden. Dr. Koussevitzky, who in spite of his modernism, shelters a romantic impulse, yielded to the temptation only at the outset of the Concerto, quickly put it by; thenceforth agreed with the pianist. For Mr. Iturbi's notion and accomplishment of "Liszt in E-flat" is of a brilliantly jewelled music, to be played precisely and adroitly, with incessant glint of tone, animation of rhythm, sparkle of bravura. His piano, like that of most in the new generation, is an instrument of percussion, not of simulated song. Nothing in the Concerto tempts him to sentiment. He gives it no airs, preferring to find in it graces.

The outcome was a performance remarkable for clarity of outline, vivacity of pace and rhythm, charm of tone, melting euphonies with the orchestral part, glittering ornament, light and poised energy. It was as though Mr. Iturbi held the faded Concerto in his hand; turned it this way and that until every facet had caught the light; while Dr. Koussevitzky raised or lowered the curtain of the accompaniment to brighten or temper the shimmer. You never can tell when a pianist as technically adroit and as musically sensitive as Mr. Iturbi takes down a museum-piece. His new way with Liszt seemed much more desirable than the stalking ghost—all that anyone can now summon—of the old. To listen was at least to find a new sensation and to experience a pleasing thrill. Yet in the lobby-talk as the audience dispersed, one and another said that as long ago as the eighties Joseffy took the selfsame way with "Liszt in E-flat" and also in A.

Throughout, indeed, the concert was rather a romantics' afternoon. It began with a music in which they are still alive and speaking—Weber's Overture to his opera "Euryanthe." It is a good old piece, a stock-piece as the orchestra evidently believed when it scrabbled audibly through the first dozen pages before the conductor reined it into stride. Schumann sits, dreams and makes romantic music. Liszt writes it as though it were "theater" and he no inconsiderable actor. Berlioz strips it to a quivering nerve as in his melodies; or fleshes it with something nowadays very like bombast. Out of Weber it foams impetuously—say at the beginning of this Overture to "Euryanthe." To this day there is no resisting such an ardent torrent. He stays it for the muted, mysterious Largo as one who would concentrate and breathe soft his intensities; but not for long. He whips up a fugato until it sounds operatic; ends with a jubilant and triumphant flourish. He flings out the overture as though he were brimming with a dozen others; it is full of hot blood and gusto. Willy-nilly, the listener hears and believes. It is the compulsion of the romantics, in most others now withered. And for Weber the orchestra was vivid as a sunset, alive as a wind.

Count Respighi, who ended the concert with "Pines of Rome," among the twentieth-century romantics. He sees children at play under the trees of the Villa Borghese and magnifies them into the little darting monsters of the shifting tempi, broken rhythms, abrupt phrases of his first division—the modern way with a romantic impression. He wanders near catacombs and hears a mysterious hymn echoing from them. Berlioz or Liszt might have done as much and confided it to nearly the same instruments. He hears the nightingale singing from the pines of the Janiculum—notorious romantic pastime after dark. Berlioz's Harold, Liszt's Tasso, might have kept him company. They, however, would have relied upon the wind choir for the bird-voice, as at first Respighi makes shift to do. Then he glances up at the calendar on the wall of his work-room. "Dio mio! it is 1924," and forthwith shuts it up in a gramophone-record. From which—to tell the truth—it sounded yesterday rather throaty. To end, the legionaries pounding up the Appian Way. By this time we have learned a trick or two about high-rhythmed tonal masses in crescendo; while Respighi, as everyone knows, is as absorbent as a sponge. . . . It is not necessary, though possibly easy, to agree with the listener who trusted that as soon as the legion had got its breath, a centurion would be dispatched to wring the neck of the gramophoned nightingale. If not, what is Cæsar Augustus—or il Signore Mussolini—for?

There is another romanticism, however, far transcending Respighi's sonorous surfaces, alive to this day, everlastingly alive so long as the sons of men think and feel passionately: would also release their passion. It fills Bax's Second Symphony, played for the first time anywhere, after strenuous rehearsal and in manifold truth and life by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. (The circumstantial evidence was the straggling beginning of the Overture to "Euryanthe.") Of the two keys with which Bax exceptionally labelled the Symphony a learned and acute colleague has already discoursed in these columns. He also exposed the fertility of the thematic invention, the manipulative readiness, resource and imagination—for it is nothing less—that further distinguish this new Symphony. For the moment there are other salient matters.

Musically, as many say, this is the day of small, lean things. Composers choose the lesser forms; busy themselves with minute motivs; expand them prudently; clothe them economically. Bax, to the contrary, stretches spacious canvas; fills it richly writes full and ardent. He conceived his Symphony nobly; planned it loftily; achieved it in unfeigned exaltation of mind and heart and hand. The contention, the tumult, the rifts of tonal light, the descents of tonal shadow, the burthened restlessness, thrust back only to thrust forth—all these through the long first movement are passionate release of deep and welling emotion. Call it, if the hearer likes, the battle of men's souls for their own existence against enemies and fates.

The second movement, lyrical, insistent, would soothe and calm. Yet this measure and that period, is bitter-edged, repining. The third and final division begins in a new marshalling for the conflict; presses it again in a far-flung theme; wages it fiercely; lightens it here and there as if in brave defiance; ends less exhausted than oppressed—the burden that may not be lifted, the omens that will not change. A pessimistic music, if the hearer likes—sequence to Bax's bitter, angry First Symphony, sequence and deepening, less touched with mystical comfort. Yet throughout a music of passion and exaltation, at odds with a sardonic time, preferring the field of conflict to the seat of mockery, unashamed to speak nobly of and to the soul.

Second, a Symphony of uncommon richness in a day of straitened music. Those who cannot bear forty minutes of passionate self-release on the part of a composer, will object that Bax overwrites and is turgid. Possibly there are measures in the second movement that less move forward than deepen insistence. On the other hand, recall those abounding and usually significant themes, diverse in profile, diverse in substance and implication. Consider again a musical development and emotional progress both seldom flagging. Note no less the multifarious texture, the intensified harmonic and instrumental color, the rhythmic energy of all these pages.

Observe again not only the ingenuity but the imagination with which a score of devices, intrinsically modernistic and of a prosaic music of dissonance, are wrought into a music essentially romantic, underlyingly songful; are not only transfused but vitalized to new purpose. Here indeed in first fruition is the issue out of present tonal incoherence which many have visioned—the incorporation of the new means into the old substance, there to generate a more plangent speech of music, a more piercing speech of emotion. . . . A Symphony nobly conceived, loftily planned; passionately released, sustained at intensity and exaltation; full-freighted, deep-fleshed Rarely are they written in this day and year. Rarely do they conquer us who live within it. An exception, as it seemed yesterday, might be Arnold Ba —in two keys. Maybe, the creatrix of "The Constant Nymph," with her triumphant Symphony—likewise in two keys—was his sub-conscious prophet.

H. T. P.

Globe Dec 14

ITURBI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Spanish Pianist Is Given an Ovation

Arnold Bax' Second Symphony Played for First Time

Jose Iturbi, the noted Spanish pianist, now making his first American tour, was given an ovation at yesterday's Symphony concert for his remarkably brilliant playing of Liszt's Concerto in E flat. Applause was loud and long, many stamped their feet as well as clapped their hands, recalls were numerous.

Iturbi, who impressed those who heard his Boston debut the other day at a charity concert as an artist of the first rank, is now well on the way to wide and lasting popularity in Boston.

A second recital by him, to be held preferably at Symphony Hall, would, if now arranged for, undoubtedly draw a large audience. No new solo performer since Horowitz has been so cordially, so demonstratively received by a Boston audience as Iturbi was yesterday. The chief item on Dr Koussevitzky's program was a new symphony by Arnold Bax, favorably received by the audience.

Mr Iturbi was born at Valencia, Spain, in 1895, and received in 1913 a first prize for pianoforte playing from the Paris Conservatoire. From 1919 to 1923 he was head of the piano department of the Geneva Conservatoire, a position he held until 1923. He has in recent years toured Europe and South America with marked success as a concert pianist. He made his American debut Oct 11, 1929, as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia.

He has neither the long hair nor the affected mannerisms the 19th century expected of celebrated pianists. Yesterday's audience saw a quiet and business-like young man, serious and intent on his task, yet obviously certain of his ability to carry it through. The one trait betokening what press agents describe as "personality" was a remarkably ingratiating smile, which, however, appeared only when the concerto was over and the remarkable, almost unprecedented, demonstration from the audience well under way.

Sureness of Taste

Iturbi began his first Boston recital Dec 2 with Mozart's A-major sonata, and for his New York debut Dec 7 with the Philharmonic Orchestra chose a Mozart concerto. In Philadelphia, for his American debut, he played Beethoven's Fourth Concerto. These pieces, of course, demanded of him a fineness of musicianship and a sureness of taste which yesterday's show piece by Liszt gave him small opportunity to reveal.

Liszt's concerto demands, if it is to make its effect, a technique and a showmanship almost, though not quite, as rare as the musicianship the classics exact of a first-rate performer. Iturbi left no doubt in yesterday's audience of his prowess as a virtuoso, and anyone paying close attention could see from the subtlety and elegance of his phrasing and dynamics that there was no mere virtuso, no superlative pianopounder, but a true artist. One cannot, however, help being sorry he did not play us Mozart or Beethoven.

Bax's Second Symphony, dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky and published in 1929, was yesterday played for the first time in public. Its composer, a Londoner by birth and residence, is known here for a number of impressionistic pieces for orchestra and for pianoforte, associated with Irish, or as he would doubtless prefer to say, with "Keltic" subjects. His first symphony was played at these concerts Dec 16, 1927, but the present writer did not hear it.

The symphony heard yesterday is interesting chiefly for several of its episodic passages. It contains some salient musical ideas, none of which are developed. The piece is overlong, and far too rhapsodic to deserve its title. Bax could have made better use of these ideas in short impressionistic tone poems. His style is incurably diffuse, with no trace of either desire or ability to create musical structures on a large scale. The numerous climaxes the work contains, some of which employ the full power of orchestra and organ, grow wearisome because they are not prepared far in advance, or fitted into a carefully-planned musical scheme. There are also numerous reminiscences of the work of other and greater composers. The performance was painstakingly eloquent, and the work was more cordially received than is that of most living writers represented on Boston Symphony programs.

Romantic Music

The other members were Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and Respighi's "Pines of Rome," so that the program as a whole had an admirable artistic unity. Dr Koussevitzky conducted with his characteristic dramatic fervor, overstressing most of the points he wished to make, but certainly driving them home to the average listener. Restraint, poise, balance are qualities less obviously but none the less certainly demanded of an interpreter of romantic music than they are of a performer of the classics.

15

16

Dec. 14

JOSE ITURBI CHEERED AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

THE appearance of Jose Iturbi, Spanish pianist, at the Symphony concerts this week is in the nature of another field day—or pair of them—for the audience. It is likely that the remarkable demonstration of Friday afternoon will be repeated this evening when this extraordinary virtuoso and artist, fresh from the Iberian peninsula, repeats the solo part in the Liszt E-flat Concerto.

The audience was considerably excited last Friday afternoon, when Ravel's "Bolero" received its first performance. It was even more excited yesterday. It was not content with fervid applause and even stamping its feet. It raised its voice, or voices—shrill feminine voices, for the most part—to cheer Iturbi.

This demonstration was prompted by one of the finest pianistic exhibitions we have ever been privileged to hear. Iturbi is first of all a great musician and artist, and his playing was never out of perspective, so far as the whole performance was concerned. On the other hand, he realized that this piece was intended even by the composer to be something of a show-piece for the virtuoso. And it was virtuosity of the very finest type, not mere meretricious showmanship, that Iturbi dispensed yesterday.

His performance was the climax of a brilliant concert. A thrilling, colorful rendering of Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" began it. So inspired was the reading of Mr. Koussevitzky and the playing of the orchestra under him that it might have been a first performance as was that of the Bax Symphony in E minor and C major, which followed it.

Arnold Bax could not come, as he had intended, to hear his work played for the first time. If he had, it seems to us he would have been eminently satisfied, for the performance seemed to do justice to the Romantic and mystical ardors of the Celt. There is much fine music in this score—more than can be digested at a single hearing. It stands out among the welter of superficial and insincere modernist pieces as Mount Washington would if transplanted into the Blue Hills.

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" closes the program.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE RESPONDS

Iturbi, Pianist, Makes Sensation in Liszt's 1st Concerto

Post Dec 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Friday afternoon Symphony Concerts are losing their traditional air of sobriety. Last week it was Ravel's "Bolero" of the protracted crescendo that launched a furore of excitement. Yesterday it was the newly arrived Spanish pianist, Jose Iturbi, bringing to electrifying performance that much-ridden war-horse, Liszt's Concerto in E-flat.

A MASTER OF ELEGANCE

The present musical years, so lean in some respects, are happily not falling behind their predecessors in the production of remarkable pianists. Two seasons ago it was the tornadic Horowitz that inflamed a pair of Symphony audiences; now comes Mr. Iturbi to create yet another sensation.

That the Russian and the Spaniard should be so alike in their power to arouse their listeners and so unlike their methods of doing it is renewed proof of the range and scope of musical performance. The one is dynamic, a super-technician inclined, as his latest Symphony Hall recital suggested, to let his volcanic energies lead him into inartistic excesses. The other, singularly poised and self-controlled, is a supreme master of musical elegance, of rhythmic verve, of clear-cut, crystalline tone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JOURNAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will speak with a Russian accent in its second concert of the season here at the E. F. Albee Theatre Tuesday night of next week. Works of Tschaikowsky (the "Pathetic" Symphony) and Stravinsky "Fire Bird" music) are announced for performance, while the third of the three long numbers is by the 18th century Italian, Vivaldi.

Vivaldi, in spite of his age, has never appeared on symphony programs here often enough to force us to regard him as our own familiar friend. Dr. Koussevitzky did revive a movement from the "Four Seasons" concerto in the spring of 1928, but the composer is little known—not even well enough to appear in many encyclopedias.

A violinist, he wrote largely for this instrument, and contributed much to its technical development. "Though by no means an artist of the exalted type of Corelli, his extraordinary fertility as a composer for the violin, his ingenuity in making new combinations and devising new effects, and especially his undoubted influence on the further development of the Concerto-form, give him an important position in the history of violin playing.

"While in the Concerto grossi of Torelli and Corelli the solo violins are treated very much in the same manner as the orchestral violins—the solo passages being usually accompanied by the bass alone—Vivaldi not only gives to the solo violins entirely distinct passages of a much more brilliant character, but he also adds to his orchestra oboes and horns, which not merely double other parts, but have independent passages and phrases to perform—thereby giving the earliest instance of orchestration as applied to the Concerto."

For the Russian Ballet.

Like so many Russian composers, Stravinsky entered another profession before turning to music on the advice of an established leader in the art. Rimsky-Korsakov persuaded him to leave the law, and the young man wrote his first ballet for Diaghilev, whose dancers performed this "Fire Bird" suite. The music was played by the Boston Symphony under the present conductor here in January, 1927. The program notes on that occasion told us that it was composed between the summer of 1909 and May, 1910, and that the scenario was the work of Fokine.

"Fokine's scenario may thus be described: After a short prelude, the curtain rises and the grounds of an old castle are seen. Ivan Tsarevitch, the hero of many tales, in the course of hunting at night, comes to the enchanted garden and sees a beautiful bird with flaming golden plumage. She attempts to pluck fruit of gold from a silver tree. He captures her, but, heeding her entreaties, frees her. In gratitude, she gives him one of her feathers which has magic properties.

"The dawn breaks. Thirteen enchanted princesses appear, coming from the castle. Ivan, hidden, watches them playing with golden apples, and dancing. Fascinated by them, he finally discloses himself. They tell him that the castle belongs to the terrible Katschei, who turns decoyed travellers into stone. The princesses warn Ivan of his fate, but he resolves to enter the castle.

In Castle Perilous.

"Opening the gate, he sees Katschei with his train of grotesque and deformed subjects marching toward him in pompous procession. Katschei attempts to work his spell on Ivan, who is protected, however, by the feather. Ivan summons the Fire-Bird, who causes Katschei and his retinue to dance until they drop exhausted.

"The secret of Katschei's immortality is disclosed to Ivan; the sorcerer keeps an egg in a casket; if this egg should be broken or even injured, he would die. Ivan swings the egg backwards and forwards. Katschei and his crew sway with it. At last the egg is dashed to the ground; Katschei dies; his palace vanishes; the petrified knights come to life; and Ivan, amid great rejoicing, receives the hand of the most beautiful princess.

"According to Ralston in his 'Russian Folk-Tales,' the Fire-Bird is known in its native haunts as the Zhar-Ptitsa. Its name, he says, indicates its close connection with flame or night. Zhar means 'glowing heart, as of a furnace,' and Zhar-Ptitsa means, literally, the Glow-Bird.

Birdly Illumination

"Its appearance corresponds with its designation. Its feathers blaze with golden or silvery sheen, its eyes shine like crystal. it dwells in a golden cage. In the depths of the night it flies into a garden and lights it up as brilliantly as could a thousand burning fires. A single feather from its tail illuminates a dark room. It feeds upon golden apples, which have the power of bestowing youth and beauty.

"Katschei is one of the many incarnations of the dark spirit. Sometimes he is described as altogether serpent-like in form. Sometimes he seems to be of a mixed nature, partly human and partly ophidian, but in some stories he is apparently framed after the fashion of a man." Another version of the apple and serpent story.

"The music describes with an extraordinary wealth of suggestion the various weird figures of the drama, and is of a nature never allowing us to forget that it is fantasy and not life that we are witnessing. . . . Throughout the ballet the music serves as a preparation, by means of the ear, for what the eye is to witness."

The "Pathetic" Sixth

The melancholy Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony brings the evening to a close. So much has been said of the brooding melancholy of this composer and what he meant by it, that whatever is said in addition is almost certain to be considered as futile as what has gone before.

Certainly we cannot think of Tschaikowsky as "the human, with his droppings of soft tears," nor yet speak of "tears from the depths of some divine despair." Perhaps he was only a sensitive man who felt that the evils of life were real and in the ascendant, aware that all is vanity, which he let become a vexation of spirit as well.

Sometimes he seemed like a frail instrument—a lute—that the wind blew over and made to resound to its own mood, while with its humor it put the sensitive strings out of tune, and thus made discord through no fault of the player.

Tschaikowsky never played in the strong C major key of life; rather he set his fancies always to a minor mood, exploring vistas of the vague, the doubtful, the hopelessly aspiring that fell inevitably back towards the pit. But at times as in the wonderful 5-4 rhythm of the second movement of our symphony, he stands out against the cruelty of life like a real Cassandra, rigid and strong against a pitiless force, awaiting with supreme human defiance the crash of a blow that must descend when the will of the smiter decides.

M. C. W.

In Temper of the Day

There is in his playing rare fineness and precision that yet escapes any hint of aridity. Other performances of Liszt's Concerto in Symphony Hall, for example that of Mr. Rosenthal several seasons ago, have had a breadth, a sweep, an overpowering force that was not in Mr. Iturbi's highly polished and sensitive version of yesterday. But the Spaniard's way with the music is more in accord with the temper of our own day, and one more likely to freshen and reanimate a romantic and rhetorical music. Mr. Iturbi, who played a short time ago at the Hotel Statler, is certain sooner or later to give a recital in Symphony Hall, and when he does he should pack that auditorium to the doors.

Besides the stimulating Iturbi, yesterday's concert offered the first performance anywhere of the Second Symphony of Arnold Bax, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky, together with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," in a performance so inflated, exaggerated and over-contrived that, as may sometimes happen, it fell in consequence quite flat, and finally, in a most eloquent performance, Respighi's now popular "Pines of Rome" of the shrilling children, the gloomy catacombs, the phonograph nightingale and the cataclysmic march of Caesar's legions.

In Uncongenial Field

Though his Symphony proved a work of uneven interest and unequal value, Bax is not a composer to be lightly dismissed. Yet it is possible to feel that in his two symphonies, of which the first is the more significant, he is laboring in an uncongenial field.

A moody, poetic, essentially subjective composer, this Celt seems more at home in the symphonic poem than in the symphony, where logic of design the severer, more abstract domain of design and continuity of thought are prime essentials.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

TIMES

THE new symphony by Arnold Bax, written in two keys, E minor and C major, was performed for the first time anywhere on Dec. 13 in Boston by the symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Although it was written in 1924-25, the composer reserved the production for Mr. Koussevitzky, to whom the work is dedicated.

The composer has said that "there is absolutely no communicable program associated with the music, which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work."

"When the symphonic poems by Bax were played by this orchestra," says Philip Hale in The Boston Herald, "the charge of occasional diffuseness, if not vagueness, was urged against him, while full justice was done to the fine, poetic qualities. It might have been said that he was then lulled at too great length by the enchanting airs he heard in the Faery Hills and in the Garden of Fand. In this symphony even more than in his first symphony played two years ago, there is still, especially in the second movement, the Celtic feeling that is characteristic of many of his works; there are themes, there are harmonies of tender, wistful beauty, not free from a pleasing melancholy, but these pages only relieve and enhance the heroic character of the work as a whole, the defiant pages or those of doubt and questioning until there is at the end submission to the inevitable, if not a lasting peace. These final pages, artfully simple, leading to silence, are among the most eloquent and impressive in the symphony.

"That the audience realizes the strength and the beauty, the originality of invention and expression was shown by the manner in which the symphony was received. Seldom, if ever, has the first performance of a new symphony been so heartily and honestly applauded."

MUSIC

Herald Dec. 14

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. Jose Iturbi, pianist, played for the first time at these concerts. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to 'Euryanthe." Bax, symphony No. 2 in E minor and C. Liszt, piano concerto, No. 1. Respighi, "The Pines of Rome." The new symphony by Arnold Bax was performed for the first time anywhere. Although it was written in 1924-1925, he reserved the production for Dr. Koussevitzky, to whom the score is dedicated, feeling confident, as he said in a letter, that conducted by him and played by this orchestra the symphony "will receive a finer first performance than any previous work of mine." His confidence was not misplaced. He honored conductor and players by it; the superb performance justified it. In another letter, dated London, Dec. 3, Mr. Bax says: "There is absolutely no communicable 'program' associated with the music which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work." He calls attention to the cyclic character of the form and to the persistence in all the three movements of a three-note figure.

"Severely", "absolute" music — but the symphony is charged with emotion and with contending emotions. By reason of contents, its musical ideas, its treatment of them, the technical workmanship, the strain of mysticism alternating with human warmth, the melodic beauty. The boldness, never experimental, of the harmonic schemes, the ingenuity and the taste displayed in the orchestral dress, this symphony is by far the most important work that has come from England for many years; one of the most important that has come from Europe.

When the symphonic poems by Bax were played by this orchestra the charge of occasional diffuseness, if not vagueness, was urged against him, while full justice was done to the fine, poetic qualities. It might have been said that he was then lulled at too great length by the enchanting airs he heard in the Faery Hills and in the Garden of Fand. In this symphony even more than in his first symphony played two years ago, there is still, especially in the second movement, the Celtic feeling that is characteristic of many of his works; there are themes, there are harmonies of tender, wistful beauty, not free from a pleasing melancholy, but these pages only relieve and enhance the heroic character of the work as a whole, the defiant pages or those of doubt and questioning until there is at the end submission to the inevitable, if not a lasting peace. These final pages, artfully simple, leading to silence, are among the most eloquent and impressive in the symphony.

That the audience realizes the strength and the beauty, the originality of invention and expression was shown by the manner in which the smyphony was received. Seldom, if ever, has the first performance of a new symphony been so heartily and honestly applauded.

Mr. Iturbi, whose playing of concertos by the Mozart and Beethoven aroused enthusiasm in Philadelphia and New York, chose for Boston the "Triangle" concerto by Liszt that had not been placed on a program of these concerts since 1913. His performance was one of dazzling brilliance; nor is this all that is to be said. The concerto itself is much more than a parade piece; it is shrewdly, musically planned, and not only for the glory of a virtuoso; there are pages of genuine and haunting charm that test the soul as well as the fingers of a pianist. The delicacy and poetry of Mr. Iturbi's interpretation of these passages were as conspicuous as his triumphant bravura. Yes, when played as Mr. Iturbi played it, this concerto is exciting; but it is more than an appeal to the nerves. It was a pleasure to find that Mr. Iturbi is not a "specialist," for a specialist in music is a fearsome wild fowl. To excel in the playing of Mozart's music stamps one as a thorough musician of knowledge, taste and charm. This one is indeed, an artist. To excel also in this music of Liszt's awakens further admiration and respect. As remarkable as the piano playing was the orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Iturbi was recalled many times; Dr. Koussevitzky was greeted most warmly when he came on the platform to conduct "The Pines of Rome." Of Respighi's four movements, the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," has the most enduring musical and emotional value. The first movement is conspicuous for its orchestration; the third movement does not gain by the introduction of a gramophone-nightingale; the march of victorious Romans in the Appian way owes its effect only to steadily increasing dynamic force and the anticipation of a thundering climax.

As an introduction to one of the most interesting concerts of several seasons, Weber's overture was performed in an appropriately dramatic manner with due regard to the singing of the suave second theme and the unearthliness of the mysterious episode for strings.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week's program will comprise Roussel's "Petite Suite." Tournier's "Feerie" prelude and dance for harp (Mr. Zighera) and orchestra; the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

TIMES

New American works being performed this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Aaron Copland's symphony, a tone poem of Roger Sessions, a tone poem of Werner Josten and Samuel Gardner's "Broadway." Other novelties listed for the season are Prokofieff's Third symphony, Filip Lazar's Concerto Grosso, Honegger's "Bach" suite, Mahler's Ninth symphony, Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's Ninth symphony, Debussy's "Le Martyre de St. Sebastian," and a Spohr suite for winds.

Le Courrier Musicale of recent date announces that Maurice Maréchal, the French 'cellist, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next February, Koussevitzky conducting. There will be heard for the first time Honegger's new concerto for 'cello, written especially for M. Maréchal.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

WORLD

DEC 15

Boston Symphony Plays for Charity

Plans are under way for a special non-subscription perforamnce by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall Friday afternoon, Jan. 10, at 2.30 o'clock. The proceeds of this concert, made possible through the kindness of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will go to the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc., the High Commission for Refugees League of Nations and the International Anti-Tuberculosis Union.

On the trip which Mrs. Henry P. Loomis, President of the American Socity, recently made through twelve countries to study the existing conditions of Russian exiles she was distressed by the misery and hardship under which these people struggle. When Dr. Koussevitzky learned of the suffering of his compatriots he arranged for a benefit performance for these unfortunate and deserving exiles.

Jour Dec 16

Saturday Supplement

Though the audience on Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall has not yet learned to stamp out its pleasure, it was as fervid over Mr. Iturbi as its predecessor of the matinée. Cheers were its preference as supplement to clapping. Yet if the applauded Spaniard were to return next month for a concert of his own—an hour and half instead of twenty minutes of his "wonderful" playing—would he draw more than half a house? By much Bostonian precedent he would not.

The new Symphony of Bax, impressive in itself and impressively played, fared not so well as on Friday. As it seemed, it baffled many; while no more than a peristent minority called back the conductor and finally brought the orchestra to its feet. Yet Dr. Koussevitzky could do worse than repeat at another pair of concerts a Symphony likely to excel all the novel numbers of the year.

16

Tribune Dec. 14

JOSE ITURBI CHEERED AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

THE appearance of Jose Iturbi, Spanish pianist, at the Symphony concerts this week is in the nature of another field day—or pair of them—for the audience. It is likely that the remarkable demonstration of Friday afternoon will be repeated this evening when this extraordinary virtuoso and artist, fresh from the Iberian peninsula, repeats the solo part in the Liszt E-flat Concerto.

The audience was considerably excited last Friday afternoon, when Ravel's "Bolero" received its first performance. It was even more excited yesterday. It was not content with fervid applause and even stamping its feet. It raised its voice, or voices—shrill feminine voices, for the most part—to cheer Iturbi.

This demonstration was prompted by one of the finest pianistic exhibitions we have ever been privileged to hear. Iturbi is first of all a great musician and artist, and his playing was never out of perspective, so far as the whole performance was concerned. On the other hand, he realized that this piece was intended even by the composer to be something of a show-piece for the virtuoso. And it was virtuosity of the very finest type, not mere meretricious showmanship, that Iturbi dispensed yesterday.

His performance was the climax of a brilliant concert. A thrilling, colorful rendering of Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" began it. So inspired was the reading of Mr. Koussevitzky and the playing of the orchestra under him that it might have been a first performance as was that of the Bax Symphony in E minor and C major, which followed it.

Arnold Bax could not come, as he had intended, to hear his work played for the first time. If he had, it seems to us he would have been eminently satisfied, for the performance seemed to do justice to the Romantic and mystical ardors of the Celt. There is much fine music in this score—more than can be digested at a single hearing. It stands out among the welter of superficial and insincere modernist pieces as Mount Washington would if transplanted into the Blue Hills.

Respighi's "Pines of Romé" closes the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will speak with a Russian accent in its second concert of the season here at the E. F. Albee Theatre Tuesday night of next week. Works of Tschaikowsky (the "Pathetic" Symphony) and Stravinsky ("Fire Bird" music) are announced for performance, while the third of the three long numbers is by the 18th century Italian, Vivaldi.

Vivaldi, in spite of his age, has never appeared on symphony programs here often enough to force us to regard him as our own familiar friend. Dr. Koussevitzky did revive a movement from the "Four Seasons" concerto in the spring of 1928, but the composer is little known—not even well enough to appear in many encyclopedias.

A violinist, he wrote largely for this instrument, and contributed much to its technical development. "Though by no means an artist of the exalted type of Corelli, his extraordinary fertility as a composer for the violin, his ingenuity in making new combinations and devising new effects, and especially his undoubted influence on the further development of the Concerto-form, give him an important position in the history of violin playing.

"While in the Concerto grossi of Torelli and Corelli the solo violins are treated very much in the same manner as the orchestral violins—the solo passages being usually accompanied by the bass alone—Vivaldi not only gives to the solo violins entirely distinct passages of a much more brilliant character, but he also adds to his orchestra oboes and horns, which not merely double other parts, but have independent passages and phrases to perform—thereby giving the earliest instance of orchestration as applied to the Concerto."

For the Russian Ballet.

Like so many Russian composers, Stravinsky entered another profession before turning to music on the advice of an established leader in the art. Rimsky-Korsakov persuaded him to leave the law, and the young man wrote his first ballet for Diaghilev, whose dancers performed this "Fire Bird" suite. The music was played by the Boston Symphony under the present conductor here in January, 1927. The program notes on that occasion told us that it was composed between the summer of 1909 and May, 1910, and that the scenario was the work of Fokine.

"Fokine's scenario may thus be described: After a short prelude, the curtain rises and the grounds of an old castle are seen. Ivan Tsarevitch, the hero of many tales, in the course of hunting at night, comes to the enchanted garden and sees a beautiful bird with flaming golden plumage. She attempts to pluck fruit of gold from a silver tree. He captures her, but, heeding her entreaties, frees her. In gratitude, she gives him one of her feathers which has magic properties.

"The dawn breaks. Thirteen enchanted princesses appear, coming from the castle. Ivan, hidden, watches them playing with golden apples, and dancing. Fascinated by them, he finally discloses himself. They tell him that the castle belongs to the terrible Katschei, who turns decoyed travellers into stone. The princesses warn Ivan of his fate, but he resolves to enter the castle.

In Castle Perilous.

"Opening the gate, he sees Katschei with his train of grotesque and deformed subjects marching toward him in pompous procession. Katschei attempts to work his spell on Ivan, who is protected, however, by the feather. Ivan summons the Fire-Bird, who causes Katschei and his retinue to dance until they drop exhausted.

"The secret of Katschei's immortality is disclosed to Ivan; the sorcerer keeps an egg in a casket; if this egg should be broken or even injured, he would die. Ivan swings the egg backwards and forwards. Katschei and his crew sway with it. At last the egg is dashed to the ground; Katschei dies; his palace vanishes; the petrified knights come to life; and Ivan, amid great rejoicing, receives the hand of the most beautiful princess.

"According to Ralston in his 'Russian Folk-Tales,' the Fire-Bird is known in its native haunts as the Zhar-Ptitsa. Its name, he says, indicates its close connection with flame or night. Zhar means 'glowing heart, as of a furnace,' and Zhar-Ptitsa means, literally, the Glow-Bird.

Birdly Illumination

"Its appearance corresponds with its designation. Its feathers blaze with golden or silvery sheen, its eyes shine like crystal, it dwells in a golden cage. In the depths of the night it flies into a garden and lights it up as brilliantly as could a thousand burning fires. A single feather from its tail illuminates a dark room. It feeds upon golden apples, which have the power of bestowing youth and beauty.

"Katschei is one of the many incarnations of the dark spirit. Sometimes he is described as altogether serpent-like in form. Sometimes he seems to be of a mixed nature, partly human and partly ophidian, but in some stories he is apparently framed after the fashion of a man." Another version of the apple and serpent story.

"The music describes with an extraordinary wealth of suggestion the various weird figures of the drama, and is of a nature never allowing us to forget that it is fantasy and not life that we are witnessing. . . . Throughout the ballet the music serves as a preparation, by means of the ear, for what the eye is to witness."

The "Pathetic" Sixth

The melancholy Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony brings the evening to a close. So much has been said of the brooding melancholy of this composer and what he meant by it, that whatever is said in addition is almost certain to be considered as futile as what has gone before.

Certainly we cannot think of Tschaikowsky as "the human, with his droppings of soft tears," nor yet speak of "tears from the depths of some divine despair." Perhaps he was only a sensitive man who felt that the evils of life were real and in the ascendant, aware that all is vanity, which he let become a vexation of spirit as well.

Sometimes he seemed like a frail instrument—a lute—that the wind blew over and made to resound to its own mood, while with its humor it put the sensitive strings out of tune, and thus made discord through no fault of the player.

Tschaikowsky never played in the strong C major key of life; rather he set his fancies always to a minor mood, exploring vistas of the vague, the doubtful, the hopelessly aspiring that fell inevitably back towards the pit. But at ...es as in the wonderful 5-4 rhythm ... second movement of our sym... ...tands out against the cruelty ...al Cassandra, rigid and ... pitiless force, awaiting ...man defiance the crash ... must descend when the ...iter decides.

M. C. W.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE RESPONDS

Iturbi, Pianist, Makes Sensation in Liszt's 1st Concerto

Post Dec 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Friday afternoon Symphony Concerts are losing their traditional air of sobriety. Last week it was Ravel's "Bolero" of the protracted crescendo that launched a furore of excitement. Yesterday it was the newly arrived Spanish pianist, Jose Iturbi, bringing to electrifying performance that much-ridden war-horse, Liszt's Concerto in E-flat.

A MASTER OF ELEGANCE

The present musical years, so lean in some respects, are happily not falling behind their predecessors in the production of remarkable pianists. Two seasons ago it was the tornadic Horowitz that inflamed a pair of Symphony audiences; now comes Mr. Iturbi to create yet another sensation.

That the Russian and the Spaniard should be so alike in their power to arouse their listeners and so unlike their methods of doing it is renewed proof of the range and scope of musical performance. The one is dynamic, a super-technician inclined, as his latest Symphony Hall recital suggested, to let his volcanic energies lead him into inartistic excesses. The other, singularly poised and self-controlled, is a supreme master of musical elegance, of rhythmic verve, of clear-cut, crystalline tone.

In Temper of the Day

There is in his playing rare fineness and precision that yet escapes any hint of aridity. Other performances of Liszt's Concerto in Symphony Hall, for example that of Mr. Rosenthal several seasons ago, have had a breadth, a sweep, an overpowering force that was not in Mr. Iturbi's highly polished and sensitive version of yesterday. But the Spaniard's way with the music is more in accord with the temper of our own day, and one more likely to freshen and reanimate a romantic and rhetorical music. Mr. Iturbi, who played a short time ago at the Hotel Statler, is certain sooner or later to give a recital in Symphony Hall, and when he does he should pack that auditorium to the doors.

Besides the stimulating Iturbi, yesterday's concert offered the first performance anywhere of the Second Symphony of Arnold Bax, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky, together with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," in a performance so inflated, exaggerated and over-contrived that, as may sometimes happen, it fell in consequence quite flat, and finally, in a most eloquent performance, Respighi's now popular "Pines of Rome" of the shrilling children, the gloomy catacombs, the phonograph nightingale and the cataclysmic march of Caesar's legions.

In Uncongenial Field

Though his Symphony proved a work of uneven interest and unequal value, Bax is not a composer to be lightly dismissed. Yet it is possible to feel that in his two symphonies, of which the first is the more significant, he is laboring in an uncongenial field.

A moody, poetic, essentially subjective composer, this Celt seems more at home in the symphonic poem than in the symphony, where logic of design the severer, more abstract domain of design and continuity of thought are prime essentials.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

THE new symphony by Arnold Bax, written in two keys, E minor and C major, was performed for the first time anywhere on Dec. 13 in Boston by the symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Although it was written in 1924-25, the composer reserved the production for Mr. Koussevitzky, to whom the work is dedicated.

The composer has said that "there is absolutely no communicable program associated with the music, which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work."

"When the symphonic poems by Bax were played by this orchestra," says Philip Hale in The Boston Herald, "the charge of occasional diffuseness, if not vagueness, was urged against him, while full justice was done to the fine, poetic qualities. It might have been said that he was then lulled at too great length by the enchanting airs he heard in the Faery Hills and in the Garden of Fand. In this symphony even more than in his first symphony played two years ago, there is still, especially in the second movement, the Celtic feeling that is characteristic of many of his works; there are themes, there are harmonies of tender, wistful beauty, not free from a pleasing melancholy, but these pages only relieve and enhance the heroic character of the work as a whole, the defiant pages or those of doubt and questioning until there is at the end submission to the inevitable, if not a lasting peace. These final pages, artfully simple, leading to silence, are among the most eloquent and impressive in the symphony.

"That the audience realizes the strength and the beauty, the originality of invention and expression was shown by the manner in which the symphony was received. Seldom, if ever, has the first performance of a new symphony been so heartily and honestly applauded."

MUSIC

Herald Dec. 14

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. Jose Iturbi, pianist, played for the first time at these concerts. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe." Bax, symphony No. 2 in E minor and C. Liszt, piano concerto, No. 1. Respighi, "The Pines of Rome." The new symphony by Arnold Bax was performed for the first time anywhere. Although it was written in 1924-1925, he reserved the production for Dr. Koussevitzky, to whom the score is dedicated, feeling confident, as he said in a letter, that conducted by him and played by this orchestra the symphony "will receive a finer first performance than any previous work of mine." His confidence was not misplaced. He honored conductor and players by it; the superb performance justified it. In another letter, dated London, Dec. 3, Mr. Bax says: "There is absolutely no communicable 'program' associated with the music which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work." He calls attention to the cyclic character of the form and to the persistence in all the three movements of a three-note figure.

"Severely", "absolute" music — but the symphony is charged with emotion and with contending emotions. By reason of contents, its musical ideas, its treatment of them, the technical workmanship, the strain of mysticism alternating with human warmth, the melodic beauty. The boldness, never experimental, of the harmonic schemes, the ingenuity and the taste displayed in the orchestral dress, this symphony is by far the most important work that has come from England for many years; one of the most important that has come from Europe.

When the symphonic poems by Bax were played by this orchestra the charge of occasional diffuseness, if not vagueness, was urged against him, while full justice was done to the fine, poetic qualities. It might have been said that he was then lulled at too great length by the enchanting airs he heard in the Faery Hills and in the Garden of Fand. In this symphony even more than in his first symphony played two years ago, there is still, especially in the second movement, the Celtic feeling that is characteristic of many of his works; there are themes, there are harmonies of tender, wistful beauty, not free from a pleasing melancholy, but these pages only relieve and enhance the heroic character of the work as a whole, the defiant pages or those of doubt and questioning until there is at the end submission to the inevitable, if not a lasting peace. These final pages, artfully simple, leading to silence, are among the most eloquent and impressive in the symphony.

That the audience realizes the strength and the beauty, the originality of invention and expression was shown by the manner in which the smyphony was received. Seldom, if ever, has the first performance of a new symphony been so heartily and honestly applauded.

Mr. Iturbi, whose playing of concertos by the Mozart and Beethoven aroused enthusiasm in Philadelphia and New York, chose for Boston the "Triangle" concerto by Liszt that had not been placed on a program of these concerts since 1913. His performance was one of dazzling brilliance; nor is this all that is to be said. The concerto itself is much more than a parade piece; it is shrewdly, musically planned, and not only for the glory of a virtuoso; there are pages of genuine and haunting charm that test the soul as well as the fingers of a pianist. The delicacy and poetry of Mr. Iturbi's interpretation of these passages were as conspicuous as his triumphant bravura. Yes, when played as Mr. Iturbi played it, this concerto is exciting; but it is more than an appeal to the nerves. It was a pleasure to find that Mr. Iturbi is not a "specialist," for a specialist in music is a fearsome wild fowl. To excel in the playing of Mozart's music stamps one as a thorough musician of knowledge, taste and charm. This one is indeed, an artist. To excel also in this music of Liszt's awakens further admiration and respect. As remarkable as the piano playing was the orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Iturbi was recalled many times; Dr. Koussevitzky was greeted most warmly when he came on the platform to conduct "The Pines of Rome." Of Respighi's four movements, the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," has the most enduring musical and emotional value. The first movement is conspicuous for its orchestration; the third movement does not gain by the introduction of a gramophone-nightingale; the march of victorious Romans in the Appian way owes its effect only to steadily increasing dynamic force and the anticipation of a thundering climax.

As an introduction to one of the most interesting concerts of several seasons, Weber's overture was performed in an appropriately dramatic manner with due regard to the singing of the suave second theme, and the unearthliness of the mysterious episode for strings.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week's program will comprise Roussel's "Petite Suite." Tournier's "Feerie" prelude and dance for harp (Mr. Zighera) and orchestra; the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

New American works being performed this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Aaron Copland's symphony, a tone poem of Roger Sessions, a tone poem of Werner Josten and Samuel Gardner's "Broadway." Other novelties listed for the season are Prokofieff's Third symphony, Filip Lazar's Concerto Grosso, Honegger's "Bach" suite, Mahler's Ninth symphony, Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's Ninth symphony, Debussy's "Le Martyre de St. Sebastian," and a Spohr suite for winds.

Le Courrier Musicale of recent date announces that Maurice Maréchal, the French 'cellist, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next February, Koussevitzky conducting. There will be heard for the first time Honegger's new concerto for 'cello, written especially for M. Maréchal.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

DEC 15

Boston Symphony Plays for Charity

Plans are under way for a special non-subscription perforamnce by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall Friday afternoon, Jan. 10, at 2.30 o'clock. The proceeds of this concert, made possible through the kindness of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will go to the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc., the High Commission for Refugees League of Nations and the International Anti-Tuberculosis Union.

On the trip which Mrs. Henry P. Loomis, President of the American Socity, recently made through twelve countries to study the existing conditions of Russian exiles she was distressed by the misery and hardship under which these people struggle. When Dr. Koussevitzky learned of the suffering of his compatriots he arranged for a benefit performance for these unfortunate and deserving exiles.

Sun Dec 16

Saturday Supplement

Though the audience on Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall has not yet learned to stamp out its pleasure, it was as fervid over Mr. Iturbi as its predecessor of the matinée. Cheers were its preference as supplement to clapping. Yet if the applauded Spaniard were to return next month for a concert of his own—an hour and half instead of twenty minutes of his "wonderful" playing—would he draw more than half a house? By much Bostonian precedent he would not.

The new Symphony of Bax, impressive in itself and impressively played, fared not so well as on Friday. As it seemed, it baffled many; while no more than a peristent minority called back the conductor and finally brought the orchestra to its feet. Yet Dr. Koussevitzky could do worse than repeat at another pair of concerts a Symphony likely to excel all the novel numbers of the year.

Concert-Chronicle

Harpist's Day

PREPARING a light program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky began it with a "Little Suite" by Roussel. Hearing the piece, he found it unsuited to his purpose and deferred it to a later pair of concerts. For it he substitutes two familiar Russian numbers—the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina," Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-poem, "Sadko." For new piece there remains only Tournier's "Faerie," with subtitle, "Prelude and Dance for Harp." It will be played—the strings of the orchestra assisting—by Bernard Zighera, familiar figure "at these concerts" with either harp or piano.

About "Faerie," A. H. M. sends his customary note: Marcel Tournier, one of whose chamber-pieces was played last month in Boston at a Flute-Players' concert, is professor of the harp in the Conservatory at Paris. He was born in 1879; received a "first prize" at the Conservatory in 1899; won the "Prix de Rome" in 1909, and succeeded Hasselmans as professor in 1912. He writes extensively and pleasingly for his chosen instrument. . . . The chief interest of "Faerie" lies in the solo-part. The orchestral score is slight. The harmonies, to the present-day ear, are only mildly dissonant, as becomes a piece written well before the late war. After introductory measures a very simple melody forms the basis of many harp figurations, arpeggios, broken chords, devices which sound well and are the natural language of the instrument. One becomes aware that "harp-style," as a is called, has much in common with "prelude-style" as laid down by many a master since the days of Sebastian Bach. The Prelude runs through a "Très modéré," the dance begins with an "Allegretto scherzando." There are measures of obvious dance-accompaniment, and a sprightly dance-figure emerges, the chief theme of the dance. Several times the music broadens to lyric utterance. Each time the dance-theme returns. Once, such broadening, rising to greater heights than before, carries the significant direction "Chaleureux." At the close there are again the characteristic harp-arpeggios, a moment of pianissimo, and then a steady climax and end.

perfect lips, and she is mighty good

HARP SOLOIST PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

THERE is no recognizable connection between this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Yuletide season. It is just another symphony concert, and even the audience at the Friday matinee looked upon it in this light, for it came in customary numbers instead of leaving—as a pre-Christmas concert generally does—huge gaps of vacant seats.

Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the orchestra, was soloist in a piece called "Feerie" by his former teacher in Paris, Marcel Lucien Tournier. Originally written for harp and string quartet and now receiving its first performance with orchestra, the piece is written in the politest impressionistic style. It enabled, however, Zighera to disclose what we suppose is a very fluent technique.

The applause following this performance gave a slight measure of vitality to the audience, which was otherwise languorous. It was as if the people had assembled for a weekly duty and then—in the manner of a music critic—dared the performers to please them. Certainly there was brilliant playing to excite an average assemblage, notably the performance of the Second Suite drawn from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

Russian music, represented by Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," began the concert. And a fellow-Slav, Dvorak, ended it with the "New World" symphony. This work, which once caused a critical war as to the sources of its themes, has been and is still much overplayed elsewhere. Fortunately that is not the case in Boston, where it has not been heard at the symphony concerts in years.

As a result we can still take joy in the honest emotion of this piece, in its beautiful melodies and in its occasionally inspired orchestration. Mr. Koussevitzky labored with it as with a work of love. The orchestra, however, fell short of its best performances.

CHEERFUL MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Zighera, Harpist, as Soloist, Delights Hearers

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon a programme of music predominantly light, brilliant, cheerful and familiar suited well the holiday season. There was a touch of relative novelty, too, in the appearance of Bernard Zighera, accomplished first harpist of the orchestra, by the little known French lude and dance for harp with orchestra by the little known French composer, Marcel Tournier.

MOUSSORGSKY'S PRELUDE

In detail this amiable list assembled Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's musical picture, "Sadko," the piece by Tournier aforementioned, the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," and lastly Dvorak's Symphony "From the New World," hitherto absent from the Symphony programmes since the coming of Dr. Koussevitzky. Music, all of this, in which conductor and orchestra naturally excel, and played yesterday with remarkable brilliance and finish. That the audience received some of it rather coolly may be attributed in part to a lack of contrast and diversity of appeal.

Viewed in retrospect, the most vital piece of the afternoon was Moussorgsky's prelude. Notable composers each were Modest Petrovitch Moussorgsky and Nicolai Andreievitch Rimsky-Korsakov, but in combination they surpassed in certain respects their separate selves. Let Moussorgsky furnish the musical ideas and Rimsky-Korsakov the instrumentation, as in this prelude to "Khovantchina" or in "Boris," and there emerges a work of which neither would have been capable single-handed. "Sadko" is, of course, not a composition by which Rimsky-Korsakov may fairly be judged. As the first Russian symphonic poem it is of greater historic than actual importance, despite much in the score that is undeniably attractive. The essential Rimsky was to come later.

Monsieur Tournier's piece, to continue, is of itself of little interest, but it afforded Mr. Zighera a chance to display his undoubted prowess in the full glare of the spotlight, and the audience, which always welcomes a soloist, applauded him heartily.

The performance yesterday of Ravel's Suite was one of extraordinary virtuosity, of glowing and effulgent tone. Yet it fell upon ears relatively indifferent. Is it not possible that Ravel's music in general and "Daphnis and Chloe" in particular, has of late years been played over-frequently in Symphony Hall?

The New World Again

Finally, to exemplify the tragic mortality of music, there came Dvorak with a symphony once admired, not only in the new world which inspired it, but likewise in the old, and that after but 36 years has become scarcely more than an exaltation of the trite and obvious.

In justice to the composer as well as to the performance, however, it must be added that a portion of yesterday's audience found such pleasure in this symphony that it recalled the conductor to the stage and prevailed upon him to bring the players to their feet.

Bernard Zighera, the young first harp of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who is to be the soloist at the next pair of concerts, was born in Paris in April 1904, of a Roumanian father and a Polish mother. It is an interesting fact that although his parents were not particularly musical, Zighera has two brothers who have won distinction rivalling his in the musical world. Alfred Zighera is one of the players in the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Leon Zighera is a violin virtuoso in Europe.

Bernard Zighera studied at the Paris Conservatory under Tournier, the famous harpist whose composition is to be played next Friday and Saturday. The piece, entitled "Feerie," was played in February, 1926, at the Theatre de L'Ouvre at a concert by the quartet of Leon Zighera, which bore his name. The coming performance, however, is the first with full orchestral accompaniment. Bernard Zighera took first prize both in harp and piano at the Paris Conservatory, and he has played important piano parts in Boston Symphony concerts, but now concentrates all his energies to his duties as first harp, an increasingly important position in modern music.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Moussorgsky, prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina," Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko" Tournier, "Ferie" —prelude and dance for harp and orchestra (first performance with orchestra). Ravel, second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe." Dvorak, symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

Without doubt Rimsky-Korsakov, editing Moussorgsky's score left unfinished at his death, rewriting, adding, cutting, turned this prelude into a thing of beauty chiefly by the charm of his instrumentation. It would be interesting to see Moussorgsky's sketch for this Prelude as it would be to hear Rimsky-Korsakov's original version of "Sadko"—which was composed as early as 1867. The revision was in 1891 and the reviser had learned much in the years between. Yesterday the Prelude stirred the imagination of the hearer and not only because it is associated with a scene in the Kremlin's Red Square. One not knowing the opera might be curious concerning the significance of solemn strains that stand out from a purely pictorial background. Kremlin or no Kremlin, the music was a pleasure to ear and mind, and Philistines would not be alone in saying: "That's what music is for." Down went Sadko like McGinty to the bottom of the sea. He played for the dancers there. The music is picturesque, though it does not show Rimsky at his best.

Ravel's Suite is if it had been planned with the express purpose of displaying the euphony, sonority, brilliance and clasticity of the remarkable orchestra conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. On can easily think that led by a respectable but prosaic man of routine experience the music itself might occasionally seem purposeless, if not trite, especially as it does not in the concert hall accompany action in an appropriate stage setting. As played under the conditions stated—a virtuoso orchestra with an understanding, poetic, magnetic conductor in full sympathy with the composer—it is to be so beautiful in the actual performance?"

David played the harp until Saul threw a javelin at him, but David probably improvised. Some of us remember the dreary compositions that skilled harpists were obliged to play, for composers of high standing wrote little for them, and the harpists themselves when they were forced to compose thought first of their own technical ability and shaped their music accordingly. The instrument was favored in drawing rooms at a time when a woman with sculptural arms, a neck of dazzling whiteness—blonde harpists were preferred—strummed the wires and sang, not always tunefully, "Love not, ye hapless sons of clay"—and attentive swains would in sugared compliments beg another song—"Touch the harp gently, my pretty Louise." But composers today take the harp seriously and write seriously for it, especially as an orchestral instrument. A harpist is now expected to be a musician as well as a master of his instrument. Tournier's "Feerie" is written by a musician, who is also a harpist and a teacher of the harp. He may well be proud of his pupil, Mr. Zighera, whose musical proficiency and technical skill were warmly and justly applauded yesterday.

Dvorak's symphony, which once excited controversy, had not been played here by the Symphony Orchestra since March, 1920. Today there is little or no talk about its origin, which at the time the symphony was first performed was misunderstood, especially by those who shouted its praise, screaming: "It's 100 per cent. American." The symphony is popular. The tunes are obvious. Some of them can be hummed and whistled as one is leaving the hall. There are otherwise interesting pages in the work. But when Dvorak was on his native soil, he rose to a greater height as a composer, than when he composed an oratorio for England and a symphony for the United States. The performance yesterday was all that could be asked, and the audience was greatly pleased.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is thus announced: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven, symphony No. B flat major; Bloch, "Schelomo" Solomon) Hebrew rhapsody for violoncello (Felix Salmond), and orchestra; Gliere, "The Saporotchky Cossacks"; symphonic tone picture-ballet (first time here).

AUSTRAL SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Wagner Program Given to Aid Pension Fund

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its annual concerts in aid of the pension fund for retired players yesterday afternoon. An audience which filled Symphony Hall applauded orchestra, conductor and the soloist, Florence Austral, at every opportunity. Miss Austral's voice, one of the greatest this generation has heard, and her admirable singing of three Wagner excerpts, the best Wagner singing heard in Boston in concert in many a long year, made this concert memorable.

Dr Koussevitzky arranged a program which illustrated the development of Wagner's genius. It began with the overture and "Senta's Ballad," from "The Flying Dutchman." The other numbers were the Bacchanale and Elisabeth's "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," the "Ride of the Valkyries," and the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan."

As always it seemed incredible that the same man who, in the 1840's, wrote "The Flying Dutchman," with its commonplace harmonies and noisy orchestration, could 20 years later rise to the height of the excerpts from "Meistersinger" and "Tristan." In the work of no other great composer is there such a gulf between his early and his later music.

Miss Austral has one of the finest dramatic soprano voices now to be heard anywhere in the world, with a phenomenal volume and a ringing intensity of quality that make it almost ideally suited to Wagner. She uses her voice with musical and dramatic intelligence of a very high order. Nobody within the memory of persons under 40 has sung "Dich, Theure Halle" and the "Liebestod" in Boston, either in opera or in concert, so well as Miss Austral sang them yesterday.

It is strange that so great a singer, with many outstanding successes in Wagner in European opera houses to her credit, should not have been heard in opera in the United States. The only Wagnerian soprano comparable to her whom Boston has heard in recent years is Frida Leider, now an ornament of the Chicago Civic Opera. But Miss Leider's voice has not the phenomenal power of Miss Austral's.

Enthusiasm over a great singer, in a day when great singers with great voices are the rarest of visitors to our concert halls, should not lead anyone into taking as a mere matter of course the greatness of the Boston Syphony Orchestra. The other day the pianist Iturbi remarked to an interviewer that three of the four finest orchestras in the world were in America.

The four greatest orchestras, according to Iturbi, whose triumphantly successful career has brought him solo appearances with orchestras the world over, are the Boston Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, New York Philharmonic, and Amsterdam Concertgebouw. He tactfully refrained from ranking the four in order of excellence.

The Boston Symphony under Dr Koussevitzky has by common consent regained its proud position among the world's greatest, unsurpassed anywhere. Its playing yesterday, as always these days, proved its right to be counted among the most superb of the instruments upon which celebrated conductors perform.

Wagner, however, is not a composer in whose music Dr Koussevitzky excels. Yesterday the latter part of the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," and the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" were taken at a pace strangely slow and in a mood inappropriately languishing. Nor was the interpretation of the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" an artistic triumph comparable to those scored by Dr Koussevitzky in such things as Ravel's Bolero and Tchaikovsky's "1812." The conductor was at his best yesterday in the sound and fury of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. P. R.

HARP SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bernard Zighera Plays Tournier's "Feerie"

Dr Koussevitzky Interprets Dvorak's "New World" Symphony

Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony, appeared as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, playing a composition by his teacher, Marcel Tournier, professor in the Paris Conservatoire, entitled "Feerie." The program, altered from that announced in advance, began with the overture to Musorgsky's opera "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko." It concluded with Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, which Dr Koussevitzky had not previously conducted in Boston.

Mr Zighera, as those who have listened to his playing in the orchestra will not need be told, is a fine harpist. Tournier in the little prelude and dance entitled "Feerie" has written music agreeable enough to listen to if lacking in musical distinction. It goes without saying that the performer is given ample opportunity to display his virtuosity. There were many recalls from a pleased and demonstrative audience.

The general public is unquestionably delighted at the chance to listen to an occasional harp solo. Yet one cannot but feel the harp to be a monotonous instrument when brought into prominence throughout a piece, effective as it is in its usual subordinate place in the orchestra. One had as lief hear a solo on the contrabassoon as a harp solo.

The prelude to "Khovantchina," which depicts dawn in the Kremlin at Moscow, is music which gives Dr Koussevitzky full scope for his remarkable gift of dramatic and pictorial interpretation. The listener, however skeptical he may be about the possibility of tone painting, cannot but be impressed by a reading as eloquent as yesterday's. That Dr Koussevitzky fully believes in the possibility of evoking pictures and stories in the minds of listeners to music seems certain. Such pieces as this prelude almost invariably show him at his best.

Yesterday's program was, as more than one of Dr Koussevitzky's programs this season have been, apparently chosen with a view to artistic unity. This way of planning a concert with a view to its total effect on the listener, instead of grouping pieces on a program haphazard, is commendable. Slavic composers of the last quarter of the 19th century occupied the whole concert, save for the brief and musically not highly significant harp solo.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," an attempt to make music tell an elaborate Russian legend about a shipwrecked mariner, sounded yesterday curiously old fashioned. Not all Dr Koussevitzky's eloquence and fervor could make one think of the legend that suggested the piece and ignore its defects as music, its meaningless repetition of themes which lack the intrinsic interest of those in "Scheherezade," its relatively colorless orchestration.

Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, about which commentators discoursed so learnedly and so lengthily when it was an epoch-making novelty, back in the 1890s, also sounded very old-fashioned yesterday. Its composer, a Czech peasant, had an apparent inexhaustible, but wholly naive and unlitical musical gift. For this symphony he used themes which, though holly his own inventions, suggest at mes the American Negro tunes he ard during his sojourn in the United ates. Many of them are sufficiently gratiating to have won for this symony wide popularity. Its slow ovement has become what some iblishers would call "a popular clas-." The orchestration, though simple, also highly effective. But again the ndency to meaningless repetition, id the lack of elaborate musical ructure that are the universal deets of Slavic music have now beme painfully obvious.

Compare this symphony with one of aydn's. Haydn was also of peasant origin, and, as Sir Henry Hadow has shown, strongly influenced by Croatian folk tunes. Haydn's music seems like Dvorak's to have been written with effortless ease. But Haydn had a far subtler and finer musical gift than Dvorak. He could not merely invent lovely themes, he could build from them admirable and by no means naive musical structures. Haydn is still a genuine classic, which merely means that his music can be heard repeatedly with permanent and increasing delight. But Dvorak and Rimsky have begun already to pall on many musical listeners, so that their music may not last.

Dr Koussevitzky had his own notions, as usual, about tempi and dynamics. He made of all these pieces something eloquent, something impressive, something persuasive, but sometimes did it by violating the letter and spirit of the printed texts. He claims for the interpreter a greater and more prominent role than one persuades that nothing should stand between composer and listener is willing to grant him.

The program announced for next week includes Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Bloch's "Solomon," for 'cello and orchestra, and Gliere's "Saporotchky Cossacks." The soloist is to be Felix Salmond. P. R.

Concert-Chronicle

Harpist's Day

PREPARING a light program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky began it with a "Little Suite" by Roussel. Hearing the piece, he found it unsuited to his purpose and deferred it to a later pair of concerts. For it he substitutes two familiar Russian numbers—the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina," Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-poem, "Sadko." For new piece there remains only Tournier's "Faerie," with subtitle, "Prelude and Dance for Harp." It will be played—the strings of the orchestra assisting—by Bernard Zighera, familiar figure "at these concerts" with either harp or piano.

About "Faerie," A. H. M. sends his customary note: Marcel Tournier, one of whose chamber-pieces was played last month in Boston at a Flute-Players' concert, is professor of the harp in the Conservatory at Paris. He was born in 1879; received a "first prize" at the Conservatory in 1899; won the "Prix de Rome" in 1909, and succeeded Hasselmans as professor in 1912. He writes extensively and pleasingly for his chosen instrument. . . . The chief interest of "Faerie" lies in the solo-part. The orchestral score is slight. The harmonies, to the present-day ear, are only mildly dissonant, as becomes a piece written well before the late war. After introductory measures a very simple melody forms the basis of many harp figurations, arpeggios, broken chords, devices which sound well and are the natural language of the instrument. One becomes aware that "harp-style," as a is called, has much in common with "prelude-style" as laid down by many a master since the days of Sebastian Bach. The Prelude runs through a "Très modére," the dance begins with an "Allegretto scherzando." There are measures of obvious dance-accompaniment, and a sprightly dance-figure emerges, the chief theme of the dance. Several times the music broadens to lyric utterance. Each time the dance-theme returns. Once, such broadening, rising to greater heights than before, carries the significant direction "Chaleureux." At the close there are again the characteristic harp-arpeggios, a moment of pianissimo, and then a steady climax and end.

perfect lips, and she is mighty goo

HARP SOLOIST PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

THERE is no recognizable connection between this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Yuletide season. It is just another symphony concert, and even the audience at the Friday matinee looked upon it in this light, for it came in customary numbers instead of leaving—as a pre-Christmas concert generally does—huge gaps of vacant seats.

Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the orchestra, was soloist in a piece called "Feerie" by his former teacher in Paris, Marcel Lucien Tournier. Originally written for harp and string quartet and now receiving its first performance with orchestra, the piece is written in the politest impressionistic style. It enabled, however, Zighera to disclose what we suppose is a very fluent technique.

The applause following this performance gave a slight measure of vitality to the audience, which was otherwise languorous. It was as if the people had assembled for a weekly duty and then —in the manner of a music critic —dared the performers to please them. Certainly there was brilliant playing to excite an average assemblage, notably the performance of the Second Suite drawn from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

Russian music, represented by Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," began the concert. And a fellow-Slav, Dvorak, ended it with the "New World" symphony. This work, which once caused a critical war as to the sources of its themes, has been and is still much overplayed elsewhere. Fortunately that is not the case in Boston, where it has not been heard at the symphony concerts in years.

As a result we can still take joy in the honest emotion of this piece, in its beautiful melodies and in its occasionally inspired orchestration. Mr. Koussevitzky labored with it as with a work of love. The orchestra, however, fell short of its best performances.

CHEERFUL MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Zighera, Harpist, as Soloist, Delights Hearers

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon a programme of music predominantly light, brilliant, cheerful and familiar suited well the holiday season. There was a touch of relative novelty, too, in the appearance of Bernard Zighera, accomplished first harpist of the orchestra, by the little known French lude and dance for harp with orchestra by the little known French composer, Marcel Tournier.

MOUSSORGSKY'S PRELUDE

In detail this amiable list assembled Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's musical picture, "Sadko," the piece by Tournier aforementioned, the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," and lastly Dvorak's Symphony "From the New World," hitherto absent from the Symphony programmes since the coming of Dr. Koussevitzky. Music, all of this, in which conductor and orchestra naturally excel, and played yesterday with remarkable brilliance and finish. That the audience received some of it rather coolly may be attributed in part to a lack of contrast and diversity of appeal.

Viewed in retrospect, the most vital piece of the afternoon was Moussorgsky's prelude. Notable composers each were Modest Petrovitch Moussorgsky and Nicolai Andreievitch Rimsky-Korsakov, but in combination they surpassed in certain respects their separate selves. Let Moussorgsky furnish the musical ideas and Rimsky-Korsakov the instrumentation, as in this prelude to "Khovantchina" or in "Boris," and there emerges a work of which neither would have been capable single-handed. "Sadko" is, of course, not a composition by which Rimsky-Korsakov may fairly be judged. As the first Russian symphonic poem it is of greater historic than actual importance, despite much in the score that is undeniably attractive. The essential Rimsky was to come later.

Monsieur Tournier's piece, to continue, is of itself of little interest, but it afforded Mr. Zighera a chance to display his undoubted prowess in the full glare of the spotlight, and the audience, which always welcomes a soloist, applauded him heartily.

The performance yesterday of Ravel's Suite was one of extraordinary virtuosity, of glowing and effulgent tone. Yet it fell upon ears relatively indifferent. Is it not possible that Ravel's music in general and "Daphnis and Chloe" in particular, has of late years been played over-frequently in Symphony Hall?

The New World Again

Finally, to exemplify the tragic mortality of music, there came Dvorak with a symphony once admired, not only in the new world which inspired it, but likewise in the old, and that after but 36 years has become scarcely more than an exaltation of the trite and obvious.

In justice to the composer as well as to the performance, however, it must be added that a portion of yesterday's audience found such pleasure in this symphony that it recalled the conductor to the stage and prevailed upon him to bring the players to their feet.

Globe Dec

Bernard Zighera, the young first harp of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who is to be the soloist at the next pair of concerts, was born in Paris in April 1904, of a Roumanian father and a Polish mother. It is an interesting fact that although his parents were not particularly musical, Zighera has two brothers who have won distinction rivalling his in the musical world. Alfred Zighera is one of the players in the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Leon Zighera is a violin virtuoso in Europe.

Bernard Zighera studied at the Paris Conservatory under Tournier, the famous harpist whose composition is to be played next Friday and Saturday. The piece, entitled "Feerie," was played in February, 1926, at the Theatre de L'Ouvre at a concert by the quartet of Leon Zighera, which bore his name. The coming performance, however, is the first with full orchestral accompaniment. Bernard Zighera took first prize both in harp and piano at the Paris Conservatory, and he has played important piano parts in Boston Symphony concerts, but now concentrates all his energies to his duties as first harp, an increasingly important position in modern music.

MUSIC

Record Dec 27

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Moussorgsky, prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina," Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko" Tournier, "Ferie"—prelude and dance for harp and orchestra (first performance with orchestra). Ravel, second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe." Dvorak, symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

Without doubt Rimsky-Korsakov, editing Moussorgsky's score left unfinished at his death, rewriting, adding, cutting, turned this prelude into a thing of beauty chiefly by the charm of his instrumentation. It would be interesting to see Moussorgsky's sketch for this Prelude as it would be to hear Rimsky-Korsakov's original version of "Sadko"—which was composed as early as 1867. The revision was in 1891 and the reviser had learned much in the years between. Yesterday the Prelude stirred the imagination of the hearer and not only because it is associated with a scene in the Kremlin's Red Square. One not knowing the opera might be curious concerning the significance of solemn strains that stand out from a purely pictorial background. Kremlin or no Kremlin, the music was a pleasure to ear and mind, and Philistines would not be alone in saying: "That's what music is for." Down went Sadko like McGinty to the bottom of the sea. He played for the dancers there. The music is picturesque, though it does not show Rimsky at his best.

Ravel's Suite is if it had been planned with the express purpose of displaying the euphony, sonority, brilliance and clasticity of the remarkable orchestra conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. On can easily think that led by a respectable but prosaic man of routine experience the music itself might occasionally seem purposeless, if not trite, especially as it does not in the concert hall accompany action in an appropriate stage setting. As played under the conditions stated—a virtuoso orchestra with an understanding, poetic, magnetic conductor in full sympathy with the composer—the music has kaleidescopic beauty, the performance is incomparable. One might ask whether in this instance a conductor and his men do not with the material produce such glowing effects that Ravel, if he were listening, might say to himself: "Did I really write this music? Did I expect it to be so beautiful in the actual performance?"

David played the harp until Saul threw a javelin at him, but David probably improvised. Some of us remember the dreary compositions that skilled harpists were obliged to play, for composers of high standing wrote little for them, and the harpists themselves when they were forced to compose thought first of their own technical ability and shaped their music accordingly. The instrument was favored in drawing rooms at a time when a woman with sculptural arms, a neck of dazzling whiteness—blonde harpists were preferred—strummed the wires and sang, not always tunefully, "Love not, ye hapless sons of clay"—and attentive swains would in sugared compliments beg another song—"Touch the harp gently, my pretty Louise." But composers today take the harp seriously and write seriously for it, especially as an orchestral instrument. A harpist is now expected to be a musician as well as a master of his instrument. Tournier's "Feerie" is written by a musician, who is also a harpist and a teacher of the harp. He may well be proud of his pupil, Mr. Zighera, whose musical proficiency and technical skill were warmly and justly applauded yesterday.

Dvorak's symphony, which once excited controversy, had not been played here by the Symphony Orchestra since March, 1920. Today there is little or no talk about its origin, which at the time the symphony was first performed was misunderstood especially by those who shouted its praise, screaming: "It's 100 per cent. American." The symphony is popular. The tunes are obvious. Some of them can be hummed and whistled as one is leaving the hall. There are otherwise interesting pages in the work. But when Dvorak was on his native soil, he rose to a greater height as a composer, than when he composed an oratorio for England and a symphony for the United States. The performance yesterday was all that could be asked, and the audience was greatly pleased.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is thus announced: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven, symphony No. 4, B flat major; Bloch, "Schelomo" (Solomon) Hebrew rhapsody for violoncello (Felix Salmond), and orchestra; Gliere, "The Saporotchky Cossacks"; symphonic tone picture-ballet (first time here).

est this generation has heard, and her admirable singing of three Wagner excerpts, the best Wagner singing heard in Boston in concert in many a long year, made this concert memorable.

Dr Koussevitzky arranged a program which illustrated the development of Wagner's genius. It began with the overture and "Senta's Ballad," from "The Flying Dutchman." The other numbers were the Bacchanale and Elisabeth's "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser," the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," the "Ride of the Valkyries," and the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan."

As always it seemed incredible that the same man who, in the 1840's, wrote "The Flying Dutchman," with its commonplace harmonies and noisy orchestration, could 20 years later rise to the height of the excerpts from "Meistersinger" and "Tristan." In the work of no other great composer is there such a gulf between his early and his later music.

Miss Austral has one of the finest dramatic soprano voices now to be heard anywhere in the world, with a phenomenal volume and a ringing intensity of quality that make it almost ideally suited to Wagner. She uses her voice with musical and dramatic intelligence of a very high order. Nobody within the memory of persons under 40 has sung "Dich, Theure Halle" and the "Liebestod" in Boston, either in opera or in concert, so well as Miss Austral sang them yesterday.

It is strange that so great a singer, with many outstanding successes in Wagner in European opera houses to her credit, should not have been heard in opera in the United States. The only Wagnerian soprano comparable to her whom Boston has heard in recent years is Frida Leider, now an ornament of the Chicago Civic Opera. But Miss Leider's voice has not the phenomenal power of Miss Austral's.

Enthusiasm over a great singer, in a day when great singers with great voices are the rarest of visitors to our concert halls, should not lead anyone into taking as a mere matter of course the greatness of the Boston Syphony Orchestra. The other day the pianist Iturbi remarked to an interviewer that three of the four finest orchestras in the world were in America.

The four greatest orchestras, according to Iturbi, whose triumphantly successful career has brought him solo appearances with orchestras the world over, are the Boston Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, New York Philharmonic, and Amsterdam Concertgeboeuw. He tactfully refrained from ranking the four in order of excellence.

The Boston Symphony under Dr Koussevitzky has by common consent regained its proud position among the world's greatest, unsurpassed anywhere. Its playing yesterday, as always these days, proved its right to be counted among the most superb of the instruments upon which celebrated conductors perform.

Wagner, however, is not a composer in whose music Dr Koussevitzky excels. Yesterday the latter part of the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," and the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" were taken at a pace strangely slow and in a mood inappropriately languishing. Nor was the interpretation of the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" an artistic triumph comparable to those scored by Dr Koussevitzky in such things as Ravel's Bolero and Tchaikovsky's "1812." The conductor was at his best yesterday in the sound and fury of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. P. R.

STOUGHTON, Dec 29—In one of two automobile accidents here tonight, Miss Laura Malinda A. Robichaud, 21, of this town was seriously injured and her name was placed on the danger list.

Lucier's body was ordered removed to a local undertaking establishment by Medical Examiner Albert J. McRea.

STOUGHTON WOMAN KILLED BY TAXICAB

HARP SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bernard Zighera Plays Tournier's "Feerie"

Dr Koussevitzky Interprets Dvorak's "New World" Symphony

Globe Dec 27

Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony, appeared as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, playing a composition by his teacher, Marcel Tournier, professor in the Paris Conservatoire, entitled "Feerie." The program, altered from that announced in advance, began with the overture to Musorgsky's opera "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko." It concluded with Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, which Dr Koussevitzky had not previously conducted in Boston.

Mr Zighera, as those who have listened to his playing in the orchestra will not need be told, is a fine harpist. Tournier in the little prelude and dance entitled "Feerie" has written music agreeable enough to listen to if lacking in musical distinction. It goes without saying that the performer is given ample opportunity to display his virtuosity. There were many recalls from a pleased and demonstrative audience.

The general public is unquestionably delighted at the chance to listen to an occasional harp solo. Yet one cannot but feel the harp to be a monotonous instrument when brought into prominence throughout a piece, effective as it is in its usual subordinate place in the orchestra. One had as lief hear a solo on the contrabassoon as a harp solo.

The prelude to "Khovantchina," which depicts dawn in the Kremlin at Moscow, is music which gives Dr Koussevitzky full scope for his remarkable gift of dramatic and pictorial interpretation. The listener, however skeptical he may be about the possibility of tone painting, cannot but be impressed by a reading as eloquent as yesterday's. That Dr Koussevitzky fully believes in the possibility of evoking pictures and stories in the minds of listeners to music seems certain. Such pieces as this prelude almost invariably show him at his best.

Yesterday's program was, as more than one of Dr Koussevitzky's programs this season have been, apparently chosen with a view to artistic unity. This way of planning a concert with a view to its total effect on the listener, instead of grouping pieces on a program haphazard, is commendable. Slavic composers of the last quarter of the 19th century occupied the whole concert, save for the brief and musically not highly significant harp solo.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," an attempt to make music tell an elaborate Russian legend about a shipwrecked mariner, sounded yesterday curiously old fashioned. Not all Dr Koussevitzky's eloquence and fervor could make one think of the legend that suggested the piece and ignore its defects as music, its meaningless repetition of themes which lack the intrinsic interest of those in "Scheherezade," its relatively colorless orchestration.

Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, about which commentators discoursed so learnedly and so lengthily when it was an epoch-making novelty, back in the 1890s, also sounded very old-fashioned yesterday. Its composer, a Czech peasant, had an apparent inexhaustible, but wholly naive and unlyrical musical gift. For this symphony he used themes which, though wholly his own inventions, suggest at times the American Negro tunes he heard during his sojourn in the United States. Many of them are sufficiently ingratiating to have won for this symphony wide popularity. Its slow movement has become what some publishers would call "a popular classic." The orchestration, though simple, is also highly effective. But again the tendency to meaningless repetition, and the lack of elaborate musical structure that are the universal defects of Slavic music have now become painfully obvious.

Compare this symphony with one of Haydn's. Haydn was also of peasant origin, and, as Sir Henry Hadow has shown, strongly influenced by Croatian folk tunes. Haydn's music seems like Dvorak's to have been written with effortless ease. But Haydn had a far subtler and finer musical gift than Dvorak. He could not merely invent lovely themes, he could build from them admirable and by no means naive musical structures. Haydn is still a genuine classic, which merely means that his music can be heard repeatedly with permanent and increasing delight. But Dvorak and Rimsky have begun already to pall on many musical listeners, so that their music may not last.

Dr Koussevitzky had his own notions, as usual, about tempi and dynamics. He made of all these pieces something eloquent, something impressive, something persuasive, but sometimes did it by violating the letter and spirit of the printed texts. He claims for the interpreter a greater and more prominent role than one persuades that nothing should stand between composer and listener is willing to grant him.

The program announced for next week includes Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Bloch's "Solomon," for 'cello and orchestra, and Gliere's "Saporotchky Cossacks." The soloist is to be Felix Salmond. P. R.

A Matinee Of Bon-Bons and Sweet Sounds

Dr. Koussevitzky with Mr. Zighera and His Harp To Assist

WHAT an afternoon of bon-bons . . . It was a stray remark from the corridors after yesterday's concert at Symphony Hall. Which corridors are to the observant a treasure house of reactions, a mine of points of view. And if one of the observant perchance has the pleasant duty of making "copy" of programs and performances, companies of hearers and responses from those hearers, those same corridors may become for him a veritable Bible of texts. And thus for the day a "text" has been chosen.

Bon-bons—confections; let us see. In the course of the afternoon twice the rising dawn was evoked; once the surface of a gentle sea yielded its picture; lovers made sport to the tones of a liquid flute; while other beings, product of romantic imaginings, held court at the bottom of the sea; a shining harp was brought to stand beside the conductor for all to see and hear; and lately, a string of "tunes" was made by clever hands into a symphony. Or, for the prosacic record—the rising dawn once was prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina"; again it was first of the excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," which also yielded the silver flute and the pastoral dancers; the sea and the goings-on beneath the sea were Rimsky-Korsakov's "musical picture," "Sadko"; upon the golden harp Mr. Zighera ably played Monsieur Tournier's "Féerie"; and the symphony which was also "tunes," was Dr. Antonin Dvorak's symphony, No. 5 in E minor, better known as the "New World Symphony:"

Thus ran a pleasant afternoon, with not a thing to disturb the most timid. Yes, there were climaxes; no music can proceed without its periodic ebb and flow, its heights and depths. But these heights were not the towering Rockies with bold crags and gouged canyons; these were the older Alleghenies, with peaks eroded and valleys filled in with the wash from the mountain-tops. Or, to change violently the figure and resort to homely simile, these climaxes scarce caused a tempest in a teapot, they were rather the natural rise and fall of a thermometer on a calm fleckless summer's day—brought indoors in mid-December.

And yet—one should pause a bit. Why should this little old year of 1929 thus complacently deliver itself of its smug assurances? A decade or two, a mere score of years or two, have wrought mighty change. Count back only two years more than a decade and Boston was first hearing its "Daphnis and Chloe," and oldsters were sitting on needles and youngsters were straightening their spines at its audacities, for in 1918 it was in the very vanguard of the "advanced"; and count back a half-decade farther and this same ballet brought dissension between composer and producer, Ravel and Diaghilev. Bon-bon indeed! Or go back less than two score of years, within the easy memory of many who sit before the orchestra on Fridays (less who sit there on Saturdays), and another of these "bon-bons" is a bone of contention. The program-book yesterday was full of reflections of the battle of pen against pen. The learned were trying to discover whether the Bohemian Dr. Dvorak had used negro tunes for the making of an "American" symphony; leaving in the background the more important question of whether a Bohemian can, in the very nature of the case, write "American" music, and to what extent Negroid melodies are indeed "American." Which dissensions may well be allowed to rest in peace. The point being that within the easy span of a single lifetime this symphony was as much and perhaps more an issue than is at present the latest problem-work of a Stravinsky or a Honegger or a Schoenberg. Nor does one have to go back to the eighteen-nineties for such opinion. Our young lions will roar to be reminded that not later than 1918 one of the best of commentators from the ranks of the teaching fraternity thus delivered himself on the subject of the last measures of this symphony: "The end comes with the savagest, most ear-devastating harmonies, like the cries of lost souls." And now the corridors of Symphony hall call it a "bon-bon."

Truth to tell, Dr. Koussevitzky, in the assembling of this program was but exercising the same catholicity in program-making which he has shown during his entire stay in Boston. It may be exercised in many ways. The component parts of an audience are various. While one is agreeably stimulated, another is painfully lacerated; while one smilingly remembers the good old days, another is lulled to sleep. Both may be satisfied by placing numbers of both kinds on a single program. Or, some programs may be for the one group while others are for the other. The present generation places possibly undue emphasis upon suspense and excitement; it has often had its day in Symphony Hall. An older generation prefers wistfulness, and memories, and pleasant sounds; it had its day yesterday. Certainly one in ten years (it was last played in 1920) the "New World Symphony" deserves hearing. And how best frame it than with music of not too great disparity with it? That the afternoon was enjoyed was evident from the hand-clapping at the end. For while suburbanites and modernists (what a combination!) were rushing to the doors a large company ardently recalled conductor time after time until he bade the orchestra rise to its feet. In a well appointed day (or year) there is a place for "bon-bons."

Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Mussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov or Ravel is well known. Be they writing of the shining sea or the rising dawn, he polishes and makes bright and effulgent their tonal surfaces. Light is reflected from them. They shine. Is the dawn rising, they grow in splendor, as with the clear-skied Musorgsky; or, they radiate more and more warmth (not heat, be it remembered) as in the unfolding measures of Ravel. Is there sudden change of scene, as in "Sadko," a drum-beat quickly whisks one from undulating surfaces into realms of magic. And the new mood is as suddenly upon one as if by a stroke of legerdemain. Is there dancing, as of nymphs and shepherds and bacchantes, Dr. Koussevitzky, even as Ravel, furnishes stimulus, rises with the dancers to the tumult of joy.

Marcel Tournier is, of course, virtuoso composer, very much virtuoso-composer. He knows his harp and, disdaining the vaudeville tricks with which others seem to find it necessary to deck it out, writes pleasingly and effectively for it. His piece fits into the afternoon's program. And Mr. Zighera, who for some years has labored in semi-obscurity behind violas and near bass drums is for once heard as able virtuoso on his own account. By no means small was his portion of the applause.

What would Dr. Koussevitzky do with Dr. Dvorak's symphony, it was asked. First of all, he gave it performance remarkable for its clarity, for excellent proportioning of parts to each other, to the whole. Straightforward, virile, was the theme of ascending and descending arpeggii. The succeeding one, in G minor, might as well have been Oriental as Negroid. Or do our ears still hear as "Oriental" anything of a certain type of the exotic, regardless of its origin? A "Largo" which has become the stock-in-trade of all sorts and conditions of musicians and near-musicians (perhaps a coined opposite, far-musicians, would be more truthful word), came with exquisite taste. The English horn of Mr. Speyer, gently guided by the hand of the conductor, avoided both pitfalls; it neither over-sentimentalized by too slow tempo, nor lost one whit of its melancholy. And with succeeding themes Dr. Koussevitzky was equally apt, even through the incongruous ballet-like measures which serve to introduce a reference to the main theme of the symphony, and through it to the English horn solo.

But the scherzo proved, of all the movements most akin to our own age. We are living in a scherzo-day. Probably not the day of Dvorak, not the day and the way of any of his most ardent admirers (and he was a great lion himself, at one time) could summon so well the scherzo-mood as did Dr. Koussevitzky. To the modernists in the audience it must have been like a breath of fresh air amid the perfumes emanating from—well—the "bon-bons." And in the last movement, almost Chaikovskian, resounded the proclamation which is its chief theme. Less slender than the other movements, it gave Dr. Koussevitzky opportunity for real climax with this symphony. While the youngsters who thought Dvorak's "old hat," but who are too young to have heard him in the absence of these ten years, must have opened surprised eyes and ears at the quotation of earlier themes in the later movements, and perhaps at the simultaneous appearance of two themes, re-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS CONCERT

Second in Series for Providence Patrons Given at Albee.

On paper it looked overwhelmingly Russian, that program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played last evening as the second of its series of concerts for the season 1929-30 in the E. F. Albee Theatre. But it was devoid of that monotony that anyone but a Russian enthusiast is apt to experience in such a musical offering.

The program:

1. Vivaldi—Concerto in D minor for Orchestra
   (Edited by A. Siloti)
   I. Maestoso
   II. Largo
   III. Allegro

2. Stravinsky — Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird"), a Danced Legend
   I. Introduction: Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird
   II. Supplication of the Fire-Bird
   III. The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples
   IV. Dance of the Princess
   V. Informal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei

3. Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6 in B minor ("Pathetic"), Opus 74
   I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo
   II. Allegro con grazia
   III. Allegro molto vivace
   IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

While there was the Russian sombreness of outlook and poignancy of expression, there was also much that was bright and vivid and many colored. Our music was free from the morbid pessimism that regards life as a victim driven by a pitiless destiny that shapes its ends rough.

True, the little Vivaldi concerto in D minor had much to do with giving the affair a non-partisan start. Vivaldi was not addicted to psychological cataclysms nor hopeless yearnings for what the gods had neglected to create. His music is rather a fine expression of the movement and pomp of life, proceeding with a dignity and a sense of power that belong to those who live their own lives in the sunshine. Shadows are things that pass, while sorrow is an accident; freedom from care is natural. And this mood culminates at intervals in a joy that does not fear to make itself heard lest the jealous divinity fire the thunderbolt as the penalty for such presumption.

Non-Contemptuous Familiarity

Stravinsky's Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu," a danced legend, is no longer the startling thing that it was at first. We realize the legend element in it now, and instead of sitting spellbound by its magic, we wander through the many enchanted gardens of our memory wherein that of Katschei's becomes merely one of the many rather than the one supreme site of enchantment.

The beauty of Stravinsky's music seems to lie in its color and its movement, as well as its riot of instrumentation. The tropical flowers are all a-bloom, gorgeous, but without scent, often a dissonance of hues seen from afar by one as in a dream, where the dreamer hesitates and wonders if he prefer this or this.

And in the midst of the color is the movement, now the poising and swoop of wings, and now the insinuating subtlety of the serpent at times growing heavy under the ill-contrived pretex of m[illegible]nster.

With the Magic Feather

But as real music to give joy to the ears it has much to seek. Honeybees and wasps and hornets for stinging; strange leaps and glistening cries that cling to the note for the note's sake; the sound of wet fingers upon glass in the strings; the small woodwind making a sound of birds dusting themselves in the sand, startled by a lovely reminiscence from Debussy; a brief melody on the 'cello, so lovely that everyone had to repeat it in turn, and the old serpent writhed and struck and fell to the ground, and darkness covered his eyes and made him vanish from our vision, fold on fold.

Dr. Koussevitzky has given us a Tschaikowsky changed somewhat in feature, but wholly recognizable for all that. We get a sharper and stronger intellectual force, a certain hardness, a bitterness of reality that breaks at times into a jest, a mixture of the sombre, melting on occasion almost into the genial; and withal an inevitableness that no one would doubt.

Never have we heard his harmonies more firmly set forth, while at the same time held under perfect control; his rhythms, too, were all definite in their movement, at the same time free from the vagueness that some conductors have a habit of imputing to them. His polyphony, under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky, was that of a powerful master, never in doubt as to structure or expedient.

Unneeded Warnings.

There was little of the instability, the petty irritation, the subject of mood, that they warn us against in Tschaikowsky. Inevitable was the sombre pitch of the minor mood, and all that it gests of fantasy, longing, aspiration doubt; but there was a beauty also that neutralized all of this—a beauty that blunted the malignity of pessimism—casting about itself a spell that was almost benign.

We have been warned against the hypnotism that rises from Tschaikowsky's monotony of rhythm—a monotony that seems like a child's sing-song reading of verse. This, too, was conspicuous in absentia; for even that long pedal point in the 5-4 measure of the second movement ceased to be wild and sinister. It assumed rather an air of purpose and determination than that of hopelessly rocking, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth.

Even the climaxes kept their proper distances. There was little evidence of the sting of the gadfly or the lash of the furies, broken by the loud outcries and the maudlin pianissimos of a mind drunk with its own conceits. There was more of the open air, the big expanse, and the far reaches that Beethoven knew so well how to paint. A bigger and nobler Tschaikowsky, more in sympathy with his fellows—less apprehensive of himself.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

WITHOUT WORDS

Perhaps you, too, are haunted by melodies. Tschaikowsky, maybe. Maybe one of those exquisite passages from the B Minor Symphony which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played so beautifully the other night. We were. And to get rid of it ("My Heart's Beloved," that one) we simply had to sing it. Some men marry on the same delightful principle.

Well, do you know, the tune took such hold on us that since then we have sought unfrequented streets where we could more freely swell out on it, the way Dr. Koussevitsky's fiddles did? But sometimes even in more crowded thoroughfares we haven't been able to resist the temptation.

Once—this is really quite comical—the commiserating glances of two shabbily dressed fellows on Exchange Place suggested that our enthusiasm should be more guarded. "Singin' in the rain", we laughed gaily to them, which only made matters worse. They didn't understand. People don't as a rule.

But mark what followed! Seeing a clear stretch of sidewalk ahead, good for at least six uninterrupted measures, we began to hum the strain, softly at first but more fervently as we progressed. And to our surprise we became conscious of someone a pace or two behind us humming along with us, right on the pitch, a sympathetic voice, and, apparently, another enchanted soul.

Remarkable! He (it was a man; that's the one flaw in the story) caught up with us. Emboldened by each other's presence we continued the ravishing melody right into the thick of the pedestrians, and finished it. Then, without a word having been exchanged, we shook hands and parted.

"A case for the police," observed an eminently sane friend of ours. Ah, no. For the gods.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES
JAN 11 1930

BOSTONIANS RETURN

The Boston Symphony, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, came back to Brooklyn last night in its second concert of the season's series at the Academy of Music.

It was a brief program that the Boston maestro furnished Brooklyn's music-lovers, but one more than usually distinguished by virtue of its extreme contrasts. From virtuosic brilliancy the concert descended, at its conclusion, to something quite the opposite.

The brightest spot of the program, which had opened with a thoroughly able presentation of Dvorak's New World Symphony, was to be found in the Prelude and Fugue of Pick-Mangiagalli, a composition not often heard, but one that is fully deserving of its respected place in symphony repertoire. Here Dr. Koussevitzky's sensitive strings found an excellent and sympathetic vehicle and the composition, as it flowed from the instruments of the capable Bostonians, was at once charming and inspiring.

None the less beautiful was the spiritual Interlude from Strauss' "Intermezzo," that thoroughly satisfying reverie that displays a totally different Strauss from the composer of "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel." It is in this type of music that Dr. Koussevitzky is at his best. So far as last night's performance is concerned, it is something of a pity that the concert should not have ended with the last melodic phrase of the Interlude.

But no, there was a bit of Wagner yet to come and here it is a sad duty to record that Dr. Koussevitzky permitted the dreamy somnolence of the preceding number to carry over into the Prelude to the Meistersingers. The result was something new and original, for it involved the dullest and most spiritless reading of this great work that these ears have ever heard flow over the footlights of a concert stage. Philip Hale's illuminating program notes tell us that a contemporary critic characterized this Prelude as "monotonous" when it was first performed 68 years ago. Were the composition always played as it was last night, the verdict of this now deceased and hard to please luminary would still hold good.

It was, however, an enjoyable concert, even though some of us might be constrained to wonder why Mr. Koussevitzky declined to repeat the new compositions which enraptured all at his last Carnegie Hall appearances—namely, the new Bax symphony and Ravel's "Bolero." Surely Brooklyn music-lovers must want also to hear the best that the best of our contemporaries are producing.

J. C. O.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

e Boston Symphony Orchestra, e Koussevitzky, conductor, sub-ed the ninth program of the Fri- afternoon series of concerts at phony Hall, Boston, on the after- of Dec. 20. Two Russian pieces gurated the afternoon. The Prel- to Moussorgsky's "Khovánina" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's ko." Then came two samples of ch writing, Tournier's "Féerie." ude and Dance for Harp with hestra, given its first perform- e with orchestra yesterday (Ber- d Zighera, member of the orches- was the soloist) and the Second te from Ravel's "Daphnis et bé." For larger work, the audience rd Dvořák's Symphony in E or, "From the New World."

r. Koussevitzky's program, as he lined it yesterday, was not the st stimulating combination of sic imaginable. "Sadko" had been rd quite recently. The music from hovánstchina," for all its barbaric endor and deep, gaunt effective- s, is by no means unfamiliar fare. Yet, accustomed or not, these Russians proved good to listen to. How Mr. Koussevitzky revels in the grandeur, the stern magnificence of the Prelude! And how he sweeps his men through the swiftly changing pictures of "Sadko"! The instruments etch in the rumbling, charging waves of the music with sureness and power. And there is something of the glamour of the ancient folk tale, with its colorful elaborations of musical detail.

In Tournier's "Féerie" one found a contrast to the Russian music, a contrast of delicacy and grace and swirling lightness. If there was no startling exhibition of originality or any particular indication of the stature of genius in this piece, it did nevertheless suggest the charm and graciousness of the finished technician. The composer is professor of the harp at the Conservatory in Paris and was the teacher of Mr. Zighera, yesterday's soloist. His music is characteristically conceived for the solo instrument and the instrumentation is well handled. A pleasant and dexterous bit, without any pretensions to greatness, it held a creditable place on the program.

Mr. Koussevitzky brings to Ravel's music a warmth and a brilliance which to many listeners is his most interesting manner. He finds all the rhythmic patterns and sets them forth incisively and sharply. He contrasts these rhythms one against another until all the intricate lines merge into one exposition. He accents melodies skillfully. And never does he verge into sentimental ruts, since Ravel's music simply refuses to lend itself thereto. Perhaps the innate irony combined with the sparkling abilities of the composer are Mr. Koussevitzky's best spur. At any rate, few writers route him to similar effectiveness.

With the Dvořákian music, the anticipated came to pass. For here were the Slavic warmths, the melancholic songs, the lush sweetness, which so tempt the conductor. Here he drove his players into ardors which doubtless lend this music its most popular appeal, but which some few find a little tiresome. Yet there is no gainsaying the appeal of this music to many, especially when players of such skill and a conductor of such finesse traverse its measures. Yesterday's program book pointed out that the old controversies which waged about this symphony have fortunately subsided, and that now the work may be regarded simply as music, and not as a work with or without spirituals or plantation songs, or, for that matter, songs of Brittany. As music, per se, it does not own the acidity of challenge.

C. S. B.

A Matinee Of Bon-Bons and Sweet Sounds

Dr. Koussevitzky with Mr. Zighera and His Harp To Assist

WHAT an afternoon of bon-bons . . . It was a stray remark from the corridors after yesterday's concert at Symphony Hall. Which corridors are to the observant a treasure house of reactions, a mine of points of view. And if one of the observant perchance has the pleasant duty of making "copy" of programs and performances, companies of hearers and responses from those hearers, those same corridors may become for him a veritable Bible of texts. And thus for the day a "text" has been chosen.

Bon-bons—confections; let us see. In the course of the afternoon twice the rising dawn was evoked; once the surface of a gentle sea yielded its picture; lovers made sport to the tones of a liquid flute; while other beings, product of romantic imaginings, held court at the bottom of the sea; a shining harp was brought to stand beside the conductor for all to see and hear; and lately, a string of "tunes" was made by clever hands into a symphony. Or, for the prosacic record—the rising dawn once was prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina"; again it was first of the excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," which also yielded the silver flute and the pastoral dancers; the sea and the goings-on beneath the sea were Rimsky-Korsakov's "musical picture," "Sadko"; upon the golden harp Mr. Zighera ably played Monsieur Tournier's "Féerie"; and the symphony which was also "tunes," was Dr. Antonin Dvorak's symphony, No. 5 in E minor, better known as the "New World Symphony."

Thus ran a pleasant afternoon, with not a thing to disturb the most timid. Yes, there were climaxes; no music can proceed without its periodic ebb and flow, its heights and depths. But these heights were not the towering Rockies with bold crags and gouged canyons; these were the older Alleghenies, with peaks eroded and valleys filled in with the wash from the mountain-tops. Or, to change violently the figure and resort to homely simile, these climaxes scarce caused a tempest in a teapot, they were rather the natural rise and fall of a thermometer on a calm fleckless summer's day—brought indoors in mid-December.

And yet—one should pause a bit. Why should this little old year of 1929 thus complacently deliver itself of its smug assurances? A decade or two, a mere score of years or two, have wrought mighty change. Count back only two years more than a decade and Boston was first hearing its "Daphnis and Chloe," and oldsters were sitting on needles and youngsters were straightening their spines at its audacities, for in 1918 it was in the very vanguard of the "advanced"; and count back a half-decade farther and this same ballet brought dissension between composer and producer, Ravel and Diaghilev. Bon-bon indeed! Or go back less than two score of years, within the easy memory of many who sit before the orchestra on Fridays (less, who sit there on Saturdays), and another of these "bon-bons" is a bone of contention. The program-book yesterday was full of reflections of the battle of pen against pen. The learned were trying to discover whether the Bohemian Dr. Dvorak had used negro tunes for the making of an "American" symphony; leaving in the background the more important question of whether a Bohemian can, in the very nature of the case, write "American" music, and to what extent Negroid melodies are indeed "American." Which dissensions may well be allowed to rest in peace. The point being that within the easy span of a single lifetime this symphony was as much and perhaps more an issue than is at present the latest problem-work of a Stravinsky or a Honegger or a Schoenberg. Nor does one have to go back to the eighteen-nineties for such opinion. Our young lions will roar to be reminded that not later than 1918 one of the best of commentators from the ranks of the teaching fraternity thus delivered himself on the subject of the last measures of this symphony: "The end comes with the savagest, most ear-devastating harmonies, like the cries of lost souls." And now the corridors of Symphony hall call it a "bon-bon."

Truth to tell, Dr. Koussevitzky, in the assembling of this program was but exercising the same catholicity in program-making which he has shown during his entire stay in Boston. It may be exercised in many ways. The component parts of an audience are various. While one is agreeably stimulated, another is painfully lacerated; while one smilingly remembers the good old days, another is lulled to sleep. Both may be satisfied by placing numbers of both kinds on a single program. Or, some programs may be for the one group while others are for the other. The present generation places possibly undue emphasis upon suspense and excitement; it has often had its day in Symphony Hall. An older generation prefers wistfulness, and memories, and pleasant sounds; it had its day yesterday. Certainly one in ten years (it was last played in 1920) the "New World Symphony" deserves hearing. And how best frame it than with music of not too great disparity with it? That the afternoon was enjoyed was evident from the hand-clapping at the end. For while suburbanites and modernists (what a combination!) were rushing to the doors a large company ardently recalled conductor time after time until he bade the orchestra rise to its feet. In a well appointed day (or year) there is a place for "bon-bons."

Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Mussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov or Ravel is well known. Be they writing of the shining sea or the rising dawn, he polishes and makes bright and effulgent their tonal surfaces. Light is reflected from them. They shine. Is the dawn rising, they grow in splendor, as with the clear-skied Musorgsky; or, they radiate more and more warmth (not heat, be it remembered) as in the unfolding measures of Ravel. Is there sudden change of scene, as in "Sadko," a drum-beat quickly whisks one from undulating surfaces into realms of magic. And the new mood is as suddenly upon one as if by a stroke of legerdemain. Is there dancing, as of nymphs and shepherds and bacchantes, Dr. Koussevitzky, even as Ravel, furnishes stimulus, rises with the dancers to the tumult of joy.

Marcel Tournier is, of course, virtuoso composer, very much virtuoso-composer. He knows his harp and, disdaining the vaudeville tricks with which others seem to find it necessary to deck it out, writes pleasingly and effectively for it. His piece fits into the afternoon's program. And Mr. Zighera, who for some years has labored in semi-obscurity behind violas and near bass drums is for once heard as able virtuoso on his own account. By no means small was his portion of the applause.

What would Dr. Koussevitzky do with Dr. Dvorak's symphony, it was asked. First of all, he gave it performance remarkable for its clarity, for excellent proportioning of parts to each other, to the whole. Straightforward, virile, was the theme of ascending and descending arpeggii. The succeeding one, in G minor, might as well have been Oriental as Negroid. Or do our ears still hear as "Oriental" anything of a certain type of the exotic, regardless of its origin? A "Largo" which has become the stock-in-trade of all sorts and conditions of musicians and near-musicians (perhaps a coined opposite, far-musicians, would be more truthful word), came with exquisite taste. The English horn of Mr. Speyer, gently guided by the hand of the conductor, avoided both pitfalls; it neither over-sentimentalized by too slow tempo, nor lost one whit of its melancholy. And with succeeding themes Dr. Koussevitzky was equally apt, even through the incongruous ballet-like measures which serve to introduce a reference to the main theme of the symphony, and through it to the English horn solo.

But the scherzo proved, of all the movements most akin to our own age. We are living in a scherzo-day. Probably not the day of Dvorak, not the day and the way of any of his most ardent admirers (and he was a great lion himself, at one time) could summon so well the scherzo-mood as did Dr. Koussevitzky. To the modernists in the audience it must have been like a breath of fresh air amid the perfumes emanating from—well—the "bon-bons." And in the last movement, almost Chaikovskian, resounded the procluamation which is its chief theme. Less slender than the other movements, it gave Dr. Koussevitzky opportunity for real climax with this symphony. While the youngsters who thought Dvorak's "old hat," but who are too young to have heard him in the absence of these ten years, must have opened surprised eyes and ears at the quotation of earlier themes in the later movements, and perhaps at the simultaneous appearance of two themes, regardless of the once new clash of harmonies, which the professor found "devastating."

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

WITHOUT WORDS

Perhaps you, too, are haunted by melodies. Tschaikowsky, maybe. Maybe one of those exquisite passages from the E Minor Symphony which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played so beautifully the other night. We were. And to get rid of it ("My Heart's Beloved," that one) we simply had to sing it. Some men marry on the same delightful principle.

Well, do you know, the tune took such hold on us that since then we have sought unfrequented streets where we could more freely swell out on it, the way Dr. Koussevitsky's fiddles did? But sometimes even in more crowded thoroughfares we haven't been able to resist the temptation.

Once—this is really quite comical—the commiserating glances of two shabbily dressed fellows on Exchange Place suggested that our enthusiasm should be more guarded. "Singin' in the rain", we laughed gaily to them, which only made matters worse. They didn't understand. People don't as a rule.

But mark what followed! Seeing a clear stretch of sidewalk ahead, good for at least six uninterrupted measures, we began to hum the strain, softly at first but more fervently as we progressed. And to our surprise we became conscious of someone a pace or two behind us humming along with us, right on the pitch, a sympathetic voice, and, apparently, another enchanted soul.

Remarkable! He (it was a man; that's the one flaw in the story) caught up with us. Emboldened by each other's presence we continued the ravishing melody right into the thick of the pedestrians, and finished it. Then, without a word having been exchanged, we shook hands and parted.

"A case for the police," observed an eminently sane friend of ours. Ah, no. For the gods.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES

JAN 11 1930

BOSTONIANS others.
The Boston Symp... Befor... direction of Dr. Se... a patro... came back to Broo... his due... its second concert... close of...
series at the Acade... bership...
It was a brief p... men. I...
Boston maestro furn... with th...
music-lovers, but o... number...
ually distinguished... officer i...
extreme contrasts. ... cial stan...
brilliancy the conce... card fu... its conclusion, to son... member... opposite. ... largest...
The brightest spot ... world.
which had opened w... The ... able presentation o... mark in...
World Symphony, w... gates d... in the Prelude and ... should ...
Mangiagalli, a comp... ing of ... heard, but one that ... efforts ...
phony repertoire. H... by Pres... vitzky's sensitive strin... officers.
cellent and sympathe...
the composition, as i...
the instruments of th...
tonians, was at once...
inspiring.
None the less be... spiritual Interlude fr... The ...
termezzo," that thro... an elect... reverie that displays... Alderm... ferent Strauss from t... on the ...
"Don Juan" and "Till... Alder...
It is in this type of ... resentin...
Koussevitzky is at h... tired as...
as last night's perfo... years' s... cerned, it is somethin... of the ...
the concert should ... six tern... with the last melodi... alderma...
Interlude. ... ber of t...
But no, there was ... tee whe...
yet to come and he... referend...
duty to record that ... ably.
permitted the dream... In rec...
the preceding numbe... ing been...
into the Prelude to th... to serve...
The result was som... lagher ...
original, for it invo... of receiv...
and most spiritless ... ship in... great work that thes... Associati... heard flow over the ... A ret... concert stage. Phili... Frank, ... nating program no... the Bro...
a contemporary crit... yn some... this Prelude as "mo...
it was first performe...
Were the compositio...
as it was last night...
this now deceased an... O'Brien ...
luminary would still...
It was, however, a... cert, even though so... Chief ...
be constrained to w... he requ...
Koussevitzky decline... horities...
new compositions wi... naking ...
all at his last Carneg... artment...
ances—namely, the ... ere in t...
phony and Ravel's "... The re...
Brooklyn music-lov... r less of...
also to hear the be... he recru...
of our contemporarie...

Queens

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, submitted the ninth program of the Friday afternoon series of concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Dec. 20. Two Russian pieces inaugurated the afternoon. The Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovánstchina" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko." Then came two samples of French writing, Tournier's "Féerie," Prelude and Dance for Harp with Orchestra, given its first performance with orchestra yesterday (Bernard Zighera, member of the orchestra, was the soloist) and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé." For larger work, the audience heard Dvořák's Symphony in E minor, "From the New World."

Mr. Koussevitzky's program, as he outlined it yesterday, was not the most stimulating combination of music imaginable. "Sadko" had been heard quite recently. The music from "Khovánstchina," for all its barbaric splendor and deep, gaunt effectiveness, is by no means unfamiliar fare. Yet, accustomed or not, these Russians proved good to listen to. How Mr. Koussevitzky revels in the grandeur, the stern magnificence of the Prelude! And how he sweeps his men through the swiftly changing pictures of "Sadko"! The instruments etch in the rumbling, charging waves of the music with sureness and power. And there is something of the glamour of the ancient folk tale, with its colorful elaborations of musical detail.

In Tournier's "Féerie" one found a contrast to the Russian music, a contrast of delicacy and grace and swirling lightness. If there was no startling exhibition of originality or any particular indication of the stature of genius in this piece, it did nevertheless suggest the charm and graciousness of the finished technician. The composer is professor of the harp at the Conservatory in Paris and was the teacher of Mr. Zighera, yesterday's soloist. His music is characteristically conceived for the solo instrument and the instrumentation is well handled. A pleasant and dexterous bit, without any pretensions to greatness, it held a creditable place on the program.

Mr. Koussevitzky brings to Ravel's music a warmth and a brilliance which to many listeners is his most interesting manner. He finds all the rhythmic patterns and sets them forth incisively and sharply. He contrasts these rhythms one against another until all the intricate lines merge into one exposition. He accents melodies skillfully. And never does he verge into sentimental ruts, since Ravel's music simply refuses to lend itself thereto. Perhaps the innate irony combined with the sparkling abilities of the composer are Mr. Koussevitzky's best spur. At any rate, few writers route him to similar effectiveness.

With the Dvořákian music, the anticipated came to pass. For here were the Slavic warmths, the melancholic songs, the lush sweetness, which so tempt the conductor. Here he drove his players into ardors which doubtless lend this music its most popular appeal, but which some few find a little tiresome. Yet there is no gainsaying the appeal of this music to many, especially when players of such skill and a conductor of such finesse traverse its measures. Yesterday's program book pointed out that the old controversies which waged about this symphony have fortunately subsided, and that now the work may be regarded simply as music, and not as a work with or without spirituals or plantation songs, or, for that matter, songs of Brittany. As music, per se, it does not own the acidity of challenge.

C. S. B.

Second in Series for Providence Patrons Given at Albee.

On paper it looked overwhelmingly Russian, that program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played last evening as the second of its series of concerts for the season 1929-30 in the E. F. Albee Theatre. But it was devoid of that monotony that anyone but a Russian enthusiast is apt to experience in such a musical offering.

The program:

1. Vivaldi—Concerto in D minor for Orchestra
   (Edited by A. Siloti)
   I. Maestoso
   II. Largo
   III. Allegro

2. Stravinsky — Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird"), a Danced Legend
   I. Introduction: Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird
   II. Supplication of the Fire-Bird
   III. The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples
   IV. Dance of the Princess
   V. Informal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei

3. Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6 in B minor ("Pathetic"), Opus 74
   I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo
   II. Allegro con grazia
   III. Allegro molto vivace
   IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

While there was the Russian sombreness of outlook and poignancy of expression, there was also much that was bright and vivid and many colored. Our music was free from the morbid pessimism that regards life as a victim driven by a pitiless destiny that shapes its ends rough.

True, the little Vivaldi concerto in D minor had much to do with giving the affair a non-partisan start. Vivaldi was not addicted to psychological cataclysms nor hopeless yearnings for what the gods had neglected to create. His music is rather a fine expression of the movement and pomp of life, proceeding with a dignity and a sense of power that belong to those who live their own lives in the sunshine. Shadows are things that pass, while sorrow is an accident; freedom from care is natural. And this mood culminates at intervals in a joy that does not fear to make itself heard lest the jealous divinity fire the thunderbolt as the penalty for such presumption.

Non-Contemptuous Familiarity

Stravinsky's Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu," a danced legend, is no longer the startling thing that it was at first. We realize the legend element in it now, and instead of sitting spellbound by its magic, we wander through the many enchanted gardens of our memory wherein that of Katschei's becomes merely one of the many rather than the one supreme site of enchantment.

The beauty of Stravinsky's music seems to lie in its color and its movement, as well as its riot of instrumentation. The tropical flowers are all a-bloom, gorgeous, but without scent, often a dissonance of hues seen from afar by one as in a dream, where the dreamer hesitates and wonders if he prefer this or this.

And in the midst of the color is the movement, now the poising and swoop of wings, and now the insinuating subtlety of the serpent at times growing heavy under the ill-contrived pretex of m... monster.

With the Magic Feather

But as real music to give joy to the ears it has much to seek. Honeybees and wasps and hornets for stinging; strange leaps and glistening cries that cling to the note for the note's sake; the sound of wet fingers upon glass in the strings; the small woodwind making a sound of birds dusting themselves in the sand, startled by a lovely reminiscence from Debussy; a brief melody on the 'cello, so lovely that everyone had to repeat it in turn, and the old serpent writhed and struck and fell to the ground, and darkness covered his eyes and made him vanish from our vision, fold on fold.

Dr. Koussevitzky has given us a Tschaikowsky changed somewhat in feature, but wholly recognizable for all that. We get a sharper and stronger intellectual force, a certain hardness, a bitterness of reality that breaks at times into a jest, a mixture of the sombre, melting on occasion almost into the genial; and withal an inevitableness that no one would doubt.

Never have we heard his harmonies more firmly set forth, while at the same time held under perfect control; his rhythms, too, were all definite in their movement, at the same time free from the vagueness that some conductors have a habit of imputing to them. His polyphony, under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky, was that of a powerful master, never in doubt as to structure or expedient.

Unneeded Warnings.

There was little of the instability, the petty irritation, the subject of mood, that they warn us against in Tschaikowsky. Inevitable was the sombre pitch of the minor mood, and all that it suggests of fantasy, longing, aspiration doubt; but there was a beauty also that neutralized all of this—a beauty that blunted the malignity of pessimism—casting about itself a spell that was almost benign.

We have been warned against the hypnotism that rises from Tschaikowsky's monotony of rhythm—a monotony that seems like a child's sing-song reading of verse. This, too, was conspicuous in absentia; for even that long pedal point in the 5-4 measure of the second movement ceased to be wild and sinister. It assumed rather an air of purpose and determination than that of hopelessly rocking, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth.

Even the climaxes kept their proper distances. There was little evidence of the sting of the gadfly or the lash of the furies, broken by the loud outcries and the maudlin pianissimos of a mind drunk with its own conceits. There was more of the open air, the big expanse, and the far reaches that Beethoven knew so well how to paint. A bigger and nobler Tschaikowsky, more in sympathy with his fellows—less apprehensive of himself.

M. C. W.

Trans Dec 28
BOSTON EVENING

Symphony

Elder Masters, A Nondescript, And A Genius

Substitution and an Incident, Mozart, Bloch, Beethoven, At Symphony Hall

THE PRIGS were severe and withering. The cynics were wry and sneering. Perhaps it was wisest to be mildly amused at the ordinary courses of human nature in public assembled. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky had persuaded himself, or been persuaded, that a "symphonic tone-picture ballet"—whatever such a triple-headed curiosity may be—deserved performance at the Symphony Concerts. It was all about "The Saporoshhtzy Cossacks," who had a habit of defying Turkish Sultans in phrases that the Watch and Ward Society would surely find "objectionable." Having written them on fair white paper—if we are to believe the subtitles of the "symphonic tone-picture ballet"—they further released their feelings in laughter and the dance. One Glière, a workaday Russian composer, "now living in Moscow," civilly "musicked" them. . . . Well, as the clergymen say by way of clearing their throats, the oftener Dr. Koussevitzky read and rehearsed Glière's Muscovite masterpiece, the less worthy and desirable it seemed for performance in Symphony Hall. At last disinclination mounted to decision, and he tossed the score into the discard. Something must be substituted in the twinkling of an eye. Lo and behold, when the elect ladies of Friday afternoon opened program-books, the final number was the "Ouverture Solennelle" of Chaikovsky, more briefly known as "1812."

Now, "1812" is well enough in its way—so well indeed that it has been played weekly at the Pop Concerts summers beyond recall. Year in and year out, besides, it has landed near the top of the list when audiences were polled for a "Request Night." Whether or not it had been heard before at a Symphony Concert, no man knoweth, since the informing program-book gave it only one line of forty-odd letters. Long memories recollected it at a concert for the Pension Fund; while a waif and stray from Philadelphia said that it was "a great favorite" with Mr. Stokowski, his orchestra and his public. And all of us Bostonians (amongst whom she had the luck to settle) know what they are! . . . Anyhow, the "Ouverture Solennelle" was played—played as though Dr. Koussevitzky believed in it as, perhaps, he did. It generated a stirring motion and tuneful excitement as it proceeded, say with La Marseillaise in one hand and the Russian national hymn—Tsarist, not Soviétique—in the other. It ended with stringy whirrs and brazen clangors, high heaven-rending.

Then ensued the event of the afternoon. Bach, Beethoven and Brahms have been played at the Symphony Concerts. Schubert and Schumann, Mozart and Wagner, have sounded there—classics all, and twenty others with them. Debussy, Ravel, Strauss, Stravinsky, has each had his sonorous inning. Yet in a quarter-century at Symphony Hall, not one, for any masterpiece, has received more applause than yesterday belauded this "Ouverture Solennelle." There were shouts and murmurs; volleys of hand-clapping; eager recalls for the conductor. For once, the matinée audience was lingering to release its fervors of delight. It knew what it liked, received it and—blessings on it!—testified a hearty, honest elation. . . . So runs the world away and it is pleasant to watch it from the bank with a half-smile. "It is holiday time, you know," said a kindly mentor at Symphony Hall. Bien ça!, as the French have it. Or in the American vernacular, "You bet!"

One of the preliminaries to the "Ouverture Solennelle" was another overture, by Mozart set before his opera of "The Magic Flute." With the grave, mysterious chords still sounding retrospectively in our ears, some of us may crave permission to find them more sonorous, not to say solemn, than the subsequent Chaikovskian tumults. We may even lay our hands on our hearts and declare them close to grandeur: while as for the intervening measures, was there ever a music more akin to light and air and fire—so swift, so volatile, so bright? In the overture abides the effortless magic which Mozart distilled from what he liked to call his magic play—distilled and touched it, when he would, even with sublimity. Dr. Koussevitzky toiled over "1812"; but observe him winging Mozart's overture into inspired flight. It was as though the conductor, like we others, found it irresistible.

There is something to be said, too—even with the "Ouverture Solennelle" to come after—for the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven. How well for example, it companioned the overture of Mozart, though nowhere does it rise to the grandeur of the Mozartean sonorities. Both composers seem writing out of an ease-ful readiness and abundance; both would make a music akin to light; both hear their several instruments sounding gratefully in their ears. In the maturer symphonies Beethoven bent choirs and individual voices to his will. In this Fourth he often plays with them gracefully (for him), even affectionately, as though he cherished their quality and diversity, would persuade and not drive them. have their charm and not their power. Fancy runs free, alert and stirring through the unfolding and the upbuilding of the melodies, in the wreathing of ornament, in the incessant animation of beginning and end, in the third movement that is neither minuet nor scherzo but caprice playing over both.

And in this Symphony, written only six years into the nineteenth century, hear Beethoven as the man of sentiment by the eighteenth bred. In the introduction, he is not quite sure of this new character; gropes amiably for the mood; finds it in the lively violins; runs through a first movement benign, gay, light-handed with themes and voices, ever in happy curve. In the slow movement, he is all for songful sentiment with the play of instruments for piquant sauce to sweetness. The light-footed finale, with nothing much to say but a mercurial animation in the saying, is neither more nor less than eighteenth-century leave-taking with an elegant, confident air. Call this Fourth, Beethoven's Symphony of sentiment and virtuosity, with the responsive Dr. Koussevitzky and his virtuoso-orchestra lying in wait for it. Granted this view, he did not refine too much on the golden melody of the slow-movement; while virtuoso after virtuoso had his turn to shade it with a little solo. Even the kettle-drum, beloved of Beethoven, took its chance.

Last, to thrust the "Ouverture Solennelle" into outer darkness, Bloch's Rhapsody, which is Schelomo in Hebrew and Solomon in English—the great king in his glory, the greater preacher of a bitter wisdom. My Jewish part is my better part, wrote Bloch in substance to the editor of the program-book. Out of it he made this music for proclaiming violoncello and seconding orchestra. The form is the freest; a unity of texture and speech and passion, motivs plangent, projected, piercing, bind the whole together. The violoncello, deep-toned, sounds with sensuous magnificence; sets forth power and state; swells into sovereign exaltation; cries out in sharp rejection and acrid scorn. There is no end to the diversity of its speech; its very repetitions prevail; throughout it is the mingled voice of Solomon and the tone-poet, with splendor charged, to bitterness stripped.

The orchestra is both complement and contrast, deepening sensuous lusters, echoing song as though it were the Great King's temple; answering proclamation with tribal tumults; turning sombre and shadowed, brooding and fateful; shrieking out in the mockeries of despair. The hand of power stretches the design; wealth of resource fills it; impassioned imagination clothes it; racial spirit impregnates it; a very fire of creation heats it. Voice against voice beat the sensual and the spiritual; splendor declines into shadow while across it wisdom pierces. . . . Music of a power that among American composers none but the Jewish Bloch has conceived and accomplished in our time. And Mr. Salmond at the violoncello, Dr. Koussevitzky above him, an orchestra, enkindled rather than compelled, shared and outspread this puissance.

H. T. P.

'1812' OVERTURE BY SYMPHONY

Shining Beauty Made of Familiar Strains by Orchestra

Trans Dec 28

An eleventh-hour chaange replaced the untried "Saporotchky Cossacks" with Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture on yesterday's program for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert. And taking its stirring phrases, its thunderous crescendos, its martial rhythms, and its all too familiar melodies, Mr. Koussevitzky achieved the impossible and transformed its triteness into as exciting and inspiring a musical treat as an audience could wish for.

The customary procedure calls for a spattering of applause and immediate rush for the doors at the close of the Friday afternoon program. But yesterday's audience remained to recall Mr. Koussevitzky and to acclaim his men, who could make such shining beauty out of strains that have become more familiar to the vaudeville fan and the open-air park crowds than to the concertgoer. "Let the miracle be his" read an advance notice, and yesterday's performance deserves to be placed in that category.

The overture was preceded by Bloch's "Solomon," a Hebrew rhapsody for violoncello and orchestra. Felix Salmond was the soloist, and showed a complete mastery of his instrument and an understanding of this significant expression of the Jewish soul as Mr. Bloch has written it. A program note relates that Mr. Bloch's desire is to create good, genuine music, and not to attempt a reconstruction of the purely Hebraic. In "Solomon" he has done both, for its very sombreness and brooding tone hold the sorrowful history of his race in every phrase.

The remainder of the program was devoted to Beethoven's B-flat Major Symphony, and to Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute."

CELLIST IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Post A Dec 28

Concert Ends With "1812" and Audience Likes It

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Like the Colonel's lady and Judy O'Grady of Kipling's poem, the subscribers to the Friday afternoon Symphony Concerts and those denied that cultural advantage are, musically speaking, sisters under their skins. For final number at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, wrested from the Pops, came that clap-trap in excelsis, Tchaikovsky's "1812." And when the last resounding note had ceased did the assembled dowagers, debutantes and those between lift a supercilious eyebrow? Emphatically they did not. They went, as the expression goes, quite wild with delight.

BEETHOVEN'S FOURTH

There was variety aplenty in yesterday's list, and in the presentation of it. To Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," with which the concert began, Dr. Koussevitzky would impart the qualities of a sonorous, dramatic, brilliant theatrically effective curtain-raiser; but in the process the essential Mozartean spirit, as precious as it is indefinable, evaporated. There was brilliance, but there was hardly the requisite lucidity in the weaving of the voices, the euphony, the formal beauty.

On the other hand, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony that followed was nobly played. This performance might be described as Beethovenish, in the fullest, truest, most flattering sense of the term. Not in long recollection, even at Dr. Koussevitzky's own hands, has this symphony, admittedly one of the lesser ones, proved so engrossing in Symphony Hall, seemed so worthy of its fellowship in the immortal nine.

And if Dr. Koussevitzky was yesterday eloquent with Beethoven, he was nothing less than inspired in his conducting of Ernest Bloch's "Schelemo" (Solomon), Hebrew Rhapsody for violoncello and orchestra, in which Felix Salmond, notable 'cellist, but newcomer to the Symphony Concerts, bore the solo part.

It was good yesterday to hear Mr. Salmond, who played with his customary full and firm yet beautifully modulated tone, with a fervor and poetry and a feeling for the savage magnificence of the music, its epic voice and stride, that matched Dr. Koussevitzky's own. It was good, too, after two performances last season of the pot-boiler "America," to be reminded again of the greater, the essential Bloch.

This Swiss Jew, who now honors this country with his residence, is not only the unequalled tonal prophet of his race; he is, and the fact becomes clearer with each succeeding year, one of the foremost figures in contemporary musical life.

Dec 29 '28

Music Notes and Comment

Dr Koussevitzky plans to repeat at this week's Symphony concerts Ravel's Bolero, which made an unprecedented sensation when first played here last month, and Bax's Second Symphony, which was more warmly received than are most new works at its first performance here, the first anywhere.

Rather belatedly Charles Martin Loeffler's new "Canticles of the Sun," with a text from St Francis of Assisi, is to be given its first Boston performance. It has been heard in Washington and Philadelphia. Mme Povla Frijsh, the Danish soprano long admired here as an interpreter of concert songs, will sing the soprano solo in Mr Loeffler's work, as she has done at the previous performances. Mme Frijsh is also to be heard in a Jordan Hall recital Jan 8.

The Boston Symphony's Wagner program this afternoon, with Florence Austral, one of the greatest of livin singers, as soloist, will benefit th pension fund for retired members the orchestra. This concert will b gin at 3, instead of the usual hour 3:30.

Globe Dec 28 THE B

19

BLOCH'S 'SOLOMON' AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Felix Salmond Soloist in Hebrew Rhapsody

Dr Koussevitzky's Interpretation of Tschaikowsky's "1812" Applauded

Ernest Bloch's "Solomon," or "Schelomo," a "Hebrew Rhapsody" for violoncello and orchestra was the only modern piece on yesterday's Symphony concert program. The solo cellist was Felix Salmond, an Englishman, who has given several recitals in Boston. The other numbers were Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and, instead of Gliere's "Saporotzy Cossacks," Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

"Solomon," first played at these concerts in 1923, with Mr Bedetti as soloist, is one of the finest of Bloch's compositions. Here his melodic and harmonc originality, his flair for distinctive tone color, his emotional intensity find full scope. Interested, as he has written, by "the Jewish soul . . . the complex, glowing, agitated soul . . . vibrating throughout the Bible," Bloch has not tried to be a musical archaeologist, or to base his music on more or less authentic Hebrew themes.

His creative power stimulated by thoughts of the magnificent sensualism and despair of the great king of Hebrew tradition, Bloch has written glowingly, rhapsodically, powerfully. Dr Koussevitzky's intense and dramatic interpretation of the purely orchestral measures made Mr Salmond's conception of the solo part seem tepid and tame.

Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, one of the most marvelous pure patterns in tone yet created, was gracefully and fluently played. Here Dr Koussevitzky had not Mozartian melody, with which he is out of sympathy, to baffle him in his endeavors for a sympathetic performance. He was, accordingly, more successful than he has yet been in Boston with any work by Mozart.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony has from its first performances been more or less eclipsed in the minds and memories of musicians by the Third and Fifth Symphonies. Why, it is hard to explain. The music is original and in its way wholly delightful, but somehow neither the themes nor the working out of them have the intense creative energy felt by everyone in the "Eroica" and Fifth symphonies.

Dr Koussevitzky excelled yesterday in the slow introduction to the first movement, which he made sound more deeply significant than it usually has. Where he fell short was where he so often fails with the great classics. Again and again, in the slow movement, in the trio of the scherzo, with the second theme of the first allegro, he did not clearly grasp Beethoven's melodic line and reveal all its subtlety and purity of design. From the printed music he drew melody, to be sure, but a stickier, stodgier melody in slow passages, and a flimsier, more trivial melody in rapid passages, than Beethoven wrote.

It was a surprise to some to find Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture on the program of a pair of symphony concerts. In Boston that piece has for a good many years been relegated to the Pops and the movie houses. Many listeners, among them the present writer, dislike the "1812" overture intensely, not merely because it is now hopelessly hackneyed, but because of the overemphasis of its final climax, one of the emptiest and noisiest in all music.

But even listeners thus prejudiced against the piece could not fail to be struck with the tremendous dramatic power of Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation and impressed by the ingenuity with which he avoided wherever possible all suggestion of the commonplaces of music. He made the "1812" overture sound much better than it has sounded before, and won rapturous applause from the audience.

After hearing Dvorak's "New World" symphony the other day and "1812" yesterday one is inclined to surmise that Dr Koussevitzky intends this season occasionally to regale the Boston Symphony audiences with "popular classics," with the sort of piece that is the mainstay of the Pops programs. By so doing he would undoubtedly please very many of the subscribers. If Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and Victor Herbert's arrangement of "The Rosary" are played in due course, they will be heartily applauded, let the musical intelligentsia sneer, as it unquestionably will.

But, after all, is not the purpose of these Symphony concerts the performance, not of the most popular music in the world, but of the best? From Bach to Stravinsky the repertory of orchestral music is full of things that are not, and will probably never be popular in the sense that "1812" is popular. No audience large enough to fill Symphony Hall exists anywhere in the world, which is devoted only to the best music. In these matters the subscribers trust the conductor to maintain a standard most of them would not attempt to decide upon for themselves.

Next week, if the announced program is not altered, the audience will hear Bax' Second Symphony and Ravel's Bolero repeated, also Walton's "Portsmouth Point" and Mr Loeffler's new "Cantum fratris Solis," with Povla Frijsh as soloist.

MR AND MRS MAY OSER

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
DEC 29 1929

Russian Exiles Will Be Aided By Concert

Boston Symphony to Play At Carnegie Hall for Fund

MRS. HENRY P. LOOMIS, President of the American Society for Relief of Russian exiles, announces that plans have been completed for the first non-subscription concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at 2:30 o'clock on Friday afternoon, Jan. 10, at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the Russian exiles. The program, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has volunteered to conduct, will be all-Russian. It will consist of the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky; Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from "Sadko;" the concerto for violin and orchestra by Prokofieff, Stravinsky's orchestral suite from "Petrouchka," and Tchaikowsky's 1812 Overture.

Among the patrons and patronesses are: Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. John Henry Hammond, Mr. and Mrs. William J. Schieffelin, Mr. and Mrs. George Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. Myron C. Taylor, Mrs. Adolph Ladenburg, Mr. and Mrs. Ashton de Peyster, Mrs. William E. Wheelock, Mrs. Donald W. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Landon K. Thorne, Albert M. Bagby, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Harkness, Mrs. William T. Hildrup, Mrs. Harleston Deacon, Robert Fulton Cutting, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Littlejohn, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Loomis, Miss Lucile Thornton, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. Schuyler N. Warren, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris.

Tickets for the concert can be obtained by writing to the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, 522 Fifth Avenue, or at the Carnegie Hall box-office.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXPRESS
DEC 28 1929

NEWS ABOUT PROKOFIEFF

Serge Prokofieff has been commissioned to write a special composition commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The world premiere of his "Le Joueuer," to which he contributed both words and music, took place at the Theater de la Monnaie, Brussels, April 29. On April 17 the first performance of Prokofieff's Third Symphony, conducted by Monteux, took place in Paris. Diaghileff opened his ballet season May 21 at Paris with Prokofieff's "Le Fils Prodigue." The composer conducted middle of the 1929-1930 season. He will appear before many of the coast-to-coast chapters of Pro-Musica. Prokofieff has been engaged by many of the major orchestras including the Los Angeles Philharmonic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
DEC 29 1929

Announcement has been made of the special non-subscription concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall, Friday afternoon, Jan. 10, for the benefit of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles in collaboration with the High Commission for Refugees League of Nations and International Anti-Tuberculosis Union.

The all-Russian program will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. It will consist of the prelude to "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky; Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from "Sadko;" the concerto for violin and orchestra by Prokofieff; Stravinsky's orchestral suite from "Petrouchka," and Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

Prokofieff's violin concerto will be played by Benno Rabinoff, who has just returned from a concert tour abroad. He is a pupil of Prof. Leopold Auer who, it will be remembered, arranged a special concert for him two years ago, in which Mr. Rabinoff was the violin soloist to the accompaniment of the Philharmonic Orchestra, with Prof. Auer himself conducting.

AUSTRAL SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Wagner Program Given to Aid Pension Fund

Globe Dec 30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its annual concerts in aid of the pension fund for retired players yesterday afternoon. An audience which filled Symphony Hall applauded orchestra, conductor and the soloist, Florence Austral, at every opportunity. Miss Austral's voice, one of the greatest this generation has heard, and her admirable singing of three Wagner excerpts, the best Wagner singing heard in Boston in concert in many a long year, made this concert memorable.

Dr Koussevitzky arranged a program which illustrated the development of Wagner's genius. It began with the overture and "Senta's Ballad," from "The Flying Dutchman." The other numbers were the Bacchanale and Elisabeth's "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser," the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," the "Ride of the Valkyries," and the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan."

As always it seemed incredible that the same man who, in the 1840's, wrote "The Flying Dutchman," with its commonplace harmonies and noisy orchestration, could 20 years later rise to the height of the excerpts from "Meistersinger" and "Tristan." In the work of no other great composer is there such a gulf between his early and his later music.

Miss Austral has one of the finest dramatic soprano voices now to be heard anywhere in the world, with a phenomenal volume and a ringing intensity of quality that make it almost ideally suited to Wagner. She uses her voice with musical and dramatic intelligence of a very high order. Nobody within the memory of persons under 40 has sung "Dich, Theure Halle" and the "Liebestod" in Boston, either in opera or in concert, so well as Miss Austral sang them yesterday.

It is strange that so great a singer, with many outstanding successes in Wagner in European opera houses to her credit, should not have been heard in opera in the United States. The only Wagnerian soprano comparable to her whom Boston has heard in recent years is Frida Leider, now an ornament of the Chicago Civic Opera. But Miss Leider's voice has not the phenomenal power of Miss Austral's.

Enthusiasm over a great singer, in a day when great singers with great voices are the rarest of visitors to our concert halls, should not lead anyone into taking as a mere matter of course the greatness of the Boston Syphony Orchestra. The other day the pianist Iturbi remarked to an interviewer that three of the four finest orchestras in the world were in America.

The four greatest orchestras, according to Iturbi, whose triumphantly successful career has brought him solo appearances with orchestras the world over, are the Boston Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, New York Philharmonic, and Amsterdam Concertgeboeuw. He tactfully refrained from ranking the four in order of excellence.

The Boston Symphony under Dr Koussevitzky has by common consent regained its proud position among the world's greatest, unsurpassed anywhere. Its playing yesterday, as always these days, proved its right to be counted among the most superb of the instruments upon which celebrated conductors perform.

Wagner, however, is not a composer in whose music Dr Koussevitzky excels. Yesterday the latter part of the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," and the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" were taken at a pace strangely slow and in a mood inappropriately languishing. Nor was the interpretation of the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" an artistic triumph comparable to those scored by Dr Koussevitzky in such things as Ravel's Bolero and Tchaikovsky's "1812." The conductor was at his best yesterday in the sound and fury of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. P. R.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

ROME—Ottorino Respighi, Italian maestro, has accepted an offer to write the symphony for the Boston Symphony orchestra to be used in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the organization's foundation.

PENSION AN EPIC CONCERT

Mme. Austral, Wagnerian Singer, a Notable Aid

Post Dec 30

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Wagner concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its Pension Fund are no novelty. Nor has the orchestra on such occasions gone always without competent and helpful vocal embellishment. But yesterday, at Symphony Hall, there came a Pension Fund Wagner concert with a notable Wagnerian singer, Florence Austral, to aid. And that was novelty indeed.

IN PRESENCE OF GREATNESS

As was wholly appropriate, the best came last yesterday, in the shape of the "Tristan" Prelude and "Love-Death," and the large audience by its pronounced and protracted enthusiasm showed itself sensible of the fact that it had been in the presence of greatness: great music, great singing, great orchestral playing and great conducting. Many times were Dr. Koussevitzky and Miss Austral recalled, and at length the conductor bade the players rise and bow their acknowledgments.

The programme of yesterday's concert was ingeniously made. First there was the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and after it Senta's Ballad, from that opera, seldom enough sung hereabouts. Here was the early Wagner, a giant in swaddling clothes but a giant for all that. Followed the Bacchanale from the later, Parisian version of "Tannhauser," a glowing page for which Dr. Koussevitzky displays especial sympathy although there have been those who dissented from this or that detail in his reading of it. And as pendant to this came a bit from the original "Tannhauser," music still as fresh as on the day when it was penned, Elizabeth's greeting to the Hall of Song.

For the rest there was, and richly played, the noble apotheosis of Hans Sachs that is the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and the Ride of the Valkyries, again at the dizzy pace which Dr. Koussevitzky fancies here.

To Senta's Ballad, which she sang in English, Miss Austral brought yesterday its three essential moods: the wild terror at the thought of the spectreship and its doomed captain, the maid's calm faith that the sacrifice of one who truly loved him would lift the Dutchman's curse, and the passionate exaltation in which she proclaims herself as his potential deliverer. And Miss Austral, who was later to voice so eloquently the emotions of the Isolde who had learned all that there was to know of love and life, could also bring to the music of Elizabeth a note of virginal innocence and maidenly joy.

Music Notes and Comment

Those who do not subscribe to series of Boston Symphony concerts have next Sunday afternoon an excellent opportunity to hear the great orchestra that is Boston's chief musical glory play a Wagner program for the benefit of its pension fund. Florence Austral, one of the greatest of living singers, will be heard as soloist.

Dr Koussevitzky has chosen as the program a piece by the Russian composer Gliere, born in 1875 and known here by his tone poem "The Sirens," entitled "The Saporoshtzy Cossacks." This composition, described by a Russian analyst as a "symphonic tone picture ballet," was suggested by a painting by Ilya Repin, which hangs in a Moscow gallery. Its subject, drawn from Russian history, depicts the leaders of Cossack tribes engaged in drawing up a scurrilous defiance of the Turkish Sultan Mohammed IV, in 1680, in answer to a letter from him commanding that they recognize his suzerainty. At this week's concerts the English cellist, Felix Salmond, heard in Bloch's rhapsody "Solomon," or 'Schelomo."

Herald Dec 30

MUSIC

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Yesterday's concert in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, the sixtieth, no less, for the purpose, proved an occasion of beauty and splendor, almost of solemnity. People knew it would be an event. They "sensed" as much in the air, forbidding and damp though it was, on the way to Symphony Hall; once in a way a happy presentiment of the sort does make itself felt, although nobody can quite tell why. Perhaps the press of cars at the corner, which raised erossing the street to the pitch of a perilous adventure, had a hand in spreading the right atmosphere abroad.

The right atmosphere, at all events, prevailed, inside the hall as well as out. An audience filling every seat sat mighty expectant, all looking for something apart. For the spell of Wagner still holds its power unlessened by one iota. For real romance the world is still eager. But of course the romance must be genuine, not commonplace ragged out.

So wild a note of high romance Dr. Koussevitzky found in the "Flying Dutchman" overture that he startled some of his hearers. He made the music sound not early Wagner, but at the least of it post-Ring. He also made it hard for Mme. Florence Austral, who sang Senta's ballad, to follow him to the same dizzy level of expression and picturesqueness.

With less of novelty but with a finer beauty Dr. Koussevitzky read the Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser." Magnificiently, in very truth, he blazoned forth this glorified ballet music. Leda's swan, satyrs and the three graces—not for one second were they missed. Also Mme. Austral, more at home with "Tannhaeuser" than with the Hollaender, gave of her beautiful voice successfully in Elizabeth's "Dich, Heure Halle."

All this was lofty. But loftier lowed when Dr. Koussevitzky p the prelude to the third act of Meistersinger." Every exquisite dious phrase, as it fell, rhythm right and entrancingly sonorous the refreshed and satisfied ear, st memories of the blessed Sunday that the Hans Sachs of Emil Fis when the curtain rose on act t personified.

Here was the solemnity of the a noon, crowning perfect beauty. there was a second solemn mon when Dr. Koussevitzky, after the fr of applause that greeted the Valky ride, motioned the orchestra to st This was a significant moment.

It led to a thrillingly beautiful ormance of the prelude to "Trist and the Love-Death in which M Austral joined. For sheer musician surely Dr. Koussevitzky has never passed the high point he reached this prelude. Since emotion held with musicianship, the performa moving as well as beautiful, was to be remembered this many a da

The audience applauded Mme. A tral, Dr. Koussevitzky and the pla with enthusiasm. R. R. C

WAR VETERAN AGED

NEW YORK
AMERICAN
JAN 1 - 1930

Benefit Concert Gets Aid of El

THE list of patrons, patr esses and boxholders the benefit concert of the Bos Symphony Orchestra on Fri afternoon, January 10, at C negie Hall, includes:

Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, Mrs. erick Lothrop Ames, Mrs. Albert Bagby, Mrs. Charles Tracy Barney, and Mrs E. Farrar Bateson, Mr. Mrs. Gordon Knox Bell, Mrs. Donal Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Trowbridge way, Mrs. Eunice Putnam Chadbo Mrs. Charles A. Childs, Mr. and Arthur Osgood Choate, Mrs. Richar Colgate, Mr. and Mrs George Eustis coran, Mrs. Charles H. Coster, Jr., Winthrop Cowdin, Mr. and Mrs. F. K bury Curtis, Mr. Robert Fulton Cu Mrs Harleston Deacon, Mr. and Marius de Brabant, Mr. and Mrs. Ross Delafield, Mr. and Mrs. Ashto Peyster, the Duchesse de Richelieu and Mrs. William F. Dominick, M Bradhurst Field, Mrs. Charles S rie, Mr. and Mrs. Harry L. Hamlin and Mrs. John Henry Hammond and Mrs. Edward J. Haney, Mr. and Edward S. Harkness, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Hewitt, Mr. and Mrs. Jam Higginson, Jr.

Mrs. William T. Hildrup, Jr., Eliot Betts Hoadley, Miss Anne Sh Hoyt, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus King Adolph Ladenberg, Mr. and Mrs. Larkin, Mr. and Mrs Robert Littl Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Loomis, M Mrs. Clarence F. MacMurray, George T. Maxwell, Mr and Mrs. ence Blair Mitchell, Mrs. John M Mitchell, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis G neur Morris, Mr. and Mrs. Henry ter Pease, Mrs. Alfred Duane Pell William Peyton, Mrs. Percy Riv Pyne, Mr. and Mrs. George Roberts Elihu Root, Jr., Mr and Mrs. Jo Ryan, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur F. Sche horn, Mr. and Mrs. William Jay S felin, Mrs. Alfred Seton, Miss Ge Robinson Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Myr Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Th Mr. and Mrs. Landon K. Thorne and Mrs. Samuel Thorne, Miss Thornton, Mr. and Mrs. Schuyler N. Warren and Mrs. William E. Wheelock.

NEW YORK
TIMES
DEC 29 1929

TWO BENEFITS

The Russian Relief and Hospital Unit Lay Plans

PLANS are being formed for a non-subscription performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the afternoon of Jan. 10 at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the American Society for the Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc. It is being arranged by this group in collaboration with the High Commission for Refugees of the League of Nations and International Anti-Tuberculosis Union. Mrs. Henry P. Loomis is president of the American society.

The program, which will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will consist of all Russian music, including the prelude to "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, Rimsky Korsakoff's suite from "Sadko," the concerto for violin and orchestra by Prokofieff, Stravinsky's orchestral suite from "Petrouchka" and Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture."

Tickets may be secured at the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, 522 Fifth Avenue, or at Carnegie Hall.

Taking Note Of Week-End Music-Making

Hans Jan 6

Mr. Loeffler Again Honored, The Maturing Heifetz, Parisian Visitors

THE AUDIENCE of Saturday evening at the Symphony Concert listened intently to Mr. Loeffler's setting of St. Francis's "Canticle to The Sun"; applauded the composer, the singer (Mme. Frijsh), the conductor, the orchestra, no less warmly than had the listeners of Friday. Again the bowing three, with the standing orchestra behind them, were climax to the whole. Since the distant day of the Symphony, called "Hora Mystica," Mr. Loeffler has not set before his own city so rarefied a music. An exacting audience heard it eagerly, answered with applause in which musical appreciation and personal regard were justly mingled. . . . In turn, the repetition of Ravel's "Bolero" fared as indifferently as it had on Friday. The listening was nonchalant; the applause no heartier than any displayful piece might excite. . . . And the Saturday audience still hears doubtingly the new Symphony of Mr. Bax. As the signs went, it is interested rather than impressed; seems still to doubt whether a living and a modern English composer can really be true when he spreads so spacious a canvas; sweeps across it from fervor to fervor; fills it with significant music that is stranger neither to vigor and wildness nor, in the slow movement, to troubled beauty.

Above most of his fellow-conductors, Dr. Koussevitzky does not forget his more deserving "novelties" as soon as he has played them. Not only does he repeat them after a few weeks, as he did on Friday and Saturday with Mr Bax's Symphony and Ravel's "Bolero," he actually tries to keep one and another in the active repertory. Though to some it will seem rank blasphemy, Mr. Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point," deserves such place quite as much as Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," to be resurrected tomorrow. Nowadays, Byron's dramatic poem reposes unread in his "collected works:" while Schumann's prelude shines only in the reflected light of orchestral tradition and his own richer-furnished, more enduring, music. Mr. Walton, beside him, is only a youthful Englishman and a born modernist.

Therefore most of us hear "Portsmouth Point" as though it were curtain-raiser to a serious concert, or cocktail before the baked meats. Whereas, its short motivs and breathless phrases tumble about in dazzling discordance; the colors flash; the rhythms spring; the little hornpipe dances; the whole is as buoyant and bright as a blowy, sun-drenched day, with the orchestra swaggering and shouting "all over the place." Once in so often, for the good of our souls, it is better to be lusty than refined; while not once does Mr. Walton's Overture turn loose-lipped and merely noisy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
DEC 29 1929

Russian Exiles Will Be Aided By Concert

Boston Symphony to Play At Carnegie Hall for Fund

MRS. HENRY P. LOOMIS, President of the American Society for Relief of Russian exiles, announces that plans have been completed for the first non-subscription concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at 2:30 o'clock on Friday afternoon, Jan. 10, at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the Russian exiles. The program, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has volunteered to conduct, will be all-Russian. It will consist of the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky; Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from "Sadko;" the concerto for violin and orchestra by Prokofieff, Stravinsky's orchestral suite from "Petrouchka," and Tchaikowsky's 1812 Overture.

Among the patrons and patronesses are: Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. John Henry Hammond, Mr. and Mrs. William J. Schieffelin, Mr. and Mrs. George Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. Myron C. Taylor, Mrs. Adolph Ladenburg, Mr. and Mrs. Ashton de Peyster, Mrs. William E. Wheelock, Mrs. Donald W. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Landon K. Thorne, Albert M. Bagby, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Harkness, Mrs. William T. Hildrup, Mrs. Harleston Deacon, Robert Fulton Cutting, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Littlejohn, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Loomis, Miss Lucile Thornton, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. Schuyler N. Warren, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris.

Tickets for the concert can be obtained by writing to the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, 522 Fifth Avenue, or at the Carnegie Hall box-office.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXPRESS
DEC 28 1929

NEWS ABOUT PROKOFIEFF

Serge Prokofieff has been commissioned to write a special composition commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The world premiere of his "Le Joueuer," to which he contributed both words and music, took place at the Theater de la Monnaie, Brussels, April 29. On April 17 the first performance of Prokofieff's Third Symphony, conducted by Monteux, took place in Paris. Diaghileff opened his ballet season May 21 at Paris with Prokofieff's "Le Fils Prodigue." The composer conducted middle of the 1929-1930 season. He will appear before many of the coast-to-coast chapters of Pro-Musica. Prokofieff has been engaged by many of the major orchestras including the Los Angeles Philharmonic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
DEC 29 1929

AUSTRAL SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Wagner Program Given to Aid Pension Fund

Globe Dec 30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its annual concerts in aid of the pension fund for retired players yesterday afternoon. An audience which filled Symphony Hall applauded orchestra, conductor and the soloist, Florence Austral, at every opportunity. Miss Austral's voice, one of the greatest this generation has heard, and her admirable singing of three Wagner excerpts, the best Wagner singing heard in Boston in concert in many a long year, made this concert memorable.

Dr Koussevitzky arranged a program which illustrated the development of Wagner's genius. It began with the overture and "Senta's Ballad," from "The Flying Dutchman." The other numbers were the Bacchanale and Elisabeth's "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser," the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," the "Ride of the Valkyries," and the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan."

As always it seemed incredible that the same man who, in the 1840's, wrote "The Flying Dutchman," with its commonplace harmonies and noisy orchestration, could 20 years later rise to the height of the excerpts from "Meistersinger" and "Tristan." In the work of no other great composer is there such a gulf between his early and his later music.

Miss Austral has one of the finest dramatic soprano voices now to be heard anywhere in the world, with a phenomenal volume and a ringing intensity of quality that make it almost ideally suited to Wagner. She uses her voice with musical and dramatic intelligence of a very high order. Nobody within the memory of persons under 40 has sung "Dich, Theure Halle" and the "Liebestod" in Boston, either in opera or in concert, so well as Miss Austral sang them yesterday.

It is strange that so great a singer, with many outstanding successes in Wagner in European opera houses to her credit, should not have been heard in opera in the United States. The only Wagnerian soprano comparable to her whom Boston has heard in recent years is Frida Leider, now an ornament of the Chicago Civic Opera. But Miss Leider's voice has not the phenomenal power of Miss Austral's.

Enthusiasm over a great singer, in a day when great singers with great voices are the rarest of visitors to our concert halls, should not lead anyone into taking as a mere matter of course the greatness of the Boston Syphony Orchestra. The other day the pianist Iturbi remarked to an interviewer that three of the four finest orchestras in the world were in America.

The four greatest orchestras, according to Iturbi, whose triumphantly successful career has brought him solo appearances with orchestras the world over, are the Boston Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, New York Philharmonic, and Amsterdam Concertgebouw. He tactfully refrained from ranking the four in order of excellence.

The Boston Symphony under Dr Koussevitzky has by common consent regained its proud position among the world's greatest, unsurpassed anywhere. Its playing yesterday, as always these days, proved its right to be counted among the most superb of the instruments upon which celebrated conductors perform.

Wagner, however, is not a composer in whose music Dr Koussevitzky excels. Yesterday the latter part of the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," and the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" were taken at a pace strangely slow and in a mood inappropriately languishing. Nor was the interpretation of the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" an artistic triumph comparable to those scored by Dr Koussevitzky in such things as Ravel's Bolero and Tchaikovsky's "1812." The conductor was at his best yesterday in the sound and fury of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. P. R.

Announcement has been made of the special non-subscription concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall, Friday afternoon, Jan. 10, for the benefit of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles in collaboration with the High Commission for Refugees League of Nations and International Anti-Tuberculosis Union.

The all-Russian program will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. It will consist of the prelude to "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky; Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from "Sadko;" the concerto for violin and orchestra by Prokofieff; Stravinsky's orchestral suite from "Petrouchka," and Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

Prokofieff's violin concerto will be played by Benno Rabinoff, who has just returned from a concert tour abroad. He is a pupil of Prof. Leopold Auer who, it will be remembered, arranged a special concert for him two years ago, in which Mr. Rabinoff was the violin soloist to the accompaniment of the Philharmonic Orchestra, with Prof. Auer himself conducting.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

ROME—Ottorino Respighi, Italian maestro, has accepted an offer to write the symphony for the Boston Symphony orchestra to be used in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the organization's foundation.

PENSION AN EPIC CONCERT

Mme. Austral, Wagnerian Singer, a Notable Aid

Post Dec 30

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Wagner concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its Pension Fund are no novelty. Nor has the orchestra on such occasions gone always without competent and helpful vocal embellishment. But yesterday, at Symphony Hall, there came a Pension Fund Wagner concert with a notable Wagnerian singer, Florence Austral, to aid. And that was novelty indeed.

IN PRESENCE OF GREATNESS

As was wholly appropriate, the best came last yesterday, in the shape of the "Tristan" Prelude and "Love-Death," and the large audience by its pronounced and protracted enthusiasm showed itself sensible of the fact that it had been in the presence of greatness: great music, great singing, great orchestral playing and great conducting. Many times were Dr. Koussevitzky and Miss Austral recalled, and at length the conductor bade the players rise and bow their acknowledgments.

The programme of yesterday's concert was ingeniously made. First there was the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and after it Senta's Ballad, from that opera, seldom enough sung hereabouts. Here was the early Wagner, a giant in swaddling clothes but a giant for all that. Followed the Bacchanale from the later, Parisian version of "Tannhauser," a glowing page for which Dr. Koussevitzky displays especial sympathy although there have been those who dissented from this or that detail in his reading of it. And as pendant to this came a bit from the original "Tannhauser," music still as fresh as on the day when it was penned, Elizabeth's greeting to the Hall of Song.

For the rest there was, and richly played, the noble apotheosis of Hans Sachs that is the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and the Ride of the Valkyries, again at the dizzy pace which Dr. Koussevitzky fancies here.

To Senta's Ballad, which she sang in English, Miss Austral brought yesterday its three essential moods: the wild terror at the thought of the spectreship and its doomed captain, the maid's calm faith that the sacrifice of one who truly loved him would lift the Dutchman's curse, and the passionate exaltation in which she proclaims herself as his potential deliverer. And Miss Austral, who was later to voice so eloquently the emotions of the Isolde who had learned all that there was to know of love and life, could also bring to the music of Elizabeth a note of virginal innocence and maidenly joy.

Music Notes and Comment

Those who do not subscribe to series of Boston Symphony concerts have next Sunday afternoon an excellent opportunity to hear the great orchestra that is Boston's chief musical glory play a Wagner program for the benefit of its pension fund. Florence Austral, one of the greatest of living singers, will be heard as soloist.

Dr Koussevitzky has chosen as the program a piece by the Russian composer Gliere, born in 1875 and known here by his tone poem "The Sirens," entitled "The Saporoshtzy Cossacks." This composition, described by a Russian analyst as a "symphonic tone picture ballet," was suggested by a painting by Ilya Repin, which hangs in a Moscow gallery. Its subject, drawn from Russian history, depicts the leaders of Cossack tribes engaged in drawing up a scurrilous defiance of the Turkish Sultan Mohammed IV, in 1680, in answer to a letter from him commanding that they recognize his suzerainty. At this week's concerts the English cellist, Felix Salmond, heard in Bloch's rhapsody "Solomon," or 'Schelomo."

Handel and Haydn Society will

Herald Dec 30

MUSIC

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Yesterday's concert in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, the sixtieth, no less, for the purpose, proved an occasion of beauty and splendor, almost of solemnity. People knew it would be an event. They "sensed" as much in the air, forbidding and damp though it was, on the way to Symphony Hall; once in a way a happy presentiment of the sort does make itself felt, although nobody can quite tell why. Perhaps the press of cars at the corner, which raised erossing the street to the pitch of a perilous adventure, had a hand in spreading the right atmosphere abroad.

The right atmosphere, at all events, prevailed, inside the hall as well as out. An audience filling every seat sat mighty expectant, all looking for something apart. For the spell of Wagner still holds its power unlessened by one iota. For real romance the world is still eager. But of course the romance must be genuine, not commonplace ragged out.

So wild a note of high romance Dr. Koussevitzky found in the "Flying Dutchman" overture that he startled some of his hearers. He made the music sound not early Wagner, but at the least of it post-Ring. He also made it hard for Mme. Florence Austral, who sang Senta's ballad, to follow him to the same dizzy level of expression and picturesqueness.

With less of novelty but with a finer beauty Dr. Koussevitzky read the Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser." Magnificiently, in very truth, he blazoned forth this glorified ballet music. Leda's swan, satyrs and the three graces—not for one second were they missed. Also Mme. Austral, more at home with "Tannhaeuser" than with the Hollaender, gave of her beautiful voice successfully in Elizabeth's aria "Dich, Heure Halle."

All this was lofty. But loftier followed when Dr. Koussevitzky played the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." Every exquisite melodious phrase, as it fell, rhythmically right and entrancingly sonorous, on the refreshed and satisfied ear, stirred memories of the blessed Sunday calm that the Hans Sachs of Emil Fischer, when the curtain rose on act three, personified.

Here was the solemnity of the afternoon, crowning perfect beauty. But there was a second solemn moment, when Dr. Koussevitzky, after the frenzy of applause that greeted the Valkyries' ride, motioned the orchestra to stand. This was a significant moment.

It led to a thrillingly beautiful performance of the prelude to "Tristan," and the Love-Death in which Mme. Austral joined. For sheer musicianship surely Dr. Koussevitzky has never surpassed the high point he reached in this prelude. Since emotion held pace with musicianship, the performance, moving as well as beautiful, was one to be remembered this many a day.

The audience applauded Mme. Austral, Dr. Koussevitzky and the players with enthusiasm. R. R. G.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN
JAN 1 - 1930

Benefit Concert Gets Aid of Elite

THE list of patrons, patronesses and boxholders for the benefit concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, January 10, at Carnegie Hall, includes:

Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, Mrs. Frederick Lothrop Ames, Mrs. Albert M. Bagby, Mrs. Charles Tracy Barney, Mr. and Mrs E. Farrar Bateson, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Knox Bell, Mrs. Donald W. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Trowbridge Callaway, Mrs. Eunice Putnam Chadbourne, Mrs. Charles A. Childs, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Osgood Choate, Mrs. Richard M. Colgate, Mr. and Mrs George Eustis Corcoran, Mrs. Charles H. Coster, Jr., Mrs. Winthrop Cowdin, Mr. and Mrs. F. Kingsbury Curtis, Mr. Robert Fulton Cutting, Mrs Harleston Deacon, Mr. and Mrs. Marius de Brabant, Mr. and Mrs. John Ross Delafield, Mr. and Mrs. Ashton de Peyster, Die Duchesse de Richelieu, Mr. and Mrs. William F. Dominick, Mrs. A. Bradhurst Field, Mrs. Charles S. Guthrie, Mr. and Mrs. Harry L. Hamlin, Mr. and Mrs. John Henry Hammond, Mr. and Mrs. Edward J. Hancy, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Harkness, Mr. and Mrs. John Robert Hewitt, Mr. and Mrs. James J Higginson, Jr.

Mrs. William T. Hildrup, Jr., Mrs. Eliot Betts Hoadley, Miss Anne Sherman Hoyt, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus King, Mrs. Adolph Ladenberg, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Larkin, Mr. and Mrs Robert Littlejohn, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Loomis, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence F. MacMurray, Mrs. George T. Maxwell, Mr and Mrs. Clarence Blair Mitchell, Mrs. John Murray Mitchell, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hollister Pease, Mrs. Alfred Duane Pell, Mrs. William Peyton, Mrs. Percy Rivington Pyne, Mr. and Mrs. George Roberts, Mrs. Elihu Root, Jr., Mr and Mrs. John D. Ryan, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur F. Schermerhorn, Mr. and Mrs. William Jay Schieffelin, Mrs. Alfred Seton, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Myron C. Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. Landon K. Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Thorne, Miss Lucile Thornton, Mr. and Mrs. Schuyler N. Warren and Mrs. William E. Wheelock.

NEW YORK
TIMES
DEC 29 1929

TWO BENEFITS

The Russian Relief and Hospital Unit Lay Plans

PLANS are being formed for a non-subscription performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the afternoon of Jan. 10 at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the American Society for the Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc. It is being arranged by this group in collaboration with the High Commission for Refugees of the League of Nations and International Anti-Tuberculosis Union. Mrs. Henry P. Loomis is president of the American society.

The program, which will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will consist of all Russian music, including the prelude to "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from "Sadko," the concerto for violin and orchestra by Prokofieff, Stravinsky's orchestral suite from "Petrouchka" and Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture."

Tickets may be secured at the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, 522 Fifth Avenue, or at Carnegie Hall.

MOVING
CO.
SHIPPING
TORAGE GIFTS
ment to All World NN CO.
MOVERS
E AND MOVING
St. HAN. 8000
n St. JAM. 4674
TON
eautiful estate accessible but d of equally though of the n yet it has o make it an who is seeking e average. It with fireplace. lful mahogany ace and large Second floor two baths and acious grounds ees and shrubs most beautiful riced low for TOR. Lexingnone LEX ing-NING, Inc.
t, Boston
rd 8230
DGE
oms, 3 baths neighborhood and built to verage family.
Y & CO.
OR ter 3478
d 28
ESTATE
00 fruit trees, kinds of trees 110-ft. barn; ges with imansion house. k walnut and illage. Town big house for ttages or all
LISS
l. Littleton 99
ja 3
ME SITE
d street, overnding country

Concert-Chronicle

St. Francis at Symphony Hall

UPON the program of the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky has placed a notable work by a composer dwelling in the environs of Boston; for the performance has called in the singer from the outset associated with it. The work is Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis" or "Song of Brother Sun," more often called "The Canticle of the Sun"; the singer is that intelligent musician, Mme. Povla Frijsh. The 'Canticle of the Sun" is one of the last great hymns of St. Francis of Assisi. Mr. Loeffler's musical setting was written on commission for the first festival of chamber music in the Library of Congress, to which institution upon her own "foundation," Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge had confided the perpetuation of her annual rites at Pittsfield. At Washington, on Oct. 28, 1925, the new "Canticle" was heard for the first time from Mme. Frijsh and a chamber-orchestra of about thirty players, with Mr. Frederick Stock of Chicago as conductor.

When in 1224, at the age of forty-four, the gentle Francis, broken in body, sore in heart at the crudities of a world so completely the opposite of himself, gave vent to his feelings, it was not to utter lamentations or complaints, but to raise a hymn of praise. For all the material and elemental blessings of life he lauded "the good Lord God." When the surgeons of the day administered treatment which nowadays seems brutal, when there was no relief in sight, he added significantly the verse in praise of "our sister, the death of the body." And, since he considered the sun the crown of creation, since he recalled that "In Scripture the Lord Himself is called 'The Sun of Righteousness'" he gave to his verses for name, "The Song of Brother Sun."

Francis of Assisi (he was not then, of course, a saint) characteristically disdained the use of pompous Latin for his poem. Instead, he used the Umbrian dialect of his day—and scholars have given him credit as a founder of Italian religious poetry. For his setting Mr. Loeffler has used a modern Italian version furnished him by Mr. Gino Perera. Program books have carried an English translation by Matthew Arnold, as follows:

"O most high, almighty, good Lord God, to thee belong praise, glory, honor, and all blessing!

"Praised be my Lord for our mother the earth, the which doth sustain us and keep us, and bringeth forth divers fruits, and flowers of many colors, and grass.

"Praised be my Lord for our sister water, who is very serviceable unto us, and humble, and precious, and clean.

"Praised be my Lord for our brother the wind, and for air and cloud, calms and all weather, by which thou upholdest in life all creatures.

"Praised be my Lord for our brtoher fire, through whom thou givest us light in the darkness; and he is bright, and pleasant, and very mighty, and strong.

"Praised be my Lord for our sister, the death of the body, from whom no man escapeth. Woe to him who dieth in mortal sin! Blessed are they who are found walking by the most holy will, for the second death shall have no power to do them harm.

"Praised be my Lord for all those who pardon one another for his love's sake, and who endure weakness and tribulation; blessed are they who peaceably shall endure, for thou, O most High, shalt give them a crown!

"Praised be my Lord for our sister the moon, and for the stars, the which he has set clear and lovely in heaven.

"Praised be my Lord God, with all his creatures; and specially our brother the sun, who brings us the day, and who brings us the light; fair is he, and shining with a very great splendor: O Lord, he signifies to us thee!

"Praise ye, and bless ye the Lord, and give thanks unto Him, and serve Him with great humility."

Mr. Loeffler wrote his score late in the winter and in the spring and summer of 1925; scored it for three flutes, English horn, two horns, celesta, piano, two harps, organ and strings, and, of course, the solo-voice. Each verse has its own characterizing music, be the source of the characterization an appropriate Gregorian motif from the church liturgy or the free, delineative imaginings of the com- own spirit. Mr. Loeffler does not music of great spiritual radiance, of rapt, inward exultation. And in this place no technical labels shall be applied to it.

Since the poem is a hymn of praise, it is fitting that the first verse (after some preluding) should sound the music of the "Deo gratias"; that in the final exulting climax about "our brother, the sun," the same motif should again gloriously recur. Writes Mr. Gilman: "Here the music of Loeffler is irradiated from within, as horns and organ, and finally the whole orchestra, join in a superb outburst on the 'Deo gratias.'" Further, one hears undulating harps in praise of "our sister water" in the third verse; tremulous and sighing harps, strings and winds, for "our brother the wind" of the fourth verse: the flickering of celesta, piano, harps and winds for "our brother fire" of the fifth verse. Then follows the verse in praise of "our sister, the death of the body." Mr. Loeffler prefaces it with music in which the introit "Ressurexit" occurs: accompanies it with an English horn singing the penitential "Kyrie eleison." After which a quickening of tempo, a music growing more and more radiant, bring us to tones of ineffable light in the apostrophe to the stars of the eighth verse. After which the climax as already described.

When New York heard Mr. Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" (from Madame Frijsh, Dr. Stokowski and his Philadelphians on Jan. 5, 1926) reviewers gave it warm praise. Mr. Downes wrote of it as a music of "grave and constrained nobility and of simple exaltation." And Mr. Gilman thus expressed himself, "The matchless words of Saint Francis have evidently stirred Loeffler very deeply. We recall no music of his since "Hora Mystica" which has seemed to us so searching in its beauty and intensity. It is rare music, exalted, unsullied, rapt. It is worthy of the poem." A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

As guest-conductor and composer, Mr. Glazunov will be heard with the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening, Jan. 16; in Symphony Hall at Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 17 and 18. On all three occasions the program will comprise his Sixth Symphony (in C minor); his Concerto for Violin; his tone-poem, "Stenka Razin." The violinist at each concert will be Mr. Benno Rabinov, a rising youth schooled by Auer.

For his concert of piano-pieces in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 12, Mr. Sanromá, lately returned with European laurels, announces these numbers, half of them—it is pleasure to write—from living composers:

Italian Concerto	Bach
Kreisleriana	Schumann
Ballad—Mazurka—Scherzo	Chopin
Six Little Piano-Pieces	Schönberg
Omaggi	Malipiero
March—Prelude	Prokoffiev
Polichinelle	Villa-Lobos
Joyous March	Halffter
Fantastic Dance, No. 1	Turina
El Puerto from "Iberia"	Albéniz
Fire-Dance from "Love the Sorcerer"	de Falla

The Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra is the larger by $10,000—gift last Sunday of a friend and benefactor who prefers to go unnamed. Evidently he, or she, directs generosity wisely.

In New York next week, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra will repeat on Thursday evening the program for tomorrow and Saturday at Symphony Hall: Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point"; Bax's new Symphony; Mr. ymn atur- they y in and Oc- oem, ero" lyn, e in will ym-

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Horse Is Guest

BOSTON, DEC. 28.—(WNS).—Twenty-two guests were assembled in the music room of Edgar Levinstein's Briardale farm at North Sudbury, on Christmas eve, listening to the music of Boston Symphony orchestra stars.

There came a stir at the door. In walked a groom and behind him, Pumpernickle, two-year-old thoroughbred and the pride of Levinstein's racing stables. The horse gazed around, cocked an ear to the music, then arched his neck as the women patted him. With the other instruments stilled, Cellist Zighera played for the horse, which seemed to be appreciative. Pumpernickle then turned and followed, without bridle or lead, the groom back out the door and to the stables.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

SYMPHONY CONCERT CAUSES TRAFFIC JAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was the magnet which last night drew thousands of vehicles into Westminster street and created a serious traffic jam. Beginning shortly before 8 o'clock, three lines of machines began the slow crawl from Turk's Head to the Albee Theatre and, after discharging their passengers, poured into Washington and Weybosset streets, crowding those thoroughfares.

Street car service was delayed greatly by the slow moving procession, and machines attempting to enter Westminster street from intersecting streets were forced to wait from five to 15 minutes in some instances before a break in the line gave them an opportunity.

At Washington and Mathewson streets, vehicles approaching in three directions caused an impasse which required several minutes to straighten out, long lines of traffic on both streets being held up in the meantime.

Conditions at 10 o'clock, after the concert, were somewhat better, machines intending to pick up passengers in front of the theatre keeping in line to the extreme left of the street, permitting street cars and through traffic to use the centre of the street.

Two traffic officers were stationed at Westminster and Mathewson streets and one at each other intersecting street along Westminster street.

The Players, The Numbers, The Incidents

Mr. Goossens's Second Inning, The Flute-Players Give A Fiftieth Concert

UNTIL the turn came of Respighi's "Roman Festivals," there were warmths at the Symphony Concert of Saturday. The audience frequenting it has a longer, quicker memory than the matrons and maidens of the matinée; received Mr. Goossens as remembered and welcome guest. In particular it was pleased with his version of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, covering him and the orchestra with long applause. It was as full of compliment and good will at the end of the conductor-composer's own Concertino, joining with him in the plaudits the cherished string - choir. At second and more familiar hearing that music also bettered itself. Through the first division, the rhythmic stride was Bach-like; the play of the several groups from counterpoint to counterpoint, apt and pithy; the whole, unlabored and unrelaxed in pervading animation. Preferring a folk-tune quality for the slow section, Mr. Goossens outdid the folk-pieces with his own melody. The first viola introduced it; the first violin farewelled it; between, the string orchestra gave it clear depths. It sang freshly and not too wistfully; it paraded no false pretense of sophisticated innocence. If in imagination the composer had overheard a solitary singer, with a keen sense of medium he transferred the song to his choirs. The finale, picking up a figure from the first division, escaped monotony in the gay play of rhythms and timbres; in the sudden interjection, Beethoven-like, of grave, low-pitched, full-toned measures. Throughout, the modern way with an old form refilled.

As for "Roman Festivals," there was good reason to suspect an audience that declined to take them seriously. Signor Respighi "presented" his popular fête and everyone was amused at the barker, the hand-organ, the gutter-tune, the stamping dances—as often as one or another scooted through the thick-voiced orchestra And what a welter of brass was his Circus Maximus, with the strings salving out of the din the song of the Christian martyrs! Some score with a pen; relentless Respighi now and then prefers a hammer. High-brows of the opera house reproach Puccini with banalities. Agreed: but he shines like a master beside the symphonic Respighi on sentimental "fall excursion" into the hills, or piously upturning eyes and ears at sight of marching pilgrims, at sound of ringing church-bells. What next? asked a few foreboding spirits. But we have the Signore's word that he has finished his Roman trilogy. No more between high-voiced and low-voiced instruments will he juggle the dins, ancient or modern, of Mussolini's city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAM

DEC 28 192

Symphony Concert to Aid Russian Exiles

Mrs. Henry P. Loomis, president of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, and her associates in that organization have taken over the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Friday afternoon, January 10, in Carnegie Hall, as a benefit. The program, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be all-Russian. It will consist of the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky. Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from "Sadko," the concerto for violin and orchestra by Prokofieff, Stravinsky's orchestral suite from "Petrouchka," and Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture.

Almost all of the first tier boxes have already been subscribed. Among the patrons and patronesses are Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. John Henry Hammond, Mr. and Mrs. William J. Schieffelin, Mr. and Mrs. George Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. Myron C. Taylor, Mrs. Adolph Ladenburg, Mr and Mrs. Frederic Ashton de Peyster, Mrs. William E. Wheelock, Mrs. Donald W. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Landon K. Thorne, Albert M. Bagby, Mr and Mrs. Edward S. Harkness, Mrs. William T. Hildrup, Jr., Mrs. Harleston Deacon, Robert Fulton Cutting, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Littlejohn, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Loomis, Miss Lucile Thornton, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. Schuyler N. Warren, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith and Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris.

Povla Frijsh Is Symphony Soloist

Events of the week at the Symphony are the first hearing of Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," and the repetition of Ravel's flaming and flamboyant "Bolero," by all odds the musical events of this season.

For the Loeffler canticle of the good St. Francis, Mme. Povla Frijsh, singer of ability and extraordinary restraint, was the soloist. Mme. Frijsh, as her many concerts have shown, is the possessor of a remarkable and darkly colored voice. To this, she adds innate intelligence in the art of song and a clarity of diction that overcomes even the vast distances of Symphony Hall.

For his part, Mr. Loeffler has turned his hand to another workmanlike and pleasing piece. Within its sonoroties, he does more than write music of religious exaltation, he catches and transmutes to music some of that inner flame that illumined St. Francis. It is a music of heights and depths, of contrasts sharply drawn. Even for Mr. Loeffler, it is no mean triumph.

The "Canticle" was the sole new piece of the day. For the rest there was the "Bolero" again with stamping of feet and clapping of hands to show the approval of the audience; Bax's Second Symphony, put on the program too quickly again after its first hearing, and Walton's brisk and breezy "Portsmouth Point."

With the Walton piece Mr. Koussevitzky was not at all successful. He took it at breakneck pace, he dulled the edges of the sharp-toned music. Not so long ago this same "Portsmouth Point" was the event of the week at the Symphony; yesterday, through its inept handling by conductor and orchestra, it fell flat.

SYMPHONY IN MODERNIST PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH

OF the four pieces that make up the program of this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra not a single piece was completed before 1925. This speaks eloquently for the manner in which Serge Koussevitzky has transformed these concerts from a museum of archaic exhibits to an almost experimental workshop of contemporary art.

Of principal interest for us, even though there was a novelty on the program, was the repetition of Arnold Bax' Symphony in two keys, the world premier of which was in the same hall three weeks ago. A second hearing strengthened our original impression that here is a work that stands out mountainously among the low flat hills of current modernist music.

It is true that the score sounded even more "derivative" than it did then; that there were reminiscences of such widely contrasted influences as Cesar Franck, who seems to have dominated the form in which this Symphony is cast, Rimsky-Korsakov and even Puccini in the first movement, Grieg in the second, Ravel and notably Borodine in the third. But it remains that Bax speaks from the heart as well as head in a speech that all men can understand, and not in the snobbish lingo of his contemporaries. Moreover, he has beautiful thoughts, to which to give utterance, not merely wise-cracks.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis," a hymn for voice and orchestra, after St. Francis of Assisi, was played here for the first time, Hailed as a masterpiece elsewhere, it was a partial disappointment to us. Allowance should be made for the late arrival here of Mme. Frijsh, who was detained by an overdue ocean liner. The audience was remarkably enthusiastic, recalling conductor, soloist and the composer many times

NEW YORK
EVENING POST

Another modern Italian novelty was fully accepted by a New York audience, at Saturday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This was Vicke Mangiagalli's "Prelude and Fugue." The prelude is a work of orchestral sonority, suited to Serge Koussevitzy's capacity for vivid effects, and the fugue is cunningly contrived and entertaining, so that the applause at the end was truly enthusiastic. The program included Bach's third "Brandenburg Concerto," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, the Interlude to the Strauss opera, "Intermezzo," and Ravel's "Bolero."

H. B.

Concert-Chronicle

St. Francis at Symphony Hall

UPON the program of the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky has placed a notable work by a composer dwelling in the environs of Boston; for the performance has called in the singer from the outset associated with it. The work is Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis" or "Song of Brother Sun," more often called "The Canticle of the Sun"; the singer is that intelligent musician, Mme. Povla Frijsh. The 'Canticle of the Sun" is one of the last great hymns of St. Francis of Assisi. Mr. Loeffler's musical setting was written on commission for the first festival of chamber music in the Library of Congress, to which institution upon her own "foundation," Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge had confided the perpetuation of her annual rites at Pittsfield. At Washington, on Oct. 28, 1925, the new "Canticle" was heard for the first time from Mme. Frijsh and a chamber-orchestra of about thirty players, with Mr. Frederick Stock of Chicago as conductor.

When in 1224, at the age of forty-four, the gentle Francis, broken in body, sore in heart at the crudities of a world so completely the opposite of himself, gave vent to his feelings, it was not to utter lamentations or complaints, but to raise a hymn of praise. For all the material and elemental blessings of life he lauded "the good Lord God." When the surgeons of the day administered treatment which nowadays seems brutal, when there was no relief in sight, he added significantly the verse in praise of "our sister, the death of the body." And, since he considered the sun the crown of creation, since he recalled that "in Scripture the Lord Himself is called 'The Sun of Righteousness'" he gave to his verses for name, "The Song of Brother Sun."

Francis of Assisi (he was not then, of course, a saint) characteristically disdained the use of pompous Latin for his poem. Instead, he used the Umbrian dialect of his day—and scholars have given him credit as a founder of Italian religious poetry. For his setting Mr. Loeffler has used a modern Italian version furnished him by Mr. Gino Perera. Program books have carried an English translation by Matthew Arnold, as follows:

"O most high, almighty, good Lord God, to thee belong praise, glory, honor, and all blessing!

"Praised be my Lord for our mother the earth, the which doth sustain us and keep us, and bringeth forth divers fruits, and flowers of many colors, and grass.

"Praised be my Lord for our sister water, who is very serviceable unto us, and humble, and precious, and clean.

"Praised be my Lord for our brother the wind, and for air and cloud, calms and all weather, by which thou upholdest in life all creatures.

"Praised be my Lord for our brtoher fire, through whom thou givest us light in the darkness; and he is bright, and pleasant, and very mighty, and strong.

"Praised be my Lord for our sister, the death of the body, from whom no man escapeth. Woe to him who dieth in mortal sin! Blessed are they who are found walking by the most holy will, for the second death shall have no power to do them harm.

"Praised be my Lord for all those who pardon one another for his love's sake, and who endure weakness and tribulation; blessed are they who peaceably shall endure, for thou, O most High, shalt give them a crown!

"Praised be my Lord for our sister the moon, and for the stars, the which he has set clear and lovely in heaven.

"Praised be my Lord God, with all his creatures; and specially our brother the sun, who brings us the day, and who brings us the light; fair is he, and shining with a very great splendor: O Lord, he signifies to us thee!

"Praise ye, and bless ye the Lord, and give thanks unto Him, and serve Him with great humility."

Mr. Loeffler wrote his score late in the winter and in the spring and summer of 1925; scored it for three flutes, English horn, two horns, celesta, piano, two harps, organ and strings, and, of course, the solo-voice. Each verse has its own characterizing music, be the source of the characterization an appropriate Gregorian motif from the church liturgy or the free, delineative imaginings of the composers's own spirit. Mr. Loeffler does not write a music of ascetic mysticism. More deeply does he penetrate into the heart of the saint. His setting is, rather, a music of great spiritual radiance, of rapt, inward exultation. And in this place no technical labels shall be applied to it.

Since the poem is a hymn of praise, it is fitting that the first verse (after some preluding) should sound the music of the "Deo gratias"; that in the final exulting climax about "our brother, the sun," the same motif should again gloriously recur. Writes Mr. Gilman: "Here the music of Loeffler is irradiated from within, as horns and organ, and finally the whole orchestra, join in a superb outburst on the 'Deo gratias.'" Further, one hears undulating harps in praise of "our sister water" in the third verse; tremulous and sighing harps, strings and winds, for "our brother the wind" of the fourth verse: the flickering of celesta, piano, harps and winds for "our brother fire" of the fifth verse. Then follows the verse in praise of "our sister, the death of the body." Mr. Loeffler prefaces it with music in which the introit "Ressurexit" occurs: accompanies it with an English horn singing the penitential "Kyrie eleison." After which a quickening of tempo, a music growing more and more radiant, bring us to tones of ineffable light in the apostrophe to the stars of the eighth verse. After which the climax as already described.

When New York heard Mr. Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" (from Madame Frijsh, Dr. Stokowski and his Philadelphians on Jan. 5, 1926) reviewers gave it warm praise. Mr. Downes wrote of it as a music of "grave and constrained nobility and of simple exaltation." And Mr. Gilman thus expressed himself, "The matchless words of Saint Francis have evidently stirred Loeffler very deeply. We recall no music of his since "Hora Mystica" which has seemed to us so searching in its beauty and intensity. It is rare music, exalted, unsullied, rapt. It is worthy of the poem." A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

As guest-conductor and composer, Mr. Glazunov will be heard with the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening, Jan. 16; in Symphony Hall at Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 17 and 18. On all three occasions the program will comprise his Sixth Symphony (in C minor); his Concerto for Violin; his tone-poem, "Stenka Razin." The violinist at each concert will be Mr. Benno Rabinov, a rising youth schooled by Auer.

For his concert of piano-pieces in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 12, Mr. Sanromá, lately returned with European laurels, announces these numbers, half of them—it is pleasure to write—from living composers:

Italian Concerto	Bach
Kreisleriana	Schumann
Ballad—Mazurka—Scherzo	Chopin
Six Little Piano-Pieces	Schönberg
Omaggi	Malipiero
March—Prelude	Prokoffiev
Polichinelle	Villa-Lobos
Joyous March	Halffter
Fantastic Dance, No. 1	Turina
El Puerto from "Iberia"	Albéniz
Fire-Dance from "Love the Sorcerer"	de Falla

The Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra is the larger by $10,000—gift last Sunday of a friend and benefactor who prefers to go unnamed. Evidently he, or she, directs generosity wisely.

In New York next week, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra will repeat on Thursday evening the program for tomorrow and Saturday at Symphony Hall: Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point"; Bax's new Symphony; Mr. Loeffler's setting of St. Francis's "Hymn to the Sun"; Ravel's "Bolero." On Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, they will be heard in Mozart's Symphony in E-flat; Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, applauded to the echo last October in Boston; Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne"; "Bolero" again. To his audience in Brooklyn, which resembles the matinée audience in Boston, the discerning conductor will proffer Dvorák's "New-World" Symphony.

Mr. Segovia, the little master of the

The Players, The Numbers, The Incidents

Mr. Goossens's Second Inning, The Flute-Players Give A Fiftieth Concert

UNTIL the turn came of Respighi's "Roman Festivals," there were warmths at the Symphony Concert of Saturday. The audience frequenting it has a longer, quicker memory than the matrons and maidens of the matinée; received Mr. Goossens as remembered and welcome guest. In particular it was pleased with his version of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, covering him and the orchestra with long applause. It was as full of compliment and good will at the end of the conductor-composer's own Concertino, joining with him in the plaudits the cherished string - choir. At second and more familiar hearing that music also bettered itself. Through the first division, the rhythmic stride was Bach-like; the play of the several groups from counterpoint to counterpoint, apt and pithy; the whole, unlabored and unrelaxed in pervading animation. Preferring a folk-tune quality for the slow section, Mr. Goossens outdid the folk-pieces with his own melody. The first viola introduced it; the first violin farewelled it; between, the string orchestra gave it clear depths. It sang freshly and not too wistfully; it paraded no false pretense of sophisticated innocence. If in imagination the composer had overheard a solitary singer, with a keen sense of medium he transferred the song to his choirs. The finale, picking up a figure from the first division, escaped monotony in the gay play of rhythms and timbres; in the sudden interjection, Beethoven-like, of grave, low-pitched, full-toned measures. Throughout, the modern way with an old form refilled.

As for "Roman Festivals," there was good reason to suspect an audience that declined to take them seriously. Signor Respighi "presented" his popular fête and everyone was amused at the barker, the hand-organ, the gutter-tune, the stamping dances—as often as one or another scooted through the thick-voiced orchestra And what a welter of brass was his Circus Maximus, with the strings salving out of the din the song of the Christian martyrs! Some score with a pen; relentless Respighi now and then prefers a hammer. High-brows of the opera house reproach Puccini with banalities. Agreed: but he shines like a master beside the symphonic Respighi on sentimental "fall excursion" into the hills, or piously upturning eyes and ears at sight of marching pilgrims, at sound of ringing church-bells. What next? asked a few foreboding spirits. But we have the Signore's word that he has finished his Roman trilogy. No more between high-voiced and low-voiced instruments will he juggle the dins, ancient or modern, of Mussolini's city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TELEGRAM

DEC 28 192

Symphony Concert to Aid Russian Exiles

Mrs. Henry P. Loomis, president of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, and her associates in that organization have taken over the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Friday afternoon, January 10, in Carnegie Hall, as a benefit. The program, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be all-Russian. It will consist of the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky. Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from "Sadko," the concerto for violin and orchestra by Prokofieff, Stravinsky's orchestral suite from "Petrouchka," and Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture.

Almost all of the first tier boxes have already been subscribed. Among the patrons and patronesses are Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. John Henry Hammond, Mr. and Mrs. William J. Schieffelin, Mr. and Mrs. George Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. Myron C. Taylor, Mrs. Adolph Ladenburg, Mr and Mrs. Frederic Ashton de Peyster, Mrs. William E. Wheelock, Mrs. Donald W. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Landon K. Thorne, Albert M. Bagby, Mr and Mrs. Edward S. Harkness, Mrs. William T. Hildrup, Jr., Mrs. Harleston Deacon, Robert Fulton Cutting, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Littlejohn, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Loomis, Miss Lucile Thornton, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. Schuyler N. Warren, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith and Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris.

Povla Frijsh Is Symphony Soloist

Events of the week at the Symphony are the first hearing of Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," and the repetition of Ravel's flaming and flamboyant "Bolero," by all odds the musical events of this season.

For the Loeffler canticle of the good St. Francis, Mme. Povla Frijsh, singer of ability and extraordinary restraint, was the soloist. Mme. Frijsh, as her many concerts have shown, is the possessor of a remarkable and darkly colored voice. To this, she adds innate intelligence in the art of song and a clarity of diction that overcomes even the vast distances of Symphony Hall.

For his part, Mr. Loeffler has turned his hand to another workmanlike and pleasing piece. Within its sonoroties, he does more than write music of religious exaltation, he catches and transmutes to music some of that inner flame that illumined St. Francis. It is a music of heights and depths, of contrasts sharply drawn. Even for Mr. Loeffler, it is no mean triumph.

The "Canticle" was the sole new piece of the day. For the rest there was the "Bolero" again with stamping of feet and clapping of hands to show the approval of the audience; Bax's Second Symphony, put on the program too quickly again after its first hearing, and Walton's brisk and breezy "Portsmouth Point."

With the Walton piece Mr. Koussevitzky was not at all successful. He took it at breakneck pace, he dulled the edges of the sharp-toned music. Not so long ago this same "Portsmouth Point" was the event of the week at the Symphony; yesterday, through its inept handling by conductor and orchestra, it fell flat.

SYMPHONY IN MODERNIST PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH

OF the four pieces that make up the program of this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra not a single piece was completed before 1925. This speaks eloquently for the manner in which Serge Koussevitzky has transformed these concerts from a museum of archaic exhibits to an almost experimental workshop of contemporary art.

Of principal interest for us, even though there was a novelty on the program, was the repetition of Arnold Bax' Symphony in two keys, the world premier of which was in the same hall three weeks ago. A second hearing strengthened our original impression that here is a work that stands out mountainously among the low flat hills of current modernist music.

It is true that the score sounded even more "derivative" than it did then; that there were reminiscences of such widely contrasted influences as Cesar Franck, who seems to have dominated the form in which this Symphony is cast, Rimsky-Korsakov and even Puccini in the first movement, Grieg in the second, Ravel and notably Borodine in the third. But it remains that Bax speaks from the heart as well as head in a speech that all men can understand, and not in the snobbish lingo of his contemporaries. Moreover, he has beautiful thoughts, to which to give utterance, not merely wise-cracks.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis," a hymn for voice and orchestra, after St. Francis of Assisi, was played here for the first time, Hailed as a masterpiece elsewhere, it was a partial disappointment to us. Allowance should be made for the late arrival here of Mme. Frijsh, who was detained by an overdue ocean liner. The audience was remarkably enthusiastic, recalling conductor, soloist and the composer many times.

The performance of Ravel's ripple of applause compared with the storm it evoked when it was heard here first a month ago. Walton's dashing brilliant overture, "Portsmouth Point," began the program.

followed, without bridle or lead, the groom back out the door and to the stables.

drew thousands of vehicles into Westminster street and created a serious traffic jam. Beginning shortly before 8 o'clock, three lines of machines began the slow crawl from Turk's Head to the Albee Theatre and, after discharging their passengers, poured into Washington and Weybosset streets, crowding those thoroughfares.

Street car service was delayed greatly by the slow moving procession, and machines attempting to enter Westminster street from intersecting streets were forced to wait from five to 15 minutes in some instances before a break in the line gave them an opportunity.

At Washington and Mathewson streets, vehicles approaching in three directions caused an impasse which required several minutes to straighten out, long lines of traffic on both streets being held up in the meantime.

Conditions at 10 o'clock, after the concert, were somewhat better, machines intending to pick up passengers in front of the theatre keeping in line to the extreme left of the street, permitting street cars and through traffic to use the centre of the street.

Two traffic officers were stationed at Westminster and Mathewson streets and one at each other intersecting street along Westminster street.

22 Piss found Nov. 13

The Fifth Symphony for Our First

A Beethoven Backbone Gives Koussevitzky His Chance as the Boston Symphony Season Opens.—A New American Poem and Strauss's Pranks

It was pleasant last evening to see again the familiar faces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and hear once more the well-known strains of our old familiar friend, the C Minor Symphony, the sharp laughter of our old acquaintance, Till Eulenspiegel, and the new stories of our young acquaintance of the Enchanted Isle.

Perhaps it was the latter that attracted us most, for ever since the days of Homer —and the Enchanted Isle goes back to him—it has been the peculiar characteristic of audiences to welcome ever the song that is newest. Pindar tells us that it was the same in his day, with perhaps a note of satire in his voice; and here today we demand with the same insistence fresh songs to relieve the tedium of the old.

We have never heard the orchestra perform with more fire or more elan. It was a performance con brio throughout. There was a fluency and luminosity in the playing that at times suggested the high places up in the cold blue sky; and again a pitting of instrument against instrument in a struggle that suggested body against body and curse against curse, with all the clangor and uproar of the pit. Storm and strife, calm and serene sunshine, sweet deception, malignant plotting, mixed with the shrieking, demoniac laughter that breaks in sardonic scorn from the sky spread over a Paradise of Fools. Which was best and which worst is purely a matter of personal taste and preference.

The Standard Works

Musicians of whatever taste never weary of Beethoven. Each repetition brings them something never noticed before. So it was last night. There was a shifting of color in the reeds, an altered glow in the strings, an unwonted fulness in the brass, an unsuspected sting in a note hitherto believed guileless-one and all making him as subtle and elusive as the clouds that roll up from the horizon and change without rest before the wind.

He is the old Cloud-Compeller, mighty, insistent, but withal tolerant, as a god should be. He rouses us to aspire and he lays us in the dust; he jeers at our infirmity and he raises a paean that makes us strong. Where is there another such as he?

But for all that, there seemed to be lacking a certain tenderness that so often walks in Beethoven's music hand in hand with nobility of soul. There was force in abundance, mysticism, impetuosity (perhaps at times a little too much), but the tender grace of a day that is dead, that Beethoven loved so well to contemplate, only to dash it in the dust in one of his cynical outbursts, does not always make itself manifest in the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least when it plays here. Perhaps the mood is akin to the sublime in literature and is not given to every orchestra to express.

The Fresh Gruenberg

And "The Enchanted Isle"—how new and how old! Modern self-confidence of treatment, and modern dearth of native composition material. Why bother about enchantment when the very idea is now discarded along with the witches and demons, and the devils that have long been cast out? Why meddle with Ulysses and Calypso on their magic isle, or Ulysses and Circe in their magic Schweinerei, and pretend to make from these something new?

The Greeks had a word which they used with no intention of compliment—to Phrygianize—which in music and poetry was synonymous with poor judgment and questionable taste. That is what so many modern composers and quasi-composers are doing today; they are Phrygianizing the little jewels and gems inherited from their ancestors, giving them a new costume-setting.

Their music is not the music that will either make us laugh or weep. They are pretty things that we take in our hands and examine and turn this way and that only to throw away. Like insects they live their little day and die.

The Way of the New Man

Of course we know that all this and worse was said of Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and the rest; but those worthies at least seemed to advance the kingdom of music; they made their characters walk the fields of the Epic or the boards of Tragedy; now when a new character comes on, we wonder whether to look for him in Rabelais, Gulliver's Travels, or the Isle of the Penguins.

But Till Eulenspiegel is a different matter. Last night he seemed deeply rooted in the soil, a rare combination of Aristophanes in his most malignant moments and Browning in a peculiarly crabbed mood; and perhaps, like those two, his mood was a mere affectation, a parody of backwoods wit assumed for those who know what to laugh at, while it provided righteous indignation for those who had no clue or lacked the fundamental sense of humor so necessary for all who are to enter into the spirit of the piece.

Beyond a doubt the orchestra made it acrid and bitter enough, but it was deft enough in its drawings to blot out the sketches before we realized fully whether they were of Caliban or the Sirens; which we take to be skill of a very high order.

M. C. W.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op.84

Gruenberg—
"The Enchanted Isle," Symphonic Poem

Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner,—in Rondo Form, Op. 28.

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHILDREN'S CONCERT

Program to Be Repeated This Afternoon

Globe Jan 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its annual series of young people's concerts yesterday afternoon to an attentive and eager audience that filled Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin conducted two numbers on the program. Dr Koussevitzky conducted the remaining three. Interesting stereopticon slides illustrated comments on each of the pieces. In the absence of Alfred H. Meyer, his notes were read to the audience by Carlos Pinfield, one of the violinists in the Boston Symphony.

This year 300 seats on the floor have again been reserved for sale to individuals who wish to bring their children. The rest of the hall is sold out through public and private schools in Greater Boston. The block of seats sold to individuals was filled yesterday with small children and their grown-up escorts. Some of these children were 3 and 4-year-olds. The seats sold through the schools had been given out in the upper grades, to boys and girls ranging in age from perhaps 12 to 18. The audience was notably quiet and well behaved. Even the little tots seemed interested in the concert.

The pictures used as illustrations included photographs of the settings of the Chicago Civic Opera production of Prokofieff's "Love of Three Oranges," sent by the opera company. The little march from this modernistic opera greatly pleased the youthful audience. So did the Saint-Saens quasi-humorous "Carnival of the Animals," with its numerous incidental solos, and the luscious "Swan," in which Mr Bedetti's cello playing was notable. Mr Kunze was the double-bass soloist in "The Elephant." Mr Laurent played the flute solo in "The Aviary." The two pianists were Jesus Sanroma and Arthur Fiedler.

Bernard Zighera played Tournier's "Feerie" for harp with orchestral accompaniment, which he recently performed in the regular series of Symphony concerts. The young people were as interested as their elders had been in the instrument. They were shown pictures of the different types of harp and told a little about the differences between them.

The concert began with three 18th century numbers from Rameau and ended with Ravel's Bolero. Dr Koussevitzky very rightly wishes to introduce to his youthful audiences modern music and 18th century pieces. This is far sounder aesthetic policy than that of the usual run of makers of "educational programs" who favor such 19th century writers as Grieg and Massenet; because it is in line with present musical fashions.

This program will be repeated today at 4. There will be a second pair of young people's concerts later in the season.

"FISHERMAN"
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 6 - 1930

MUSIC NOTES

Serge Koussevitzky has made some changes in the program originally announced for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concert next Saturday afternoon. The revised list includes Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, Beethoven's fourth symphony, Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, an interlude from Richard Strauss's "Intermezzo" and Ravel's Bolero.

LOEFFLER'S LATEST BY SYMPHONY

Mme. Frijsh in Voice Part of "Canticle of the Sun"

Post Jan. 4

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Four contemporary composers; two Londoners, a Parisian and a Bostonian (by long residence), shared the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. And it is a pleasure to be able to record, as an impartial and unprejudiced opinion, that for sheer musical quality the composition of last-named had much the best of it.

POVLA FRIJSH, SOLOIST

In detail these composers, representative of four periods and phases of modern music, were William Walton, Arnold Bax, Maurice Ravel and Charles Martin Loeffler, and their pieces were, respectively, the overture, "Portsmouth Point," the Symphony No. 2 in E minor and C, the "Bolero" of recent sensation in Symphony Hall, and the "Canticle of the Sun" (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice and orchestra. The singer in Mr. Loeffler's piece, which was heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, was Povla Frijsh, who also sang it on the occasion of its first performance anywhere, at the Library of Congress Festival of Chamber Music, in the fall of 1925.

The Canticle of St. Francis, a rhapsody in praise of God and nature, is a poetic outburst that not only cried aloud for a musical setting but that also was ideally suited to the peculiar genius of Mr. Loeffler. That his tonal investment of the lines would have the mystical rapture, the poignant beauty, the soaring eloquence, the charm of instrumental color yesterday disclosed, was almost a foregone conclusion. In Mme. Frijsh, in Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, this "Canticum Fratris Solis" found yesterday fitting interpreters, and at the conclusion of the performance all concerned received an ovation.

Bax Heard Again

The overture of the youthful Walton, first played here three seasons ago, deserved at least one re-hearing. There is in the piece a bluff English quality, a rousing vigor, a disdain of tonal politeness that is in a way exhilarating and refreshing. Of actual thematic substance the music has but little.

That Dr. Koussevitzky should have repeated the Symphony of Bax, dedicated to himself and played for the first times at the symphony concerts of three weeks ago, was altogether fitting. A piece of symphonic dimensions from the hand of so gifted a composer as Bax deserves such consideration. That a second hearing of the symphony revealed in it attributes of greatness undiscovered at first may, however, not be said. Bax says his say often gracefully, movingly and even impressively, but most of what he says has been uttered before in one form or another.

Not only is this music of Bax in the last analysis unoriginal, it is at times disconcertingly reminiscent of other composers.

"Bolero" Fails to Excite

Finally Ravel's "Bolero," which provoked a demonstration of historic vehemence at the Friday afternoon Symphony concert of Dec. 6, last, was received by the audience yesterday with relative apathy. There was applause at the end, to be sure, but no untoward excitement.

A good story should be told

NEW YORK
TIMES

By way of the Paris press comes the report that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will remain in Boston to take part in the tricentenary of the State of Massachusetts instead of touring Europe this Spring. The tour, according to the paragraphs, has been postponed until the Spring of 1931.

The recent "first Boston performances" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra include Arnold Bax's second symphony in E minor and C, and on Jan. 3 Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis" (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice and orchestra. The soloist was Povla Frijsh, who likewise appeared in the first production of this work in Washington and elsewhere three seasons ago.

The pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the larger by a ten-thousand-dollar gift lately by a friend and benefactor who prefers to go unnamed.

FRIJSH SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" Performed

Ravel's Bolero and Bax' Symphony Repeated From Previous Programs

Globe Jan 4

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," a setting for soprano and orchestra of verses attributed to St Francis of Assisi, was performed for the first time in Boston at yesterday's Symphony concert, with Povla Frijsh as soloist. There was hearty and prolonged applause for composer, soloist and conductor, when they came out to bow at the end of the piece. Finally the orchestra was bidden to rise and share the plaudits.

Ravel's Bolero and Bax' "Second Symphony," repeated from previous programs of the current season; and Walton's "Portsmouth Point" were the other numbers on a program drawn wholly from the work of living composers.

Mr Loeffler wrote his "Canticle of the Sun" in 1925 at the request of Mrs F. S. Coolidge for the first of her Washington festival concerts of chamber music. He set for soprano and chamber orchestra a modernized Italian version of the hymn said to have been written by St Francis, prepared for his use by Gino Perera of Boston. Mr Loeffler's music has been performed at concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra, as well as at the Washington festival in 1925. Mme Frijsh has sung the soprano solo at each performance.

The hymn, a naive medieval rhapsody, demands of a modern composer the evocation of a mood wholly alien to his own day and age. Mr Loeffler has used modal harmonies, and woven into the texture of his music many liturgical motives. He succeeds as well as anyone now could in creating the atmosphere of St Francis' rhapsody. One listens to his music in the spirit of a modern tourist in Assisi. But, as some modern visitors there have done, one feels a certain monotony, a certain barrenness, a lack of enduring vitality.

Try as one may to view the middle ages reverently, one cannot but recall at times the mockery of Anatole France in such pages as the famous one in his "Penguin Island" about the paintings of Margaritone of Arezzo. Mr Loeffler has done in this Canticle all that taste and skill can do to recreate something vanished, something even more alien to us than Periclean Athens, or than the Scythians whom those other modern composers, Stravinsky and Prokofieff have evoked for us (from the pages of Herodotus), with such astonishing power.

Mme Frijsh has long been admired here as an interpreter of music. Her tact and intuition are remarkable. Not so her voice, however. Yesterday she made very skilful use of her vocal resources, but in so large a hall neither the quality nor the volume of tone were wholly adequate. Furthermore she was unable to convey the nuances she wished, and would certainly have made in a smaller room.

Mr Walton's "Portsmouth Point" was suggested by a print by Rowlandson, published in 1814, depicting a scene on which Fanny Price, when temporarily banished from Mansfield Park must often have looked with eyes quite other than those of the celebrated caricaturist, either Miss Austen nor her heroine would have approved of Mr Walton's music. To them gusto, youthful high spirits noisily happy, were only to be condemned. Yet it is this same gusto which makes Mr Walton's hastily written and not profoundly original overture not merely endurable but enjoyable, though scarcely memorable. This piece was first heard here in 1926. Its composer is an Englishman born in 1902.

Ravel's Bolero made nothing like the same effect on the audience yesterday that it made at the recent first performances here. There were no cheers, no stamping of feet, only about the usual amount of handclapping. A second hearing made one admire even more than before the cleverness with which the piece has been contrived. But hearing it twice in quick succession is like rereading a detective story before you have forgotten any of its plot. The artistic value of this Bolero is about that of the general run of detective stories.

Mr Bax says that his Second Symphony, also repeated yesterday, is written in cyclic form. It certainly makes considerable use of the motto theme, but, as at the first performance, one was unable to feel that the structure of the music is sound. The piece is an overlong rhapsody with some fine moments, such as the simple melody, surprising in a modern work, near the opening of the slow movement. Its ceaseless modulations, and ever shifting rhythmic figures grow monotonous. As a whole this symphony does not compel one's attention. The music is at once too fragmentary and too monotonous. To it one is tempted to apply at least part of Gounod's well known sneer at the Franck Symphony, "incompetence elevated into a dogma." Franck did not deserve this taunt from the composer of "Faust."

Perhaps Bax does not wholly deserve it either, but his symphony heard twice in close succession becomes boresome.

There are no symphony concerts in the regular series here next week, as the orchestra goes on tour. Jan 17 and 18 the Russian composer Glazunov will conduct as guest a program of his own works.

P. R.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 2 9 1929

NEW SYMPHONY BY BAX GIVEN FIRST HEARING

Work by English Composer Arouses Much Enthusiasm in Boston Performance

The new symphony by Arnold Bax, written in two keys, E minor and C major, was performed for the first time anywhere on the 13th at Boston by the Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Although it was written in 1924-25, the composer reserved the production for Mr Koussevitzky, to whom the work is dedicated.

The composer has said that "there is absolutely no communicable program associated with the music, which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work."

"When the symphonic poems by Bax were played by this orchestra," says Philip Hale in the Boston Herald, "the charge of occasional diffuseness, if not vagueness, was urged against him, while full justice was done to the fine, poetic qualities. It might have been said that he was then lulled at too great length by the enchanting airs he heard in the Faery hills and in the garden of Fand. In this symphony even more than in his first symphony played two years ago, there is still, especially in the second movement, the Celtic feeling that is characteristic of many of his works; there are themes, there are harmonies of tender, wistful beauty, not free from a pleasing melancholy, but these pages only relieve and enhance the heroic character of the work as a whole, the defiant pages or those of doubt and questioning until there is at the end submission to the inevitable, if not a lasting peace. These final pages, artfully simple, leading to silence, are among the most eloquent and impressive in the symphony.

"That the audience realizes the strength and the beauty, the originality of invention and expression was shown by the manner in which the symphony was received. Seldom, if ever, has the first performance of a new symphony been so heartily and honestly applauded."

Trans Jan. 7

Koussevitzky to Bax

Telegrams from Conductor to Composer About a Current Symphony

THE mails bring two telegrams sent by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston to Arnold Bax in London apropos the production at the Symphony Concerts of the composer's Second Symphony, first heard there Dec. 13 and 14, repeated last week. After the final rehearsal, Dr. Koussevitzky wired:

> The orchestra and I wish to express to you our profound admiration of this work. We are proud to give it its first performance, which will be a considerable date for the Boston Symphony.

Again after the first performances:

> With greatest joy am sending you my heartiest congratulations on the exceptional success of your symphony.

22 Pass found Nov. 13

The Fifth Symphony for Our First

A Beethoven Backbone Gives Koussevitzky His Chance as the Boston Symphony Season Opens.—A New American Poem and Strauss's Pranks

It was pleasant last evening to see again the familiar faces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and hear once more the well-known strains of our old familiar friend, the C Minor Symphony, the sharp laughter of our old acquaintance, Till Eulenspiegel, and the new stories of our young acquaintance of the Enchanted Isle.

Perhaps it was the latter that attracted us most, for ever since the days of Homer—and the Enchanted Isle goes back to him—it has been the peculiar characteristic of audiences to welcome ever the song that is newest. Pindar tells us that it was the same in his day, with perhaps a note of satire in his voice; and here today we demand with the same insistence fresh songs to relieve the tedium of the old.

We have never heard the orchestra perform with more fire or more elan. It was a performance con brio throughout. There was a fluency and luminosity in the playing that at times suggested the high places up in the cold blue sky; and again a pitting of instrument against instrument in a struggle that suggested body against body and curse against curse, with all the clangor and uproar of the pit. Storm and strife, calm and serene sunshine, sweet deception, malignant plotting, mixed with the shrieking, demoniac laughter that breaks in sardonic scorn from the sky spread over a Paradise of Fools. Which was best and which worst is purely a matter of personal taste and preference.

The Standard Works

Musicians of whatever taste never weary of Beethoven. Each repetition brings them something never noticed before. So it was last night. There was a shifting of color in the reeds, an altered glow in the strings, an unwonted fulness in the brass, an unsuspected sting in a note hitherto believed guileless-one and all making him as subtle and elusive as the clouds that roll up from the horizon and change without rest before the wind.

He is the old Cloud-Compeller, mighty, insistent, but withal tolerant, as a god should be. He rouses us to aspire and he lays us in the dust; he jeers at our infirmity and he raises a paean that makes us strong. Where is there another such as he?

But for all that, there seemed to be lacking a certain tenderness that so often walks in Beethoven's music hand in hand with nobility of soul. There was force in abundance, mysticism, impetuosity (perhaps at times a little too much), but the tender grace of a day that is dead, that Beethoven loved so well to contemplate, only to dash it in the dust in one of his cynical outbursts, does not always make itself manifest in the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least when it plays here. Perhaps the mood is akin to the sublime in literature and is not given to every orchestra to express.

The Fresh Gruenberg

And "The Enchanted Isle"—how new and how old! Modern self-confidence of treatment, and modern dearth of native composition material. Why bother about enchantment when the very idea is now discarded along with the witches and demons, and the devils that have long been cast out? Why meddle with Ulysses and Calypso on their magic isle, or Ulysses and Circe in their magic Schweinerei, and pretend to make from these something new?

The Greeks had a word which they used with no intention of compliment—to Phrygianize—which in music and poetry was synonymous with poor judgment and questionable taste. That is what so many modern composers and quasi-composers are doing today; they are Phrygianizing the little jewels and gems inherited from their ancestors, giving them a new costume-setting.

Their music is not the music that will either make us laugh or weep. They are pretty things that we take in our hands and examine and turn this way and that only to throw away. Like insects they live their little day and die.

The Way of the New Man

Of course we know that all this and worse was said of Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and the rest; but those worthies at least seemed to advance the kingdom of music; they made their characters walk the fields of the Epic or the boards of Tragedy; now when a new character comes on, we wonder whether to look for him in Rabelais, Gulliver's Travels, or the Isle of the Penguins.

But Till Eulenspiegel is a different matter. Last night he seemed deeply rooted in the soil, a rare combination of Aristophanes in his most malignant moments and Browning in a peculiarly crabbed mood; and perhaps, like those two, his mood was a mere affectation, a parody of backwoods wit assumed for those who know what to laugh at, while it provided righteous indignation for those who had no clue or lacked the fundamental sense of humor so necessary for all who are to enter into the spirit of the piece.

Beyond a doubt the orchestra made it acrid and bitter enough, but it was deft enough in its drawings to blot out the sketches before we realized fully whether they were of Caliban or the Sirens; which we take to be skill of a very high order.

M. C. W.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84

Gruenberg—
"The Enchanted Isle," Symphonic Poem

Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner,—in Rondo Form, Op. 28.

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHILDREN'S CONCERT

Program to Be Repeated This Afternoon

Globe Jan 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its annual series of young people's concerts yesterday afternoon to an attentive and eager audience that filled Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin conducted two numbers on the program. Dr Koussevitzky conducted the remaining three. Interesting stereopticon slides illustrated comments on each of the pieces. In the absence of Alfred H. Meyer, his notes were read to the audience by Carlos Pinfield, one of the violinists in the Boston Symphony.

This year 300 seats on the floor have again been reserved for sale to individuals who wish to bring their children. The rest of the hall is sold out through public and private schools in Greater Boston. The block of seats sold to individuals was filled yesterday with small children and their grown-up escorts. Some of these children were 3 and 4-year-olds. The seats sold through the schools had been given out in the upper grades, to boys and girls ranging in age from perhaps 12 to 18. The audience was notably quiet and well behaved. Even the little tots seemed interested in the concert.

The pictures used as illustrations included photographs of the settings of the Chicago Civic Opera production of Prokofieff's "Love of Three Oranges," sent by the opera company. The little march from this modernistic opera greatly pleased the youthful audience. So did the Saint-Saens quasi-humorous "Carnival of the Animals," with its numerous incidental solos, and the luscious "Swan," in which Mr Bedetti's cello playing was notable. Mr Kunze was the double-bass soloist in "The Elephant." Mr Laurent played the flute solo in "The Aviary." The two pianists were Jesus Sanroma and Arthur Fiedler.

Bernard Zighera played Tournier's "Feerie" for harp with orchestral accompaniment, which he recently performed in the regular series of Symphony concerts. The young people were as interested as their elders had been in the instrument. They were shown pictures of the different types of harp and told a little about the differences between them.

The concert began with three 18th century numbers from Rameau and ended with Ravel's Bolero. Dr Koussevitzky very rightly wishes to introduce to his youthful audiences modern music and 18th century pieces. This is far sounder aesthetic policy than that of the usual run of makers of "educational programs" who favor such 19th century writers as Grieg and Massenet; because it is in line with present musical fashions.

This program will be repeated today at 4. There will be a second pair of young people's concerts later in the season.

"FISHERMAN"
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 6 - 1930

MUSIC NOTES

Serge Koussevitzky has made some changes in the program originally announced for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concert next Saturday afternoon. The revised list includes Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, Beethoven's fourth symphony, Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, an interlude from Richard Strauss's "Intermezzo" and Ravel's Bolero.

LOEFFLER'S LATEST BY SYMPHONY

Mme. Frijsh in Voice Part of "Canticle of the Sun"

Post Jan. 4

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Four contemporary composers; two Londoners, a Parisian and a Bostonian (by long residence), shared the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. And it is a pleasure to be able to record, as an impartial and unprejudiced opinion, that for sheer musical quality the composition of last-named had much the best of it.

POVLA FRIJSH, SOLOIST

In detail these composers, representative of four periods and phases of modern music, were William Walton, Arnold Bax, Maurice Ravel and Charles Martin Loeffler, and their pieces were, respectively, the overture, "Portsmouth Point," the Symphony No. 2 in E minor and C, the "Bolero" of recent sensation in Symphony Hall, and the "Canticle of the Sun" (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice and orchestra. The singer in Mr. Loeffler's piece, which was heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, was Povla Frijsh, who also sang it on the occasion of its first performance anywhere, at the Library of Congress' Festival of Chamber Music, in the fall of 1925.

The Canticle of St. Francis, a rhapsody in praise of God and nature, is a poetic outburst that not only cried aloud for a musical setting but that also was ideally suited to the peculiar genius of Mr. Loeffler. That his tonal investment of the lines would have the mystical rapture, the poignant beauty, the soaring eloquence, the charm of instrumental color yesterday disclosed, was almost a foregone conclusion. In Mme. Frijsh, in Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, this "Canticum Fratris Solis" found yesterday fitting interpreters, and at the conclusion of the performance all concerned received an ovation.

Bax Heard Again

The overture of the youthful Walton, first played here three seasons ago, deserved at least one re-hearing. There is in the piece a bluff English quality, a rousing vigor, a disdain of tonal politeness that is in a way exhilarating and refreshing. Of actual thematic substance the music has but little.

That Dr. Koussevitzky should have repeated the Symphony of Bax, dedicated to himself and played for the first times at the symphony concerts of three weeks ago, was altogether fitting. A piece of symphonic dimensions from the hand of so gifted a composer as Bax deserves such consideration. That a second hearing of the symphony revealed in it attributes of greatness undiscovered at first may, however, not be said. Bax says his say often gracefully, movingly and even impressively, but most of what he says has been uttered before in one form or another.

Not only is this music of Bax in the last analysis unoriginal, it is at times disconcertingly reminiscent of other composers.

"Bolero" Fails to Excite

Finally Ravel's "Bolero," which provoked a demonstration of historic vehemence at the Friday afternoon Symphony concert of Dec. 6, last, was received by the audience yesterday with relative apathy. There was applause at the end, to be sure, but no untoward excitement.

A good story should be told once, and once only. "Bolero" depends for its effect on a mere musical trick, though executed with infinite cleverness. Heard a second time the constantly repeated tune (uninteresting of itself), the reiterated rhythm, the long crescendo, the sudden modulation near the end, all fail greatly to stir and excite the listener.

...ond dances Maurice ...
...Moonlight Sonata" and MacDowell's seasons ago.

The pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the larger by a ten-thousand-dollar gift lately by a friend and benefactor who prefers to go unnamed.

FRIJSH SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" Performed

Ravel's Bolero and Bax' Symphony Repeated From Previous Programs

Globe Jan 4

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," a setting for soprano and orchestra of verses attributed to St Francis of Assisi, was performed for the first time in Boston at yesterday's Symphony concert, with Povla Frijsh as soloist. There was hearty and prolonged applause for composer, soloist and conductor, when they came out to bow at the end of the piece. Finally the orchestra was bidden to rise and share the plaudits.

Ravel's Bolero and Bax' "Second Symphony," repeated from previous programs of the current season; and Walton's "Portsmouth Point" were the other numbers on a program drawn wholly from the work of living composers.

Mr Loeffler wrote his "Canticle of the Sun" in 1925 at the request of Mrs F. S. Coolidge for the first of her Washington festival concerts of chamber music. He set for soprano and chamber orchestra a modernized Italian version of the hymn said to have been written by St Francis, prepared for his use by Gino Perera of Boston. Mr Loeffler's music has been performed at concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra, as well as at the Washington festival in 1925. Mme Frijsh has sung the soprano solo at each performance.

The hymn, a naive medieval rhapsody, demands of a modern composer the evocation of a mood wholly alien to his own day and age. Mr Loeffler has used modal harmonies, and woven into the texture of his music many liturgical motives. He succeeds as well as anyone now could in creating the atmosphere of St Francis' rhapsody. One listens to his music in the spirit of a modern tourist in Assisi. But, as some modern visitors there have done, one feels a certain monotony, a certain barrenness, a lack of enduring vitality.

Try as one may to view the middle ages reverently, one cannot but recall at times the mockery of Anatole France in such pages as the famous one in his "Penguin Island" about the paintings of Margaritone of Arezzo. Mr Loeffler has done in this Canticle all that taste and skill can do to recreate something vanished, something even more alien to us than Periclean Athens, or than the Scythians whom those other modern composers, Stravinsky and Prokofieff have evoked for us (from the pages of Herodotus), with such astonishing power.

Mme Frijsh has long been admired here as an interpreter of music. Her tact and intuition are remarkable. Not so her voice, however. Yesterday she made very skilful use of her vocal resources, but in so large a hall neither the quality nor the volume of tone were wholly adequate. Furthermore she was unable to convey the nuances she wished, and would certainly have made in a smaller room.

Mr Walton's "Portsmouth Point" was suggested by a print by Rowlandson, published in 1814, depicting a scene on which Fanny Price, when temporarily banished from Mansfield Park must often have looked with eyes quite other than those of the celebrated caricaturist, either Miss Austen nor her heroine would have approved of Mr Walton's music. To them gusto, youthful high spirits noisily happy, were only to be condemned. Yet it is this same gusto which makes Mr Walton's hastily written and not profoundly original overture not merely endurable but enjoyable, though scarcely memorable. This piece was first heard here in 1926. Its composer is an Englishman born in 1902.

Ravel's Bolero made nothing like the same effect on the audience yesterday that it made at the recent first performances here. There were no cheers, no stamping of feet, only about the usual amount of handclapping. A second hearing made one admire even more than before the cleverness with which the piece has been contrived. But hearing it twice in quick succession is like rereading a detective story before you have forgotten any of its plot. The artistic value of this Bolero is about that of the general run of detective stories.

Mr Bax says that his Second Symphony, also repeated yesterday, is written in cyclic form. It certainly makes considerable use of the motto theme, but, as at the first performance, one was unable to feel that the structure of the music is sound. The piece is an overlong rhapsody with some fine moments, such as the simple melody, surprising in a modern work, near the opening of the slow movement. Its ceaseless modulations, and ever shifting rhythmic figures grow monotonous. As a whole this symphony does not compel one's attention. The music is at once too fragmentary and too monotonous. To it one is tempted to apply at least part of Gounod's well known sneer at the Franck Symphony, "incompetence elevated into a dogma." Franck did not deserve this taunt from the composer of "Faust."

Perhaps Bax does not wholly deserve it either, but his symphony heard twice in close succession becomes boresome.

There are no symphony concerts in the regular series here next week, as the orchestra goes on tour. Jan 17 and 18 the Russian composer Glazunov will conduct as guest a program of his own works.

P. R.

Koussevitzky to Bax

Telegrams from Conductor to Composer About a Current Symphony

THE mails bring two telegrams sent by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston to Arnold Bax in London apropos the production at the Symphony Concerts of the composer's Second Symphony, first heard there Dec. 13 and 14, repeated last week. After the final rehearsal, Dr. Koussevitzky wired:

> The orchestra and I wish to express to you our profound admiration of this work. We are proud to give it its first performance, which will be a considerable date for the Boston Symphony.

Again after the first performances:

> With greatest joy am sending you my heartiest congratulations on the exceptional success of your symphony.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 29 1929

NEW SYMPHONY BY BAX GIVEN FIRST HEARING

Work by English Composer Arouses Much Enthusiasm in Boston Performance

The new symphony by Arnold Bax, written in two keys, E minor and C major, was performed for the first time anywhere on the 13th at Boston by the Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Although it was written in 1924-25, the composer reserved the production for Mr Koussevitzky, to whom the work is dedicated.

The composer has said that "there is absolutely no communicable program associated with the music, which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work."

"When the symphonic poems by Bax were played by this orchestra," says Philip Hale in the Boston Herald, "the charge of occasional diffuseness, if not vagueness, was urged against him, while full justice was done to the fine, poetic qualities. It might have been said that he was then lulled at too great length by the enchanting airs he heard in the Faery hills and in the garden of Fand. In this symphony even more than in his first symphony played two years ago, there is still, especially in the second movement, the Celtic feeling that is characteristic of many of his works; there are themes, there are harmonies of tender, wistful beauty, not free from a pleasing melancholy, but these pages only relieve and enhance the heroic character of the work as a whole, the defiant pages or those of doubt and questioning until there is at the end submission to the inevitable, if not a lasting peace. These final pages, artfully simple, leading to silence, are among the most eloquent and impressive in the symphony.

"That the audience realizes the strength and the beauty, the originality of invention and expression was shown by the manner in which the symphony was received. Seldom, if ever, has the first performance of a new symphony been so heartily and honestly applauded."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 11th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows:

Walton, overture, "Portsmouth Point." Bax, Symphony No. 2, E minor and C. Loeffler, Canticum Fratris Solis—after St. Francis of Assisi (first time in Boston; Povla Frijsh, soprano). Ravel, Bolero.

Walton and Bax are together in the catalogue as British composers: Walton born in Lancashire; Bax in London. The two were educated musically in England. How different their musical natures as exemplified in the overture and the symphony heard yesterday.

Walton's music is of the hearty John Bull type; roast beef, flagons of ale, the England of Captain Marryatt, "Rule Britannia," "The British Grenadiers," "Down Among the Dead Men," "God Save the King." To music this overture is as the prints of Rowlandson to art—and Rowlandson found his musical translator in Walton. Or the Walton of this overture is to music as Daniel Defoe and William Cobbett to English literature. Music that is sturdy, self-reliant, not without a suggestion of insular arrogance. Walton wisely did not attempt an interlinear translation into tones of Rowlandson's print of a quayside in confusion; no sentimental passage for the officer farewelling his lady love; no grotesque dance for the wooden legged sailor. The composer strove to picture the hurry, the bustle, what one might call the fury of departure. He did not strive in vain.

Bax, on the other hand, has been known to us by his musical sojourn in fairy land. He dwelt in western Ireland for a time, nor was he a stranger among the artists and writers of Dublin. His visit to Russia did not affect him musically to any noticeable extent.

It was said of the pugilist Sir Daniel Donnelly that there were Iricisms in his style. In the music of Arnold Bax there are Celticisms: the romantic melancholy, the Donnybrook defiant outbursts, the fancy that has been nourished on Irish legends. He has seen "the good people"; he has visited the Faery Hills and sailed to the island of Pfand; he has listened to the men and women known to Synge; exchanged mystical revelations with the poet Yeats, yet Bax is no idle dreamer of an empty lay; he dreams—even in this symphony—but here he is also a purposeful man of action. He is profoundly musical and feels no need of a program to fire his imagination. (The symphony is a highly imaginative work.) Mr. Edwin Evans is not extravagant in saying that Irish legends, landscapes and songs have contributed to the characteristic style by which one knows the music of Bax. His music is intensely emotional, but in an individual manner. To some this symphony is a stumbling block; even if they have emotions, they wish them to be aroused in a more familiar and genteel manner. They have ears, but they do not hear. There is nothing cryptic in the music. Everywhere is strength, even in the beauty of the work. Is anyone left unmoved by the Celtic sadness of the ending? Suppose Bax had ended with a roaring fortissimo, with the organ thundering, drums beating, cymbals crashing fanfares of triumpets in what is sometimes called "the apotheosis" would not some have then applauded tempestuously, and said as they went out: "I didn't get on to a good deal of the music, but I liked the ending."

A third hearing confirms one hearer in the impression made by the first; here is one of the most important musical works that have crossed the Atlantic for many years. The sympathetic, eloquent, superb performance yesterday turned impression into conviction.

Mr. Loeffler is a man of fine literary taste and wide reading as well as a singularly skilled composer of exquisite fancy. It is not surprising that this "Hymn of Brother Sun" appealed to him and led him to seek out the fitting music. The Hymn has attracted many composers. Some of them have written in heroic, bravura manner, singularly out of keeping with the text. There are lovely pages in Mr. Loeffler's work—charming melodic lines, an assisting not distracting, always pertinent use of liturgical motives, a poetic blending of instrumental timbres. Mme. Frijsh, the one great interpreter of songs, now before the American public, did not fail to realize and express the sentiments of the Saint and the illuminating commentary of the composer. Mr. Loeffler, Mme. Frijsh, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were obliged more than once to acknowledge the hearty tribute paid them.

There were many requests during the last fortnight for a repetition of Ravel's "Bolero." Ravel did not fare the better by the granting of the request. This "Bolero" is the clever trick of a superrefined composer. The trick is amazingly well performed, but it is only a trick. The surprise of a first performance does not affect one a second time. Indeed, the first 10 minutes in performance yesterday, owing to the inevitable monotony, were rather boresome. Still there was the expectation of something going to happen, of a final thunderous proclamation of the inherently negligible tune. According to the old saw, surprise is the chief element of wit. Perhaps—but honest laughter follows the first cracking of a joke. After that the laughter is only courteous.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn next week. Alexander Glazounov will be the "guest conductor" here on Jan. 17, 18. The program will comprise his sixth symphony; his violin concerto (Benno Rabinoff, violinist), and his symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

MUSIC

CHILDREN'S CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert for young people yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin conducted. Alfred H. Meyer's comments on the program were read by Carlos E. Pinfield. Stereopticon slides were shown. The program was as follows: Rameau-Kretzschmar, ballet suite from "Acante et Cephisse." Tournier, "Fairie," for harp (Bernard Zighera), and orchestra. Prokofieff, march from "The Love for Three Oranges." Saint-Saens, "The Animals' Carnival—Cocks and Hens, The Elephant (M. Kunze, double bass), Aquarium, Personages with Long Ears, The Cuckoo in the Depth of the Forest, Aviary (E. Laurent, flute), The Swan (J. Bedetti, violoncello); Messrs. Sanroma and Fiedler, pianists. Ravel, Bolero.

The question arises whenever a concert is given for children, what compositions are the better suited to their musical instincts (if they have any)—music that has pronounced and stirring rhythm, music of action, or music of obvious melody. In these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is no deliberate plan of instruction. Mr. Meyer's interesting comments are upon the pieces then and there performed. There are no long explanations of the various instruments and various forms, as in Mr. Schilling's concerts, with music to illustrate now the strings, now the wood-wind instruments and so on. The "education" is to be derived from the music heard. It has been shown in previous concerts in Symphony hall that the young people show little interest in slow movements of the composers called "classic." A lively piece, provided it is obviously melodious, pleases the young. It is safe to say that they would enjoy Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," or Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" more than a slow movement by Mozart or Beethoven. Nor is this to be greatly deplored. The realization of Mozart's greatness will come later in the children's musical life.

Early in this month a concert for children was given in London, and what was the program? Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Elgar's transcription of Bach's C minor fantasia and fugue; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and the overture to "Tannhaeuser." Even the English children take their pleasures sadly. The program presented yesterday was much more to the point; a program that should please children from 10 to 80 years of age. Take this ballet music of Rameau's, for example. The fact that Rameau in this "heroic pastoral" was the first to introduce clarinets in the Paris Opera House would not interest children, nor would they be thrilled if they were told that as the first performance was in celebration of the birth of the Duke of Burgundy, Rameau endeavored in the overture to express the popular joy "as far as it is possible in music." Surely the music itself would be enough. Nor are children, unlike some of their elders, frightened by the name Prokofieff, nor do they argue that his music must be of a barbaric nature. And what music is more appropriate for a concert of this nature than Saint-Saens's Animals and Ravel's Bolero.

The hall was filled from top to bottom. The children were much more appreciative, more enthusiastic than on certain preceding occasions. Some of the slides amused them greatly. What would the comedians and ballet dancers of Rameau's time have said had they known that their costumes and poses would have excited laughter when shown to children of Boston in the 20th century? Yesterday the audience enjoyed the heavy tread of the elephantine double-bass, the virtuosity of Mr. Laurent, and the song of the swan so beautifully sung by Mr. Bedetti's violoncello. Unsophisticated, they applauded Rameau, Prokofieff, Tournier and Ravel with delightful impartiality.

The order of the program was changed from that given above. Mr. Burgin conducted the ballet suite and Saint-Saens's zoological music. He was succeeded by Dr. Koussevitzky, who conducted the remaining numbers with the care and interest that he would display at one of the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening concerts.

The final pair of young people's concerts this season will be given on April 23 and 24. The concert of yesterday will be repeated this afternoon.

BROCKTON

SECOND TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Schumann and Wagner Fill Program

The second program of the Tuesday afternoon Symphony concert series consisted of the overture to Byron's "Manfred" and the Second Symphony of Schumann, and four Wagner excerpts—the "Lohengrin" prelude, the "Ride of the Valkyries," the prelude and the introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger."

Schumann's orchestral works are interesting solely because seldom played. Hearing these two compositions of his, it is evident that he never fully grasped the orchestral and symphonic concept. His attitude is too thoroughly pianistic to permit him to go farther from his naturale genre than chamber music. He seems to find no necessity for contrast and color.

When he does try original combinations of instruments, they are often bizarre. The kettledrum strokes in the overture stand out like the proverbial sore thumbs; though in the first movement of the symphony they fit in admirably. Schumann's instrumentation is insecure and erratic.

The musical substance of both the overture and the symphony is so original that it stands out in spite of the clumsy scoring. The principal motive in the symphony is, curiously enough, identical both rhythmically and melodically with the beginning of the introduction to Haydn's

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democratic Chronicle

NEWEST WORK OF DR. HANSON TO BE SAVED-

Rochester Composer Holds 'Romantic' for Boston; To Play 'Nordic' Here

Dr. Howard Hanson will conduct his "Nordic" Symphony at the Philharmonic matinee to be given next Friday by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in the Eastman Theater. In the announcement of the season's matinee programs a new work by Dr. Hanson was announced for this concert. When Dr. Hanson was asked yesterday about that new work, his explanation was of interest.

"The reason why my new symphony, the 'Romantic,' is not being played in Rochester this season is due to the fact that Mr. Koussevitski has commissioned it for performance next season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra," said Dr. Hanson. "The reason for this commission is that next year will be the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitski has asked representative composers from various countries to write works for first performances during that season," he explained. "Due to the importance of such a performance, I am holding up all previous performances of the work."

Dr. Hanson also received yesterday a letter from the offices of the American Academy in Rome informing him that he has been appointed a member of the jury which will elect the next holder of the Prix de Rome. The other members of the jury will be Walter Damrosch, John Alden Carpenter, Edward Burlingame Hill and Leo Sowerby.

self, particularly in the Schmann Symphony. This should have raised the level of the performance to unusual heights, but unfortunately the orchestra showed the ill effects of either scanty rehearsal or carelessness. There were several unfortunate slips, noticeably in the "Meistersinger" prelude, and in the end of the "Lohengrin" prelude.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday series of concerts took place yesterday in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Schumann, Overture to Byron's "Manfred"; Schumann, symphony No. 2, C major; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin." The Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure"; introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; prelude to "The Mastersingers." Schumann and Wagner, both romantics; yet the juxtaposition is ironical to those who recall the mutual attitude of the two men: one towards the music of the other. It is true that Schumann did not know any of Wagner's works after "Tannhaeuser," of which he at first said that Wagner, this clever fellow, full of mad ideas, was incapable of conceiving and writing four beautiful measures, indeed hardly good ones in succession. But soon afterward Schumann found deep and original things in the opera and thought Wagner could be of great importance to the stage. Wagner, on the other hand, called Schumann's D minor symphony "banal." He formally inspired Joseph Rubinstein to write a malignant article against Schumann's compositions. Nor did the two men when they met find their meeting agreeable. Schumann complained that Wagner talked incessantly; Wagner found it impossible to discuss music with a man who would hardly open his mouth.

It was a pleasure to hear the overture to "Manfred" again. It has not been put on a program of the Friday and Saturday concerts for almost a dozen seasons. The overture has interest outside of its musical quality; reminding one, as it does, of the poet who exerted a mighty influence on European literature and even the conduct of life; also reminding one of the unsavory discussion that has followed the publication of Mrs. Stowe's article. It is strange that no psycho-analyist in music—say Richard Strauss—has treated the subject, laying morbid stress on the Astarte Episoda. By the way, will not Dr. Koussevitzky at some concert in the future conduct fragments from Tchaikovsky's "Manfred"? We say "fragments" for the movements of the symphony are of unequal worth.

The performance of the various works gave great pleasure to the large audience. Whether the music was by Schumann or by Wagner, the performance was conspicuous by its eloquence; by its attention to the details—as in the symphony—which, interpreted by Dr. Koussevitzky, never seemed mere padding. If Schumann and Wagner could have heard their music played in this manner they might have had greater respect, the one for the other—perhaps genuine affection. Who knows?

The next one of the Tuesday concerts will be Feb. 11. H. M. G.

SYMPHONY IN 2D MATINEE

Romantic List Played for Tuesday Series

Yesterday brought the second of the Tuesday afternoon series of Symphony Concerts. The first, of a few weeks ago, offered only the classics, Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Yesterday's list was, on the other hand, as emphatically romantic, comprising as it did Schumann's Overture to "Manfred" and Second Symphony and Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin," to the first and third acts of "Die Meistersinger," and "The Ride of the Valkyries."

Save for the "Lohengrin" Prelude, the Wagner excerpts were all heard at the recent Pension Fund Concert, while the Schumann Symphony had place not long ago at a Friday and Saturday pair. The "Manfred" Overture, however, had never before appeared on one of Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston programmes, though his plans for his initial season here once included a performance of the whole of Schumann's music to Byron's play, enlisting the services of solo singers, a chorus and a reader. The Overture itself has more than once been called the finest of Schumann's orchestral compositions. In it is a sweep and a freedom, a passion and a dramatic quality certainly not to be found in any of the symphonies. It received from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra yesterday a performance of expected eloquence, and it is to be hoped that the conductor will see fit to play the piece ere long at the regular concerts.

Even more successfully than before did Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday reveal the beauties and conceal the defects of Schumann's long and uneven Symphony. The performances of the Wagnerian fragments, tinctured here and [illegible] with the conductor's individual

Herald Dec 30

MUSIC

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Yesterday's concert in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, the sixtieth, no less, for the purpose, proved an occasion of beauty and splendor, almost of solemnity. People knew it would be an event. They "sensed" as much in the air, forbidding and damp though it was, on the way to Symphony Hall; once in a way a happy presentiment of the sort does make itself felt, although nobody can quite tell why. Perhaps the press of cars at the corner, which raised crossing the street to the pitch of a perilous adventure, had a hand in spreading the right atmosphere abroad.

The right atmosphere, at all events, prevailed, inside the hall as well as out. An audience filling every seat sat mighty expectant, all looking for something apart. For the spell of Wagner still holds its power unlessened by one iota. For real romance the world is still eager. But of course the romance must be genuine, not commonplace ragged out.

So wild a note of high romance Dr. Koussevitzky found in the "Flying Dutchman" overture that he startled some of his hearers. He made the music sound not early Wagner, but at the least of it post-Ring. He also made it hard for Mme. Florence Austral, who sang Senta's ballad, to follow him to the same dizzy level of expression and picturesqueness.

With less of novelty but with a finer beauty Dr. Koussevitzky read the Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser." Magnificiently, in very truth, he blazoned forth this glorified ballet music. Leda's swan, satyrs and the three graces—not for one second were they missed. Also Mme. Austral, more at home with "Tannhaeuser" than with the Hollaender, gave of her beautiful voice successfully in Elizabeth's aria "Dich, Heure Halle."

All this was lofty. But loftier followed when Dr. Koussevitzky played the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." Every exquisite melodious phrase, as it fell, rhythmically right and entrancingly sonorous, on the refreshed and satisfied ear, stirred memories of the blessed Sunday calm that the Hans Sachs of Emil Fischer, when the curtain rose on act three, personified.

Here was the solemnity of the afternoon, crowning perfect beauty. But there was a second solemn moment, when Dr. Koussevitzky, after the frenzy of applause that greeted the Valkyries' ride, motioned the orchestra to stand. This was a significant moment.

It led to a thrillingly beautiful performance of the prelude to "Tristan," and the Love-Death in which Mme. Austral joined. For sheer musicianship surely Dr. Koussevitzky has never surpassed the high point he reached in this prelude. Since emotion held pace with musicianship, the performance, moving as well as beautiful, was one to be remembered this many a day.

The audience applauded Mme. Austral, Dr. Koussevitzky and the players with enthusiasm. R. R. G.

WAR VETERAN AGED 104

MUSIC

Herald Jan 4

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 11th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows:

Walton, overture, "Portsmouth Point." Bax, Symphony No. 2, E minor and C. Loeffler, Canticum Fratris Solis—after St. Francis of Assisi (first time in Boston; Povla Frijsh, soprano). Ravel, Bolero.

Walton and Bax are together in the catalogue as British composers: Walton born in Lancashire; Bax in London. The two were educated musically in England. How different their musical natures as exemplified in the overture and the symphony heard yesterday.

Walton's music is of the hearty John Bull type; roast beef, flagons of ale, the England of Captain Marryatt, "Rule Britannia," "The British Grenadiers," "Down Among the Dead Men," "God Save the King." To music this overture is as the prints of Rowlandson to art—and Rowlandson found his musical translator in Walton. Or the Walton of this overture is to music as Daniel Defoe and William Cobbett to English literature. Music that is sturdy, self-reliant, not without a suggestion of insular arrogance. Walton wisely did not attempt an interlinear translation into tones of Rowlandson's print of a quayside in confusion; no sentimental passage for the officer farewelling his lady love; no grotesque dance for the wooden legged sailor. The composer strove to picture the hurry, the bustle, what one might call the fury of departure. He did not strive in vain.

Bax, on the other hand, has been known to us by his musical sojourn in fairy land. He dwelt in western Ireland for a time, nor was he a stranger among the artists and writers of Dublin. His visit to Russia did not affect him musically to any noticeable extent.

It was said of the pugilist Sir Daniel Donnelly that there were Iricisms in his style. In the music of Arnold Bax there are Celticisms: the romantic melancholy, the Donnybrook defiant outbursts, the fancy that has been nourished on Irish legends. He has seen "the good people"; he has visited the Faery Hills and sailed to the island of Pfand; he has listened to the men and women known to Synge; exchanged mystical revelations with the poet Yeats, yet Bax is no idle dreamer of an empty lay; he dreams—even in this symphony—but here he is also a purposeful man of action. He is profoundly musical and feels no need of a program to fire his imagination. (The symphony is a highly imaginative work.) Mr. Edwin Evans is not extravagant in saying that Irish legends, landscapes and songs have contributed to the characteristic style by which one knows the music of Bax. His music is intensely emotional, but in an individual manner. To some this symphony is a stumbling block; even if they have emotions, they wish them to be aroused in a more familiar and genteel manner. They have ears, but they do not hear. There is nothing cryptic in the music. Everywhere is strength, even in the beauty of the work. Is anyone left unmoved by the Celtic sadness of the ending? Suppose Bax had ended with a roaring fortissimo, with the organ thundering, drums beating, cymbals crashing fanfares of triumpets in what is sometimes called "the apotheosis" would not some have then applauded tempestuously, and said as they went out: "I didn't get on to a good deal of the music, but I liked the ending."

A third hearing confirms one hearer in the impression made by the first; here is one of the most important musical works that have crossed the Atlantic for many years. The sympathetic, eloquent, superb performance yesterday turned impression into conviction.

Mr. Loeffler is a man of fine literary taste and wide reading as well as a singularly skilled composer of exquisite fancy. It is not surprising that this "Hymn of Brother Sun" appealed to him and led him to seek out the fitting music. The Hymn has attracted many composers. Some of them have written in heroic, bravura manner, singularly out of keeping with the text. There are lovely pages in Mr. Loeffler's work—charming melodic lines, an assisting not distracting, always pertinent use of liturgical motives, a poetic blending of instrumental timbres. Mme. Frijsh, the one great interpreter of songs, now before the American public, did not fail to realize and express the sentiments of the Saint and the illuminating commentary of the composer. Mr. Loeffler, Mme. Frijsh, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were obliged more than once to acknowledge the hearty tribute paid them.

There were many requests during the last fortnight for a repetition of Ravel's "Bolero." Ravel did not fare the better by the granting of the request. This "Bolero" is the clever trick of a super-refined composer. The trick is amazingly well performed, but it is only a trick. The surprise of a first performance does not affect one a second time. Indeed, the first 10 minutes in performance yesterday, owing to the inevitable monotony, were rather boresome. Still there was the expectation of something going to happen, of a final thunderous proclamation of the inherently negligible tune. According to the old saw, surprise is the chief element of wit. Perhaps—but honest laughter follows the first cracking of a joke. After that the laughter is only courteous.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn next week. Alexander Glazounov will be the "guest conductor" here on Jan. 17, 18. The program will comprise his sixth symphony; his violin concerto (Benno Rabinoff, violinist), and his symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

SYMPHONY IN 2D MATINEE

Romantic List Played for Tuesday Series

Post Jan 8

Yesterday brought the second of the Tuesday afternoon series of Symphony Concerts. The first, of a few weeks ago, offered only the classics, Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Yesterday's list was, on the other hand, as emphatically romantic, comprising as it did Schumann's Overture to "Manfred" and Second Symphony and Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin," to the first and third acts of "Die Meistersinger," and "The Ride of the Valkyries."

Save for the "Lohengrin" Prelude, the Wagner excerpts were all heard at the recent Pension Fund Concert, while the Schumann Symphony had place not long ago at a Friday and Saturday pair. The "Manfred" Overture, however, had never before appeared on one of Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston programmes, though his plans for his initial season here once included a performance of the whole of Schumann's music to Byron's play, enlisting the services of solo singers, a chorus and a reader. The Overture itself has more than once been called the finest of Schumann's orchestral compositions. In it is a sweep and a freedom, a passion and a dramatic quality certainly not to be found in any of the symphonies. It received from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra yesterday a performance of expected eloquence, and it is to be hoped that the conductor will see fit to play the piece ere long at the regular concerts.

Even more successfully than before did Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday reveal the beauties and conceal the defects of Schumann's long and uneven Symphony. The performances of the Wagnerian fragments, tinctured here and there with the conductor's individual approach to the music, were effective and much relished by the large audience which, in fact, took exceptional pleasure in the entire concert.

SECOND TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Schumann and Wagner Fill Program

Globe Jan 8

The second program of the Tuesday afternoon Symphony concert series consisted of the overture to Byron's "Manfred" and the Second Symphony of Schumann, and four Wagner excerpts—the "Lohengrin" prelude, the "Ride of the Valkyries," the prelude and the introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger."

Schumann's orchestral works are interesting solely because seldom played. Hearing these two compositions of his, it is evident that he never fully grasped the orchestral and symphonic concept. His attitude is too thoroughly pianistic to permit him to go farther from his naturale genre than chamber music. He seems to find no necessity for contrast and color.

When he does try original combinations of instruments, they are often bizarre. The kettledrum strokes in the overture stand out like the proverbial sore thumbs; though in the first movement of the symphony they fit in admirably. Schumann's instrumentation is insecure and erratic.

The musical substance of both the overture and the symphony is so original that it stands out in spite of the clumsy scoring. The principal motive in the symphony is, curiously enough, identical both rhythmically and melodically with the beginning of the introduction to Haydn's D-major symphony.

Unfortunately Dr Koussevitzky substituted for the "Siegfried Funeral Music," originally announced, the more obvious "Ride of the Valkyries." It is a question whether such an excerpt as the introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger" is suitable for concert performance. The other three Wagner excerpts played were more or less self contained units. The beautiful music of the introduction became almost uninteresting taken out of its proper context. The "Meistersinger" prelude, while played with a great attention to detail, did not have the plasticity it inherently possesses.

Dr Koussevitzky quite outdid himself, particularly in the Schmann Symphony. This should have raised the level of the performance to unusual heights, but unfortunately the orchestra showed the ill effects of either scanty rehearsal or carelessness. There were several unfortunate slips, noticeably in the "Meistersinger" prelude, and in the end of the "Lohengrin" perlude.

LEAVES [illegible]

[illegible] Overture, Schumann, [illegible] major; Wagner, [illegible] Lohengrin." The Ride of the [illegible]s from "Die Walkure"; introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; prelude to "The Mastersingers." Schumann and Wagner, both romantics; yet the juxtaposition is ironical to those who recall the mutual attitude of the two men: one towards the music of the other. It is true that Schumann did not know any of Wagner's works after "Tannhaeuser," of which he at first said that Wagner, this clever fellow, full of mad ideas, was incapable of conceiving and writing four beautiful measures, indeed hardly good ones in succession. But soon afterward Schumann found deep and original things in the opera and thought Wagner could be of great importance to the stage. Wagner, on the other hand, called Schumann's D minor symphony "banal." He formally inspired Joseph Rubinstein to write a malignant article against Schumann's compositions. Nor did the two men when they met find their meeting agreeable. Schumann complained that Wagner talked incessantly; Wagner found it impossible to discuss music with a man who would hardly open his mouth.

It was a pleasure to hear the overture to "Manfred" again. It has not been put on a program of the Friday and Saturday concerts for almost a dozen seasons. The overture has interest outside of its musical quality; reminding one, as it does, of the poet who exerted a mighty influence on European literature and even the conduct of life; also reminding one of the unsavory discussion that has followed the publication of Mrs. Stowe's article. It is strange that no psycho-analyist in music—say Richard Strauss—has treated the subject, laying morbid stress on the Astarte Episoda. By the way, will not Dr. Koussevitzky at some concert in the future conduct fragments from Tchaikovsky's "Manfred"? We say "fragments" for the movements of the symphony are of unequal worth.

The performance of the various works gave great pleasure to the large audience. Whether the music was by Schumann or by Wagner, the performance was conspicuous by its eloquence; by its attention to the details—as in the symphony—which, interpreted by Dr. Koussevitzky, never seemed mere padding. If Schumann and Wagner could have heard their music played in this manner they might have had greater respect, the one for the other—perhaps genuine affection. Who knows?

The next one of the Tuesday concerts will be Feb. 11. H. M. G.

mighty expectant, all looking for something apart. For the spell of Wagner still holds its power unlessened by one iota. For real romance the world is still eager. But of course the romance must be genuine, not commonplace ragged out.

So wild a note of high romance Dr. Koussevitzky found in the "Flying Dutchman" overture that he startled some of his hearers. He made the music sound not early Wagner, but, at the least of it post-Ring. He also made it hard for Mme. Florence Austral, who sang Senta's ballad, to follow him to the same dizzy level of expression and picturesqueness.

With less of novelty but with a finer beauty Dr. Koussevitzky read the Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser." Magnificiently, in very truth, he blazoned forth this glorified ballet music. Leda's swan, satyrs and the three graces—not for one second were they missed. Also Mme. Austral, more at home with "Tannhaeuser" than with the Hollaender, gave of her beautiful voice successfully in Elizabeth's aria "Dich, Heure Halle."

All this was lofty. But loftier followed when Dr. Koussevitzky played the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." Every exquisite melodious phrase, as it fell, rhythmically right and entrancingly sonorous, on the refreshed and satisfied ear, stirred memories of the blessed Sunday calm that the Hans Sachs of Emil Fischer, when the curtain rose on act three, personified.

Here was the solemnity of the afternoon, crowning perfect beauty. But there was a second solemn moment, when Dr. Koussevitzky, after the frenzy of applause that greeted the Valkyries' ride, motioned the orchestra to stand. This was a significant moment.

It led to a thrillingly beautiful performance of the prelude to "Tristan," and the Love-Death in which Mme. Austral joined. For sheer musicianship surely Dr. Koussevitzky has never surpassed the high point he reached in this prelude. Since emotion held pace with musicianship, the performance, moving as well as beautiful, was one to be remembered this many a day.

The audience applauded Mme. Austral, Dr. Koussevitzky and the players with enthusiasm. R. R. G.

WAR VETERAN AGED 104

MUSIC

Herald

CHILDREN'S CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert for young people yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin conducted. Alfred H. Meyer's comments on the program were read by Carlos E. Pinfield. Stereopticon slides were shown. The program was as follows: Rameau-Kretzschmar, ballet suite from "Acante et Cephisse." Tournier, "Fairie," for harp (Bernard Zighera), and orchestra. Prokofieff, march from "The Love for Three Oranges." Saint-Saens, "The Animals' Carnival—Cocks and Hens, The Elephant (M. Kunze, double bass), Aquarium, Personages with Long Ears, The Cuckoo in the Depth of the Forest, Aviary (E. Laurent, flute), The Swan (J. Bedetti, violoncello); Messrs. Sanroma and Fiedler, pianists. Ravel, Bolero.

The question arises whenever a concert is given for children, what compositions are the better suited to their musical instincts (if they have any)—music that has pronounced and stirring rhythm, music of action, or music of obvious melody. In these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is no deliberate plan of instruction. Mr. Meyer's interesting comments are upon the pieces then and there performed. There are no long explanations of the various instruments and various forms, as in Mr. Schilling's concerts, with music to illustrate now the strings, now the wood-wind instruments and so on. The "education" is to be derived from the music heard. It has been shown in previous concerts in Symphony hall that the young people show little interest in slow movements of the composers called "classic." A lively piece, provided it is obviously melodious, pleases the young. It is safe to say that they would enjoy Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," or Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" more than a slow movement by Mozart or Beethoven. Nor is this to be greatly deplored. The realization of Mozart's greatness will come later in the children's musical life.

Early in this month a concert for children was given in London, and what was the program? Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Elgar's transcription of Bach's C minor fantasia and fugue; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and the overture to "Tannhaeuser." Even the English children take their pleasures sadly. The program presented yesterday was much more to the point; a program that should please children from 10 to 80 years of age. Take this ballet music of Rameau's, for example. The fact that Rameau in this "heroic pastoral" was the first to introduce clarinets in the Paris Opera House would not interest children, nor would they be thrilled if they were told that as the first performance was in celebration of the birth of the Duke of Burgundy, Rameau endeavored in the overture to express the popular joy "as far as it is possible in music." Surely the music itself would be enough. Nor are children, unlike some of their elders, frightened by the name Prokofieff, nor do they argue that his music must be of a barbaric nature. And what music is more appropriate for a concert of this nature than Saint-Saens's Animals and Ravel's Bolero.

The hall was filled from top to bottom. The children were much more appreciative, more enthusiastic than on certain preceding occasions. Some of the slides amused them greatly. What would the comedians and ballet dancers of Rameau's time have said had they known that their costumes and poses would have excited laughter when shown to children of Boston in the 20th century? Yesterday the audience enjoyed the heavy tread of the elephantine double-bass, the virtuosity of Mr. Laurent, and the song of the swan so beautifully sung by Mr. Bedetti's violoncello. Unsophisticated, they applauded Rameau, Prokofieff, Tournier and Ravel with delightful impartiality.

The order of the program was changed from that given above. Mr. Burgin conducted the ballet suite and Saint-Saens's zoological music. He was succeeded by Dr. Koussevitzky, who conducted the remaining numbers with the care and interest that he would display at one of the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening concerts.

The final pair of young people's concerts this season will be given on April 23 and 24. The concert of yesterday will be repeated this afternoon.

KILLING PROOF

nounced for this [illegible]r. Hanson was asked yesterday about that new work, his explanation was of interest.

"The reason why my new symphony, the "Romantic,' is not being played in Rochester this season is due to the fact that Mr. Koussevitski has commissioned it for performance next season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra," said Dr. Hanson. "The reason for this commission is that next year will be the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitski has asked representative composers from various countries to write works for first performances during that season," he explained. "Due to the importance of such a performance, I am holding up all previous performances of the work."

Dr. Hanson also received yesterday a letter from the offices of the American Academy in Rome informing him that he has been appointed a member of the jury which will elect the next holder of the Prix de Rome. The other members of the jury will be Walter Damrosch, John Alden Carpenter, Edward Burlingame Hill and Leo Sowerby.

PENSION 24 AN EPIC CONCERT

Post

Mme. Austral, Wagnerian Singer, a Notable Aid

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Wagner concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its Pension Fund are no novelty. Nor has the orchestra on such occasions gone always without competent and helpful vocal embellishment. But yesterday, at Symphony Hall, there came a Pension Fund Wagner concert with a notable Wagnerian singer, Florence Austral, to aid. And that was novelty indeed.

IN PRESENCE OF GREATNESS

As was wholly appropriate, the best came last yesterday, in the shape of the "Tristan" Prelude and "Love-Death," and the large audience by its pronounced and protracted enthusiasm showed itself sensible of the fact that it had been in the presence of greatness: great music, great singing, great orchestral playing and great conducting. Many times were Dr. Koussevitzky and Miss Austral recalled, and at length the conductor bade the players rise and bow their acknowledgments.

The programme of yesterday's concert was ingeniously made. First there was the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and after it Senta's Ballad, from that opera, seldom enough sung hereabouts. Here was the early Wagner, a giant in swaddling clothes but a giant for all that. Followed the Bacchanale from the later, Parisian version of "Tannhauser," a glowing page for which Dr. Koussevitzky displays especial sympathy although there have been those who dissented from this or that detail in his reading of it. And as pendant to this came a bit from the original "Tannhauser," music still as fresh as on the day when it was penned, Elizabeth's greeting to the Hall of Song.

For the rest there was, and richly played, the noble apotheosis of Hans Sachs that is the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and the Ride of the Valkyries, again at the dizzy pace which Dr. Koussevitzky fancies here.

To Senta's Ballad, which she sang in English, Miss Austral brought yesterday its three essential moods: the wild terror at the thought of the spectreship and its doomed captain, the maid's calm faith that the sacrifice of one who truly loved him would lift the Dutchman's curse, and the passionate exaltation in which she proclaims herself as his potential deliverer. And Miss Austral, who was later to voice so eloquently the emotions of the Isolde who had learned all that there was to know of love and life, could also bring to the music of Elizabeth a note of virginal innocence and maidenly joy.

Programs in Prospect

From Mr. Eugene Goossens as guest conductor at the Symphony Concerts of next week::

Trans Jan 16

A Faust Overture.....Wagner
Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat major.....Schumann
Concertino for Double String-Orchestra, Goossens
Symphonic Poem, "Roman Festivals"..Respighi

A program to which there can be no possible demur outside one item—the Symphony from Schumann. Is Mr. Goossens aware that with Schumann in general and with this First Symphony in particular, Dr. Koussevitzky excels most other conductors, that no less than four times it was played at the Symphony Concerts last season? All else whets expectation. Wagner's Faust Overture has been long overlooked at Symphony Hall; wherever it has been heard, Mr. Goossens's Concertino has pleased; while Respighi's "Roman Festivals," new likewise to Boston, rounds the series begun with "Roman Fountains," continued with "Roman Pines."

From Symphony Hall for the Young People's Concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, Jan. 28 and 29, with Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin conducting and Mr. Meyer as introducer of the several pieces:

Three Dances from The Ballet "Acanthus and Cephissa".....Rameau
"Faerie" for Harp and Orchestra.....Tournier
(Harpist: Bernard Zighera)
March from The Opera, "Love of Three Oranges".....Prokoffiev
Seven Numbers from "The Animals' Carnival".....Saint-Saëns (Soloists: Messrs. Kunze, Laurent, Bedetti.
Pianists: Messrs. Sanromá and Fiedler)
Ride of The Valkyrs from The Opera, "Die Walküre".....Wagner

A new proviso for these Young People's Concerts runs: "Three hundred desirable floor seats have been reserved, to be sold directly to individuals for their children. These special reserved tickets are available to Symphony subscribers at the Symphony Hall box office at $1 each. No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children. The balance of the seats will, as before, be offered the schools of Greater Boston at thirty-five cents each."

Globe Jan 12

Glazunov As Guest Conductor

Dr Koussevitzky is taking this week and next the midseason vacation from his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony allowed him by the terms of his present contract with the trustees As is now customary, he is to be replaced at the Symphony concerts by two distinguished guest leaders, Alexander Glazunov, the Russian composer, who will conduct this week a program of his own music, and Eugene Goossens, the English conductor and composer, who will appear next week.

Glazunov was born at St Petersburg, now Leningrad, Aug 10, 1865. His first American tour, now in progress, has included appearances with the Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The program book of the Chicago concerts of Dec 20, and 21, 1929, stated that the music of Glazunov has been played by the Chicago Orchestra oftener than that of any other living composer except Richard Strauss. This is not the case with the Boston Symphony, on whose programs the music of such writers as Ravel and Sibelins has more frequently figured than has that of the noted Russian. But a good deal of Glazunov's work has been heard at Boston Symphony concerts.

Felix Borowski, editor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra program book published in the issue of Dec 20 and 21 last the following note on Glazunov, reprinted here in a somewhat condensed form.

"Glazunov, the son of a bookseller and publisher who possessed a flourishing business in St Petersburg in the days of the imperial regime, began his musical training at the age of nine with Narcisse Elyenowsky, who taught him piano playing. Displaying quite remarkable gifts for composition, Glazunov came under the notice of Balakirev and, when the boy was 14 years of age, was advised by Balakirev to develop those gifts under the superintendence of Rimsky-Korsakov. The latter musician wrote in his book My Musical Life:

"Casually, Balakirev once brought me the composition of a 14 or 15-year-old high school student, Sascha Glazunov. It was an orchestral score written in childish fashion. The boy's talent was indubitably clear. Shortly afterward (in the season of 1879-80) Balakirev introduced him, that he might take up his studies with me. While giving lessons in elementary theory to his mother, Eleyena Pavlona Glavounov, I began also to teach the youthful Sascha. He was a charming boy with beautiful eyes, who played the piano very clumsily; N. N. Elyenowsky taught him piano playing. Elementary theory and solfeggio proved unnecessary for him, as he had a superior ear, and Elyenowsky had covered harmony also with him to a certain extent.

Glazunov was only 16 when he brought to Rimsky-Korsakov the sketch for his first symphony, and the work, completed in 1881, was performed the following year under the direction of Balakirev at a concert of the Free School of Music in St Petersburg. Later the road to fame was made easier for the young musician through his friendship with Belaieff, who, having succeeded to the business and fortune of his father—a timber merchant—became an ardent supporter of Russian music, and who founded a music publishing business in Leipzig, which brought out the works of Glazunov, Rimsky-Korsakov, Borodin and others of the national school.

Borodin also interested himself in Glazunov's works, and brought them to the attention of Liszt. It was due to the influence of the Hungarian master that the young man's first symphony was produced at Weimar in 1884. Thereafter, Glazunov's rise was rapid and continuous. His works were performed in every country of Europe, and he was invited to conduct his own music at the Paris Exposition of 1889. In 1900 Glazunov was invited to join the faculty of the St Petersburg (Leningrad) Conservatory as rofessor of instrumentation and core-reading, and when, five years ater, Rimsky-Korsakov was removed rom the directorship of the institution, in consequence of his political ympathy with certain striking students, Glazunov succeeded him in the post and promptly reinstated him on he faculty.

A Pupil's View

An interesting appreciation of Glazunov as a man and a teacher was contributed to the music department of the New York Times by Dimitri Tiomkin, one of his pupils.

"Who of the hundreds—perhaps even thousands—of the graduates of the former Imperial Conservatory of Music of St Petersburg," wrote Mr Tiomkin, "does not recollect the large, imposing office with portraits of Rubinstein, Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov, etc, and behind the large table the imposing figure of the moving spirit of the venerable 'Lighthouse' of the tonal art —Alexander Constantinovitch Glazunov? . . . He is known in Russia not only as a towering musical genius, composer of symphonies, ballets, songs, instrumental work and stage music, and an incomparable pedagogue, but he is worshiped as one of the most magnanimous personalities, a friend of the poor and the outcast—a man with a real heart. His devotion to the cause of his art may be judged by the fact that throughout the revolutionary terror he stuck heroically to his post in the conservatory and did not leave Russia, as most of his colleagues did. Mme Kamaneva, head of the Department of Culture, said proudly, 'We can be proud of our Glazunov at the head of the conservatory.'

"A majority of the great Russian virtuosi, conductors, composers and court procedures.

Music in Boston

Monitor Jan 8

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, gave the second of its Tuesday series of concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Schumann and Wagner were drawn upon to make up a program of Romantic music. The items were the "Manfred" Overture and the Second Symphony in C major of the former, and the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Ride of the Valkyrs, and the Introduction to Act III and the Prelude to "Meistersinger."

All these numbers have been heard at other concerts under Dr. Koussevitzky, except the "Manfred" Overture. Let us be thankful that he has confined himself to the Overture instead of carrying out his dire scheme, as once threatened, of presenting the entire poem, with all the incidental music accompanying the fervid voice of a reader. The Overture contains all the characterizing music that is necessary to expound the Byronic notion of romantic grandeur. A century ago people appear to have liked that sort of altiloquence; today the Overture is quite enough.

In fact, it was pleasant yesterday to put out of memory the literary associations and give oneself up to enjoyment

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Boston Orchestra Is Almost 50 Years Old

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, an organization of 112 musicians conducted by the celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, which is to give its annual Richmond concert in the Mosque the night of Monday, February 3, under the management of T. Michaux Moody as the second attraction in his artists' course of five concerts, is almost 50 years old. It was founded in 1881 by the late Major Henry L. Higginson, who spared neither time nor money in bringing the organization to the highest possible standard. Tickets for this concert alone and for that to be given by Jascha Heizetz, violinist, on the following Monday night, February 10, as well as for the series, are now on sale at Walter D Moses and Company. Tremendous interest is being shown in the coming to this city of these two attractions, for nohing is more popular with the public than a distinguished orchestra or a world-famous violinist.

not a severe technical drilling and composition—intensely thorough and conscientious as he was in these respects—but a spiritual inspiration. Although apparently democratic and gentle in his relations to the students, yet he remained a spiritual dictator in principle. All the students were most anxious to prepare best their lessons for Glazunov, as they all feared the detection of the slightest mistakes, for which he had a phenomenal perception.

"Like all men of personality, Glazunov has his individual peculiarities, his outspoken likes and dislikes. Either he is very lively or absolutely silent Although he inherited considerable wealth from his ancestors, that enabled him to live well, he was never so happy as he was in simple Bohemian apartments on the Kazanskaya, about four blocks from the Conservatory, which he furnished in the old style. Until a short while ago he was the good boy of his 90-year-old mother, who always called him Sashenka. His particular hobby was his old family coach, a strange-looking vehicle, which he used in Summer and in Winter. With a long black cigar, a big black tie and robust figure, dressed in the manner of the characters of Turgeniew's or Tolstoy's novels, he was an outstanding figure in St Petersburg society. But Glazunov was far more a Bohemian of comfortable habits than a society man. His constant guests were the well-known writers, painters and musicians of the Russian metropolis: Chekhow, Serow, Repin, Stassow, Rimsky-Korsakow, Liadow and company. . . .

"Glazunov was accessible to everybody, without any red tape. He received everybody who came, helped everyone who asked for help. He never forgot a pupil, or failed, long after the official lessons had come to an end, to read and, if they wished it, to correct their writing. He never condemned anybody. He had no enemies. Even the police, who suspected him of being a sympathizer with the radicals, never dared molest him by searching his house or asking questions about his proteges.

"Utter modesty and spiritual democracy were his watchwords at home and in the school. As a rule, he spoke little in society, but when he was aroused on a particular subject he could be brilliantly conversational. His favorite topics were the stage and the ballet, in which field of composition he distinguished himself. There is in him much of the hospitable Russian merchant who loves to entertain his visitors, or, in the good old days, treat them to a glass of tea or vodka. Above all his musical colleagues in Russia, he was loved, almost deified, by the students and even the general public."

Herald Dec 25

MUSIC

BLOCH'S RHAPSODY

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave its 10th concert of the 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute;" Beethoven, symphony No. 4; Bloch, "Schelomo" ("Solomon"); Hebrew rhapsody for violoncello (Felix Salmond) and orchestra; Tchaikovsky, overture, "1812."

Mr. Bloch is most inspired when he stands firmly and proudly on Jewish ground. The well equipped composer is seen in all that he writes, but his three Jewish poems for orchestra, his Psalms, for voice and orchestra, two of which have been sung here by Mme. Povla Frijsh and in a memorable manner; his "Schelomo" are far above his what might be called Gentile work, even above his concerto, not to mention the cycloramic "America." As he has written in an account of himself and his artistic beliefs, it is the Jewish soul that interests him; "the complex, glowing, agitated soul" that he feels vibrating through the Bible. No wonder that the despair of the Preacher in Jerusalem and the splendor of Solomon alike appealed to him; the monarch in all his glory; the Preacher, who when he looked on all the works that his hands had wrought and on the labor that he had labored to do, could only exclaim: "And behold, all was vanity, and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the Sun." And so Mr. Bloch might have taken as a motto for this Hebrew rhapsody the lines of Rueckert:

"Solomon! Where is thy throne? It is gone in the wind.

* * * * *

Say, what is pleasure? A phantom, a mask undefined;
Science? An almond, whereof we can pierce but the rind;
Honor and Affluence? Firmans that Fortune hath signed
Only to glitter and pass on the wings of the wind."

Other composers have taken Solomon for their hero; as Handel in his oratorio; Goldmark, representing him as mighty and jealous in "The Queen of Sheba"; Gounod in the opera similarly entitled, based on the wildly fantastic tale of Gerard de Nerval; there are older operas, but all, or nearly all, are concerned with the "Grande Turke," the Sultan of the Ottomans. It was left for Mr. Bloch to express in music the magnificence and the pessimistic, despairing philosophy of the ruler to whom is falsely attributed the book, Ecclesiastes.

Here is music that does not brook conventional analysis: music that is now purely lyrical, now dramatic, now pictorial; music that rises to gorgeous heights and sinks to the depths; with a conclusion that is not of the Preacher, the pious admonition after summing up the whole matter; but a conclusion voiced by the violoncello: "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest." Here is no Solomon, lord of all creatures, at whose name Afrites and evil jinn trembled, the Solomon of the "Thousand Nights and a Night"; here is the monarch that have known power and all pleasures, drawn-out complaint. The inference would be wrong, for Mr. Bloch has imagined in tones, in superbly exultant measures the pomp and sumptuousness of the King enthroned. There are orchestral bursts of glorification; between them are recitatives and lyric reflections for the jaded voluptuary, the embittered philosopher. The ingenuity displayed is as remarkable as the individuality, the originality shown by the composer stirred in his soul not only by the story of Solomon; moved mightily by the thought of ancient days, the succeedings trials and persecution of his race. More than once in the Rhapsody, if there is a suggestion of Solomon's court and Temple, there is also the suggestion of the Wailing Wall.

The performance by Mr. Salmond, whose musicianship and art were already known in Boston, and by the orchestra was of the utmost eloquence. A violoncellist, seeking only for applause, would have chosen a concerto that would inevitably by its obvious tunefulness, have won him easy recognition. Bloch's rhapsody is not a parade piece for a virtuoso regarding the orchestra only as a necessary appendage. The Rhapsody is orchestral with violoncello obbligato. Without an orchestra like the one heard yesterday; without Dr. Koussevitzky, imbued with the spirit of the composition, appreciating the interpretation of the soloist, the Rhapsody might have seemed enigmatical to many. There were yesterday three interpreters, all in aesthetic rivalry. One tribute was paid to them by the audience. The enthusiasm was genuine.

The concert was otherwise of a high standard; even Tchaikovsky's overture, written for an occasion, music that should be heard out-of-doors if possible, gained a certain dignity by the dramatic rendering. For once there was music, not merely bustle and noise. Mozart's overture, ever fresh and sparkling; Beethoven's symphony—they were performed in a vital, necessarily romantic manner; the symphony in the poetically grand style—not with the perfunctory respect paid to a name that is often supposed to guarantee a performance, though it be pedestrian and boresome.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Walton, overture "Portsmouth Point." Bax, Symphony No. 2. Loeffler, "Cantum Fratris Solis" (after [illegible]

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

BY A STAFF CORRESPONDENT.

New York, Jan. 11.—(NANA)—Artistic New York had two novelties this week to wrangle over—a new symphony and a dance without music. The symphony, No. 2 in E Minor and C" by Arnold Bax, the Anglo-Celtic composer, was introduced by Serge Koussevitzky and the visiting Boston Symphony orchestra.

Bax is not unknown to concert goers here. Four years ago Sokoloff and his Cleveland Symphony played his E-flat symphony, a stern, somber composition. The new symphony is described as "absolute music". It is not too absolute—which word many translate as "modern" and "chaotic"—to win the praises of the stricter critics.

Of the new symphony, Lawrence Gilman, who is not addicted to the moderns, says:

"Mr. Bax's symphony is in three movements, formidable in scope and content, and it lasts for almost forty minutes. It is scored for an orchestra of heroic size, fit to deal with what Carlyle so bravely called 'the immensities and the eternities'. And it is as substantial in its imaginative and intellectual yield as if tonal gnat's egg had not been agreed upon as the only decent thing for the creative mind to

N. Y. TELEGRAM

APR 4 - 1930

NEW YORK
SUN

Boston Symphony Gives Second Matinee Concert

The second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Saturday in Carnegie Hall with a sold-out house. The orchestra, which had given three concerts in greater New York during the preceding two days, including the Friday Russian refugee benefit, was in admirable form, showing its virtuosity in glowing colors throughout the program. The high light of the concert was the second number, when Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of Beethoven's fourth symphony, a work all the more welcome because of infrequent hearing here, received a wealth of lyric beauty through great tonal finesse from the orchestra and polished and graceful articulation of phrasing.

A number new here was a prelude and fugue by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, a Czech-Italian composer, whose ballet "Il Carillon Magico" was seen some years ago at the Metropolitan Opera House. His prelude and fugue is a well written, melodious, fresh and buoyant composition with parts effectively partial to the strings. The number was given with so much orchestral color and dash as to win for it a decided hit with the audience.

The program began with the allegro moderato and allegro sections from Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, which were played in a very straightforward, but virile manner. Richard Strauss's melodious interlude from the opera "Intermezzo, A Domestic Comedy" and Ravel's "Bolero," repeated from Thursday's concert, and not winning the acclaim to be expected, completed the program.

Ravel's "Bolero," which made such a hit with audiences when Mr. Toscanini put it on a series of Philharmonic-Symphony programs recently, has been selected to close the Carnegie Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11.

On Thursday Mr. Koussevitzky will also introduce the new second symphony (in E minor and C) of Arnold Bax, which Mr. Bax has dedicated to him. Walton's "Portsmouth Point" overture and Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," with Mme. Povla Frijsh as soprano soloist, are also on the program.

Additional numbers for Saturday are a prelude and fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, with a major scale as the fugal subject; Mozart's symphony in E flat and Rabaud's "Procession nocturne."

[illegible] old Haydn's

PENSION AN EPIC CONCERT

Post

Mme. Austral, Wagnerian Singer, a Notable Aid

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Wagner concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its Pension Fund are no novelty. Nor has the orchestra on such occasions gone always without competent and helpful vocal embellishment. But yesterday, at Symphony Hall, there came a Pension Fund Wagner concert with a notable Wagnerian singer, Florence Austral, to aid. And that was novelty indeed.

IN PRESENCE OF GREATNESS

As was wholly appropriate, the best came last yesterday, in the shape of the "Tristan" Prelude and "Love-Death," and the large audience by its pronounced and protracted enthusiasm showed itself sensible of the fact that it had been in the presence of greatness: great music, great singing, great orchestral playing and great conducting. Many times were Dr. Koussevitzky and Miss Austral recalled, and at length the conductor bade the players rise and bow their acknowledgments.

The programme of yesterday's concert was ingeniously made. First there was the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and after it Senta's Ballad, from that opera, seldom enough sung hereabouts. Here was the early Wagner, a giant in swaddling clothes but a giant for all that. Followed the Bacchanale from the later, Parisian version of "Tannhauser," a glowing page for which Dr. Koussevitzky displays especial sympathy although there have been those who dissented from this or that detail in his reading of it. And as pendant to this came a bit from the original "Tannhauser," music still as fresh as on the day when it was penned, Elizabeth's greeting to the Hall of Song.

For the rest there was, and richly played, the noble apotheosis of Hans Sachs that is the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and the Ride of the Valkyries, again at the dizzy pace which Dr. Koussevitzky fancies here.

To Senta's Ballad, which she sang in English, Miss Austral brought yesterday its three essential moods: the wild terror at the thought of the spectreship and its doomed captain, the maid's calm faith that the sacrifice of one who truly loved him would lift the Dutchman's curse, and the passionate exaltation in which she proclaims herself as his potential deliverer. And Miss Austral, who was later to voice so eloquently the emotions of the Isolde who had learned all that there was to know of love and life, could also bring to the music of Elizabeth a note of virginal innocence and maidenly joy.

Programs in Prospect

From Mr. Eug... conductor at the ... next week::

A Faust Overture... Symphony, No. 1, in ... Concertino for Double ...

Symphonic Poem, "R...

A program to wh... possible demur ou... Symphony from Schu... sens aware that with... eral and with this ... particular, Dr. Kouss... other conductors, th... four times it was pl... phony Concerts last d... whets expectation. ... Overture has been long ... phony Hall; wherever i... Mr. Goossens's Concerti... while Respighi's "Ro... new likewise to Bost... series begun with "Ror... continued with "Roman ...

From Symphony Hall ... People's Concerts on ... Wednesday afternoons, Ja... with Dr. Koussevitzky an... conducting and Mr. Meyer... of the several pieces:

Three Dances from The Ballet "... and Cephissa" ...
"Faerie" for Harp and Orchestra ...
(Harpist: Bernard Zigl...
March from The Opera, "Love ... Oranges" ...
Seven Numbers from "The Animal ... val" ...
(Soloists: Messrs. Kunze, Laure...
Pianists: Messrs. Sanroma and ...
Ride of The Valkyrs from The Opera ... Walkure" ...

A new proviso for the ... People's Concerts runs: "Three ... desirable floor seats have been ... to be sold directly to individuals ... children. These special reserves ... are available to Symphony subscribers ... the Symphony Hall box office at ... No adult will be admitted unless ... panied by one or more children ... balance of the seats will, as ... offered the schools of Greater ... thirty-five cents each."

4.50 P.M.—Women's ...
5.00 P.M.—...
5.45 P.M.—...
6.20 P.M.—...
6.30 P.M.—...
6.45 P.M.—...
6.50 P.M.—...
7.00 P.M.—Harmon... Big Bro...
7.30 P.M.—... ley, ten... direction... (Quicksi... Under ... Jungle ... Crying ... of the ...
8.00 P.M. ...
9.00 P.M. ... tenor; ... tenor; Orche... Juba ... iana, ... ni). ... piano ... Matt... (Dris... from ...
9.30 P. ...
10.00 ... Iago ... bari... Orch... Shil...
11.00 ... Rid...
11.05 ... Sign...
990 k...
4.00—...
4.15—...
4.30—...
5.00—...
5.25—...
5.30—...
5.45—...
5.59—...
6.00—...
6.02—...
6.15—...
6.20—...
6.30—...
6.45—...
6.55—...
7.0...
7.1...
7.3...
8.0...

Globe Jan 12

Glazunov As Guest Conductor

Dr Koussevitzky is taking this week and next the midseason vacation from his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony allowed him by the terms of his present contract with the trustees As is now customary, he is to be replaced at the Symphony concerts by two distinguished guest leaders, Alexander Glazunov, the Russian composer, who will conduct this week a program of his own music, and Eugene Goossens, the English conductor and composer, who will appear next week.

Glazunov was born at St Petersburg, now Leningrad, Aug 10, 1865. His first American tour, now in progress, has included appearances with the Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The program book of the Chicago concerts of Dec 20, and 21, 1929, stated that the music of Glazunov has been played by the Chicago Orchestra oftener than that of any other living composer except Richard Strauss. This is not the case with the Boston Symphony, on whose programs the music of such writers as Ravel and Sibelins has more frequently figured than has that of the noted Russian. But a good deal of Glazunov's work has been heard at Boston Symphony concerts.

Felix Borowski, editor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra program book published in the issue of Dec 20 and 21 last the following note on Glazunov, reprinted here in a somewhat condensed form.

"Glazunov, the son of a bookseller and publisher who possessed a flourishing business in St Petersburg in the days of the imperial regime, began his musical training at the age of nine with Narcisse Elyenowsky, who taught him piano playing. Displaying quite remarkable gifts for composition, Glazunov came under the notice of Balakirev and, when the boy was 14 years of age, was advised by Balakirev to develop those gifts under the superintendence of Rimsky-Korsakov. The latter musician wrote in his book My Musical Life:

"Casually, Balakirev once brought me the composition of a 14 or 15-year-old high school student, Sascha Glazunov. It was an orchestral score written in childish fashion. The boy's talent was indubitably clear. Shortly afterward (in the season of 1879-80) Balakirev introduced him, that he might take up his studies with me. While giving lessons in elementary theory to his mother, Eleyena Pavlona Glavounov, I began also to teach the youthful Sascha. He was a charming boy with beautiful eyes, who played the piano very clumsily; N. N. Elyenowsky taught him piano playing. Elementary theory and solfeggio proved unnecessary for him, as he had a superior ear, and Elyenowsky had covered harmony also with him to a certain extent.

Glazunov was only 16 when he brought to Rimsky-Korsakov the sketch for his first symphony, and the work, completed in 1881, was performed the following year under the direction of Balakirev at a concert of the Free School of Music in St Petersburg. Later the road to fame was made easier for the young musician through his friendship with Belaieff, who, having succeeded to the business and fortune of his father—a timber merchant—became an ardent supporter of Russian music, and who founded a music publishing business in Leipzig, which brought out the works of Glazunov, Rimsky-Korsakov, Borodin and others of the national school.

Borodin also interested himself in Glazunov's works, and brought them to the attention of Liszt. It was due to the influence of the Hungarian master that the young man's first symphony was produced at Weimar in 1884. Thereafter, Glazunov's rise was rapid and continuous. His works were performed in every country of Europe, and he was invited to conduct his own music at the Paris Exposition of 1889. In 1900 Glazunov was invited to join the faculty of the St Petersburg (Leningrad) Conservatory as professor of instrumentation and score-reading, and when, five years later, Rimsky-Korsakov was removed from the directorship of the institution, in consequence of his political sympathy with certain striking students, Glazunov succeeded him in the post and promptly reinstated him on the faculty.

A Pupil's View

An interesting appreciation of Glazunov as a man and a teacher was contributed to the music department of the New York Times by Dimitri Tiomkin, one of his pupils.

"Who of the hundreds—perhaps even thousands—of the graduates of the former Imperial Conservatory of Music of St Petersburg," wrote Mr Tiomkin, "does not recollect the large, imposing office with portraits of Rubinstein, Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov, etc, and behind the large table the imposing figure of the moving spirit of the venerable 'Lighthouse' of the tonal art —Alexander Constantinovitch Glazunov? . . . He is known in Russia not only as a towering musical genius, composer of symphonies, ballets, songs, instrumental work and stage music, and an incomparable pedagogue, but he is worshiped as one of the most magnanimous personalities, a friend of the poor and the outcast—a man with a real heart. His devotion to the cause of his art may be judged by the fact that throughout the revolutionary terror he stuck heroically to his post in the conservatory and did not leave Russia, as most of his colleagues did. Mme Kamaneva, head of the Department of Culture, said proudly, 'We can be proud of our Glazunov at the head of the conservatory.'

"A majority of the great Russian virtuosi, conductors, composers and musicians in less prominent positions owe their training and success to this leading master of Russian music today.

"My own recollections of Glazunov as a teacher in the Imperial Conservatory of Music are and remain the most cherished moments of my past. He acted as a teacher of orchestration, counterpoint and composition, whose lessons were the most popular features of the institution. His method was not a severe technical drilling and composition—intensely thorough and conscientious as he was in these respects—but a spiritual inspiration. Although apparently democratic and gentle in his relations to the students, yet he remained a spiritual dictator in principle. All the students were most anxious to prepare best their lessons for Glazunov, as they all feared the detection of the slightest mistakes, for which he had a phenomenal perception.

"Like all men of personality, Glazunov has his individual peculiarities, his outspoken likes and dislikes. Either he is very lively or absolutely silent Although he inherited considerable wealth from his ancestors, that enabled him to live well, he was never so happy as he was in simple Bohemian apartments on the Kazanskaya, about four blocks from the Conservatory, which he furnished in the old style. Until a short while ago he was the good boy of his 90-year-old mother, who always called him Sashenka. His particular hobby was his old family coach, a strange-looking vehicle, which he used in Summer and in Winter. With a long black cigar, a big black tie and robust figure, dressed in the manner of the characters of Turgeniew's or Tolstoy's novels, he was an outstanding figure in St Petersburg society. But Glazunov was far more a Bohemian of comfortable habits than a society man. His constant guests were the well-known writers, painters and musicians of the Russian metropolis: Chekhow, Serow, Repin, Stassow, Rimsky-Korsakow, Liadow and company. . . .

"Glazunov was accessible to everybody, without any red tape. He received everybody who came, helped everyone who asked for help. He never forgot a pupil, or failed, long after the official lessons had come to an end, to read and, if they wished it, to correct their writing. He never condemned anybody. He had no enemies. Even the police, who suspected him of being a sympathizer with the radicals, never dared molest him by searching his house or asking questions about his proteges.

"Utter modesty and spiritual democracy were his watchwords at home and in the school. As a rule, he spoke little in society, but when he was aroused on a particular subject he could be brilliantly conversational. His favorite topics were the stage and the ballet, in which field of composition he distinguished himself. There is in him much of the hospitable Russian merchant who loves to entertain his visitors, or, in the good old days, treat them to a glass of tea or vodka. Above all his musical colleagues in Russia, he was loved, almost deified, by the students and even the general public."

court procedures.

Music in Boston

Monitor Jan 8

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, gave the second of its Tuesday series of concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Schumann and Wagner were drawn upon to make up a program of Romantic music. The items were the "Manfred" Overture and the Second Symphony in C major of the former, and the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Ride of the Valkyrs, and the Introduction to Act III and the Prelude to "Meistersinger."

All these numbers have been heard at other concerts under Dr. Koussevitzky, except the "Manfred" Overture. Let us be thankful that he has confined himself to the Overture instead of carrying out his dire scheme, as once threatened, of presenting the entire poem, with all the incidental music accompanying the fervid voice of a reader. The Overture contains all the characterizing music that is necessary to expound the Byronic notion of romantic grandeur. A century ago people appear to have liked that sort of altiloquence; today the Overture is quite enough.

In fact, it was pleasant yesterday to put out of memory the literary associations and give oneself up to enjoyment of the music alone. The playing of the orchestra was superb in this number and in the symphony. Fortunate are those among the Tuesday subscribers who are having their introduction to symphonic music from such a band and such a conductor.

L. A. S.

Herald Dec. 28

MUSIC

BLOCH'S RHAPSODY

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave its 10th concert of the 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute;" Beethoven, symphony No. 4; Bloch, "Schelomo" ("Solomon"); Hebrew rhapsody for violoncello (Felix Salmond) and orchestra; Tchaikovsky, overture, "1812."

Mr. Bloch is most inspired when he stands firmly and proudly on Jewish ground. The well equipped composer is seen in all that he writes, but his three Jewish poems for orchestra, his Psalms, for voice and orchestra, two of which have been sung here by Mme. Povla Frijsh and in a memorable manner; his "Schelomo" are far above his what might be called Gentile work, even above his concerto, not to mention the cycloramic "America." As he has written in an account of himself and his artistic beliefs, it is the Jewish soul that interests him; "the complex, glowing, agitated soul" that he feels vibrating through the Bible. No wonder that the despair of the Preacher in Jerusalem and the splendor of Solomon alike appealed to him; the monarch in all his glory; the Preacher, who when he looked on all the works that his hands had wrought and on the labor that he had labored to do, could only exclaim: "And behold, all was vanity, and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the Sun." And so Mr. Bloch might have taken as a motto for this Hebrew rhapsody the lines of Rueckert:

"Solomon! Where is thy throne? It is gone in the wind.

* * * * *

Say, what is pleasure? A phantom, a mask undefined;
Science? An almond, whereof we can pierce but the rind;
Honor and Affluence? Firmans that Fortune hath signed
Only to glitter and pass on the wings of the wind."

Other composers have taken Solomon for their hero; as Handel in his oratorio; Goldmark, representing him as mighty and jealous in "The Queen of Sheba"; Gounod in the opera similarly entitled, based on the wildly fantastic tale of Gerard de Nerval; there are older operas, but all, or nearly all, are concerned with the "Grande Turke," the Sultan of the Ottomans. It was left for Mr. Bloch to express in music the magnificence and the pessimistic, despairing philosophy of the ruler to whom is falsely attributed the book, Ecclesiastes.

Here is music that does not brook conventional analysis: music that is now purely lyrical, now dramatic, now pictorial; music that rises to gorgeous heights and sinks to the depths; with a conclusion that is not of the Preacher, the pious admonition after summing up the whole matter; but a conclusion voiced by the violoncello: "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest." Here is no Solomon, lord of all creatures, at whose name Afrites and evil jinn trembled, the Solomon of the "Thousand Nights and a Night"; here is the monarch that having known power and all pleasures, enumerating them—even to "the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and that of all sorts"—reasoned that everything was futile; that all was vanity.

One might therefore infer that this Rhapsody is distressingly sombre, for nothing is more wearisome than a long drawn-out complaint. The inference would be wrong, for Mr. Bloch has imagined in tones, in superbly exultant measures the pomp and sumptuousness of the King enthroned. There are orchestral bursts of glorification; between them are recitatives and lyric reflections for the jaded voluptuary, the embittered philosopher. The ingenuity displayed is as remarkable as the individuality, the originality shown by the composer stirred in his soul not only by the story of Solomon; moved mightily by the thought of ancient days, the succeedings trials and persecution of his race. More than once in the Rhapsody, if there is a suggestion of Solomon's court and Temple, there is also the suggestion of the Wailing Wall.

The performance by Mr. Salmond, whose musicianship and art were already known in Boston, and by the orchestra was of the utmost eloquence. A violoncellist, seeking only for applause, would have chosen a concerto that would inevitably by its obvious tunefulness, have won him easy recognition. Bloch's rhapsody is not a parade piece for a virtuoso regarding the orchestra only as a necessary appendage. The Rhapsody is orchestral with violoncello obbligato. Without an orchestra like the one heard yesterday; without Dr. Koussevitzky, imbued with the spirit of the composition, appreciating the interpretation of the soloist, the Rhapsody might have seemed enigmatical to many. There were yesterday three interpreters, all in aesthetic rivalry. One tribute was paid to them by the audience. The enthusiasm was genuine.

The concert was otherwise of a high standard; even Tchaikovsky's overture, written for an occasion, music that should be heard out-of-doors if possible, gained a certain dignity by the dramatic rendering. For once there was music, not merely bustle and noise. Mozart's overture, ever fresh and sparkling; Beethoven's symphony—they were performed in a vital, necessarily romantic manner; the symphony in the poetically grand style—not with the perfunctory respect paid to a name that is often supposed to guarantee a performance, though it be pedestrian and boresome.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Walton, overture "Portsmouth Point." Bax, Symphony No. 2. Loeffler, "Cantum Fratris Solis" (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice (Povla Frijsh) and orchestra (first time here). Ravel, "Bolero."

... without music. The symphony, No. 2 in E Minor and C" by Arnold Bax, the Anglo-Celtic composer, was introduced by Serge Koussevitzky and the visiting Boston Symphony orchestra.

Bax is not unknown to concert goers here. Four years ago Sokoloff and his Cleveland Symphony played his E-flat symphony, a stern, somber composition. The new symphony is described as "absolute music". It is not too absolute—which word many translate as "modern" and "chaotic"—to win the praises of the stricter critics.

Of the new symphony, Lawrence Gilman, who is not addicted to the moderns, says:

"Mr. Bax's symphony is in three movements, formidable in scope and content, and it lasts for almost forty minutes. It is scored for an orchestra of heroic size, fit to deal with what Carlyle so bravely called 'the immensities and the eternities'. And it is as substantial in its imaginative and intellectual yield as if tonal gnat's eggs had not been agreed upon as the only decent thing for the creative mind to hatch.

Mr. Bax completed the symphony in 1923, and it was published last year, with a dedication to Mr. Koussevitzky."

... Carnegie ... ton Symphony Orchestra ... Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11.

On Thursday Mr. Koussevitzky will also introduce the new second symphony (in E minor and C) of Arnold Bax, which Mr. Bax has dedicated to him. Walton's "Portsmouth Point" overture and Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," with Mme. Povla Frijsh as soprano soloist, are also on the program.

Additional numbers for Saturday are a prelude and fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, with a major scale as the fugal subject; Mozart's symphony in E flat and Rabaud's "Procession nocturne."

... old Haydn's ... a Czech-Italian composer, whose ballet "Il Carillon Magico" was seen some years ago at the Metropolitan Opera House. His prelude and fugue is a well written, melodious, fresh and buoyant composition with parts effectively partial to the strings. The number was given with so much orchestral color and dash as to win for it a decided hit with the audience.

The program began with the allegro moderato and allegro sections from Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, which were played in a very straightforward, but virile manner. Richard Strauss's melodious interlude from the opera "Intermezzo, A Domestic Comedy" and Ravel's "Bolero," repeated from Thursday's concert, and not winning the acclaim to be expected, completed the program.

Concert-Chronicle

Three for Luck Jan 8 – Trans

NO less than three printed programs were spread before the concert-goer at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. First (in the sense of being oldest) was the program of Mr. Hale's notes. But fine print above those notes gave information, "The program was changed too late to make a corresponding change in the notes." One turned to the front page, on which the numbers are listed—found program number two, with Schumann's "Manfred" overture replacing Schubert's "Rosamunde" music of the original program. And then there was an insert, the third program, reciting simply: "The program has been changed as follows": And this time Siegfried's funereal music out of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" had been removed to make place for the same composer's "Ride of the Valkyries." From all of which one suspects that Dr. Koussevitzky's program-complex had been even more active than usual. And the result was that the hearers were given a Schumann-Wagner afternoon.

To begin, the hearer who may have been drowsing in his place on an unseasonably warm winter's afternoon, was startled out of his day dreaming by the three vigorous introductory chords of the "Manfred" overture. Few there are who could charge, as if with electricity, such simple matter as does Dr. Koussevitzky. There could be no more drowsing after those chords. In due time followed the sombre but restlessly melancholy theme of Manfred, and in its turn the plaintive tender melody of Astarte. Of the two is this overture compounded. The subject matter is such as to appeal to the romanticist who was Schumann. He characters his hero, his heroine, sets emotional background for them, brings to climax their music, at end in summing up, writes his quiet epilogue—which tendency toward "epilogues" commentators have called Schumannesque. And to Byron and to Schumann, that other romanticist who is Koussevitzky, yesterday was perfect counterpart.

Came next the same composer's Symphony in C major. Both in Cambridge

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 12

February Third Marks Coming Of Orchestra

Famous Boston Symphony With Koussevitsky Leading Will Play at Mosque

All music-loving Richmond is looking forward with keen enthusiasm to the annual visit of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, comprised of 112 musicians and headed by that towering artist, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, which comes to the Mosque the night of Monday, February 3, as the second attraction in the artists' course of five great concerts. The orchestra will be presented by T. Michaux Moody and tickets for this offering alone and for the series are now being sold at Walter D. Moses & Co., where the box office is located. This is the third annual visit of the Boston Symphony under the same management and now its appearance is generally recognized as an established part of the local season of music.

The superlative performances of the orchestra are declared by both critics and the public as something to cause wonder and ceaseless adulation. But just why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate. The outstanding facts of its history are self-explanatory. In 1881 the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra—a rare thing in those days. This noted musician, soldier, financier and public-spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks, and brought to this country one after the other the world's greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the improvement of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony in its original form had only sixty players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of his day. The initial aims, still adhered to, were that the musicians should play under one conductor in one orchestra, and not debase their talents by routine engagements; that the symphony should provide only the finest music; that artistic considerations should always be paramount, and that the conductor be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot. The policies, the programs, even the venture itself were violently attacked and staunchly defended. But the wisdom of the founder has been justified and now the orchestra gives sixty concerts a season in Boston alone and many in other cities.

Schumann; the solidities and the dignities, the pomp and the impelling onward rush which is the finale. By the way we noted this or that figure which seemed essentially "modern." Above all we were impressed with Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Schumann. For some years it has seemed as if neglect were to be Schumann's portion. He is not "in tune" with the tendencies of the present day. His ardent, passionate romanticism is at the opposite pole from present "mechanistic" practices. Into this present Dr. Koussevitzky brings Schumann, rekindles the flame that is in him, gives persuasive and eloquent voice to his idealism, better than most others minimizes his faults, and behold, the "hard-as-tacks" contemporary world (which, however, beneath the surface still clings to not a little of its romanticism) finds this Schumann good. Of a truth, not far behind the conductor's illuminating way with Brahms is his revitalizing of Schumann.

After an intermission, the Wagner of "Lohengrin" with its prelude; of "The Valkyrie" with its "Ride"; of "The Mastersingers" with preludes to the third act, to the opera as a whole. Another type of romanticist is this; Wagner, who is continually scaling the heavens, who would wrest from the gods their secrets—but who could stoop also to write of a

Continued on Following Page

It will be known as .....

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

simple, honest cobbler, and a "green," poetically naive young singer, investing them with all the grandeur of a background of music otherwise reserved for his gods. Thus we listened to that long, cumulative ascent, that glorious consummation, which introduces into the realms of the magic land of Lohengrin. Thus we listened to the tumults and the clangors of the warrior-maidens of the Wagnerian brand of Norse mythology—played with a punch which an opera-house would find it hard to equal. Then we followed conductor and composer and orchestra through an exceedingly lyric, emotionally finely wrought version of the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers." And at last came to a heroic playing of the prelude to the same work. In this prelude it seemed the conductor exceeded himself. If ever there may be proof of the thesis that a concert version of an operatic excerpt may differ from operatic performance itself, such playing of this prelude would be first line evidence. As climax to a concert in which high points were not lacking, it gave enough and to spare. A. H. M.

Amusements

A Full-Stocked Week-End at Symphony Hall

The Orchestra Returns from New York—Mr. Sanroma As Modernist

(Adv) Jan 13

THE Symphony Orchestra returned, Saturday evening, from a fortunate visit to New York. There it was heard in three concerts: in usual course on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon; by exception on Friday afternoon in behalf of those studious Russian exiles, once an object of fashionable philanthropy in Boston. The good offices of Dr. Koussevitzky now made $9000 available for them. On Thursday, the conductor repeated his program of the preceding week in Symphony Hall: Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point"; Bax's new Symphony; Loeffler's Canticle of St. Francis; Ravel's "Bolero." The audience responded with eager interest and uncommonly warm applause—for Mr. Loeffler, who was present to receive it; for Mme. Frijsh, assisting singer; for the conductor himself. With an exception or two, the reviewers were as generous. One who demurred damned all four pieces with a rather amusing succession of faint praise; another was merely bored after the manner of those that go to concerts against their will.

More to the point, Mr. Henderson in The Sun hailed Mr. Loeffler's Canticle as "beautiful and noble music"; took pleasure in the "unconventional melodic ideas," the "syncopated rhythms," the "jovial" mood and "humorous fancy" of Mr. Walton's Overture; wrote of Mr. Bax's Symphony in these terms:

> The themes upon which the first movement is built, and which are basic, are valiant, full of red blood and the strong breathing of a man who lives in the outdoor world and meets nature face to face. They sing and sometimes they shout, but always they have substance and musical quality. The development is over-elaborated; there are pages from which some of the packing might well be pulled out. But it is a good movement.
>
> The andante rests on a long drawn lyric melody of genuine beauty given out by the strings. The whole movement is song-like and varied by sharply contrasting episodes. The finale, like the first movement, is noteworthy for its confident and full-throated utterance. It closes effectively. Mr. Bax employs modern harmonies with excellent skill and his orchestration is sonorous and richly colored. What is perhaps best, however, is the spontaneity, the ebullient spirit of the composition which is set forth in brilliant light by the introspective mood underrunning the whole. Mr. Bax's communions with nature have made him serious, but have strengthened his courage. He is no pessimist. The symphony was performed in a manner which would have given the composer infinite joy and the audience appeared to find the music admirable.

Mr. Gilman of The Herald Tribune should also be heard about the Symphony: "Mr. Bax writes without apology after the ample fashion of the symphonic fathers. He scores, not for two piccolos and a jewsharp in B-flat, but for the unashamedly ponderable apparatus of those who seem to have thought that a symphony is essentially an ample and deliberate affair, and not something to be disposed of as a sort of belated musical repartee to the invention of the telegraph. . . . And the outcome is as substantial in imaginative and intellectual yield as if tonal gnat's eggs had not been agreed upon as the only decent thing for the creative mind to hatch.

"Whether it is absolute or not this is detaining music. It has fiber and strength and gravity; and at its best, as in the latter part of the Finale, it reminds us that music is still, if we wish it to be, an incomparable vehicle for the utterance of first and last things. . . . In his earlier symphony Mr. Bax appeared to be chiefly concerned with fashioning a stern and drastic music, little occupied with Celtic faery spells and magic seas and haunted, melancholy woods. The fierce gloom of the North was felt in it, and a new aggressiveness and power. These traits mark the new symphony. Yet, on the whole, it is less somber and austere a work than its predecessor. The Celtic temperament is a difficult thing to outlive. . . ."

Dr. Koussevitzky filled his program on Friday with more or less familiar Russian numbers; on Saturday divided it between Beethoven's Fourth Symphony—"played with marked clarity, spirit and polish"—and a miscellany of short pieces. Among them was Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, heard and delightedly applauded at the orchestra's first pair of concerts in Boston. In New York it even provoked cheers. Nor, seemingly, does repetition lessen the excitement of the Manhattanese over Ravel's "Bolero." In it The Evening Post found Dr. Koussevitzky taking at the outset a "slower, more languorous" tempo than had Mr. Toscanini, but "at the conclusion he unleashed all the orgiastic fury and din of which his ensemble was capable—a virtuoso achievement of the most stunning brilliance."

Glazunov Makes Orchestral Bow

Trans Jan 17

With Cambridge to Give First Warm Welcome to the Conductor-Composer

SINCE the annual Koussevitzkian vacation takes two weeks ,and since it is preceded by a week-end in New York, it comes about that Cambridge each year hears one of the noted guests who fill those two weeks. And since the Cantabrigian concert falls on Thursday, it is the university audience which has the honor of first greeting the visitor. Last evening it was the Russian composer and educator, Alexander Glazunov. And the greeting which the university audience gave him, was one to warm the heart of any man. When he made his way slowly to the conductor's podium, the orchestra rose to a man. The audience, not to be outdone, quickly followed. Of course there was applause, long and hearty.

It is written that when the unorganized Israelites looked about them for a king, they chose Saul because he stood a head taller than all his brethren. One ventures that if conductors were chosen by the same process, Mr. Glazunov would have an excellent chance to become conductor of almost any group in which he might find himself. And what is more, if circumference were to be taken into consideration, his chances would be increased several-fold. Looking upon the conductor-composer in his sixty-fifth year, one can discover from the reviewer's seat in Sanders Theater not a single gray hair upon his head. If advancing years have left any mark upon him, it is to retard a bit his pace as he walks to the conductor's stand. In his place before the orchestra he conducts with a minimum of effort. His beat is clear, firm, decisive. But it never describes a wide arc. The left hand is almost never brought into play except to indicate a cue here, a diminuendo there. But from the orchestra come energies, sharp rhythms, dynamic fervors which might have assumed a conductor wilting his collar to the very roots.

Of course the program was entirely Glazunov. With the sixth symphony it began. After the intermission it continued with the violin concerto, Opus 82, played by Mr. Benno Rabinov. And it ended with the youthful symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." Mr. Glazunov is masterful with his own works. Persuasively he leads one through an ascending introduction, a well-charactered chief theme, a song of arresting melody as a second; through resourceful and scholarly development, more songful measures, energetic conclusion. The variations of the second movement he outlined, each in its own mood, each with its particular sonorities and timbres, through fugue and nocturne, scherzo and majestic finale, to mention only a few. And then came playful intermezzo, full of its own especial charm. At last the finale. Of the Russian dance it reminds one. Energies are released, sonorities piled upon each other. A powerful movement, and last evening powerfully played. After which came the principal demonstration of the evening. Applause came abundantly. Mr. Glazunov shook hands with Mr. Burgin, then with Mr. Theodorowicz. Still it continued. The orchestra was asked to rise to its feet. And more handshaking; through many of the rest of the principals of the string choir. And still the audience would not let the composer go. But the resources of acknowledgement were at an end. And Mr. Glazunov had to fall back upon simple bowing until the enthusiasm of the audience had spent itself.

The concerto is grateful piece for the solo instrument. Though it is played continuously, it suggests the usual four movements. A long cadenza gives the soloist especial opportunity. To it Mr. Rabinov and Mr. Glazunov and a hundred others also gave charactering voice.

Although it is an early work, "Stenka Razin" must rank high among the works of Mr. Glazunovx. The Cossack ruffian is the nominal hero of the piece, but the real hero is of course the River Volga, which furnishes the background for the other characters. It is well known how the composer takes the familiar boatman's song for unifying theme. Against it one hears Stenka, one hears his Persian princess, and through it one hears the final tumult. Vigorous and imaginative it is. Vigorously and imaginatively it was played last evening. A. H. M.

25

Concert-Chronicle

Three for Luck Jan 8 — Trans

NO less than three printed programs were spread before the concert-goer at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. First (in the sense of being oldest) was the program of Mr. Hale's notes. But fine print above those notes gave information, "The program was changed too late to make a corresponding change in the notes." One turned to the front page, on which the numbers are listed—found program number two, with Schumann's "Manfred" overture replacing Schubert's "Rosamunde" music of the original program. And then there was an insert, the third program, reciting simply: "The program has been changed as follows": And this time Siegfried's funereal music out of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" had been removed to make place for the same composer's "Ride of the Valkyries." From all of which one suspects that Dr. Koussevitzky's program-complex had been even more active than usual. And the result was that the hearers were given a Schumann-Wagner afternoon.

To begin, the hearer who may have been drowsing in his place on an unseasonably warm winter's afternoon, was startled out of his day dreaming by the three vigorous introductory chords of the "Manfred" overture. Few there are who could charge, as if with electricity, such simple matter as does Dr. Koussevitzky. There could be no more drowsing after those chords. In due time followed the sombre but restlessly melancholy theme of Manfred, and in its turn the plaintive tender melody of Astarte. Of the two is this overture compounded. The subject matter is such as to appeal to the romanticist who was Schumann. He characters his hero, his heroine, sets emotional background for them, brings to climax their music, at end in summing up, writes his quiet epilogue—which tendency toward "epilogues" commentators have called Schumannesque. And to Byron and to Schumann, that other romanticist who is Koussevitzky, yesterday was perfect counterpart.

Came next the same composer's Symphony in C major. Both in Cambridge and in Boston has the conductor played it. Now he brings it to his "series of classics" which is the Tuesday concerts. Once again we heard the simple motto which "unifies" (as the phrase goes) the movements; once again lived through alternately the fun and the romance which are the first movement; the lively play, only briefly interrupted by quasi-seriousness, which is the scherzo—remembered that here Schumann is in highly characteristic vein; the long, lyric melody which is the Adagio, and which is also one of the "famous" passages in all Schumann; the solidities and the dignities, the pomp and the impelling onward rush which is the finale. By the way we noted this or that figure which seemed essentially "modern." Above all we were impressed with Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Schumann. For some years it has seemed as if neglect were to be Schumann's portion. He is not "in tune" with the tendencies of the present day. His ardent, passionate romanticism is at the opposite pole from present "mechanistic" practices. Into this present Dr. Koussevitzky brings Schumann, rekindles the flame that is in him, gives persuasive and eloquent voice to his idealism, better than most others minimizes his faults, and behold, the "hard-as-tacks" contemporary world (which, however, beneath the surface still clings to not a little of its romanticism) finds this Schumann good. Of a truth, not far behind the conductor's illuminating way with Brahms is his revitalizing of Schumann.

After an intermission, the Wagner of "Lohengrin" with its prelude; of "The Valkyrie" with its "Ride"; of "The Mastersingers" with preludes to the third act, to the opera as a whole. Another type of romanticist is this; Wagner, who is continually scaling the heavens, who would wrest from the gods their secrets—but who could stoop also to write of a

Continued on Following Page

it will be known as ....

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

simple, honest cobbler, and a "green," poetically naive young singer, investing them with all the grandeur of a background of music otherwise reserved for his gods. Thus we listened to that long, cumulative ascent, that glorious consummation, which introduces into the realms of the magic land of Lohengrin. Thus we listened to the tumults and the clangors of the warrior-maidens of the Wagnerian brand of Norse mythology—played with a punch which an opera-house would find it hard to equal. Then we followed conductor and composer and orchestra through an exceedingly lyric, emotionally finely wrought version of the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers." And at last came to a heroic playing of the prelude to the same work. In this prelude it seemed the conductor exceeded himself. If ever there may be proof of the thesis that a concert version of an operatic excerpt may differ from operatic performance itself, such playing of this prelude would be first line evidence. As climax to a concert in which high points were not lacking, it gave enough and to spare. A. H. M.

Amusements

Amusements

A Hit

...ready to start work on ...Louis Bertelli," based on the sensational

This is the third annual visit of the Boston Symphony under the same management and now its appearance is generally recognized as an established part of the local season of music.

The superlative performances of the orchestra are declared by both critics and the public as something to cause wonder and ceaseless adulation. But just why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate. The outstanding facts of its history are self-explanatory. In 1881 the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra—a rare thing in those days. This noted musician, soldier, financier and public-spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks, and brought to this country one after the other the world's greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the improvement of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony in its original form had only sixty players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of his day. The initial aims, still adhered to, were that the musicians should play under one conductor in one orchestra, and not debase their talents by routine engagements; that the symphony should provide only the finest music; that artistic considerations should always be paramount, and that the conductor be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot. The policies, the programs, even the venture itself were violently attacked and staunchly defended. But the wisdom of the founder has been justified and now the orchestra gives sixty concerts a season in Boston alone and many in other cities.

A Full-Stocked Week-End at Symphony Hall

The Orchestra Returns from New York—Mr. Sanroma As Modernist

THE Symphony Orchestra returned, Saturday evening, from a fortunate visit to New York. There it was heard in three concerts: in usual course on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon; by exception on Friday afternoon in behalf of those studious Russian exiles, once an object of fashionable philanthropy in Boston. The good offices of Dr. Koussevitzky now made $9000 available for them. On Thursday, the conductor repeated his program of the preceding week in Symphony Hall: Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point"; Bax's new Symphony: Loeffler's Canticle of St. Francis; Ravel's "Bolero." The audience responded with eager interest and uncommonly warm applause—for Mr. Loeffler, who was present to receive it; for Mme. Frijsh, assisting singer; for the conductor himself. With an exception or two, the reviewers were as generous. One who demurred damned all four pieces with a rather amusing succession of faint praise; another was merely bored after the manner of those that go to concerts against their will.

More to the point, Mr. Henderson in The Sun hailed Mr. Loeffler's Canticle as "beautiful and noble music"; took pleasure in the "unconventional melodic ideas," the "syncopated rhythms," the "jovial" mood and "humorous fancy" of Mr. Walton's Overture; wrote of Mr. Bax's Symphony in these terms:

> The themes upon which the first movement is built, and which are basic, are valiant, full of red blood and the strong breathing of a man who lives in the outdoor world and meets nature face to face. They sing and sometimes they shout, but always they have substance and musical quality. The development is over-elaborated; there are pages from which some of the packing might well be pulled out. But it is a good movement.
>
> The andante rests on a long drawn lyric melody of genuine beauty given out by the strings. The whole movement is song-like and varied by sharply contrasting episodes. The finale, like the first movement, is noteworthy for its confident and full-throated utterance. It closes effectively. Mr. Bax employs modern harmonies with excellent skill and his orchestration is sonorous and richly colored. What is perhaps best, however, is the spontaneity, the ebullient spirit of the composition which is set forth in brilliant light by the introspective mood underrunning the whole. Mr. Bax's communions with nature have made him serious, but have strengthened his courage. He is no pessimist. The symphony was performed in a manner which would have given the composer infinite joy and the audience appeared to find the music admirable.

Mr. Gilman of The Herald Tribune should also be heard about the Symphony: "Mr. Bax writes without apology after the ample fashion of the symphonic fathers. He scores, not for two piccolos and a jewsharp in B-flat, but for the unashamedly ponderable apparatus of those who seem to have thought that a symphony is essentially an ample and deliberate affair, and not something to be disposed of as a sort of belated musical repartee to the invention of the telegraph. . . . And the outcome is as substantial in imaginative and intellectual yield as if tonal gnat's eggs had not been agreed upon as the only decent thing for the creative mind to hatch.

"Whether it is absolute or not this is detaining music. It has fiber and strength and gravity; and at its best, as in the latter part of the Finale, it reminds us that music is still, if we wish it to be, an incomparable vehicle for the utterance of first and last things. . . . In his earlier symphony Mr. Bax appeared to be chiefly concerned with fashioning a stern and drastic music, little occupied with Celtic faery spells and magic seas and haunted, melancholy woods. The fierce gloom of the North was felt in it, and a new aggressiveness and power. These traits mark the new symphony. Yet, on the whole, it is less somber and austere a work than its predecessor. The Celtic temperament is a difficult thing to outlive. . . ."

Dr. Koussevitzky filled his program on Friday with more or less familiar Russian numbers; on Saturday divided it between Beethoven's Fourth Symphony—"played with marked clarity, spirit and polish"—and a miscellany of short pieces. Among them was Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, heard and delightedly applauded at the orchestra's first pair of concerts in Boston. In New York it even provoked cheers. Nor, seemingly, does repetition lessen the excitement of the Manhattanese over Ravel's "Bolero." In it The Evening Post found Dr. Koussevitzky taking at the outset a "slower, more languorous" tempo than had Mr. Toscanini, but "at the conclusion he unleashed all the orgiastic fury and din of which his ensemble was capable—a virtuoso achievement of the most stunning brilliance."

Glazunov Makes Orchestral Bow

Trans — Jan 17

With Cambridge to Give First Warm Welcome to the Conductor-Composer

SINCE the annual Koussevitzkian vacation takes two weeks ,and since it is preceded by a week-end in New York, it comes about that Cambridge each year hears one of the noted guests who fill those two weeks. And since the Cantabrigian concert falls on Thursday, it is the university audience which has the honor of first greeting the visitor. Last evening it was the Russian composer and educator, Alexander Glazunov. And the greeting which the university audience gave him, was one to warm the heart of any man. When he made his way slowly to the conductor's podium, the orchestra rose to a man. The audience, not to be outdone, quickly followed. Of course there was applause, long and hearty.

It is written that when the unorganized Israelites looked about them for a king, they chose Saul because he stood a head taller than all his brethren. One ventures that if conductors were chosen by the same process, Mr. Glazunov would have an excellent chance to become conductor of almost any group in which he might find himself. And what is more, if circumference were to be taken into consideration, his chances would be increased several-fold. Looking upon the conductor-composer in his sixty-fifth year, one can discover from the reviewer's seat in Sanders Theater not a single gray hair upon his head. If advancing years have left any mark upon him, it is to retard a bit his pace as he walks to the conductor's stand. In his place before the orchestra he conducts with a minimum of effort. His beat is clear, firm, decisive. But it never describes a wide arc. The left hand is almost never brought into play except to indicate a cue here, a diminuendo there. But from the orchestra come energies, sharp rhythms, dynamic fervors which might have assumed a conductor wilting his collar to the very roots.

Of course the program was entirely Glazunov. With the sixth symphony it began. After the intermission it continued with the violin concerto, Opus 82, played by Mr. Benno Rabinov. And it ended with the youthful symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." Mr. Glazunov is masterful with his own works. Persuasively he leads one through an ascending introduction, a well-charactered hief theme, a song of arresting melody as a second; through resourceful and scholarly development, more songful measures, energetic conclusion. The variations of the second movement he outlined, each in its own mood, each with its particular sonorities and timbres, through fugue and nocturne, scherzo and majestic finale, to mention only a few. And then came playful intermezzo, full of its own especial charm. At last the finale. Of the Russian dance it reminds one. Energies are released, sonorities piled upon each other. A powerful movement, and last evening powerfully played. After which came the principal demonstration of the evening. Applause came abundantly. Mr. Glazunov shook hands with Mr. Burgin; then with Mr. Theodorowicz. Still it continued. The orchestra was asked to rise to its feet. And more handshaking; through many of the rest of the principals of the string choir. And still the audience would not let the composer go. But the resources of acknowledgement were at an end. And Mr. Glazunov had to fall back upon simple bowing until the enthusiasm of the audience had spent itself.

The concerto is grateful piece for the solo instrument. Though it is played continuously, it suggests the usual four movements. A long cadenza gives the soloist especial opportunity. To it Mr. Rabinov and Mr. Glazunov and a hundred others also gave charactering voice.

Although it is an early work, "Stenka Razin" must rank high among the works of Mr. Glazunovx. The Cossack ruffian is the nominal hero of the piece, but the real hero is of course the River Volga, which furnishes the background for the other characters. It is well known how the composer takes the familiar boatman's song for unifying theme. Against it one hears Stenka, one hears his Persian princess, and through it one hears the final tumult. Vigorous and imaginative it is. Vigorously and imaginatively it was played last evening. A. H. M.

Mr. Goossens Returns, Baton in Hand

Last Season He Came as Pianist and Composer, But Now He Brings a Nordic Folio as Conductor and Guest of the Boston Symphony

Under the baton of Eugene Goossens, the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season at the Albee Theatre, will feature on next Tuesday evening a program by Wagner, Schumann and Sibelius.

Eugene Goossens the conductor we met four years ago under similar auspices and under similar conditions. When he came last year it was as composer, pianist and violinist playing his own compositions alone and with other artists in a Sunday afternoon concert in Memorial Hall. He returns fresh from his venture in opera in Philadelphia, where his "Judith" had its premiere.

His experience as a conductor dates back to 1921 when he formed his own orchestra of carefully picked players, "with whom he gave a concert of modern music that established his reputation among the foremost conductors of the day. He aroused so much interest that the program had to be repeated at the following concert.

Since then his services have been in constant demand on both sides of the Atlantic. He has conducted the British National and Carl Rosa Opera Companies, the Russian Ballet, the London Symphony Orchestra, and many other organizations. His most successful American connection was probably with the Hollywood Bowl group whom he conducted in open-air symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

1. Wagner.....A Faust Overture
2. Schumann...Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
   - I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
   - II. Larghetto.
   - III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio 1: Molto piu vivace; Trio II.
   - IV. Allegro Animato e grazioso.
3. Sibelius..."A Saga," Tone Poem, Op. 9.
4. Wagner..Excerpts from Act III, "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Introduction--Dance of the Apprentices—Assemblage of the Masters.

From Wagner's Youth

The program begins and ends with Wagner. At the outset we have a "Faust" overture, a novelty which should prove of great interest to all who might wonder how the Titan would treat such a theme. Written in 1840 when the composer was 27 years old, it has been called a superb orchestral piece, the first work which bears the true stamp of Wagner.

"It was conceived after a rehearsal of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Conservatoire in the winter of 1839 and is in some sense a piece of autobiography written in music. As originally planned it was to form the first movement of a Faust Symphony. It is a masterpiece of construction and instrumentation. The influence of Beethoven is apparent in the concise power of the themes, and the plain direct manner in which they are set forth, yet the work is Wagner's own from beginning to en

Th er" t milia ner's one important venture in the field of comedy. This he based definitely on the pattern of old comedy, just as he based his tragedies on old Greek models with their inscrutable Fate to justify or nullify the ways of gods and men. Like Aristophanes he has his fun at the expense of the manners, vices and follies of the people, and the stage is set to illustrate a specific page of history.

A Satyr Play

The Greek tragedian offered tragedies immediately after which was presented a comedy (Satyr Play). "Meistersinger," we are told is a Satyr Play that might follow the tragic "Tannhauser;" and more than that, it happens to be a superhuman laugh of derision at the hand of Fate itself; for Wagner wrote it immediately after the terrible failure of "Tannhauser" in Paris.

Schumann's First Symphony has never been what might be called popular, but it is fine music just the same. Easily surpassing the work of Schubert and Mendelssohn in power and range, it is striking on account of its musical ideas and that subtle charm which is indispensable to greatness. Perhaps Schumann did use Beethoven as a sort of model, but he is very far away from both Mozart and Hayden in this work. It shows unusual originality and a creative force that is distinctly Schumann.

Against the instrumentation of this symphony too much has been said of late, particularly by those human gulls and crows that chatter at the eagle. ever the instrumentation, the work ly, fresh, and full of the buoyancy uplift of life. Its first movement, e told, was to have been called ng's Awakening," and the finale, ng's Farewell."

Schumann's Innovations

e beginning of the introduction ly represents a trumpet-summons ealing down from on high; then zephyrs blow softly to and fro, erywhere the dormant forces and ake their way to the light," re quoting from the composer's rogram.) "In the Allegro the g comes laughing in, in the full y of youth. This explains and jus- he novel use of the triangle in the ovement—an instrument not then ered admissible in a symphony. ch. nting effect is produced by the song at the close of the first ent, played as though sung with heart; and it is an entirely new of coda."

lius is a composer who stands in his individuality, which was enough to make itself felt even very beginning of his career. He d, mysterious, sweet, bold, sad, in often speaking with a sublime ty seldom heard in the works of sers of equal rank.

ranks among the foremost living sers of today. He has been wholly ected by the work of his predeces- nd contemporaries. He is con- d, first and last, in giving his own ge to the world in a form that s austere and forbidding on a first ntance, but which holds the at- n throughout. His method of atic development is peculiarly ori- Much of his work is based on national life of Finland, in which and Death play a large and gloomy But for all that, he is not mor- his main characteristic being that ormous power.

M. C. W.

WARNING!

NEW YORK
TIMES

THE number of new works presented thus far this season by the conductors of the major orchestras in this country has been large and diversified. Compositions by native composers have had unusual attention.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, gave Boston its first hearing of Marcel Lucien Tournier's "Féerie"—Prelude and Dance for harp and orchestra. The composer, now living in Paris, was a pupil of the distinguished French harpist, Hasselmans, whose son is now conducting at the Metropolitan Opera House. The soloist was Bernard Zighera, a pupil of the composer, and first harpist of the orchestra. He has often played important piano parts with the orchestra.

Henry Eichheim conducted his own musical impressions of the Orient which he called "Burma" and "Java." In these works the composer employed many native percussion instruments he had himself collected. At the same concert, during November, was heard Spohr's "Notturno for Wind Instruments and Jannissaries," Op. 34, which Richard Strauss suggested to Dr. Koussevitzky as being worthy of a rehearing.

Early in December the Symphony played Blair Fairchild's "Chant Nègres." Written originally for the piano, it was here scored for full modern orchestra, receiving its première. Ravel's "Bolero" was presented to Boston hearers for the first time at the same concert.

Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, conducted the first Boston hearing of Wetzler's "The Basque Venus" toward the end of November.

Other "first times" included Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" on Nov. 8, Pick-Mangiagalli's "Prelude and Fugue" on Oct. 11 and Richard Strauss's Interlude from "Intermezzo, A Domestic Comedy," on Oct. 18.

Bach's "Kunst der Fuge" was played there by the Seventeenth Century Ensemble and assisting artists under Paul Stassevitch.

UR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH Y'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

JAN 30 19

New Works Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra

At the second Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jan. 9, Koussevitzky provided an "embarrassment of riches" for his brilliant subscription audience. He succeeded in offering a most satisfactory program of living composers with two first performances in New York. The first was the overture, "Portsmouth Point," by William Turner Walton, a young English composer of fewer than thirty years. If this overture is an example of what he did at the age of twenty-four it promises well for his future. The first performance of the work took place at the Zurich Festival of the International Society of Contemporary Music. Koussevitzky conducted the first American performance in Boston in November, 1926. It is a bit of rollicking fun—blatant and breathing the atmosphere of vulgarity necessary to the picture. The title is taken from a print by the English caricaturist, Thomas Rowlandson, picturing Portsmouth Point when it was the center of the shipping trade. Walton has caught the atmosphere and has woven a score which hums with life, rhythm, vitality, and humor.

The second novelty was Arnold Bax' Symphony No. 2 in E minor--C major, (world premiere in Boston under Koussevitzky's baton, Dec. 13, 1929.) The score, dedicated to Koussevitzky, is one of the most representative works in symphonic form we have heard in recent years. It reflects a brooding poetic quality which has not succumbed to the contemporary point of view of eliminating personal feelings from a musical composition. It is frankly romantic, of a Celtic romanticism—Mr. Bax's methods are sometimes impressionistic. He is not afraid of dissonance, but neither is he afraid of long-phrased melodic loveliness, which in the slow movement recalls an Irish folk song. Edwin Evans, the London critic, in an article in "Modern Music" of November-December, 1927, sums up the composer and his work admirably: "Of all contemporary British composers, he is the most difficult correctly to classify. He corresponds to none of the labels which pass as current coin today. He is neither an impressionist, nor an expressionist; neither a revolutionary, nor that still more subversive apparition, a neo-classicist. Atonality, polytonality, and linear counterpoint may all be met with in his later works, and doubtless, quarter-tones would be there also if he felt that he needed them; but none of these technical seasonings mean anything in his still comparatively young life, beyond their use as seasoning the fare he has to offer us. Some say he is not a modernist—whatever that may mean—but he certainly is no conservative, nor is he a traditionalist, except in the praiseworthy sense in which every heir to the materia musica of his predecessors—and, in fact, every artist is under obligation to the material in which he works. Those critics who must classify at all costs have discovered that there is only one label that fits him: romantic; and that fits him because, in one way or another, it fits every artist with the love of beauty in his soul." It is the lyrical impulse which made the slow movement so lovely. The entire score is rich in harmonic coloring and it reflects great sincerity. That it was slightly long and perhaps diffuse in form does not take away from the fact that it is exceedingly beautiful music. We hope to hear it again and often.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" for voice and orchestra, was written for the 1925 Library of Congress Festival of Chamber Music. It is a gloriously beautiful work, and we have reason to be proud that it was written in America. As a text Mr. Loeffler has used a hymn of St. Francis of Assisi. Mme. Povla Frijsh sang it with the Boston Symphony and through her efforts and those of the Boston Symphony, it was given a magnificent performance. Mr. Loeffler has written with characteristic refinement of style, which has found expression in the use of liturgical motives and a mature orchestral technic and unerring taste. Mme. Frijsh gave all of her superb artistry to the interpretation of the work. The composer was present, and the house broke into storms of applause when he appeared with Koussevitzky and Mme. Frijsh.

The program closed with an interesting performance of Ravel "Bolero." It was intererpretation so soon after tor held back the tempo osition up in speed and lous climax. The audiinfluence of the fascinatith cheers, a fitting close g programs that Serge

NEW YORK
WORLD

Other Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2.30.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3.....Bach
Symphony No. 4 in B Flat.....Beethoven
Preludn and Fugue.....Pick-Mangiagalli
Interlude from "Intermezzo".....Strauss
Bolero .....Ravel

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra could scarcely have expected to pass the scrutiny of a third audience in Carnegie Hall without offering some enticement to insure a continued interest. Hence the Prelude and Fugue by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, played yesterday afternoon. As matters turned out, the audience would have been amply satisfied with his beautiful reading of Beethoven's Symphony in B Flat.

The Italian work, introduced to Boston by Mr. Toscanini and the La Scala Orchestra in 1921, had never before been played here. The Prelude, obviously influenced by certain past modes in the world's great music, is virile and commanding, its sturdy simplicity resting solely upon a poise of unshakable dignity. Mr. Koussevitzky, we thought, seemed inclined to vest it with a passion and romanticism wholly alien to its basic mood. The succeeding Fugue, built upon a major scale introduced by the clarinet, follows closely upon the classic form of Bach, yet is relieved of undue austerity by a lush and brilliant orchestration. The audience received the work cordially.

An Interlude from Richard Strauss's opera "Intermezzo," that tale of domestic upheaval; Bach's third "Brandenburg" Concerto (G major), to which Mr. Koussevitzky gave the lilting beauty of a serenade, and Ravel's acclaimed Bolero constituted the rest of the program. The rhythm of the latter grew a bit plethoric as the Koussevitzky baton faltered, and we could think of nothing but wooden shoes and avoirdupois.

Across the street in Chalif Hall a

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

A matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, drew a thronged attendance and deserved it fully, as well as the demonstrative applause which Serge Koussevitzky acknowledged for himself and his players.

Stimulative, highly musical, and technically flawless readings were given of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3; Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Pick-Mangiaqalli's inconsequential "Prelude and Fugue," the "Interlude" from Strauss's "Intermezzo," and the sure-fire "Bolero" by Ravel, quite the most sensational orchestral novelty of the season. yIts exciting performance elicited prolonged cheers.

* * *

...Carnegie Hall

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

JAN 14 19

Music

By FELIX DEYO

POST-COMMENT ON THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S RECENT CONCERT IN BROOKLYN

TO PLACATE, perhaps, even in partial measure, the Left Wing of Brooklyn's music strata, Mr. Koussevitzky included a contemporary Italian composition, namely, a Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, on the programme of last week's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music. Even this was conventional, but not without interest, as the fugue proved almost a bit of conscious witticism, a smirk at the pedants, for its subject was none other than the centuries-old Ionian scale, perhaps known better as that most melodious ladder of tones which constitutes the Do-Re-Mi, etc., of our childhood. The composer juggles his major scale adroitly, in diminution and augmentation and stretto, and what not, enlivening its steps with jaunty, rhythmic counterpoints and instrumental devices. As a whole the score is one of those things, academic in point and purpose, but neither here nor there.

* * *

IT WAS PLEASURE to hear once again Antonin Dvorak's "From the New World" Symphony, which was last heard in Brooklyn at the Orchestral Society's concert of March 9, 1925, under the baton of Herbert J. Braham. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the work "con amore," although the orchestra seemed to indicate, by its somewhat apathetic playing, that it was bored a bit by the music of this erstwhile celebrated composition.

Now a thing of the past, embalmed in the pages of music history, is the spirited controversy that long ranged over Dvorak's symphony. As late as 1907, William Ritter, an authority on Bohemian music, asserted that "the 'New World' expresses the state of soul of an uncultured Czech in America, the state of a homesick soul remembering his native land and stupefied by the din and hustle of a new life," and that "Negro airs, not copied, adapted, or imitated, tint slightly two or three passages of the symphony without injury to its Czech character.

This attempt, as Mr. Lawrence Gilman describes, to "de-Africanize" and "whiten the complexion" of Dvorak's music was carried on in many quarters.

* * *

WHATEVER variation of opinion, past or present, as to the 100 per cent Americanism of the "New World" Symphony, its music, molded in the complete and permanent contour of classic form, is robust, captivating buoyant, large in expressiveness, direct and certain. As a voyager bent on discoveries, Dvorak found in this country a treasure trove of untouched melody. His imagination eagerly seized upon and expanded its possibilities. The "New World" is his legacy.

(Continued from Page 8)

Apropos of the celebrated Largo, Dr. Henry T. Fleck, of Hunter College, some time since informed our interested self that Anton Seidl (who conducted the New York premiere of this symphony on December 15, 1893, at Carnegie Hall) established the tempo of the movement, Dvorak's original marking having been Audante. The composer's miscalculation was sensed by the interpretative genius of Seidl, who, at rehearsal, made the alteration to a much slower tempo. Dr. Fleck, present upon that occasion, states that this change met the immediate approval of the visibly excited and pleased composer.

* * *

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

Carnegie Hall reveled in benefits yesterday. The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon raised about $9,000 for the Association for the Relief of Russian Exiles, and the Philharmonic-Symphony, in the evening, realized another $4,000 for its pension fund. Most of the orchestra seats at the latter concert were reserved for members of the Philharmonic Society, while the upper floors were sold out.

Mr. Goossens Returns, Baton in Hand

Last Season He Came as Pianist and Composer, But Now He Brings a Nordic Folio as Conductor and Guest of the Boston Symphony

Under the baton of Eugene Goossens, the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season at the Albee Theatre, will feature on next Tuesday evening a program by Wagner, Schumann and Sibelius.

Eugene Goossens the conductor we met four years ago under similar auspices and under similar conditions. When he came last year it was as composer, pianist and violinist playing his own compositions alone and with other artists in a Sunday afternoon concert in Memorial Hall. He returns fresh from his venture in opera in Philadelphia, where his "Judith" had its premiere.

His experience as a conductor dates back to 1921 when he formed his own orchestra of carefully picked players, "with whom he gave a concert of modern music that established his reputation among the foremost conductors of the day. He aroused so much interest that the program had to be repeated at the following concert.

Since then his services have been in constant demand on both sides of the Atlantic. He has conducted the British National and Carl Rosa Opera Companies, the Russian Ballet, the London Symphony Orchestra, and many other organizations. His most successful American connection was probably with the Hollywood Bowl group whom he conducted in open-air symphony.

From Wagner's Youth

The program begins and ends with Wagner. At the outset we have a "Faust" overture, a novelty which should prove of great interest to all who might wonder how the Titan would treat such a theme. Written in 1840 when the composer was 27 years old, it has been called a superb orchestral piece, the first work which bears the true stamp of Wagner.

"It was conceived after a rehearsal of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Conservatoire in the winter of 1839 and is in some sense a piece of autobiography written in music. As originally planned it was to form the first movement of a Faust Symphony. It is a masterpiece of construction and instrumentation. The influence of Beethoven is apparent in the concise power of the themes, and the plain direct manner in which they are set forth, yet the work is Wagner's own from beginning to end."

The excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" that end our evening are more familiar, as nearly everyone knows Wagner's one important venture in the field of comedy. This he based definitely on the pattern of old comedy, just as he based his tragedies on old Greek models with their inscrutable Fate to justify or nullify the ways of gods and men. Like Aristophanes he has his fun at the expense of the manners, vices and follies of the people, and the stage is set to illustrate a specific page of history.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

1. Wagner.....A Faust Overture
2. Schumann...Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
   - I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
   - II. Larghetto.
   - III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio 1: Molto piu vivace; Trio II.
   - IV. Allegro Animato e grazioso.
3. Sibelius.."A Saga," Tone Poem, Op. 9.
4. Wagner..Excerpts from Act III, "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Introduction—Dance of the Apprentices—Assemblage of the Masters.

A Satyr Play

The Greek tragedian offered tragedies immediately after which was presented a comedy (Satyr Play). "Meistersinger," we are told is a Satyr Play that might follow the tragic "Tannhauser;" and more than that, it happens to be a superhuman laugh of derision at the hand of Fate itself; for Wagner wrote it immediately after the terrible failure of "Tannhauser" in Paris.

Schumann's First Symphony has never been what might be called popular, but it is fine music just the same. Easily surpassing the work of Schubert and Mendelssohn in power and range, it is striking on account of its musical ideas and that subtle charm which is indispensable to greatness. Perhaps Schumann did use Beethoven as a sort of model, but he is very far away from both Mozart and Hayden in this work. It shows unusual originality and a creative force that is distinctly Schumann.

Against the instrumentation of this symphony too much has been said of late, particularly by those human gulls and crows that chatter at the eagle. Whatever the instrumentation, the work is lively, fresh, and full of the buoyancy and uplift of life. Its first movement, we are told, was to have been called "Spring's Awakening," and the finale, "Spring's Farewell."

Schumann's Innovations

"The beginning of the introduction evidently represents a trumpet-summons sent pealing down from on high; then gentle zephyrs blow softly to and fro, and everywhere the dormant forces awake and take their way to the light." (We are quoting from the composer's own program.) "In the Allegro the Spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth. This explains and justifies the novel use of the triangle in the first movement—an instrument not then considered admissible in a symphony. An enchanting effect is produced by the spring song at the close of the first movement, played as though sung with a full heart; and it is an entirely new form of coda."

Sibelius is a composer who stands alone in his individuality, which was strong enough to make itself felt even at the very beginning of his career. He is wild, mysterious, sweet, bold, sad, in turns, often speaking with a sublime majesty seldom heard in the works of composers of equal rank.

He "ranks among the foremost living composers of today. He has been wholly unaffected by the work of his predecessors and contemporaries. He is concerned, first and last, in giving his own message to the world in a form that appears austere and forbidding on a first acquaintance, but which holds the attention throughout. His method of thematic development is peculiarly original." Much of his work is based on the national life of Finland, in which Hades and Death play a large and gloomy power. But for all that, he is not morbid, his main characteristic being that enormous power.

M. C. W.

WARNING!

crowded once more. At the Theatre, Harald Kreutzberg
Yvonne Georgi will give th of two Sunday concerts at return from a Western Hampden's Theatre, Mar will also give the first certs. She will be as ert Stone and a g
girls. This will be ance with a grou
Paul Haakon w
début recital of be assisted by

The New
of Dancin nual me
the Hol demo an St
A ot ex
tr

musica which he
"Java." In th
poser employed ma
sion instruments he ha
lected. At the same con
November, was heard Sp turno for Wind Instrumenta nissaries," Op. 34, which
Strauss suggested to Dr. Ko
zky as being worthy of a rehe
Early in December the Symp played Blair Fairchild's "Ch Nègres." Written originally for piano, it was here scored for f modern orchestra, receiving its pre mière. Ravel's "Bolero" was pre sented to Boston hearers for the first time at the same concert.
Richard Burgin, the concertmas ter of the orchestra, conducted the first Boston hearing of Wetzler's
"The Basque Venus" toward the end of November.
Other "first times" included Louis
Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" on Nov. 8, Pick-Mangiagalli's "Pre lude and Fugue" on Oct. 11 and Richard Strauss's Interlude from "Intermezzo, A Domestic Comedy,"
on Oct. 18.
Bach's "Kunst der Fuge" was played there by the Seventeenth Cen tury Ensemble and assisting artists under Paul Stassevitch.

UR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHIC Y'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

JAN 30

New Works Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra

At the second Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jan. 9, Koussevitzky provided an "embarrassment of riches" for his brilliant subscription audience. He succeeded in offering a most satisfactory program of living composers with two first performances in New York. The first was the overture, "Portsmouth Point," by William Turner Walton, a young English composer of fewer than thirty years. If this overture is an example of what he did at the age of twenty-four it promises well for his future. The first performance of the work took place at the Zurich Festival of the International Society of Contemporary Music. Koussevitzky conducted the first American performance in Boston in November, 1926. It is a bit of rollicking fun—blatant and breathing the atmosphere of vulgarity necessary to the picture. The title is taken from a print by the English caricaturist, Thomas Rowlandson, picturing Portsmouth Point when it was the center of the shipping trade. Walton has caught the atmosphere and has woven a score which hums with life, rhythm, vitality, and humor.

The second novelty was Arnold Bax' Symphony No. 2 in E minor—C major, (world premiere in Boston under Koussevitzky's baton, Dec. 13, 1929.) The score, dedicated to Koussevitzky, is one of the most representative works in symphonic form we have heard in recent years. It reflects a brooding poetic quality which has not succumbed to the contemporary point of view of eliminating personal feelings from a musical composition. It is frankly romantic, of a Celtic romanticism—Mr. Bax's methods are sometimes impressionistic. He is not afraid of dissonance, but neither is he afraid of long-phrased melodic loveliness, which in the slow movement recalls an Irish folk song. Edwin Evans, the London critic, in an article in "Modern Music" of November-December, 1927, sums up the composer and his work admirably: "Of all contemporary British composers, he is the most difficult correctly to classify. He corresponds to none of the labels which pass as current coin today. He is neither an impressionist, nor an expressionist; neither a revolutionary, nor that still more subversive apparition, a neo-classicist. Atonality, polytonality, and linear counterpoint may all be met with in his later works, and doubtless, quarter-tones would be there also if he felt that he needed them; but none of these technical seasonings mean anything in his still comparatively young life, beyond their use as seasoning the fare he has to offer us. Some say he is not a modernist—whatever that may mean—but he certainly is no conservative, nor is he a traditionalist, except in the praiseworthy sense in which every heir to the materia musica of his predecessors—and, in fact, every artist is under obligation to the material in which he works. Those critics who must classify at all costs have discovered that there is only one label that fits him: romantic; and that fits him because, in one way or another, it fits every artist with the love of beauty in his soul." It is the lyrical impulse which made the slow movement so lovely. The entire score is rich in harmonic coloring and it reflects great sincerity. That it was slightly long and perhaps diffuse in form does not take away from the fact that it is exceedingly beautiful music. We hope to hear it again and often.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" for voice and orchestra, was written for the 1925 Library of Congress Festival of Chamber Music. It is a gloriously beautiful work, and we have reason to be proud that it was written in America. As a text Mr. Loeffler has used a hymn of St. Francis of Assisi. Mme. Povla Frijsh sang it with the Boston Symphony and through her efforts and those of the Boston Symphony, it was given a magnificent performance. Mr. Loeffler has written with characteristic refinement of style, which has found expression in the use of liturgical motives and a mature orchestral technic and unerring taste. Mme. Frijsh gave all of her superb artistry to the interpretation of the work. The composer was present, and the house broke into storms of applause when he appeared with Koussevitzky and Mme. Frijsh.

The program closed with an interesting performance of Ravel's latest composition, "Bolero." It was interesting to hear Koussevitzky's interpretation so soon after Toscanini's. The Boston conductor held back the tempo deliberately, working the composition up in speed and volume, and creating a tremendous climax. The audience responded to the hypnotic influence of the fascinating Spanish theme and rhythm with cheers, a fitting close for one of the most entertaining programs that Serge Koussevitzky has presented.

---

enticement
terest. Hence the Prelude and Fugue by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, played yesterday afternoon. As matters turned out, the audience would have been amply satisfied with his beautiful reading of Beethoven's Symphony in B Flat.

The Italian work, introduced to Boston by Mr. Toscanini and the La Scala Orchestra in 1921, had never before been played here. The Prelude, obviously influenced by certain past modes in the world's great music, is virile and commanding, its sturdy simplicity resting solely upon a poise of unshakable dignity. Mr. Koussevitzky, we thought, seemed inclined to vest it with a passion and romanticism wholly alien to its basic mood. The succeeding Fugue, built upon a major scale introduced by the clarinet, follows closely upon the classic form of Bach, yet is relieved of undue austerity by a lush and brilliant orchestration. The audience received the work cordially.

An Interlude from Richard Strauss's opera "Intermezzo," that tale of domestic upheaval; Bach's third "Brandenburg" Concerto (G major), to which Mr. Koussevitzky gave the lilting beauty of a serenade, and Ravel's acclaimed Bolero constituted the rest of the program. The rhythm of the latter grew a bit plethoric as the Koussevitzky baton faltered, and we could think of nothing but wooden shoes and avoirdupois.

Across the street in Chalif Hall a

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JAN 12 1930

A matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, drew a thronged attendance and deserved it fully, as well as the demonstrative applause which Serge Koussevitzky acknowledged for himself and his players.

Stimulative, highly musical, and technically flawless readings were given of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3; Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Pick-Mangiagalli's inconsequential "Prelude and Fugue," the "Interlude" from Strauss's "Intermezzo," and the sure-fire "Bolero" by Ravel, quite the most sensational orchestral novelty of the season. yIts exciting performance elicited prolonged cheers.

* * *

[redacted] Carnegie Hall

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

[redacted]
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

JAN 14 1930

Music

By FELIX DEYO

POST-COMMENT ON THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S RECENT CONCERT IN BROOKLYN

TO PLACATE, perhaps, e'en in partial measure, the Left Wing of Brooklyn's music strata, Mr. Koussevitzky included a contemporary Italian composition, namely, a Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, on the programme of last week's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music. Even this was conventional, but not without interest, as the fugue proved almost a bit of conscious witticism, a smirk at the pedants, for its subject was none other than the centuries-old Ionian scale, perhaps known better as that most melodious ladder of tones which constitutes the Do-Re-Mi, etc., of our childhood. The composer juggles his major scale adroitly, in diminution and augmentation and stretto, and what not, enlivening its steps with jaunty, rhythmic counterpoints and instrumental devices. As a whole the score is one of those things, academic in point and purpose, but neither here nor there.

* * *

IT WAS PLEASURE to hear once again Antonin Dvorak's "From the New World" Symphony, which was last heard in Brooklyn at the Orchestral Society's concert of March 9, 1925, under the baton of Herbert J. Braham. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the work "con amore," although the orchestra seemed to indicate, by its somewhat apathetic playing, that it was bored a bit by the music of this erstwhile celebrated composition.

Now a thing of the past, embalmed in the pages of music history, is the spirited controversy that long ranged over Dvorak's symphony. As late as 1907, William Ritter, an authority on Bohemian music, asserted that "the 'New World' expresses the state of soul of an uncultured Czech in America, the state of a homesick soul remembering his native land and stupefied by the din and hustle of a new life," and that "Negro airs, not copied, adapted, or imitated, tint slightly two or three passages of the symphony without injury to its Czech character.

This attempt, as Mr. Lawrence Gilman describes, to "de-Africanize" and "whiten the complexion" of Dvorak's music was carried on in many quarters.

* * *

WHATEVER variation of opinion, past or present, as to the 100 per cent Americanism of the "New World" Symphony, its music, molded in the complete and permanent contour of classic form, is robust, captivating buoyant, large in expressiveness, direct and certain. As a voyager bent on discoveries, Dvorak found in this country a treasure trove of untouched melody. His imagination eagerly seized upon and expanded its possibilities. The "New World" is his legacy.

(Continued from Page 8)

Apropos of the celebrated Largo, Dr. Henry T. Fleck, of Hunter College, some time since informed our interested self that Anton Seidl (who conducted the New York premiere of this symphony on December 15, 1893, at Carnegie Hall) established the tempo of the movement, Dvorak's original marking having been Andante. The composer's miscalculation was sensed by the interpretative genius of Seidl, who, at rehearsal, made the alteration to a much slower tempo. Dr. Fleck, present upon that occasion, states that this change met the immediate approval of the visibly excited and pleased composer.

* * *

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 11 1930

Carnegie Hall reveled in benefits yesterday. The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon [redacted]ised about $9,000 for the Association for the Relief of Russian Exiles, and the Philharmonic-Symphony, in the evening, realized another $4,000 for its pension fund. Most of the orchestra seats at the latter concert were reserved for members of the Philharmonic Society, while the upper floors were sold out.

Mr. Goossens Returns, Baton in Hand

Last Season He Came as Pianist and Composer, But Now He Brings a Nordic Folio as Conductor and Guest of the Boston Symphony

Under the baton of Eugene Goossens, the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season at the Albee Theatre, will feature on next Tuesday evening a program by Wagner, Schumann and Sibelius.

Eugene Goossens the conductor we met four years ago under similar auspices and under similar conditions. When he came last year it was as composer, pianist and violinist playing his own compositions alone and with other artists in a Sunday afternoon concert in Memorial Hall. He returns fresh from his venture in opera in Philadelphia, where his "Judith" had its premiere.

His experience as a conductor dates back to 1921 when he formed his own orchestra of carefully picked players, with whom he gave a concert of modern music that established his reputation among the foremost conductors of the day. He aroused so much interest that the program had to be repeated at the following concert.

Since then his services have been in constant demand on both sides of the Atlantic. He has conducted the British National and Carl Rosa Opera Companies, the Russian Ballet, the London Symphony Orchestra, and many other organizations. His most successful American connection was probably with the Hollywood Bowl group whom he conducted in open-air symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

1. Wagner.....A Faust Overture
2. Schumann...Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
   - I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
   - II. Larghetto.
   - III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio 1: Molto piu vivace; Trio II.
   - IV. Allegro Animato e grazioso.
3. Sibelius..."A Saga," Tone Poem, Op. 9.
4. Wagner..Excerpts from Act III, "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Introduction—Dance of the Apprentices—Assemblage of the Masters.

From Wagner's Youth

The program begins and ends with Wagner. At the outset we have a "Faust" overture, a novelty which should prove of great interest to all who might wonder how the Titan would treat such a theme. Written in 1840 when the composer was 27 years old, it has been called a superb orchestral piece, the first work which bears the true stamp of Wagner.

"It was conceived after a rehearsal of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Conservatoire in the winter of 1839 and is in some sense a piece of autobiography written in music. As originally planned it was to form the first movement of a Faust Symphony. It is a masterpiece of construction and instrumentation. The influence of Beethoven is apparent in the concise power of the themes, and the plain direct manner in which they are set forth, yet the work is Wagner's own from beginning to end."

The excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" that end our evening are more familiar, as nearly everyone knows Wagner's one important venture in the field of comedy. This he based definitely on the pattern of old comedy, just as he based his tragedies on old Greek models with their inscrutable Fate to justify or nullify the ways of gods and men. Like Aristophanes he has his fun at the expense of the manners, vices and follies of the people, and the stage is set to illustrate a specific page of history.

A Satyr Play

The Greek tragedian offered tragedies immediately after which was presented a comedy (Satyr Play). "Meistersinger," we are told is a Satyr Play that might follow the tragic "Tannhauser;" and more than that, it happens to be a superhuman laugh of derision at the hand of Fate itself; for Wagner wrote it immediately after the terrible failure of "Tannhauser" in Paris.

Schumann's First Symphony has never been what might be called popular, but it is fine music just the same. Easily surpassing the work of Schubert and Mendelssohn in power and range, it is striking on account of its musical ideas and that subtle charm which is indispensable to greatness. Perhaps Schumann did use Beethoven as a sort of model, but he is very far away from both Mozart and Hayden in this work. It shows unusual originality and a creative force that is distinctly Schumann.

Against the instrumentation of this symphony too much has been said of late, particularly by those human gulls and crows that chatter at the eagle. Whatever the instrumentation, the work is lively, fresh, and full of the buoyancy and uplift of life. Its first movement, we are told, was to have been called "Spring's Awakening," and the finale, "Spring's Farewell."

Schumann's Innovations

"The beginning of the introduction evidently represents a trumpet-summons sent pealing down from on high; then gentle zephyrs blow softly to and fro, and everywhere the dormant forces awake and take their way to the light." (We are quoting from the composer's own program.) "In the Allegro the Spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth. This explains and justifies the novel use of the triangle in the first movement—an instrument not then considered admissible in a symphony. An enchanting effect is produced by the spring song at the close of the first movement, played as though sung with a full heart; and it is an entirely new form of coda."

Sibelius is a composer who stands alone in his individuality, which was strong enough to make itself felt even at the very beginning of his career. He is wild, mysterious, sweet, bold, sad, in turns, often speaking with a sublime majesty seldom heard in the works of composers of equal rank.

He "ranks among the foremost living composers of today. He has been wholly unaffected by the work of his predecessors and contemporaries. He is concerned, first and last, in giving his own message to the world in a form that appears austere and forbidding on a first acquaintance, but which holds the attention throughout. His method of thematic development is peculiarly original." Much of his work is based on the national life of Finland, in which Jades and Death play a large and gloomy power. But for all that, he is not morbid, his main characteristic being that enormous power.

M. C. W.

WARNING!

crowded once more. At the Theatre, Harald Kreutzberg
Yvonne Georgi will give th of two Sunday concerts af return from a Western Hampden's Theatre, Marc
will also give the first certs. She will be ass ert Stone and a g
girls. This will be ance with a grou
Paul Haakon w
début recital of
be assisted by

The New
of Dancin nual me
the Hol
demo an St
A ot ex
tr

musica which he
"Java." In th
poser employed ma
sion instruments he ha
lected. At the same con
November, was heard Spe turno for Wind Instruments
nissaries," Op. 34, which
Strauss suggested to Dr. Ko
zky as being worthy of a rehe

Early in December the Symp played Blair Fairchild's "Cl Nègres." Written originally for piano, it was here scored for fi modern orchestra, receiving its pre mière. Ravel's "Bolero" was presented to Boston hearers for the first time at the same concert.

Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, conducted the first Boston hearing of Wetzler's "The Basque Venus" toward the end of November.

Other "first times" included Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" on Nov. 8, Pick-Mangiagalli's "Prelude and Fugue" on Oct. 11 and Richard Strauss's Interlude from "Intermezzo, A Domestic Comedy," on Oct. 18.

Bach's "Kunst der Fuge" was played there by the Seventeenth Century Ensemble and assisting artists under Paul Stassevitch.

ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH Y'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

JAN 30th

New Works Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra

At the second Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jan. 9, Koussevitzky provided an "embarrassment of riches" for his brilliant subscription audience. He succeeded in offering a most satisfactory program of living composers with two first performances in New York. The first was the overture, "Portsmouth Point," by William Turner Walton, a young English composer of fewer than thirty years. If this overture is an example of what he did at the age of twenty-four it promises well for his future. The first performance of the work took place at the Zurich Festival of the International Society of Contemporary Music. Koussevitzky conducted the first American performance in Boston in November, 1926. It is a bit of rollicking fun—blatant and breathing the atmosphere of vulgarity necessary to the picture. The title is taken from a print by the English caricaturist, Thomas Rowlandson, picturing Portsmouth Point when it was the center of the shipping trade. Walton has caught the atmosphere and has woven a score which hums with life, rhythm, vitality, and humor.

The second novelty was Arnold Bax' Symphony No. 2 in E minor—C major, (world premiere in Boston under Koussevitzky's baton, Dec. 13, 1929.) The score, dedicated to Koussevitzky, is one of the most representative works in symphonic form we have heard in recent years. It reflects a brooding poetic quality which has not succumbed to the contemporary point of view of eliminating personal feelings from a musical composition. It is frankly romantic, of a Celtic romanticism—Mr. Bax's methods are sometimes impressionistic. He is not afraid of dissonance, but neither is he afraid of long-phrased melodic loveliness, which in the slow movement recalls an Irish folk song. Edwin Evans, the London critic, in an article in "Modern Music" of November-December, 1927, sums up the composer and his work admirably: "Of all contemporary British composers, he is the most difficult correctly to classify. He corresponds to none of the labels which pass as current coin today. He is neither an impressionist, nor an expressionist; neither a revolutionary, nor that still more subversive apparition, a neo-classicist. Atonality, polytonality, and linear counterpoint may all be met with in his later works, and doubtless, quarter-tones would be there also if he felt that he needed them; but none of these technical seasonings mean anything in his still comparatively young life, beyond their use as seasoning the fare he has to offer us. Some say he is not a modernist—whatever that may mean—but he certainly is no conservative, nor is he a traditionalist, except in the praiseworthy sense in which every heir to the materia musica of his predecessors—and, in fact, every artist is under obligation to the material in which he works. Those critics who must classify at all costs have discovered that there is only one label that fits him: romantic; and that fits him because, in one way or another, it fits every artist with the love of beauty in his soul." It is the lyrical impulse which made the slow movement so lovely. The entire score is rich in harmonic coloring and it reflects great sincerity. That it was slightly long and perhaps diffuse in form does not take away from the fact that it is exceedingly beautiful music. We hope to hear it again and often.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" for voice and orchestra, was written for the 1925 Library of Congress Festival of Chamber Music. It is a gloriously beautiful work, and we have reason to be proud that it was written in America. As a text Mr. Loeffler has used a hymn of St. Francis of Assisi. Mme. Povla Frijsh sang it with the Boston Symphony and through her efforts and those of the Boston Symphony, it was given a magnificent performance. Mr. Loeffler has written with characteristic refinement of style, which has found expression in the use of liturgical motives and a mature orchestral technic and unerring taste. Mme. Frijsh gave all of her superb artistry to the interpretation of the work. The composer was present, and the house broke into storms of applause when he appeared with Koussevitzky and Mme. Frijsh.

The program closed with an interesting performance of Ravel's latest composition, "Bolero." It was interesting to hear Koussevitzky's interpretation so soon after Toscanini's. The Boston conductor held back the tempo deliberately, working the composition up in speed and volume, and creating a tremendous climax. The audience responded to the hypnotic influence of the fascinating Spanish theme and rhythm with cheers, a fitting close for one of the most entertaining programs that Serge Koussevitzky has presented.

---

enticement
terest. Hence the Prelude and Fugue by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, played yesterday afternoon. As matters turned out, the audience would have been amply satisfied with his beautiful reading of Beethoven's Symphony in B Flat.

The Italian work, introduced to Boston by Mr. Toscanini and the La Scala Orchestra in 1921, had never before been played here. The Prelude, obviously influenced by certain past modes in the world's great music, is virile and commanding, its sturdy simplicity resting solely upon a poise of unshakable dignity. Mr. Koussevitzky, we thought, seemed inclined to vest it with a passion and romanticism wholly alien to its basic mood. The succeeding Fugue, built upon a major scale introduced by the clarinet, follows closely upon the classic form of Bach, yet is relieved of undue austerity by a lush and brilliant orchestration. The audience received the work cordially.

An Interlude from Richard Strauss's opera "Intermezzo," that tale of domestic upheaval; Bach's third "Brandenburg" Concerto (G major), to which Mr. Koussevitzky gave the lilting beauty of a serenade, and Ravel's acclaimed Bolero constituted the rest of the program. The rhythm of the latter grew a bit plethoric as the Koussevitzky baton faltered, and we could think of nothing but wooden shoes and avoirdupois.

Across the street in Chalif Hall a

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

A matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, drew a thronged attendance and deserved it fully, as well as the demonstrative applause which Serge Koussevitzky acknowledged for himself and his players.

Stimulative, highly musical, and technically flawless readings were given of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3; Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Pick-Mangiagalli's inconsequential "Prelude and Fugue," the "Interlude" from Strauss's "Intermezzo," and the sure-fire "Bolero" by Ravel, quite the most sensational orchestral novelty of the season. yIts exciting performance elicited prolonged cheers.

* * *

Carnegie Hall

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 1 1

Carnegie Hall reveled in benefits yesterday. The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon raised about $9,000 for the Association for the Relief of Russian Exiles, and the Philharmonic-Symphony, in the evening, realized another $4,000 for its pension fund. Most of the orchestra seats at the latter concert were reserved for members of the Philharmonic Society, while the upper floors were sold out.

BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

JAN 14 193

Music

By FELIX DEYO

POST-COMMENT ON THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S RECENT CONCERT IN BROOKLYN

TO PLACATE, perhaps, even in partial measure, the Left Wing of Brooklyn's music strata, Mr. Koussevitzky included a contemporary Italian composition, namely, a Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, on the programme of last week's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music. Even this was conventional, but not without interest, as the fugue proved almost a bit of conscious witticism, a smirk at the pedants, for its subject was none other than the centuries-old Ionian scale, perhaps known better as that most melodious ladder of tones which constitutes the Do-Re-Mi, etc., of our childhood. The composer juggles his major scale adroitly, in diminution and augmentation and stretto, and what not, enlivening its steps with jaunty, rhythmic counterpoints and instrumental devices. As a whole the score is one of those things, academic in point and purpose, but neither here nor there.

* * *

IT WAS PLEASURE to hear once again Antonin Dvorak's "From the New World" Symphony, which was last heard in Brooklyn at the Orchestral Society's concert of March 9, 1925, under the baton of Herbert J. Braham. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the work "con amore," although the orchestra seemed to indicate, by its somewhat apathetic playing, that it was bored a bit by the music of this erstwhile celebrated composition.

Now a thing of the past, embalmed in the pages of music history, is the spirited controversy that long ranged over Dvorak's symphony. As late as 1907, William Ritter, an authority on Bohemian music, asserted that "the 'New World' expresses the state of soul of an uncultured Czech in America, the state of a homesick soul remembering his native land and stupefied by the din and hustle of a new life," and that "Negro airs, not copied, adapted, or imitated, tint slightly two or three passages of the symphony without injury to its Czech character.

This attempt, as Mr. Lawrence Gilman describes, to "de-Africanize" and "whiten the complexion" of Dvorak's music was carried on in many quarters.

* * *

WHATEVER variation of opinion, past or present, as to the 100 per cent Americanism of the "New World" Symphony, its music, molded in the complete and permanent contour of classic form, is robust, captivating buoyant, large in expressiveness, direct and certain. As a voyager bent on discoveries, Dvorak found in this country a treasure trove of untouched melody. His imagination eagerly seized upon and expanded its possibilities. The "New World" is his legacy.

(Continued from Page 8)

Apropos of the celebrated Largo, Dr. Henry T. Fleck, of Hunter College, some time since informed our interested self that Anton Seidl (who conducted the New York premiere of this symphony on December 15, 1893, at Carnegie Hall) established the tempo of the movement, Dvorak's original marking having been Andante. The composer's miscalculation was sensed by the interpretative genius of Seidl, who, at rehearsal, made the alteration to a much slower tempo. Dr. Fleck, present upon that occasion, states that this change met the immediate approval of the visibly excited and pleased composer.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 22 1928

Goossens Pays His Annual Call

The English Guest Pairs the Old Foes, Schumann and Wagner, in Providing a Nordic Evening for the Third Boston Symphony Here

With its customary enthusiasm a large audience in the Albee Theatre last night welcomed the season's third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this time under the direction of Eugene Goossens, the gifted director of the Rochester Philharmonic Society.

Mr. Goossens is well known in Providence, where he has appeared already in the character of director, composer and performer. His return naturally arouses a friendly interest, giving at the same time a basis for comparison of the ways and means of conducting as seen in this rather restricted sphere.

And Mr. Goossens, with his sensitive hands, long arms, lithe body and straight legs, has a system of calisthenics that differs radically from that of Dr. Koussevitzky, producing a prompter flexibility of body and a more significant reach of arm and hand, which are equipped with signs and wonders of all sorts and degrees. He is more positive and more demonstrative than Dr. Koussevitzky, seeming to know his music so thoroughly that he imitates it in the rhythmic movements of his body, giving a sort of welcome to each theme as it floats up on the orchestra.

The magic circles of his stick are many and various, and of every conceivable complexity; and even when he drops the stick at the feet of the 'cellos he goes on imperturbably, grasping between his delicate thumb and first finger a phantom wand that served his purpose just as well. He is not even averse to beating time with one foot to supplement the efforts of two hands, and it is not at all strange that with such complex exertions he manages to keep himself

"Agile comme Scaramouche, Elegant comme Celadon."

Doubtless he did some things as Don Quixote would have done them, but he had his reward.

The Orchestra's Response

He made the orchestra feel perfectly at home from the moment he mounted the stand, and under his direction it seemed to play with perfect ease and composure. There was no anxiety, no restraint, no confusion. An atmosphere of contentment seemed to hang over the players, suggesting a cheerful evening at home rather than a formal concert. And there were moments in the Symphony and in the Meistersinger when a spiritual exaltation lifted the music to a veritable celestial plane.

The audience was not slow to realize the quality of Mr. Goossens's work for it gave him quite an ovation at the close of the Schumann Symphony, a work so played as to sound as fresh and vivid and full-hearted as any that we have heard in many a day.

The Wagner "Faust Overture" did not arouse a feeling of regret that its composer neglected to write the other movements. One fortunate result of its being played was the fact that it made us realize that there are violas in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and good ones at that. We have always observed them in their places, but never before have we had the opportunity of hearing them play and of experiencing real pleasure in the hearing.

It may be that this program gave them their opportunity, but we are inclined to think that their conductor overestimated their tone power and keeps them too subdued. However that may be, they had their inning last evening, being conspicuous in every number that was played and adding a charm and a color all their own.

The Gay Schumann

The Symphony was a marvel of heaven-inspired melody, full of songs—songs of joy, vivacity, roguishness and a happy heart. Melodies glad and gay, the slow movements never melancholy but rather breathing peace and contentment, while the rapid movements were merry without cynicism or mockery.

The strings had a wonderful chance and they made the most of it. In their tones was not a sound of anything acrid or mean; in the second movement they sang like a choir voicing a perfect hymn of praise to the Most High, the flute soaring above it like a breath of incense. There was one beautiful melody that seemed to have strayed across from the Songs of Mendelssohn and joined the others with no one to blame. And then the merriment of the reel-like tunes and the beautiful cadenza on the flute were as charming as such things can be.

The Saga of Sibelius seems to be a puzzle to the interpreters, because the composer did not tell them what to say about it. But one can say anything about it that fits the age it represents. He can even go back to the Age of Beowulf and hear the swing of the oars and the straining of the sail and the wind in the cordage.

He can see in the undulating violin bows the long roll of the ocean; the disembarking, the battle formation, the press of fighting men, onward into action, aggressively straining forward; then the joy of victory, as clean-cut as a Moqui snake dance, tom-toms and all. (In the excitement of one melee the 'cellos started to run amok before they got the cue.) After the booty was gathered and the spoil collected the rovers sail away on to silence in their sea-going boats.

In Wagner's Meistersinger excerpts Mr. Goossens finds more of humanity in the large and less of the nervous, the irritating, the ill-at-ease, the unsatisfied desires that so many read into him. The first part of this number was marred somewhat by the careless playing of the first violins, all of whom in a certain place seemed to disagree with each other and to disregard the conductor. But that was a small and tran-

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

Strange and Stranger.

Here's a verbatim report of a fragment of conversation heard on the street Saturday: "Sure I'm goin' to the show; but say, there's a girl in my office she's so damn dumb that she ain't liberal and broadminded about it at all an' ——"

Theer'll be some strange things there besides the Interlude!

✣ ✣ ✣

The Boston Orchestra.

Frank Sedgwick, who will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra here for an evening concert in the Bushnell Memorial on April 9, tells me the program for the concert is not yet arranged inasmuch as what may be given here depends somewhat on the numbers that are in immediate rehearsal at the time—but he assures me that Dr. Koussevitzky will present a very fine list in his first concert in the new hall.

And in this connection possibly readers of this column may be interested in the impressions of the Boston Symphony work that I gathered in the concert at Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon.

The program included the Allegro and Allegro Moderato from Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; the Beethoven Fourth Symphony; the brand new Pick-Mangiagalli Prelude and Fugue; an Interlude from Richard Strauss's "Intermezzo"; and finally the Ravel "Bolero"—certainly a varied and attractive list. And there was superb playing.

✣ ✣ ✣

Dr. Koussevitzky has, twice this season at concerts I have been privileged to attend, elected to begin with a rendition of music written for the string orchestra. He played the Handel "Concerto Grosso" at the November Saturday afternoon concert in Carnegie and last Saturday Bach was the chosen composer.

He thus puts before his audience the wealth of power possessed by the strings—and often there is the feeling that one is listening to a gigantic string quartet, so fine is the blending of tone in the various choirs.

The principal melody of this Brandenburg No. 3 is that which many Hartford people became very familiar with in their long-ago youth when Professor Reilly taught the sailors' hornpipe to chosen skilled ones in his dancing classes, and quite needless to say this melody was played with a very fine spirit and snap by the orchestra.

✣ ✣ ✣

But the reading of the Beethoven Fourth Symphony put all else out of the hearers' minds at that Carnegie concert—here was magnificent playing from the first measure to last. Everything was done with the finest possible care and finish and each phrase seemed to flow as from one great instrument.

The first climax was built up, in tremendous power with the orchestra at the top of its tonal form, and every little trim measure as the first movement closed was lovely in clarity. The Adagio, gorgeously played, yet with a full avoidance of the feeling of mere classicism in the reading; the lovely Trio, sung in the heights of spirit and tonal beauty; the Finale taken at lightning speed—all were a delight to an audience that showed great enthusiasm for every number played. Dr. Koussevitzky was brought back to the platform time after time by the applause showered upon him.

✣ ✣ ✣

Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, whose Prelude and Fugue were played in New York for the first time at that Saturday concert, is a modernist but a melodist. Born in Bohemia in 1882 of a Czech father and an Italian mother his musical training has been strictly Italian and he now resides in Milan.

His Prelude opens rather stormily though with perfect sanity of expression, and his melodies flow freely and easily, building up a finely-made fugue on the ordinary scale beginning in sonorous brass, and weaving along established lines to tremendous final chords made in the molds of the classicists—and well made. The whole work is brilliantly colorful and it was given a reading that would have gratified the composer could he have heard it.

✣ ✣ ✣

Dr. Koussevitzky chose an Interlude from Richard Strauss's "Intermezzo" to stand between the new Italian work and the Ravel "Bolero." This particular Interlude was first played in Boston last October and the assumption is that it has not been very frequently played in New York. The whole work is a domestic comedy with symphonic interludes—a rather stormy story being told. In the present part of the orchestration the composer shows his usual consummate skill in the weaving of three or more melodies in his orchestra into harmonious—though frequently strange—wholes. The whole thing seems most expressive of Strauss's individuality, and only an orchestra and conductor of quality would make much out of it. But much was made the other afternoon at Carnegie!

✣ ✣ ✣

And now for the Ravel "Bolero." There are prophets who say that with it Ravel will invade the theaters, the music shows, the talkies! For here is the simplest sort of dance rhythm repeated over and over again—using all the tricks of the most "modern" of the dance orchestras in the brass, at least—something that gets into your senses, your toes, your hips. It is a glorious dance and watching that big audience in New York the other day one could see people everywhere in the house swaying their bodies with the rhythm that was so permeative, so insistent, so effective.

The reading of this simple dance tune? It began in just a rhythm and that was all—dimly felt, hardly heard at all; and in a never-failing perfection of crescendo it rose from that whisper to heights on heights of tonal power. Instrument after instrument that had been silent early in the dance joined in the mad rhythm and swept, louder and louder still, into the maelstrom of tone finally set in motion. Had there been the slightest lapse in the growth of that phenomenally long crescendo the effect of the whole thing would have been lost—but there was no lapse; the conducting, the playing, were absolute in their brilliance of perfection.

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES ITALIAN WORK

N. Y. Times Jan 12/30

Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli in Premiere Here Seems Conventional.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the week yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The program comprised the Brandenburg Concerto 3 of Bach, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Pick-Mangiagalli's "Prelude and Fugue," which received its first performance here; Ravel's "Bolero," introduced to New York this season by Toscanini, and the Interlude to Richard Strauss's opera "Intermezzo."

The novelty by the young Italian composer proved to be an ingeniously written, though somewhat conventional work, employing the resources of the orchestra with excellent effect. Its basic themes, not distinguished for originality, are developed with a craftsmanship which respects the traditions of classic rules with occasional adventurings into the modernist realms of harmony. The nervous force of the figures played by the strings, with superimposed phrases of fine breadth and sonority by the wind instruments, give to the work an interest which the audience yesterday was quick to acknowledge. The dramatic finales of the two sections were especially effective.

"The Bolero" of Ravel, perhaps now an old story to many in the audience yesterday, failed to rouse the enthusiastic response of former concerts.

It was from the brilliant performances of the Bach and Beethoven that the audience derived most satisfaction.

NEW YORK
SUN

Two Benefit Performances At Carnegie Hall

Carnegie Hall was the scene of two benefits yesterday. In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, was heard under the auspices of the American Society for the Relief of Russian Exiles. Benno Rabinoff, violinist, was the assisting artist.

Mr. Koussevitzky offered a program suitable to the occasion, beginning with Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovanchina," including Propofieff's violin concerto, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," a tone picture, 5; Stravinsky's suite from his ballet "Petrouchka," with Jesus Maria Sanroma at the piano, and closing with a rousing performance with that movie orchestra favorite, Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

New Composer's Work on Boston Symphony Bill

Pick-Mangiagalli Prelude and Fugue Cheered by Capacity Audience at Matinee

Ravel's 'Bolero' Repeated

Fourth Beethoven Symphony Given Spirited Rendition

Concluding its unusually busy sojourn in New York, which included Friday afternoon's Russian refugee benefit concert besides the regular subscription quota, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's direction, played yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall before a capacity audience. The program included one number new to Manhattan, a prelude and fugue by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, a composer of Czech and Italian parentage, who was represented at the Metropolitan Opera House early in the last decade by his ballet "Il Carillon Magico."

The work proved conservative. The prelude is melodious in a conventional manner, with its themes adorned by a constant series of light, rapid passages in the strings. The fugue opens with a major scale, which is one of its themes, deftly interwoven with others of a different, faster moving type. The movement is unusually effective, owing the the skill shown in its construction and color in instrumentation, and was received with prolonged applause.

Opens With Bach Concerto

Dr. Koussevitzky opened his program with Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, vigorously performed. The single transitional adagio measure separating the two sections of the work in the original score was omitted. The second number was Beethoven's fourth symphony, which has not been heard here indoors since the Philharmonic performances under Toscanini in February, 1928. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, this highly lyric work was played with marked clarity, spirit and polish. After the Pick-Mangiagalli prelude and fugue, Dr. Koussevitzky continued the innocuous interlude from Strauss's "Intermezzo' and Ravel's "Bolero."

GLAZUNOV CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Russian Composer Leads Program of His Works

Sixth Symphony, Violin Concerto, and "Stenka Razin" Heard

Globe Jan 15

Alexander Glazunov, the noted Russian composer, conducted a program of his own works at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. Dr Koussevitzky is taking his annual midseason vacation of two weeks. Next week the guest leader will be Eugene Goossens, the English composer and conductor now head of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N Y.

Mr Glazunov's program nicluded his Sixth Symphony, opus 58; his Concerto for violin, opus 82, and his symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," opus 13, all of them previously performed at these concerts.

The soloist in the concerto was Benno Rabinoff, son of Max Rabinoff, remembered here as manager of the "Boston-National Opera Company," which purchased the settings and costumes of the Boston Opera and engaged some of its singers to tour the country the season after the resident company here was given up. Benno Rabinoff gave a Jordan Hall recital Jan 23, 1928. He is a pupil of Auer.

Mr Glazunov's program included his as are all Russian names when translated into our alphabet, in half a dozen different ways, of which the simplest is here followed), is, since 1922, director of the Leningrad Conservatory of Music, a position he had held from 1909-12, before the revolution. An account of his long and distinguished career as composer and teacher was printed in last Sunday's Globe. He is now making his first visit to this country, and has already appeared as guest conductor in Chicago, Detroit and New York.

Few Gestures

Yesterday's audience saw a tall, heavily built man, quiet and dignified in manner, who conducts with the fewest possible gestures, and never makes an unnecessary motion. Only his slow and rather hesitant gait betrays the fact that he is in his 65th year, and recovering from an illness which caused him to cancel an engagement in Cleveland the other day. He was quick to share the hearty applause which greeted his music with the orchestra, and with the young and almost unknown soloist.

In the 1890's the muscial conservatives denounced Glazunov as a modernist composer, but a comparison of his works with those his contemporaries, Debussy and Richard Strauss, produced between 1880 and 1905, since which date Glazunov has published almost nothing, proves the essentially conservative and academic character of Glazunov's music.

The sixth of his eight symphonies was published in 1897. It is well written music, with fluent melody and interesting rhythmic effects. The themes were apparently chosen with a view to the artistic unity of the work, so marked are the resemblances between the chief melodic ideas. This symphony shows the influence on Glazunov of the more conservative and, in America, least known works of Rimsky Korsakov, whose pupil he was. But the side of Rimsky's genius which influenced so strongly the first notable work, "The Firebird," of his later pupil Stravinsky is apparently alien to Glazunov's musical imagination.

Glazunov is not, and has made no pretention of being, a virtuoso conductor. He is, however, competent to get from an orchestra the effects he wishes in his music, as the admirably clear and sanely balanced performance of this symphony yesterday proved. The audience obviously enjoyed the music. Its applause was no mere polite tribute to the composer's presence, but heartfelt.

Show Piece

The violin concerto, which has been played at these concerts by Zimbalist and by Richard Burgin, is a skillfully written and ingratiating show piece, offering a soloist ample opportunities to display his abilities. Mr Rabinoff used a warm, rather too vibrant tone. His technique is considerable, though not sufficiently impeccable to save him from occasionally faulty information. He was very cordially applauded. One's impression of his musical gifts was distinctly more favorable yesterday than at his last Boston appearance, but he is not yet a mature and polished artist.

The other number on the program, "Stenka Razin," twice played here under Mr Monteux, was written in 1885. It is a product of the movement for nationalism in Russian music begun by Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov and their group, of whom Glazunov at 20 was the brilliant protege. It was suggested by a half-legendary, half-historical Cossack bandit. The first theme is the "Volga Boatman's Song" now thrice-familiar to audiences here, but still one of the best of Russian folk tunes. The scoring for orchestra is, as always with Glazunov, notably skillful, but the piece yesterday seemed immature and old-fashioned. The Sixth Symphony is more genuine and more interesting music.

Next week Mr Goossens, as guest conductor, proposes a program including Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Schumann's First Symphony, his own Concertino, and Respighi's "Feste Romane," the latest issued of his now lengthy series of musical guide books to Rome.

P. R.

NEW YORK
EVENING POST
JAN 16

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Bostonians Introduce a New Symphony by Bax and Povla Frijsh Hymns Loeffler Canticle Anew

WITH the return of the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall last night a new symphony by Arnold Bax was conducted by the virtuoso of the baton to whom it is dedicated, Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Bax, who makes London his habitat, was not present to hear his work performed, but another of the composers of the evening was. After Povla Frijsh had sung his "Canticle of the Sun" to the evident gratification of those to whom this is one of the most consistently rewarding of American symphonic works written in the last decade, Charles Martin Loeffler was called before the audience for repeated bows and handshakings with the soloist and the conductor. For many years a member of this orchestra, Mr. Loeffler's compositions seem to come most naturally from the ensemble with which he was identified, though the "Canticle of the Sun" was first played in Washington at the 1925 Library of Congress Festival and was introduced to New York by Mr. Stowkowski's Philadelphians with the same soloist as last night. Both the work and the soloist had their accustomed success.

Aside from the new symphony, the chief disclosure of the evening was that the Ravel "Bolero" is by no means a one-conductor sensation. Mr. Koussevitzky also made of it an incentive for shouts and stampings, with such pounding of the palms as is rarely heard even from the professionals at the Metropolitan. The Boston conductor began this maddening tour de force much more slowly and languorously than Mr. Toscanini did, but in the conclusion unleashed all the orgiastic fury and din of which his ensemble was capable. Some individual parts were not so well played, one of the trombones missing its footing and the higher saxophone notes lacking bite and surety; but, admitting all this and also a preference for the faster, more immediately tense pulse of the earlier performances, this also was a virtuoso achievement of the most stunning brilliance.

THE orchestra played the Bax Symphony with a splendor of tone and a superb adjustment of sonorities which justified the compliment paid it by the composer when he wrote in advance of the premiere, "I am confident that this symphony will receive a finer first performance than any previous work of mine." Thought that first performance was not the one in New York last night, but one in Boston not quite a month ago, there is no reason to suspect that the orchestra's playing of the symphony has become any the less remarkable by reason of two repetitions. Mr. Bax was authority for the statement that there is no communicable program associated with this music, and that it is as entirely and severely "absolute" as a work of the classic period. He also called attention to the cyclic character of the form and to the persistent use of a three-note figure in all three movements of the symphony. The one clue he provided as to the meaning seems to have been that the close should be very broad and possess "a kind of oppressive catastrophic mood."

Whatever the composer's intent, this music in performance was far from suggesting the classic symphonies—as far in spirit as in technique and manner. Each of the movements took on the character of a dramatic tone-poem, with the emotion which Mr. Bax confessed having put into it, assuming a highly personal address, customarily associated with romantic music rather than with the classic and the severely absolute. On first hearing, whatever the continuity sought or assured by the use of the cyclic form, the work appeared episodic, and though possessing many arresting and some enchanting moments its interest was not cumulative. Climactic passages led into moments of dullness, and its thematic material, workable and plentiful as it was, commanded no large measure of admiration for any superior inherent beauty. As in his earlier orchestral works, the English composer attested the high order of his craftsmanship. The work is, indeed, so good that the pity is it is not better.

Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point," which is not new to Carnegie Hall, provided a robustious opening for the concert. For those who go to the trouble to associate it with the old print—or rather the literary description of the print—by the English caricaturist Rowlandson, which inspired the composition, there is no negligible degree of pictorial suggestion in this music. But without some definite mental vista of the bustling quays, the roistering sailors, the love-making and leave-taking, the fiddling and the grog-drinking, this tone-painting has a limited appeal as music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN

NEW YORK
TIMES
JAN 1 —

TO AID RUSSIAN EXILES.

Concert Will Be Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra Today.

A special concert will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall this afternoon to aid the American Society for the Relief of Russian Exiles. Grand Duchess Kira of Russia is expected to arrive from Washington to attend the concert, which will consist of all-Russian music, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Benno Rabinoff, violinist, will be the soloist.

Among those who have taken boxes or seats are: Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Larkin, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Littlejohn, Mr. and Mrs. E. Farrar Bateson, Jr., and Mrs. Gordon Knox Bell, Mr. and Mrs. Trowbridge Callaway, Mr. and Mrs. F. Kingsbury Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Blair Mitchell, Mr. and Mrs. William Jay Schieffelin, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hollister Pease, Mr. and Mrs. George Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur F. Schermerhorn, Mr. and Mrs. F. Ashton de Peyster, Mr. and Mrs. John Ross Delafield, Mr. and Mrs. William F. Dominick, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus King, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence F. MacMurray, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Ryan, Mr. and Mrs. Myron C. Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Landon K. Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. Schuyler N. Warren, Mrs. Frederick Lothrop Ames, Mrs. Donald W. Brown, Mrs. A. Bradhurst Field, Mr. and Mrs. Marius de Brabant, Mrs. Adolf Ladenburg, Mr. and Mrs. John Henry Hammond, Mr. and Mrs. Harry L. Hamlin, Mrs. George T. Maxwell, Mrs. William Peyton, Mrs. Elihu Root Jr., Mrs. Alfred Seton and Mrs. Percy Rivington Pyne.

Koussevitzky Offers Novelties

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Program at Carnegie Hall Includes New Works.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky (who, we observe, now suffers from chronic doctoring) smothered his devotees under an avalanche of novelty at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, but fortunately to their delectation. He began with an overture entitled "Portsmouth Point" by William Turner Wallace, an English composer born in 1902. The work formed itself in the musician's mind after he had pondered an old print representing a quay in the familiar confusion of such places.

The overture reflects this by bold and unconventional melodic ideas and syncopated rhythms. It is a piece of healthy, hearty music, jovial and touched with humorous fancy. The melodic foundations rest on the soil of Britain's native song and the structure reared upon them is well planned and symmetrical. It was a pleasure to hear such a wholesome product of one of the young minds of musical England.

The overture was followed by Arnold Bax's second symphony, which is in the keys of E minor and C major. This work had its first performance anywhere on December 13, when Dr. Koussevitzky produced it in Boston. We bestow our blessing on Mr. Bax for declining to load his music with a program. He has definitely said that it has none, but is a piece of absolute music, cyclical in form and utilizing a persistent three note figure as a germinal, or at least binding theme.

This new symphony carved its lines deep into the consciousness of this hearer. It is in three movements, an allegro moderato preceded by a slow introduction, an andante and a finale marked allegro feroce, which proved to be by no means ferocious. The themes upon which the first movement is built, and which are basic, are valiant, full of red blood and the strong breathing of a man who lives in the outdoor world and meets nature face to face. They sing and sometimes they shout, but always they have substance and musical quality. The development is overelaborated; there are pages from which some of the packing might well be pulled out. But it is a good movement.

The andante rests on a long drawn lyric melody of genuine beauty given out by the strings. The whole movement is song-like and varied by sharply contrasting episodes. The coda might perhaps be shortened a little to its advantage. The finale, like the first movement, is noteworthy for its confident and full throated utterance. It closes effectively. Mr. Bax employs modern harmonies with excellent skill and his orchestration is sonorous and richly colored. The symphony shows care in workmanship. The structure barring the elaboration already mentioned is firm and the outline tolerably clear. What is perhaps best, however, is the spontaneity, the ebullient spirit of the composition which is set forth in brilliant light by the introspective mood underrunning the whole. Mr. Bax's communions with nature have made him serious, but have strengthened his courage. He is no pessimist. The symphony was performed in a manner which would have given the composer infinite joy and the audience appeared to find the music admirable.

The third of Dr. Koussevitzky's collection of novelties was Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" (Canticum Fratris Solis) after the hymn of St. Francis of Assisi. It had, of course, been heard before here.

The work was written for the opening of the new Chamber Music Hall in the Library of Congress in Washington, presented to the nation by Mrs. F. S. Coolidge and opened in 1925. The composition is for soprano and orchestra and the singer last evening was Mme. Povla Frijsh, who sang the part at the first performance.

When the hymn was given in Philadelphia, Lawrence Gilman, who writes the masterly program notes for Mr. Stokowski's organization as well as for the Philharmonic of this city, furnished a careful analysis showing how Mr. Loeffler had cunningly utilized the basic materials of old ecclesiastical music. This composer's ability to create an illusion of antiquity with modern materials is well known. The song of the Greek flute is heard again in this canticle and the voice part is so beautifully fitted to the style and sentiment of the text that it is entrancing from beginning to end.

The composition discloses once more Mr. Loeffler's originality of idiom and that lofty dignity which marks his entire artistic output. It is beautiful and noble music. It was excellently done. Mme. Povla Frijsh sang the vocal solo with understanding and a range of expression not always heard in her singing. Tonally her delivery was not perfect, but the blemishes were outweighed by the excellences.

The concert concluded with Ravel's "Bolero," which had already been made known here by the Philharmonic under Toscanini. The repetition had its value, but the music lover's gratitude was due to Mr. Koussevitzky for his presentation of three such interesting novelties.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Serge Koussevitzky Twice a "Doctor"

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will appear with his 112 musicians at the Mosque Monday, February 3, is twice has received honorary degrees from a "doctor" besides wearing the badge of the French Legion of Honor. He both Brown and Harvard Universities.

NEWS
JAN 5 - 1930

WE LOSE GOOD MUSIC

ANNOUNCEMENT that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will not come to Baltimore next season is sad news to real music lovers. And it makes some of us wonder if Baltimore really is going ahead as a music center.

Perhaps we are pessimists, but some of us, at least, see signs of retrogression. The Boston Symphony Orchestra used to have a regular season in Baltimore. This winter it makes one appearance — last night. There was a time when the Boston Symphony concerts were the big musical events here. The Philadelphia Orchestra used to give five and six concerts a season. This winter it is giving four.

A few years ago there were six children's concerts by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra. This season there are three. Recitals have not been so well attended this season. Yehudi Menuhin, it was believed, would fill every seat in the Lyric, but he didn't. Kreisler seems to be the only artist who can do that in Baltimore.

Neither the German Opera Company nor the American Opera Company, with its new work, "Yolanda of Cyprus," more than half-filled the Lyric. Apparently, Baltimore only wants the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Philadelphia Orchestra, Kreisler, Ponselle and a few other great artists. But that indicates a love for the spectacular rather than a love for music.

MINNEAPOLIS
JOURNAL
JAN 19 1930

Bax Classic A Novelty in N.Y

Boston Orchestra Produces New Opus in Celtic Strain

During a recent concert in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Serge Kousesevitzky introduced a new symphony by Arnold Bax, in E minor and C major. Lawrence Gilman wrote of it in the New York Tribune-Herald as follows:

"Mr. Bax's symphony is in three movements, formidable in scope and content, and it lasts for almost 40 minutes. It is scored for an orchestra of heroic size, fit to deal with what Carlyle so bravely called "the immensities and the eternities." And it is as substantial in its imaginative and intellectual yield as if tonal gnat's eggs had not been agreed upon as the only decent thing for the creative mind to hatch.

"The composer, in a letter spread upon the pages of Mr. Hale's annotations, says that "there is absolutely no communicable program associated with the music, which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work." Nevertheless, he speaks of the end of the symphony as publishing "a kind of oppressive catastrophic mood," and remarks that he has "put a great deal of emotion into the writing of it"; from which we are entitled to infer that the music is perhaps not so "severely absolute" as a strict interpretation of that phrase would suggest.

"In his earlier symphony Bax appeared to be chiefly concerned with fashioning a sterner and more drastic music, little occupied with faery spells and magic seas and haunted, melancholy woods. The fierce gloom of the North was felt in it, and a new aggressiveness and power.

"These traits mark the new symphony that we heard Thursday night. Yet, on the whole, it is less somber and austere a work than its predecessor. We are warned by it that the Celtic temperament, with its predilection for strangely colored loveliness, its wistful, melancholy tenderness, its inexhaustible nostalgia, is a difficult thing to outlive. In the 'cello theme of the first movement, in the lyrical violin subject of the Andante (with its odd suggestion of an Irish Grieg—the ghost of the C minor violin sonata flits by), Mr. Bax reminds us that the Gael dies hard."

NEW YORK
EVENING POST

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Bostonians Introduce a New Symphony by Bax and Povla Frijsh Hymns Loeffler Canticle Anew

WITH the return of the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall last night a new symphony by Arnold Bax was conducted by the virtuoso of the baton to whom it is dedicated, Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Bax, who makes London his habitat, was not present to hear his work performed, but another of the composers of the evening was. After Povla Frijsh had sung his "Canticle of the Sun" to the evident gratification of those to whom this is one of the most consistently rewarding of American symphonic works written in the last decade, Charles Martin Loeffler was called before the audience for repeated bows and handshakings with the soloist and the conductor. For many years a member of this orchestra, Mr. Loeffler's compositions seem to come most naturally from the ensemble with which he was identified, though the "Canticle of the Sun" was first played in Washington at the 1925 Library of Congress Festival and was introduced to New York by Mr. Stowkowski's Philadelphians with the same soloist as last night. Both the work and the soloist had their accustomed success.

Aside from the new symphony, the chief disclosure of the evening was that the Ravel "Bolero" is by no means a one-conductor sensation. Mr. Koussevitzky also made of it an incentive for shouts and stampings, with such pounding of the palms as is rarely heard even from the professionals at the Metropolitan. The Boston conductor began this maddening tour de force much more slowly and languorously than Mr. Toscanini did, but in the conclusion unleashed all the orgiastic fury and din of which his ensemble was capable. Some individual parts were not so well played, one of the trombones missing its footing and the higher saxophone notes lacking bite and surety; but, admitting all this and also a preference for the faster, more immediately tense pulse of the earlier performances, this also was a virtuoso achievement of the most stunning brilliance.

THE orchestra played the Bax Symphony with a splendor of tone and a superb adjustment of sonorities which justified the compliment paid it by the composer when he wrote in advance of the premiere, "I am confident that this symphony will receive a finer first performance than any previous work of mine." Thought that first performance was not the one in New York last night, but one in Boston not quite a month ago, there is no reason to suspect that the orchestra's playing of the symphony has become any the less remarkable by reason of two repetitions. Mr. Bax was authority for the statement that there is no communicable program associated with this music, and that it is as entirely and severely "absolute" as a work of the classic period. He also called attention to the cyclic character of the form and to the persistent use of a three-note figure in all three movements of the symphony. The one clue he provided as to the meaning seems to have been that the close should be very broad and possess "a kind of oppressive catastrophic mood."

Whatever the composer's intent, this music in performance was far from suggesting the classic symphonies—as far in spirit as in technique and manner. Each of the movements took on the character of a dramatic tone-poem, with the emotion which Mr. Bax confessed having put into it, assuming a highly personal address, customarily associated with romantic music rather than with the classic and the severely absolute. On first hearing, whatever the continuity sought or assured by the use of the cyclic form, the work appeared episodic, and though possessing many arresting and some enchanting moments its interest was not cumulative. Climactic passages led into moments of dullness, and its thematic material, workable and plentiful as it was, commanded no large measure of admiration for any superior inherent beauty. As in his earlier orchestral works, the English composer attested the high order of his craftsmanship. The work is, indeed, so good that the pity is it is not better.

Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point," which is not new to Carnegie Hall, provided a robustious opening for the concert. For those who go to the trouble to associate it with the old print—or rather the literary description of the print—by the English caricaturist Rowlandson, which inspired the composition, there is no negligible degree of pictorial suggestion in this music. But without some definite mental vista of the bustling quays, the roistering sailors, the love-making and leave-taking, the fiddling and the grog-drinking, this tone-painting has a limited appeal as music.

NEW YORK
TIMES

TO AID RUSSIAN EXILES.

Concert Will Be Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra Today.

A special concert will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall this afternoon to aid the American Society for the Relief of Russian Exiles. Grand Duchess Kira of Russia is expected to arrive from Washington to attend the concert, which will consist of all-Russian music, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Benno Rabinoff, violinist, will be the soloist.

Among those who have taken boxes or seats are: Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Larkin, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Littlejohn, Mr. and Mrs. E. Farrar Bateson, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Knox Bell, Mr. and Mrs. Trowbridge Callaway, Mr. and Mrs. F. Kingsbury Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Blair Mitchell, Mr. and Mrs. William Jay Schieffelin, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hollister Pease, Mr. and Mrs. George Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur F. Schermerhorn, Mr. and Mrs. F. Ashton de Peyster, Mr. and Mrs. John Ross Delafield, Mr. and Mrs. William F. Dominick, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus King, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence F. MacMurray, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Ryan, Mr. and Mrs. Myron C. Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Landon K. Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. Schuyler N. Warren, Mrs. Frederick Lothrop Ames, Mrs. Donald W. Brown, Mrs. A. Bradhurst Field, Mr. and Mrs. Marius de Brabant, Mrs. Adolf Ladenburg, Mr. and Mrs. John Henry Hammond, Mr. and Mrs. Harry L. Hamlin, Mrs. George T. Maxwell, Mrs. William Peyton, Mrs. Elihu Root Jr., Mrs. Alfred Seton and Mrs. Percy Rivington Pyne.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN

Koussevitzky Offers Novelties

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Program at Carnegie Hall Includes New Works.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky (who, we observe, now suffers from chronic doctoring) smothered his devotees under an avalanche of novelty at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, but fortunately to their delectation. He began with an overture entitled "Portsmouth Point" by William Turner Wallace, an English composer born in 1902. The work formed itself in the musician's mind after he had pondered an old print representing a quay in the familiar confusion of such places.

The overture reflects this by bold and unconventional melodic ideas and syncopated rhythms. It is a piece of healthy, hearty music, jovial and touched with humorous fancy. The melodic foundations rest on the soil of Britain's native song and the structure reared upon them is well planned and symmetrical. It was a pleasure to hear such a wholesome product of one of the young minds of musical England.

The overture was followed by Arnold Bax's second symphony, which is in the keys of E minor and C major. This work had its first performance anywhere on December 13, when Dr. Koussevitzky produced it in Boston. We bestow our blessing on Mr. Bax for declining to load his music with a program. He has definitely said that it has none, but is a piece of absolute music, cyclical in form and utilizing a persistent three note figure as a germinal, or at least binding theme.

This new symphony carved its lines deep into the consciousness of this hearer. It is in three movements, an allegro moderato preceded by a slow introduction, an andante and a finale marked allegro feroce, which proved to be by no means ferocious. The themes upon which the first movement is built, and which are sic, are valiant, full of red blood d the strong breathing of a man o lives in the outdoor world and ts nature face to face. They and sometimes they shout, but ys they have substance and muquality. The development is laborated; there are pages which some of the packing well be pulled out. But it is movement.

ndante rests on a lyric melody of genuine beauty given out by the strings. The whole movement is song-like and varied by sharply contrasting episodes. The coda might perhaps be shortened a little to its advantage. The finale, like the first movement, is noteworthy for its confident and full throated utterance. It closes effectively. Mr. Bax employs modern harmonies with excellent skill and his orchestration is sonorous and richly colored. The symphony shows care in workmanship. The structure barring the elaboration already mentioned is firm and the outline tolerably clear. What is perhaps best, however, is the spontaneity, the ebullient spirit of the composition which is set forth in brilliant light by the introspective mood underrunning the whole. Mr. Bax's communions with nature have made him serious, but have strengthened his courage. He is no pessimist. The symphony was performed in a manner which would have given the composer infinite joy and the audience appeared to find the music admirable.

The third of Dr. Koussevitzky's collection of novelties was Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" (Canticum Fratris Solis) after the hymn of St. Francis of Assisi. It had, of course, been heard before here.

The work was written for the opening of the new Chamber Music Hall in the Library of Congress in Washington, presented to the nation by Mrs. F. S. Coolidge and opened in 1925. The composition is for soprano and orchestra and the singer last evening was Mme. Povla Frijsh, who sang the part at the first performance.

When the hymn was given in Philadelphia, Lawrence Gilman, who writes the masterly program notes for Mr. Stokowski's organization as well as for the Philharmonic of this city, furnished a careful analysis showing how Mr. Loeffler had cunningly utilized the basic materials of old ecclesiastical music. This composer's ability to create an illusion of antiquity with modern materials is well known. The song of the Greek flute is heard again in this canticle and the voice part is so beautifully fitted to the style and sentiment of the text that it is entrancing from beginning to end.

The composition discloses once more Mr. Loeffler's originality of idiom and that lofty dignity which marks his entire artistic output. It is beautiful and noble music. It was excellently done. Mme. Povla Frijsh sang the vocal solo with understanding and a range of expression not always heard in her singing. Tonally her delivery was not perfect, but the blemishes were outweighed by the excellences.

The concert concluded with Ravel's "Bolero," which had already been made known here by the Philharmonic under Toscanini. The repetition had its value, but the music lover's gratitude was due to Mr. Koussevitzky for his presentation of three such interesting novelties.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Serge Koussevitzky Twice a "Doctor"

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will appear with his 112 musicians at the has received honorary degrees from a "doctor" besides wearing the badge Mosque Monday, February 3, is twice of the French Legion of Honor. He both Brown and Harvard Universities.

NEWS

WE LOSE GOOD MUSIC

ANNOUNCEMENT that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will not come to Baltimore next season is sad news to real music lovers. And it makes some of us wonder if Baltimore really is going ahead as a music center.

Perhaps we are pessimists, but some of us, at least, see signs of retrogression. The Boston Symphony Orchestra used to have a regular season in Baltimore. This winter it makes one appearance — last night. There was a time when the Boston Symphony concerts were the big musical events here. The Philadelphia Orchestra used to give five and six concerts a season. This winter it is giving four.

A few years ago there were six children's concerts by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra. This season there are three. Recitals have not been so well attended this season. Yehudi Menuhin, it was believed, would fill every seat in the Lyric, but he didn't. Kreisler seems to be the only artist who can do that in Baltimore.

Neither the German Opera Company nor the American Opera Company, with its new work, "Yolanda of Cyprus," more than half-filled the Lyric. Apparently, Baltimore only wants the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Phil-

MINNEAPOLIS
JOURNAL

Bax Classic A Novelty in N.Y

Boston Orchestra Produces New Opus in Celtic Strain

During a recent concert in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Serge Kousesevitzky introduced a new symphony by Arnold Bax, in E minor and C major. Lawrence Gilman wrote of it in the New York Tribune-Herald as follows:

"Mr. Bax's symphony is in three movements, formidable in scope and content, and it lasts for almost 40 minutes. It is scored for an orchestra of heroic size, fit to deal with what Carlyle so bravely called "the immensities and the eternities." And it is as substantial in its imaginative and intellectual yield as if tonal gnat's eggs had not been agreed upon as the only decent thing for the creative mind to hatch.

"The composer, in a letter spread upon the pages of Mr. Hale's annotations, says that "there is absolutely no communicable program associated with the music, which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work." Nevertheless, he speaks of the end of the symphony as publishing "a kind of oppressive catastrophic mood," and remarks that he has "put a great deal of emotion into the writing of it"; from which we are entitled to infer that the music is perhaps not so "severely absolute" as a strict interpretation of that phrase would suggest.

"In his earlier symphony Bax appeared to be chiefly concerned with fashioning a sterner and more drastic music, little occupied with faery spells and magic seas and haunted, melancholy woods. The fierce gloom of the North was felt in it, and a new aggressiveness and power.

"These traits mark the new symphony that we heard Thursday night. Yet, on the whole, it is less somber and austere a work than its predecessor. We are warned by it that the Celtic temperament, with its predilection for strangely colored loveliness, its wistful, melancholy tenderness, its incurable nostalgia, is a difficult thing to outlive. In the 'cello theme of the first movement, in the lyrical violin subject of the Andante (with its odd suggestion of an Irish Grieg—the ghost of the C minor violin sonata flits by), Mr. Bax reminds us that the Gael dies hard."

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
JAN 11 30

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY did not conduct, as was his original intention, a Dvorak and Wagner program at the Academy of Music last evening. Sensing, it may be, the desire of those who attend the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to hear occasionally music less familiar than excerpts from the Wagnerian music-dramas (which Mr. Koussewitsky not infrequently performs for them), he set aside, on second thought, his well-thumbed scores of the prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Walkuerenritt" and the introduction to the "Meistersinger's" third act and in their place substituted those of a Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangigalli and a symphonic interlude from the "Intermezzo" of Richard Strauss. Music of our times, though contemporaneous only in date of composition these novelties were relished by a large audience, which found in them no trace of that subversive modernism that several years ago provoked it to protest the performance of Mr. Copland's "Music for the Theater."

* * *

We refer to the Pick-Mangigalli Prelude and Fugue and Strauss Interlude as novelties. The term applies accurately to the Italian work, which had not had a New York performance previous to that of last evening, but excerpts from the Strauss opera have been introduced in the past by Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Klemperer and Mr. Furtwaengler to audiences in Manhattan, though not, we believe, to audiences in Brooklyn. Its composer's Op. 72, "Intermezzo" was completed and first performed in 1924. Strauss wrote both text and music of this domestic comedy in two acts and a dozen scenes, which relates with much gusto and not a little sentiment an anecdote that commentators have asked us to interpret an autobiographical, since it concerns a misunderstanding between an orchestral conductor and his temperamental wife. The seven scenes of the first and the five scenes of the second act are separated by symphonic interludes, and it was one of these—that following the fifth scene of Act One—that Mr. Koussewitsky performed last evening.

* * *

The fifth interlude from "Intermezzo" is love music. To realize this we do not need to be told that in the scene which follows Christine (the conductor's wife) has in the absence of her husband entertained a young and personable Baron, falling, upon his departure, into the sentimental reverie. Mr. Koussewitsky played not only the music of the interlude proper but some 50-odd measures preceding it and accompanying Christine's meditations. The key is A-flat, the mood dreamy and amorous. This interlude is the best thing in the opera, and fairer report might be made of it had we not heard it before in its author's "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote." The composer who repeats himself is scarcely better off than the composer who repeats another, for both borrow to conceal an insolvent talent. In this interlude from "Intermezzo" Strauss remembers and rewrites the third variation of his "Don Quixote" and the concluding pages of "Ein Heldenleben"—remembers and rewrites with emendations and amplifications and strives to simulate an emotion which he no longer feels. The result is ardent, unctuous and unconvincing.

* * *

Pick-Mangigalli's Prelude and Fugue preceded the excerpt from "Intermezzo," introducing the second half of the program. The Italian composer owes the coloring of the Prelude, as well as its profile, to Klingsor's music in "Parsifal," and in its postlude he treats fugally the diatonic scale. This he does ingeniously, but the result hardly induces us to alter the opinion we have entertained of him as a clever yet unimportant musician. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted both the Pick-Mangigalli and the Strauss performances, which greatly raised the music in the esteem of the audience. The program was otherwise devoted to Dvorak's E minor Symphony ("From the New World") and the overture to the "Meistersinger."

* * *

This Brooklyn concert was the second given yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction. The first took the form of a special matinee at Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of the American Society for the Relief of Russians in Exile, Inc., at which

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

ANGLO-SAXON MUSIC MARKS PROGRAM OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, did an unusual thing last evening at Carnegie Hall in giving over almost his entire programme to works by Anglo-Saxon composers.

The list embraced "Portsmouth Point," an overture, by William Turner Walton; Symphony No. 2, by Arnold Bax; "Canticum Fratris Solis" (St. Francis's Hymn to the Sun), by Charles Martin Loeffler, and "Bolero," by Maurice Ravel. Walton and Bax are English; Loeffler, although born an Alsatian, is an American citizen and Boston resident of many years' standing; Ravel is, of course, French.

It is difficult to guess exactly why Koussevitzky set up such a programme, for it was austere and even dull musically. The Ravel "Bolero," which came at the end, had the effect of a stiff, fresh wind blowing away a murky and somnalent fog.

Walton's overture, mildly modernistic, professes to give a tonal impression of Thomas Rowlandson's (1756-1827) print called "Portsmouth Point." The picture shows the bustle of a naval harbor, with a melee of departing sailors and their officers, some drunk, some fighting, romancing.

Bax Pages Sombre

The Walton music suggests snatches of old English tune, and something of the noisy, rowdy atmosphere of Rowlandson's subject. It is a very short, hurrying composition, and before one could thoroughly weigh its merits it was over.

Much more serious, terribly serious, was the Bax Symphony "in E minor and C," as the programme had it. The addition of the C did not help matters much, for the Bax pages are prevailingly sombre when they are not forbiddingly severe. The composition, dedicated to Koussevitzky, had its first New York performance last night.

I have seldom heard music so seemingly compact and well made and yet so devoid of recognizable purpose or direction. Bax varies his style so much that followers of Debussy, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Cesar Franck and some of the French and German moderns, all might claim him as a camp-follower.

There are some finely expressed lyrical moments in the Bax Symphony, some resounding climaxes and long stretches of monotonous music making that found one listener hard put to it to keep awake at times. I regard Bax's work with respect and something of awe, and I wish I could give it a more informative analysis.

The Loeffler hymn, for voice and orchestra, is church-writing, except that the composer takes harmonic liberties not usual in liturgical expression. No great imaginative heights are reached in Loeffler's essay. The solo part was done well by Povla Frijsch, whose unsensuous soprano voice and spiritualized delivery suited the reserved character of the music.

No rhapsodical delight came from the audience until after the whirling, propulsive finale of the splendidly played "Bolero."

JOURNAL

Mr. Goossens Returns, Baton in Hand

Last Season He Came as Pianist and Composer, But Now He Brings a Nordic Folio as Conductor and Guest of the Boston Symphony

Under the baton of Eugene Goossens, the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season at the Albee Theatre, will feature on next Tuesday evening a program by Wagner, Schumann and Sibelius.

Eugene Goossens the conductor we met four years ago under similar auspices and under similar conditions. When he came last year it was as composer, pianist and violinist playing his own compositions alone and with other artists in a Sunday afternoon concert in Memorial Hall. He returns fresh from his venture in opera in Philadelphia, where his "Judith" had its premiere.

His experience as a conductor dates back to 1921 when he formed his own orchestra of carefully picked players, "with whom he gave a concert of modern music that established his reputation among the foremost conductors of the day. He aroused so much interest that the program had to be repeated at the following concert.

Since then his services have been in constant demand on both sides of the Atlantic. He has conducted the British National and Carl Rosa Opera Companies, the Russian Ballet, the London Symphony Orchestra, and many other organizations. His most successful American connection was probably with the Hollywood Bowl group whom he conducted in open-air symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

1. Wagner.....A Faust Overture
2. Schumann...Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
   - I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
   - II. Larghetto.
   - III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio 1: Molto piu vivace; Trio II.
   - IV. Allegro Animato e grazioso.
3. Sibelius..."A Saga," Tone Poem, Op. 9.
4. Wagner..Excerpts from Act III, "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Introduction—Dance of the Apprentices—Assemblage of the Masters.

From Wagner's Youth

The program begins and ends with Wagner. At the outset we have a "Faust" overture, a novelty which should prove of great interest to all who might wonder how the Titan would treat such a theme. Written in 1840 when the composer was 27 years old, it has been called a superb orchestral piece, the first work which bears the true stamp of Wagner.

"It was conceived after a rehearsal of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Conservatoire in the winter of 1839 and is in some sense a piece of autobiography written in music. As originally planned it was to form the first movement of a Faust Symphony. It is a masterpiece of construction and instrumentation. The influence of Beethoven is apparent in the concise power of the themes, and the plain direct manner in which they are set forth, yet the work is Wagner's own from beginning to end."

The excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" that end our evening are more familiar, as nearly everyone knows Wagner's one important venture in the field of comedy. This he based definitely on the pattern of old comedy, just as he based his tragedies on old Greek models with their inscrutable Fate to justify or nullify the ways of gods and men. Like Aristophanes he has his fun at the expense of the manners, vices and follies of the people, and the stage is set to illustrate a specific page of history.

A Satyr Play

The Greek tragedian offered tragedies immediately after which was presented a comedy (Satyr Play). "Meistersinger," we are told is a Satyr Play that might follow the tragic "Tannhauser;" and more than that, it happens to be a superhuman laugh of derision at the hand of Fate itself; for Wagner wrote it immediately after the terrible failure of "Tannhauser" in Paris.

Schumann's First Symphony has never been what might be called popular, but it is fine music just the same. Easily surpassing the work of Schubert and Mendelssohn in power and range, it is striking on account of its musical ideas and that subtle charm which is indispensable to greatness. Perhaps Schumann did use Beethoven as a sort of model, but he is very far away from both Mozart and Hayden in this work. It shows unusual originality and a creative force that is distinctly Schumann.

Against the instrumentation of this symphony too much has been said of late, particularly by these human gulls and crows that criticize the eagle. Whatever the [illegible] the work is fresh and full of the buoyancy and [illegible] first movement, we are [illegible] have been called "Spring [illegible]" and the finale, "Spring [illegible]."

Schumann's Innovations

[illegible] of the introduction [illegible] a trumpet-summons [illegible] on high; then [illegible] to and fro, and everywhere the dormant forces awake and [illegible] their way to the light." (We are quoting from the composer's own program.) "In the Allegro the Spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth. This explains and justifies the novel use of the triangle in the first movement—an instrument not then considered admissible in a symphony. An enchanting effect is produced by the spring song at the close of the first movement, played as though sung with a full heart; and it is an entirely new form of coda."

Sibelius is a composer who stands alone in his individuality, which was strong enough to make itself felt even at the very beginning of his career. He is wild, mysterious, sweet, bold, sad, in turns, often speaking with a sublime majesty seldom heard in the works of composers of equal rank.

He "ranks among the foremost living composers of today. He has been wholly unaffected by the work of his predecessors and contemporaries. He is concerned, first and last, in giving his own message to the world in a form that appears austere and forbidding on a first acquaintance, but which holds the attention throughout. His method of thematic development is peculiarly original." Much of his work is based on the national life of Finland, in which Hades and Death play a large and gloomy power. But for all that, he is not morbid, his main characteristic being that of enormous power.

M. C. W.

GLAZOUNOV IS GREETED AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

THOUGH the audience at this week's Symphony concerts comes more or less prepared for what it is to see and hear, it rubs its eyes none the less. Here before it is, in the actual and plentiful fresh, Alexander Glazounov, grand old man of present day Russian composers, great connecting link with the past, one of the great line. Here is a man who rubbed shoulders intimately, as an equal, with Rimsky-Korsakov, Borodin and Balakirev, of whose music Franz Liszt was a champion.

It seems incredible, but the miracle is accomplished before our eyes. Glazounov, as guest leader, conducting a program devoted entirely to his own works. The explanation is, of course, that Glazounov developed as a composer at an extraordinarily youthful age; at 16 he had written a symphony taken seriously by his master, Rimsky-Korsakov.

Perhaps, it explains, too, the pathos that this concert held for some of us. For it was evident, as the program proceeded, that Glazounov is not a man of his time. Granted the stupendous musicianship that are evident in the pieces played on this program, including the Sixth Symphony, the Violin Concerto and the Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin." Granted the talent, the very genius that fills these pieces with music of the highest order, music for the most part not Russian, but cosmopolitan. Despite this, one feels something foreign to our time; one senses the spectacle of an actor of genius playing before an audience no longer in sympathy with his play or with his style.

None the less, it is distinctly an "occasion" this week at Symphony Hall. The program rises in steady crescendo of interest to the beautiful, sweeping "Stenka Razin." Benno Rabinoff plays the solo part of the Concerto smoothly, with small but fine tone, with appreciative musicianship. And the audience, suspicious in its opening greeting to the composer, ends by being as cordial as the hundred musicians on the stage, giving one long [illegible]

Brahms Festival

Series of Concerts to Assemble His Work and Mark His Fame

AS now and finally arranged, the long-projected Brahms Festival will consist of four special concerts in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 23; Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, March 24, 25, 26. To them will be joined the preceding Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, March 21 and Saturday evening, March 22. For the special concerts, with the whole hall open to all comers, seats will go on sale today at the automatic subscription board. For the two regular Symphony Concerts, no seats, except chance "returns" are available.

At both the regular Symphony Concerts, the Second Symphony, the Third Symphony and the Academic Overture will be played. The special concert of Sunday afternoon, March 23, will be orchestral, including the Variations on a Theme of Haydn; the Second Piano-Concerto; the Fourth Symphony. The concert of Monday evening, March 24, will be choral, divided between "The Song of Destiny" and the German Requiem. Chamber-pieces will fill the concert of Tuesday evening, March 25: a Sonata for Violin and Piano; numbers from the "Liebeslieder" for small mixed chorus; piano-pieces; the Quintet in F minor for Piano and Strings. The final concert, on Wednesday evening, March 26, will array the Rhapsody for Alto, Chorus and Orchestra; the First Piano-Concerto; the First Symphony.

The forces concerned: As conductor through the whole festival, Dr. Koussevitsky; for orchestra, the Symphony Orchestra; for chorus, the Harvard Glee Club of Dr. Davison, the Radcliffe Choral Society of Mr. Woodworth; for the chamber concert, the Burgin String Quartet of members of the orchestra; for assisting singers at need, Mme. Matzenauer (of the Metropolitan Opera House), Miss Jeannette Vreeland, Mr. Fraser Gange. Finally, for illustrious guest, hidden to Boston especially for this festival, Arthur Schnabel, the renowned pianist, master in the music of Brahms.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
JAN 11 1930

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY did not conduct, as was his original intention, a Dvorak and Wagner program at the Academy of Music last evening. Sensing, it may be, the desire of those who attend the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to hear occasionally music less familiar than excerpts from the Wagnerian music-dramas (which Mr. Koussewitsky not infrequently performs for them), he set aside, on second thought, his well-thumbed scores of the prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Walkuerenrit" and the introduction to the "Meistersinger's" third act and in their place substituted those of a Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangigalli and a symphonic interlude from the "Intermezzo" of Richard Strauss. Music of our times, though contemporaneous only in date of composition, these novelties were relished by a large audience, which found in them no trace of that subversive modernism that several years ago provoked it to protest the performance of Mr. Copland's "Music for the Theater."

* * *

We refer to the Pick-Mangigalli Prelude and Fugue and Strauss Interlude as novelties. The term applies accurately to the Italian work, which had not had a New York performance previous to that of last evening, but excerpts from the Strauss opera have been introduced in the past by Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Klemperer and Mr. Furtwaengler to audiences in Manhattan, though not, we believe, to audiences in Brooklyn. Its composer's Op. 72, "Intermezzo" was completed and first performed in 1924. Strauss wrote both text and music of this domestic comedy in two acts and a dozen scenes, which relates with much gusto and not a little sentiment an anecdote that commentators have asked us to interpret an autobiographical, since it concerns a misunderstanding between an orchestral conductor and his temperamental wife. The seven scenes of the first and the five scenes of the second act are separated by symphonic interludes, and it was one of these—that following the fifth scene of Act One—that Mr. Koussewitsky performed last evening.

* * *

The fifth interlude from "Intermezzo" is love music. To realize this we do not need to be told that in the scene which follows Christine (the conductor's wife) has in the absence of her husband entertained a young and personable Baron, falling, upon his departure, into the sentimental reverie. Mr. Koussewitsky played not only the music of the interlude proper but some 50-odd measures preceding it and accompanying Christine's meditations. The key is A-flat, the mood dreamy and amorous. This interlude is the best thing in the opera, and fairer report might be made of it had we not heard it before in its author's "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote." The composer who repeats himself is scarcely better off than the composer who repeats another, for both borrow to conceal an insolvent talent. In this interlude from "Intermezzo" Strauss remembers and rewrites the third variation of his "Don Quixote" and the concluding pages of "Ein Heldenleben"—remembers and rewrites with emendations and amplifications and strives to simulate an emotion which he no longer feels. The result is ardent, unctuous and unconvincing.

* * *

Pick-Mangigalli's Prelude and Fugue preceded the excerpt from "Intermezzo," introducing the second half of the program. The Italian composer owes the coloring of the Prelude, as well as its profile, to Klingsor's music in "Parsifal," and in its postlude he treats fugally the diatonic scale. This he does ingeniously, but the result hardly induces us to alter the opinion we have entertained of him as a clever yet unimportant musician. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted both the Pick-Mangigalli and the Strauss performances, which greatly raised the music in the esteem of the audience. The program was otherwise devoted to Dvorak's E minor Symphony ("From the New World") and the overture to the "Meistersinger."

* * *

This Brooklyn concert was the second given yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction. The first took the form of a special matinee at Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of the American Society for the Relief of Russians in Exile, Inc., at which Benno Rabinoff, violinist, appeared as assisting artist. The prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khowantchina," a suite from Strawinsky's "Petrouschka," the Prokofiew Violin Concerto, Rimsky's "Sadko," Op. 5, and Tschaikowsky's 1812 Overture comprised the program.

The list embraced "Portsmouth Point," an overture, by William Turner Walton; Symphony No. 2, by Arnold Bax; "Canticum Fratris Solis" (St. Francis's Hymn to the Sun), by Charles Martin Loeffler, and "Bolero," by Maurice Ravel. Walton and Bax are English; Loeffler, although born an Alsatian, is an American citizen and Boston resident of many years' standing; Ravel is, of course, French.

It is difficult to guess exactly why Koussevitzky set up such a programme, for it was austere and even dull musically. The Ravel "Bolero," which came at the end, had the effect of a stiff, fresh wind blowing away a murky and somnalent fog.

Walton's overture, mildly modernistic, professes to give a tonal impression of Thomas Rowlandson's (1756-1827) print called "Portsmouth Point." The picture shows the bustle of a naval harbor, with a melee of departing sailors and their officers, some drunk, some fighting, romancing.

Bax Pages Sombre

The Walton music suggests snatches of old English tune, and something of the noisy, rowdy atmosphere of Rowlandson's subject. It is a very short, hurrying composition, and before one could thoroughly weigh its merits it was over.

Much more serious, terribly serious, was the Bax Symphony "in E minor and C," as the programme had it. The addition of the C did not help matters much, for the Bax pages are prevailingly sombre when they are not forbiddingly severe. The composition, dedicated to Koussevitzky, had its first New York performance last night.

I have seldom heard music so seemingly compact and well made and yet so devoid of recognizable purpose or direction. Bax varies his style so much that followers of Debussy, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Cesar Franck and some of the French and German moderns, all might claim him as a camp-follower.

There are some finely expressed lyrical moments in the Bax Symphony, some resounding climaxes and long stretches of monotonous music making that found one listener hard put to it to keep awake at times. I regard Bax's work with respect and something of awe, and I wish I could give it a more informative analysis.

The Loeffler hymn, for voice and orchestra, is church-writing, except that the composer takes harmonic liberties not usual in liturgical expression. No great imaginative heights are reached in Loeffler's essay. The solo part was done well by Povla Frijsch, whose unsensuous soprano voice and spiritualized delivery suited the reserved character of the music.

No rhapsodical delight came from the audience until after the whirling, propulsive finale of the splendidly played "Bolero."

JOURNAL
JAN 12

Mr. Goossens Returns, Baton in Hand

Last Season He Came as Pianist and Composer, But Now He Brings a Nordic Folio as Conductor and Guest of the Boston Symphony

Under the baton of Eugene Goossens, the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season at the Albee Theatre, will feature on next Tuesday evening a program by Wagner, Schumann and Sibelius.

Eugene Goossens the conductor we met four years ago under similar auspices and under similar conditions. When he came last year it was as composer, pianist and violinist playing his own compositions alone and with other artists in a Sunday afternoon concert in Memorial Hall. He returns fresh from his venture in opera in Philadelphia, where his "Judith" had its premiere.

His experience as a conductor dates back to 1921 when he formed his own orchestra of carefully picked players, "with whom he gave a concert of modern music that established his reputation among the foremost conductors of the day. He aroused so much interest that the program had to be repeated at the following concert.

Since then his services have been in constant demand on both sides of the Atlantic. He has conducted the British National and Carl Rosa Opera Companies, the Russian Ballet, the London Symphony Orchestra, and many other organizations. His most successful American connection was probably with the Hollywood Bowl group whom he conducted in open-air symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

1. Wagner.....A Faust Overture
2. Schumann...Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
   - I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
   - II. Larghetto.
   - III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio 1: Molto piu vivace; Trio II.
   - IV. Allegro Animato e grazioso.
3. Sibelius..."A Saga," Tone Poem, Op. 9.
4. Wagner..Excerpts from Act III, "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Introduction—Dance of the Apprentices—Assemblage of the Masters.

From Wagner's Youth

The program begins and ends with Wagner. At the outset we have a "Faust" overture, a noveity which should prove of great interest to all who might wonder how the Titan would treat such a theme. Written in 1840 when the composer was 27 years old, it has been called a superb orchestral piece, the first work which bears the true stamp of Wagner.

"It was conceived after a rehearsal of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Conservatoire in the winter of 1839 and is in some sense a piece of autobiography written in music. As originally planned it was to form the first movement of a Faust Symphony. It is a masterpiece of construction and instrumentation. The influence of Beethoven is apparent in the concise power of the themes, and the plain direct manner in which they are set forth, yet the work is Wagner's own from beginning to end."

The excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" that end our evening are more familiar, as nearly everyone knows Wagner's one important venture in the field of comedy. This he based definitely on the pattern of old comedy, just as he based his tragedies on old Greek models with their inscrutable Fate to justify or nullify the ways of gods and men. Like Aristophanes he has his fun at the expense of the manners, vices and follies of the people, and the stage is set to illustrate a specific page of history.

A Satyr Play

The Greek tragedian offered tragedies immediately after which was presented a comedy (Satyr Play). "Meistersinger," we are told is a Satyr Play that might follow the tragic "Tannhauser;" and more than that, it happens to be a superhuman laugh of derision at the hand of Fate itself; for Wagner wrote it immediately after the terrible failure of "Tannhauser" in Paris.

Schumann's First Symphony has never been what might be called popular, but it is fine music just the same. Easily surpassing the work of Schubert and Mendelssohn in power and range, it is striking on account of its musical ideas and that subtle charm which is indispensable to greatness. Perhaps Schumann did use Beethoven as a sort of model, but he is very far away from both Mozart and Hayden in this work. It shows unusual originality and a creative force that is distinctly Schumann.

Against the instrumentation of this symphony too much has been said of late, particularly by those human gulls and crows that chatter at the eagle. Whatever the instrumentation, the work is lively, fresh, and full of the buoyancy and uplift of life. Its first movement, we are told, was to have been called "Spring's Awakening," and the finale, "Spring's Farewell."

Schumann's Innovations

"The beginning of the introduction evidently represents a trumpet-summons seen pealing down from on high; then gentle zephyrs blow softly to and fro, and everywhere the dormant forces awake and make their way to the light." (We are quoting from the composer's own program.) "In the Allegro the Spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth. This explains and justifies the novel use of the triangle in the first movement—an instrument not then considered admissible in a symphony. An enchanting effect is produced by the spring song at the close of the first movement, played as though sung with a full heart; and it is an entirely new form of coda."

Sibelius is a composer who stands alone in his individuality, which was strong enough to make itself felt even at the very beginning of his career. He is wild, mysterious, sweet, bold, sad, in turns, often speaking with a sublime majesty seldom heard in the works of composers of equal rank.

He "ranks among the foremost living composers of today. He has been wholly unaffected by the work of his predecessors and contemporaries. He is concerned, first and last, in giving his own message to the world in a form that appears austere and forbidding on a first acquaintance, but which holds the attention throughout. His method of thematic development is peculiarly original." Much of his work is based on the national life of Finland, in which Hades and Death play a large and gloomy power. But for all that, he is not morbid, his main characteristic being that of enormous power.

M. C. W.

Applesauce is what Miss I

Amer Jan 18

GLAZOUNOV IS GREETED AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

THOUGH the audience at this week's Symphony concerts comes more or less prepared for what it is to see and hear, it rubs its eyes none the less. Here before it is, in the actual and plentiful fresh, Alexander Glazounov, grand old man of present day Russian composers, great connecting link with the past, one of the great line. Here is a man who rubbed shoulders intimately, as an equal, with Rimsky-Korsakov, Borodin and Balakirev, of whose music Franz Liszt was a champion.

It seems incredible, but the miracle is accomplished before our eyes: Glazounov, as guest leader, conducting a program devoted entirely to his own works. The explanation is, of course, that Glazounov developed as a composer at an extraordinarily youthful age: at 16 he had written a symphony taken seriously by his master, Rimsky-Korsakov.

Perhaps, it explains, too, the pathos that this concert held for some of us. For it was evident, as the program proceeded, that Glazounov is not a man of his time. Granted the stupendous musicianship that are evident in the pieces played on this program, including the Sixth Symphony, the Violin Concerto and the Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin." Granted the talent, the very genius that fills these pieces with music of the highest order, music for the most part not Russian, but cosmopolitan. Despite this, one feels something foreign to our time; one senses the spectacle of an actor of genius playing before an audience no longer in sympathy with his play or with his style.

None the less, it is distinctly an "occasion" this week at Symphony Hall. The program rises in steady crescendo of interest to the beautiful, sweeping "Stenka Razin." Benno Rabinoff plays the solo part of the Concerto smoothly, with small but fine tone, with appreciative musicianship. And the audience, suspicious in its opening greeting to the composer, ends by being as cordial as the hundred musicians on the stage, giving one long

Brahms Festival

Series of Concerts to Assemble His Work and Mark His Fame

AS now and finally arranged, the long-projected Brahms Festival will consist of four special concerts in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 23; Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, March 24, 25, 26. To them will be joined the preceding Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, March 21 and Saturday evening, March 22. For the special concerts, with the whole hall open to all comers, seats will go on sale today at the automatic subscription board. For the two regular Symphony Concerts, no seats, except chance "returns" are available.

At both the regular Symphony Concerts, the Second Symphony, the Third Symphony and the Academic Overture will be played. The special concert of Sunday afternoon, March 23, will be orchestral, including the Variations on a Theme of Haydn; the Second Piano-Concerto; the Fourth Symphony. The concert of Monday evening, March 24, will be choral, divided between "The Song of Destiny" and the German Requiem. Chamber-pieces will fill the concert of Tuesday evening, March 25: a Sonata for Violin and Piano; numbers from the "Liebeslieder" for small mixed chorus; piano-pieces; the Quintet in F minor for Piano and Strings. The final concert, on Wednesday evening, March 26, will array the Rhapsody for Alto, Chorus and Orchestra; the First Piano-Concerto; the First Symphony.

The forces concerned: As conductor through the whole festival, Dr. Koussevitsky; for orchestra, the Symphony Orchestra; for chorus, the Harvard Glee Club of Dr. Davison, the Radcliffe Choral Society of Mr. Woodworth; for the chamber concert, the Burgin String Quartet of members of the orchestra; for assisting singers at need, Mme. Matzenauer (of the Metropolitan Opera House), Miss Jeannette Vreeland, Mr. Fraser Gange. Finally, for illustrious guest, bidden to Boston especially for this festival, Arthur Schnabel, the renowned pianist, master in the music of Brahms.

30

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Eugene Goossens

Will conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra in its third concert of season Tuesday night.

Eugene Goossens, Symphony Conductor, Well Known Here

Appeared in Same Capacity Three Years Ago. His Program

BY WARREN STORY SMITH

Eugene Goossens, who conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the Albee Theatre Tuesday evening, needs no introduction to Providence, since he appeared in this city in the same capacity four seasons ago. Of Belgian and English descent, born in England and educated musically at the Bruges Conservatory, Mr. Goossens is a true cosmopolite. As composer he is classed with the younger British school, of which he is a notable representative, but the artistic influences traceable in his music are predominantly Continental. Having acquired at home an enviable reputation as conductor, Mr. Goossens was called to Rochester, N. Y., a few years ago to take charge of the newly formed symphony orchestra in that city. Quite recently Mr. Goossens was honored in Philadelphia, where his opera "Judith" with libretto by Arnold Bennett, produced in London last summer, received its American premiere.

By a curious coincidence the first three numbers on Mr. Goossens's program of next Tuesday evening, Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Schumann's First Symphony and Sibelius's "A Saga," are the three pieces that, in the same order, began a pair of Boston Symphony concerts in 1910 when Max Fiedler, the conductor at that time, introduced to Boston the tone poem of Sibelius, since then unheard in that city, though Mr. Koussevitzky announced it for performance early last autumn.

"A Saga" has no program, but its title gives a clear hint of the character of the music. Which one of the Scandinavian heroic poems the composer had in mind [illegible] the music of this greatest of Finnish composers.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture" belongs to his earlier years, and it and the "Siegfried Idyl" are his only considerable instrumental pieces outside his operas. At the close of Tuesday's program, by the way, the fully matured Wagner of "Die Meistersinger" will be represented by three excerpts from that music drama, making possible an interesting comparison of styles. As a matter of fact, the overture is not wholly of the youthful Wagner, since, like the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and the first scene of "Tannhauser," it received subsequent revision at its composer's hands. 'A Faust Overture," which bears the subtitle "Faust in Solitude," was intended as the first of a series of three symphonic movements based on Goethe's poem, but the two companion pieces were never written. Sombre in coloring, brooding and introspective, the overture is an excellent musical character-study and strongly forecasts the later Wagner's remarkable powers in this direction.

In the Introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers," which has place on Mr. Goossens's program, may be found an impressive example of this psychological delineation. Here the "subject" is Hans Sachs, the noble, generous, whole-souled cobbler-poet of Nuremberg. With it the conductor has placed the gay Dance of the Apprentices and the stately processional of the mastersingers, as they march to the contest of song in which Walther's Prize song —beloved of all tenors—is to win for that young nobleman both the coveted admission to the guild of mastersingers and the hand of his lady fair.

The Symphony of Schumann, to discuss last the most pretentious numb on the program, is both the first ar the freshest of his four efforts in t symphonic form. Later on Schuman was to fill that form with music of ripe technical skill, music more truly symphonic in character, but he never re captured the ardor and enthusiasm tha went into the making of this lyrical, impulsive, songful and ardent Symphony in B-flat major, intended by him to be a paean in praise of the vernal season and often called the "Spring" Symphony.

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

The new symphony by Arnold Bax, written in two keys, E minor and C major, was performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Although it was written in 1924-25, the composer reserved the production for Mr. Koussevitzky, to whom the work is dedicated. The composer has said that "there is absolutely no communicable program associated with the music, which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work."

BROOKLYN
EAGLE

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

English Music at a Boston Symphony Concert—"Tannhaeuser" With Mme. Rethberg.

IN HIS invaluable notes on the program performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, at Carnegie Hall last evening, Philip Hale finds occasion to quote from a review, written by Ernest Newman of William Turner Walton's "Facade," an example of musical jesting which the London critic relished greatly. "Not all of the 'Facade' music came off, it is true," wrote Mr. Newman, "some of it was too imitative of the sort of thing we used to hear in the great days of about 1920, when M. Diaghilew was writing—or at all events signing—those wonderful letters to the papers in which a new scheme of musical values was foreshadowed, Beethoven and Brahms and Elgar being reduced to the status of mere straphangers by the Strawinskys and Saties and Prokofiews and Milhauds of the new dawn."

* * *

Beethoven, Brahms and Elgar! We do not need the signature of this review to know its origin—such inspired grouping of the great could only be made by Mr. Newman or one of his London colleagues. Only they possess the attribute of character that made it possible: a passionate and proselytizing devotion to all in Britain born and bred. We often encounter, in musical criticism of English authorship, the counterparts of Mr. Newman's phrase, and if they amuse us always, occasionally they afflict us with a becoming sense of shame. For we cannot boast, nor can any American writer upon music, so touching a faith, so courageous an attachment, to the composers of our race and nation: Beethoven, Brahms and MacDowell. Perish the thought! But our British colleagues may cry aloud what angels fear to whisper, for theirs is that generous, blind tolerance for its own of national solidarity.

* * *

Doubtless it makes them happy. They do not seek the English composer—as we seek the American composer. They find him at every turn, a genius potent and fertile. And if elsewhere his reception is less instant and unquestioning than at home, well they know the reason. We know it too—though not, perhaps, the same reason—and our knowledge is today the more certain, since Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra have played for us, as they did last evening, music by Walton and Arnold Bax, musicians of whose superior gifts no doubt exists in England, since they are Englishmen.

* * *

Mr. Bax's Second Symphony received, last evening, its first performance in New York. An earnest and sober work, it confirmed a belief which we have long entertained in the authenticity of its composer's gifts. We have heard relatively little of Bax's music. Many years ago a tone-poem, "November Woods," was played for us by the Boston Orchestra, then under the direction of Mr. Monteux, and more recently a Symphony in E-flat and a second tone-poem, "Tintagel," have been performed in this city. These and the Second Symphony disclose a powerful creative imagination expressing itself in music somber and harsh, crude in its melodic contours, violent in its coloring, always intense, passionate, hieretical, in accent, burdened with tragedy and disaster. Its derivatio[illegible] forceful and individual character, its ability, at its best, to overwhelm one with the passion and terror of the artist's conception—it is not great music. In the Second Symphony the mediocrity of the thematic material contrasts sharply with the superb treatment which it receives. One is annoyed by the commonplace profile of Bax's melody, by the triviality of its metrical scheme. This weakens the impression made by the music, all but cancels it, and this is a deplorable thing.

* * *

None the less, the Symphony was well worth hearing, and indeed could be heard again with pleasure and profit. Not so, however, Mr. Walton's overture, "Pourtsmouth Point," a piece whose rowdiness is less delightful than that of Rowlandson. As an exercise in orchestral virtuosity, it did not transcend the abilities of Mr. Koussewitsky's players, who polished it off brilliantly as a curtain-raiser to the Bax Symphony.

Later in the evening Mr. Koussewitsky conducted the second New York performance of Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis," a setting for soprano voice and orchestra of St. Francis' hymn to the sun. The work, which does not represent Mr. Loeffler at his best, was not enhanced by a performance curiously uneven and unsatisfying, in which Mme. Povla Frijsh, a singer whose interpretative skill no longer compensates for her declining vocal powers, was the soloist. Ravel's Bolero, recently introduced here by Mr. Toscanini, concluded the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

TWO ORCHESTRAS IN BENEFIT CONCERTS

Boston Symphony in All-Russian Program Aids Exiles—Philharmonic Helps Pension Fund.

Both the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony gave benefit concerts in Carnegie Hall yesterday, the visiting organization's special matinee producing gross receipts above $9,000, a large part of which will go to the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles.

Conductor Koussevitzky and Manager W. H. Brennan cooperated with Mrs. Henry P. Loomis of the society in not only giving an all-Russian program of absorbing musical interest, but also introducing pictures during an intermission to show the relief work done in collaboration with the High Commission for Refugees, League of Nations and International Anti-Tuberculosis Union.

Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovantchina" introduced the matinee in a popular crescendo leading up to Tchaikovsky's "Overture 1812" with a rising recall for players and conductor. J. M. Sanroma assisted at the piano in Stravinsky's applauded "Petruchka" suite, and Benno Rabinoff gave a notable performance of Prokofieff's violin concerto. Curiosity centred especially on Rimsky-Korsakoff's earliest sketch, Op. 5, for the opera, "Sadko," which is to be produced this month at the Metropolitan.

Mr. Mengelberg and the Philharmonic-Symphony players last evening played for members of their guarantor society, who filled the floor of Carnegie Hall, while a general sale above-stairs earned some $3,000 for the local orchestra's pension fund. Mme. Rethberg, as guest, sang an unfamiliar "Ino Cantata," by Tellemann. Messrs. Guidi and Hans Lange played Bach's D minor concerto for two violins and Mr. Mengelberg ended with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

Two Orchestras Heard in Benefits

TWO major orchestras were heard in benefit concerts at Carnegie Hall yesterday. In the afternoon the Boston Symphony, directed by Sergei Koussevitzky, presented an all-Russian programme, the receipts to be applied to the fund of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc. The list comprised the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Kovantchina," Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko;" Prokofieff's violin concerto; Orchestral Suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," and Tschaikovsky's overture, "1812."

NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Russian Concert Given By Boston Symphony

All-National Program Has Rabinoff as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, gave what was stated to be the first non-subscription benefit concert to be offered in New York by this orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of the work of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc., of which Mrs. Henry P. Loomis is president. The gross receipts were said to be $9,000.

Appropriately for a benefit of this kind, the Russian conductor led his men in an all-Russian program, beginning with the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina," and the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka," with Jesus Maria Sanroma playing the piano part.

Benno Rabinoff, a young violinist who has appeared here as soloist and in recital, played the solo role in Serge Prokofieff's concerto, Op. 10. The performance showed that he has made a marked advance in the last few years, being characterized by distinct technical proficiency and a tone of full, firm and pleasing quality.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's early "musical picture," "Sadko," is not one of Rimsky's greatest works, lacking the richness of color of "Scheherazade," but was timely, in view of the approaching production of the opera of the same name at the Metropolitan this month. Of this opera the much earlier "musical picture" is a forerunner, and its material is incorporated mainly in the sixth tableau of the stage work. Mr. Koussevitzky then closed the program with the familiar warhorse, Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

For the evening's subscription concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Mr. Koussevitzky gave Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, a work new here; an interlude from Strauss's opera "Intermezzo" and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." F. D. P.

NEW YORK
WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Soloist: Povla Frijsh, soprano.

Portsmouth Point.....Walton
Symphony No. 2.....Bax
Canticum Fratris Solis (St. Francis's Hymn to the Sun).....Loeffler
Mme. Frijsh
Bolero.....Ravel

If applause means anything, the audience at last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was bored with the first half of Dr. Koussevitzky's program and enchanted with the second.

This reaction to the creations of two Englishmen, an Alsatian and a Frenchman should prove conclusively that a symphony audience, unlike an army, travels on its nerves. For though the English works were hardly masterpieces and offered many moments of ennui, the "Bolero" of Ravel, which is almost twenty minutes of sheer monotony, nearly drove the subscribers frantic with excitement.

The reason is that Ravel is a psychologist while Mr. Bax—to take the more important of the Englishmen—is not. It is perhaps fair to state that Ravel has only in recent years become cognizant of his onions, for in the old days this sensitive Frenchman was as oblivious of an audience as Mr. Bax is now. But having had his full say, the composer of the string quartet may have come to the conclusion that in these days it is possible to maintain one's place in the sun and yet say nothing—that is, if one has the sense not to overestimate the artistic capacities of paying customers. Given a symphony orchestra, a clever musician who knows the effect of a reiterated, precise rhythm can play the devil with the collective spine of a packed house. Therefore the "Bolero" may be counted on for the present to kill anything that precedes it on a program, from a new symphony by Bax to Beethoven's "Ninth."

The Bax work is, by the way, nothing to sneeze at. If a good deal of it derives from Tschaikowsky and Grieg, it lacks as a whole the sensational element, the planting of effects, the inflated self-assertiveness that are characteristic of most contemporary writing. Mr. Bax, it is evident, desires mightily and sincerely to say things, and if what he says fails to interest, his motives are, at any rate, beyond suspicion.

Mr. Loeffler's hymn is the careful work of a musician and a scholar which does not, it seems to me, quite express the artless ecstacy of St. Francis, whose rhapsody serves it as a text. Miss Povla Frijsh sang the voice part with rare understanding of what it was all about, and at the conclusion of the piece was, in company with Mr. Loeffler and Dr. Koussevitzky, generously acclaimed.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Eugene Goossens

Will conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra in its third concert of season Tuesday night.

Eugene Goossens, Symphony Conductor, Well Known Here

Appeared in Same Capacity Three Years Ago. His Program

BY WARREN STORY SMITH

Eugene Goossens, who conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the Albee Theatre Tuesday evening, needs no introduction to Providence, since he appeared in this city in the same capacity four seasons ago. Of Belgian and English descent, born in England and educated musically at the Bruges Conservatory, Mr. Goossens is a true cosmopolite. As composer he is classed with the younger British school, of which he is a notable representative, but the artistic influences traceable in his music are predominantly Continental. Having acquired at home an enviable reputation as conductor, Mr. Goossens was called to Rochester, N. Y., a few years ago to take charge of the newly formed symphony orchestra in that city. Quite recently Mr. Goossens was honored in Philadelphia, where his opera "Judith" with libretto by Arnold Bennett, produced in London last summer, received its American premiere.

By a curious coincidence the first three numbers on Mr. Goossens's program of next Tuesday evening, Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Schumann's First Symphony and Sibelius's "A Saga," are the three pieces that, in the same order, began a pair of Boston Symphony concerts in 1910 when Max Fiedler, the conductor at that time, introduced to Boston the tone poem of Sibelius, since then unheard in that city, though Mr. Koussevitzky announced it for performance early last autumn.

"A Saga" has no program, but its title gives a clear hint of the character of the music. Which one of the Scandinavian heroic poems the composer had in mind may not be said, but his music is abundantly Northern in feeling, bardic in character. The final episode, in which a clarinet chants over an accompaniment of muted strings and a soft drumstick-roll on a single cymbal, is one of the most striking passages in all the music of this greatest of Finnish composers.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture" belongs to his earlier years, and it and the "Siegfried Idyl" are his only considerable instrumental pieces outside his operas. At the close of Tuesday's program, by the way, the fully matured Wagner of "Die Meistersinger" will be represented by three excerpts from that music drama, making possible an interesting comparison of styles. As a matter of fact, the overture is not wholly of the youthful Wagner, since, like the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and the first scene of "Tannhauser," it received subsequent revision at its composer's hands. "A Faust Overture," which bears the subtitle "Faust in Solitude," was intended as the first of a series of three symphonic movements based on Goethe's poem, but the two companion pieces were never written. Sombre in coloring, brooding and introspective, the overture is an excellent musical character-study and strongly forecasts the later Wagner's remarkable powers in this direction.

In the Introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers," which has place on Mr. Goossens's program, may be found an impressive example of this psychological delineation. Here the "subject" is Hans Sachs, the noble, generous, whole-souled cobbler-poet of Nuremberg. With it the conductor has placed the gay Dance of the Apprentices and the stately processional of the mastersingers, as they march to the contest of song in which Walther's Prize song —beloved of all tenors—is to win for that young nobleman both the coveted admission to the guild of mastersingers and the hand of his lady fair.

The Symphony of Schumann, to discuss last the most pretentious number on the program, is both the first and the freshest of his four efforts in the symphonic form. Later on Schumann was to fill that form with music of riper technical skill, music more truly symphonic in character, but he never recaptured the ardor and enthusiasm that went into the making of this lyrical, impulsive, songful and ardent Symphony in B-flat major, intended by him to be a paean in praise of the vernal season and often called the "Spring" Symphony.

was written in 1924-25, the composer reserved the production for Mr. Koussevitzky, to whom the work is dedicated. The composer has said that "there is absolutely no communicable program associated with the music, which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work."

BROOKLYN
EAGLE

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

English Music at a Boston Symphony Concert—"Tannhaeuser" With Mme. Rethberg.

IN HIS invaluable notes on the program performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, at Carnegie Hall last evening, Philip Hale finds occasion to quote from a review, written by Ernest Newman of William Turner Walton's "Facade," an example of musical jesting which the London critic relished greatly. "Not all of the 'Facade' music came off, it is true," wrote Mr. Newman, "some of it was too imitative of the sort of thing we used to hear in the great days of about 1920, when M. Diaghilew was writing—or at all events signing—those wonderful letters to the papers in which a new scheme of musical values was foreshadowed, Beethoven and Brahms and Elgar being reduced to the status of mere straphangers by the Strawinskys and Saties and Prokofiews and Milhauds of the new dawn."

* * *

Beethoven, Brahms, and Elgar! We do not need the signature of this review to know its origin—such inspired grouping of the great could only be made by Mr. Newman or one of his London colleagues. Only they possess the attribute of character that made it possible: a passionate and proselytizing devotion to all in Britain born and bred. We often encounter, in musical criticism of English authorship, the counterparts of Mr. Newman's phrase, and if they amuse us always, occasionally they afflict us with a becoming sense of shame. For we cannot boast, nor can any American writer upon music, so touching a faith, so courageous an attachment, to the composers of our race and nation: Beethoven, Brahms and MacDowell. Perish the thought! But our British colleagues may cry aloud what angels fear to whisper, for theirs is that generous, blind tolerance for its own of national solidarity.

* * *

Doubtless it makes them happy. They do not seek the English composer—as we seek the American composer. They find him at every turn, a genius potent and fertile. And if elsewhere his reception is less instant and unquestioning than at home, well they know the reason. We know it too—though not, perhaps, the same reason—and our knowledge is today the more certain, since Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra have played for us, as they did last evening, music by Walton and Arnold Bax, musicians of whose superior gifts no doubt exists in England, since they are Englishmen.

* * *

Mr. Bax's Second Symphony received, last evening, its first performance in New York. An earnest and sober work, it confirmed a belief which we have long entertained in the authenticity of its composer's gifts. We have heard relatively little of Bax's music. Many years ago a tone-poem, "November Woods," was played for us by the Boston Orchestra, then under the direction of Mr. Monteux, and more recently a Symphony in E-flat and a second tone-poem, "Tintagel," have been performed in this city. These and the Second Symphony disclose a powerful creative imagination expressing itself in music somber and harsh, crude in its melodic contours, violent in its coloring, always intense, passionate, hieretical, in accent, burdened with tragedy and disaster. Its derivations are obvious but do not matter: Bax's music follows logically, in its style, that of the romantic and the post-romantic composers and represents the development, not the imitation, of their methods. Yet despite all this—its forceful and individual character, its ability, at its best, to overwhelm one with the passion and terror of the artist's conception—it is not great music. In the Second Symphony the mediocrity of the thematic material contrasts sharply with the superb treatment which it receives. One is annoyed by the commonplace profile of Bax's melody, by the triviality of its metrical scheme. This weakens the impression made by the music, all but cancels it, and this is a deplorable thing.

* * *

None the less, the Symphony was well worth hearing, and indeed could be heard again with pleasure and profit. Not so, however, Mr. Walton's overture, "Pourtsmouth Point," a piece whose rowdiness is less delightful than that of Rowlandson. As an exercise in orchestral virtuosity, it did not transcend the abilities of Mr. Koussewitsky's players, who polished it off brilliantly as a curtain-raiser to the Bax Symphony.

Later in the evening Mr. Koussewitsky conducted the second New York performance of Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis," a setting for soprano voice and orchestra of St. Francis' hymn to the sun. The work, which does not represent Mr. Loeffler at his best, was not enhanced by a performance curiously uneven and unsatisfying, in which Mme. Povla Frijsh, a singer whose interpretative skill no longer compensates for her declining vocal powers, was the soloist. Ravel's Bolero, recently introduced here by Mr. Toscanini, concluded the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

TWO ORCHESTRAS IN BENEFIT CONCERTS

Boston Symphony in All-Russian Program Aids Exiles—Philharmonic Helps Pension Fund.

Both the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony gave benefit concerts in Carnegie Hall yesterday, the visiting organization's special matinee producing gross receipts above $9,000, a large part of which will go to the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles.

Conductor Koussevitzky and Manager W. H. Brennan cooperated with Mrs. Henry P. Loomis of the society in not only giving an all-Russian program of absorbing musical interest, but also introducing pictures during an intermission to show the relief work done in collaboration with the High Commission for Refugees, League of Nations and International Anti-Tuberculosis Union.

Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovantchina" introduced the matinee in a popular crescendo leading up to Tchaikovsky's "Overture 1812" with a rising recall for players and conductor. J. M. Sanroma assisted at the piano in Stravinsky's applauded "Petruchka" suite, and Benno Rabinoff gave a notable performance of Prokofieff's violin concerto. Curiosity centred especially on Rimsky-Korsakoff's earliest sketch, Op. 5, for the opera, "Sadko," which is to be produced this month at the Metropolitan.

Mr. Mengelberg and the Philharmonic-Symphony players last evening played for members of their guarantor society, who filled the floor of Carnegie Hall, while a general sale above-stairs earned some $3,000 for the local orchestra's pension fund. Mme. Rethberg, as guest, sang an unfamiliar "Ino Cantata," by Tellemann. Messrs. Guidi and Hans Lange played Bach's D minor concerto for two violins and Mr. Mengelberg ended with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

be applied to the fund of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc. The list comprised the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Kovantchina," Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko;" Prokofieff's violin concerto; Orchestral Suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," and Tschaikovsky's overture, "1812."

NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
Jan 14 1930

Russian Concert Given By Boston Symphony

All-National Program Has Rabinoff as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, gave what was stated to be the first non-subscription benefit concert to be offered in New York by this orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of the work of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc., of which Mrs. Henry P. Loomis is president. The gross receipts were said to be $9,000.

Appropriately for a benefit of this kind, the Russian conductor led his men in an all-Russian program, beginning with the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina," and the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka," with Jesus Maria Sanroma playing the piano part.

Benno Rabinoff, a young violinist who has appeared here as soloist and in recital, played the solo role in Serge Prokofieff's concerto, Op. 10. The performance showed that he has made a marked advance in the last few years, being characterized by distinct technical proficiency and a tone of full, firm and pleasing quality.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's early "musical picture," "Sadko," is not one of Rimsky's greatest works, lacking the richness of color of "Scheherazade," but was timely, in view of the approaching production of the opera of the same name at the Metropolitan this month. Of this opera the much earlier "musical picture" is a forerunner, and its material is incorporated mainly in the sixth tableau of the stage work. Mr. Koussevitzky then closed the program with the familiar warhorse, Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

For the evening's subscription concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Mr. Koussevitzky gave Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Pick-Mangiagalli's "Concert" and Fugue, a work new here; the prelude from Strauss's opera "Ingelheim" and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger."

F. D. P.

NEW YORK
WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Soloist, Povla Frijsh, soprano.

Portsmouth Point.....Walton
Symphony No. 2.....Bax
Canticum Fratris Solis (St. Francis's Hymn to the Sun).....Loeffler
Mme. Frijsh
Bolero.....Ravel

If applause means anything, the audience at last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was bored with the first half of Dr. Koussevitzky's program and enchanted with the second.

This reaction to the creations of two Englishmen, an Alsatian and a Frenchman should prove conclusively that a symphony audience, unlike an army, travels on its nerves. For though the English works were hardly masterpieces and offered many moments of ennui, the "Bolero" of Ravel, which is almost twenty minutes of sheer monotony, nearly drove the subscribers frantic with excitement.

The reason is that Ravel is a psychologist while Mr. Bax—to take the more important of the Englishmen—is not. It is perhaps fair to state that Ravel has only in recent years become cognizant of his onions, for in the old days this sensitive Frenchman was as oblivious of an audience as Mr. Bax is now. But having had his full say, the composer of the string quartet may have come to the conclusion that in these days it is possible to maintain one's place in the sun and yet say nothing—that is, if one has the sense not to overestimate the artistic capacities of paying customers. Given a symphony orchestra, a clever musician who knows the effect of a reiterated, precise rhythm can play the devil with the collective spine of a packed house. Therefore the "Bolero" may be counted on for the present to kill anything that precedes it on a program, from a new symphony by Bax to Beethoven's "Ninth."

The Bax work is, by the way, nothing to sneeze at. If a good deal of it derives from Tschaikowsky and Grieg, it lacks as a whole the sensational element, the planting of effects, the inflated self-assertiveness that are characteristic of most contemporary writing. Mr. Bax, it is evident, desires mightily and sincerely to say things, and if what he says fails to interest, his motives are, at any rate, beyond suspicion.

Mr. Loeffler's hymn is the careful work of a musician and a scholar which does not, it seems to me, quite express the artless ecstacy of St. Francis, whose rhapsody serves it as a text. Miss Povla Frijsh sang the voice part with rare understanding of what it was all about, and at the conclusion of the piece was, in company with Mr. Loeffler and Dr. Koussevitzky, generously acclaimed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CHEERED BY THRONG

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts One of the Most Brilliant Concerts of the Season.

TWO NOVELTIES ARE GIVEN

William Turner Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point," and a Symphony by Arnold Bax.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, last night in Carnegie Hall was one of the most brilliant that has been given in New York this season—brilliant for the music that it offered as well as for the manner in which this music was played, using the word "brilliant" in the sense of a conspicuously successful occasion. The audience listened with an attention and responsiveness that were atmospheric. It recalled a certain composer—Charles Martin Loeffler—and a certain singer—Mme. Povla Frisch—and, needless to say, Mr. Koussevitzky, time and again. It would not have enough of them, and it cheered the worst performance of the evening, which was that of Ravel's "Bolero," produced by Mr. Toscanini earlier this season. But this was only one of the four items of a program of which the three others rivaled each other in interest of various kinds. It was a memorable evening.

The two first compositions were new to audiences in this city. They were William Turner Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point," and a new symphony "in E minor and C" by Arnold Bax, which the composer has not heard yet, since the work, dedicated to Mr. Koussvitzky, was performed for the first time anywhere on the 13th of last month in Boston, and, we believe, was played for the first time outside of Boston last night. This is a symphony of conspicuously original character, and, so far as one could judge from a score which was entirely a new experience, it was magnificently interpreted. But there was even more to come in the surpassing performance of Mr. Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," after St. Francis of Assisi, a performance which resulted in the greatest public triumph of Mr. Loeffler that this writer has witnessed. For once, so far as visible signs and tokens were concerned, he received his due. He has always had a devoted following consisting of an inner circle especially perceptive and responsive to his distinguished art. Last night an immense audience rendered him unstinted homage.

If the editor of the Boston Symphony program book did not inform us of the inspiration of Walton's ripping and salty overture, we would have more than a fair idea of the picture in his mind from the character of his music. It is extremely lively, very funny, and its recklessness is essentially British. The composer's imaginative point of departure was a print by the Englishman, Thomas Rowlandson, of old Portsmouth Point in the old days when England was fighting and trading with most of the world: the harbor, chock-a-block with wooden ships; the choked, dirty, disordered streets, lined with dens and rum-shops; sailors and their girls, officers and bearers and baggage pouring in from or out to the ships in the anchor; and the fighting, the boozing, the racket.

All this is in the music, which has a glorious and unbuttoned gusto. We do not know the Rowlandson prints, but it seems that their caricature could not be more spirited or spontaneous than Walton's. How salty it is, how refreshing in its Rabelaisian audacity after the pink-tea purity and polite jests of a Sullivan or other polite English composer of the mauve decade. This music has race in it, and this laughter is the laughter of a man. And how far more genuine and contagious than the smart ironies of a Lord Berners or another composer of sophisticated satire. Why, by the way, do our modern music societies, such as the League of Composers, not let us hear such a piece as Walton's "Façade," which is sung to orchestral accompaniment through a megaphone stuck in the mouth of a big face painted on a curtain. When he heard that, Mr. Ernest Newman waved his umbrella and cheered. There is something in the composer of "Portsmouth Point."

Nothing could have stood in more striking contrast to the vigorous jesting of Walton than the long, darkly colored, runic symphony of Arnold Bax. It is not important that his new symphony happens to be written in the modern harmonic vein, that it combines keys as well as chords, that it employs deep and black tints of the orchestra as a background for the ancestral utterances of the instruments. The important thing is the mood of the music, and the steel that has come into the expression of the composer. The thought of Bax as we have known him, is synonmous with the thought of a glamorous Celticism.

This symphony, in turn, is Celtic with a celticism that is heroic and profound. A great sword flashes against a background of wild and desolate nature. Winds sweep and flay the earth, thunders prophecy doom. Old chants are heard, old defiances and lamentations. But this, one believes, is rather a word precipitated by communion with nature rather than a specific poetic program. The symphony is free of title or program. The listener may give his own imagination free course to range as it will through Bax' pages. If the composer had specific thoughts in mind, they do not concern or shacktle us as listeners, and the best that is in his music springs from a source much deeper and older than that of any conscious thinking.

It is true that this symphony is too long, and that some passages of development might well be pruned and the whole piece pulled together. It is also true that the score is not devoid of the suggestion of effort on the part of the creator; effort in the sense that he girds his loins to deal with great things and abjure soft as fetty. This score is important in itself, and it should be the prelude to greater ones. The symphony shows a Bax growing in power as well as fantasy, and with eyes fixed on distant peaks.

Mr. Loeffler's beautiful and exalted setting of St. Francis's Hymn to the Sun has been heard before in this city. Last night's performance, which was irresistably eloquent from beginning to end, and the illuminative familiarity which it fostered with the music, gave those who listened a better understanding than they could have had before of the composition. Its prevailing mood was felt more deeply, its details could not have been more clearly or exquisitely revealed. Mr. Loeffler has used motives of plain-chant as a natural speech, transforming them or fitting them at will to his expressive purpose.

He has found for the voice a melodic line of a sheer loveliness and simplicity which fittingly clothe the text. The orchestration is exceptionally transparent, and a sensuousness which is a part of Mr. Loeffler's temperament is apotheoized in certain exultant passages when the instruments enter with a sweep and glory of color that never cloys or makes flgesh of the exquisite verse. The composition is a purification of conception and of style, the mature and alembicated produce of all the best elements of Mr. Loeffler's art.

These qualities found ideal expression from the orchestra which Mr. Koussvitzky moulded to the finest line and the subtlest nuance, and in Mme. Frisch's masterly treatment of musical line and text. Always an interpreter first, and a vocalist afterwards, she was in exceptional voice, and in her tones were the same transparencies and the same ecstatic gentleness that ferments text and music. There was a rare harmony of all the factors necessary to the finest interpretation, the effect of which was shown by the response of the audience.

Per contra, the performance of Ravel's "Bolero" was unfortunately self-conscious, unnecessarily stiff in rhythm, hard and dry in its sonorities, and, even technically, under the level of the rest of the concert, in which its orchestra played with exemplary finish and brilliancy of effect. However, Ravel's workmanship and wizardry in th employment of instruments, carried him to victory.

BROOKLYN
CITIZEN

Boston Orchestra to Give Brahms Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Sarge Koussevitzky, conductor, announces a Brahms Festival on a large scale to be given in the orchestra's own city on March 21-26.

In this week of special concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky will present the principal orchestral, choral and chamber works of the German master. The orchestra will be assisted by the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe Colleges; Arthur Schnabel, the German pianist, who is crossing from Europe for the occasion; the singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Jeannette Vreeland and Fraser Gange, and the Burgin String Quartet.

The purely orchestral works to be played include the Four Symphonies, the Academic Festival Overture, and the Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Choral works announced are "A German Requiem," "A Song of Destiny," the Liebeslieder Waltzes, and the Rhapsody for alto and male chorus Schnabel will appear with the orchestra in the two piano concertos, and likewise on the chamber music program which is to include works for piano solo, a violin sonata, and the Quintet in F minor.

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
JAN 1 C 19

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

THE experiment of devoting an entire program to living composers was undertaken last night at Carnegie Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The result was, in quality as well as performance, one of the best concerts of the season. For the creative artists represented included Arnold Bax, Charles Martin Loeffler, who was present, and Maurice Ravel, whose "Bolero," the most sensational new work of the year, roused a capacity audience to the usual pandemonium.

Mr. Koussevitzky began the evening with an overture, "Portsmouth Point," by William Turner Walton, a youthful Englishman, whose work was chosen to represent Great Britain in the International Festival at Zurich during 1926. The title is taken from a print by the caricaturist, Thomas Rowlandson, of a quayside a century ago, with tippling sailors and their drabs, gold-laced officers, scuffling hooligans, a wooden-legged fiddler, a lady in a sedan chair and a background of sea and ships. This bustling and unhallowed scene was rendered into tones with a rollicking paganism and a spree of rhythms which brought spontaneous applause. But it was music solely of externals, and as such, despite its flashing vivacity, essentially cold and repellent.

But it was at the springs of spiritual beauty that Mr. Bax sought inspiration for his Symphony in E Minor and C Major, No. 2, which enjoyed at this concert its first hearing in New York, the "world premiere" having occurred in Boston, under Mr. Koussevitzky, on Dec. 13 last. The score, published in 1929, is dedicated to the Bostonian leader.

Even at first hearing, the symphony towered forth as an extraordinary work. Unlike many present-day compositions, it is rich in material and requires no padding to mask a poverty of ideas. Not often do we hear to-day a new work of a fabric so compact and closely reasoned. The use of the orchestra was masterly in its handling both of color and splendor. One characteristic was a superb employment of the very lowest tones of the tuba and trombones, and rarely is the entrance of the organ so dramatic as when its diapason tubes, literally shaking the hall, reinforced and deepened these abysmal voices.

But the work possessed far more than technical brilliance and originality. It was informed throughout by a singularly poetic imagination, rising at moments to something resembling lyric genius. This was particularly true of the slow movement, and in the finale, labeled "Allegro feroce," there emerged a surprising fairy-like scene, as delicate and fanciful as a Celtic legend. By every sign, the composition met with a most favorable reception. Its performance was one of highest credit to Mr. Koussevitsky and his colleagues. Since Mr. Toscanini's departure, I have not heard a brass choir treated with the power and mellowness attained by the Boston players. Where there might readily have been shattering noise, Mr. Koussevitsky wielded the secret of force with restraint.

After the intermission came Mr. Loeffler's setting of the "Canticle of the Sun," after the famous hymn of St. Francis of Assisi, which was composed for the opening of the New Chamber Music Hall in the Library of Congress at Washington, presented to the Nation by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. At the first performance, on Oct. 28, 1925, Mme. Povla Frijsh was the soloist, as she was again last night. After a resplendent performance, both by the soprano and the orchestra, there appeared upon the platform a slender, scholarly figure—that of Mr. Loeffler, now ending his 69th year. Twice he bowed with Mr. Koussevitzky and Mme. Frijsh, and then came forth alone. He might have returned many times more, for the audience was eager to pay its homage to the creator of the fine and distinguished beauty which still echoed about the walls.

Finally came the "Bolero," which was introduced in this country by Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 14 last. Mr. Koussevitzky began it more slowly and more softly than his Italian colleague—the snare drum, with its incessant metrical pattern, was at first almost inaudible. The Boston chieftain also built up the crescendo with less rapidity. But whereas, with Mr. Toscanini, the work remained an innocent if refulgent show piece, with Mr. Koussevitzky it became drenched with sensuous languors which ascended to the most thunderous orgies of passion. It should be added that Mr. Toscanini's soloists in this number were far more reliable than some of those in the Boston Orchestra, particularly the saxophone players and French horn.

No one could be expected to consider seriously such a production of "Carmen" as was put forward by the American Opera Company last night at the Casino Theatre. The frisking and romping that went on during the first two acts of this burlesque of Bizet's masterpiece might easily have been mistaken for a New Year's Eve jollification in a Broadway cabaret.

Of the type of singing and acting demanded, the youthful aggregation knew virtually nothing. Bettina Hall, intrusted with the title role, made her entrance by climbing out of a window, after which she writhed and sidled through the "Habanera" like a stepper in a popular revue. Charles Hedley, as Don Jose, like the rest of the soldiery, sported a uniform of blue and lavender velvet. It would be a futile task to chronicle his activities in the part, or the immature wrestlings of Nancy McCord with the difficulties of Micaela's music, or the astonishing idea of the duties of Escamillo disclosed by Willard Schindler, who might have been mistaken for the hero of a Wild West movie. What went on behind the footlights was no more extraordinary than the rough-shod accompaniment issuing from the orchestra pit, where Isaac Van Grove unleashed some strikingly unconventional notions concerning tempi.

NOEL STRAUS.

NEW YORK
WORLD
JAN 1 9 1930

Brahms Festival
March 21 in Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, announces a Brahms Festival on a large scale, to be given in the orchestra's own city March 21-26.

In this week of special concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will present the principal orchestral, choral and chamber works of the German master. The orchestra will be assisted by the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe Colleges; Artur Schnabel, the German pianist who is crossing from Europe for the occasion; the singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Jeannette Vreeland and Fraser Gange, and the Burgin String Quartet.

The purely orchestral works to be played include the Four Symphonies, the Academic Festival Overture and the Variations on a Theme, by Haydn.

Choral works announced are "A German Requiem," "A Song of Destiny," the Liebeslieder Waltzes and the Rhapsody for Alto with male chorus. Schnabel will appear with the orchestra in the two piano concertos, and likewise on the chamber music program, which is to include works for piano solo; a violin sonata and the Quintet in F Minor.

On its third visit of the season to New York, the Boston Orchestra will change the date of its Thursday evening concert to next Friday evening, Feb. 7, in Carnegie Hall.

At this and also at the Saturday matinee concert, Feb. 8, Serge Prokofieff will be the guest soloist, appearing with the orchestra in his Piano Concerto No. 2. At the Friday night concert Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Prokofieff's Scythian Suite. He will open the program with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and close it with three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

At the matinee concert, in addition to Prokofieff's concerto, the Second Symphony of Bax in E Minor and C, which was previously played at the evening concert, will be repeated in this series. It will be preceded by Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point." De Falla's dances will likewise close this program.

MU
Herald Jan 18

GLAZOUNOV

By PHILIP HALE

Alexander Glazounov conducted yesterday, as a guest, the 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program comprized his Sixth Symphony; violin concerta (Benno Rabinoff, violinist); Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin."

Those who are fond of dividing a composer's musical life into periods will note that there was an interval of 11 years between the symphonic poem written when Glazounov was 20 years old, and about 10 years between the composition of the symphony (1896) and the violin concerto (1905); "Stenka Razin" is among the works that one might call pictorial-descriptive, suggested by Nature, or historical and legendary. To say that such works, as "Stenka Razin," "The Kremlin" "The Forest," "The Sea" are "romantic" while the symphony and the concerto are "classic," would be wrong; classical compositions may be romantic, not dryly academic. A wildly romantic work, romantic in the judgment of those hearing its early performances often becomes in later years acknowledged as "classic." Thus the foolish think to pay it honor, though the musical contents have remained the same. The symphony performed yesterday is as romantic and as imaginative as the symphonic poem. The former has no "program"; the latter is an illustration in tones of a legendary historical event; but the latter does not depend for enjoyment wholly on the fantastic tale. As for the concerto, it is a romantic piece for a virtuoso performance; but not written for the empty and vainglorious display of an accomplished violinist; not primarily planned as an applause trap; in fact the cadenza in which the violinist is expected to shine and "bring down the house" is the least interesting portion of the work, except possibly to violinists regarding first of all technical ingenuity on the part of the composer and technical proficiency on the part of the player.

Glazounov was congratulated by some of his Russian co-mates for abandoning pictorial and descriptive music and devoting himself to what they called "classic form." Whether they accepted his gorgeously orchestrated ballets is not known to us. His love of the ballet is hinted at in the Intermezzo of the Sixth symphony and even in the finale: but not in a too light, flippant and "popular" manner for symphonic dignity. This symphony is as conspicuous for melodic wealth as for contrapuntal skill, and cunning of instrumentation. The melodic lines are frank and appealing, as is the theme for the variations in the second movement; melodic material, which, often simple in itself, is developed by one well-versed in composition, who does not allow knowledge to choke beauty. When a man reads "Theme With Variations" on a program he trembles; he is prepared for the worst and steels himself not to express boredom, but keep a facial showing of reasonable interest and intelligence. Even when Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" is performed, one finds oneslf wondering how long it will be before the whole theme will be revealed in its splendid nudity. These variations by Glazounov are a delight from first to last; truly varied, admirably contrasted; orchestrated in a surprising and fascinating manner; the technical skill displayed serves only to enhance the euphonious and poetic charm. The first movement, with its mysterious opening arouses anticipation for a tragic, or heroic mood, which is interrupted only by the suavity and tenderness of the expressive song theme. And here as in the Variations and the following pages with the changing tempi and rhythmic devices is the abundant reason for the reputation that Glazounov enjoys of being a master of his art.

From a purely technical standpoint, the pedant might justly say that "Stenka Razin" is not to be ranked with the symphony or the concerto; but who would have this musical story of the Volga's savage ruler, the Persian Princess and Stenka's supreme sacrifice told differently? Here we have the wild irregularity that Bacon, discussing "Beauty," found necessary.

Mr. Rabinoff of New York played the concerto, introduced here by Mr. Zimbalist 18 years ago, and revived by Mr. Burgin early in 1927. The youth of the violinist, the honesty of his performance with an emotional quality that was within the bounds of the concerto, and the music itself, won instant and hearty recognition.

Mr. Glazounov conducted simply and modestly but none the less effectively. The orchestra responded affectionately, not merely respectfully, to his directions. It was a pleasure to see on the platform of Symphony hall a man interested in his music, but not parading it; appreciating the desire of the orchestra to further his wishes; apparently unconscious of the fact that his name and his works have been honored for many years in the whole world of music.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Eugene Goossens, as a guest, will conduct the concert of next week. Wagner, a "Faust" overture. Schumann, Symphony B flat major, No. 1. Goossens, Concertino for double String-Orchestra (1st time in Boston). Respighi, Roman Festivals (1st time in Boston).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
JAN 1 0 1930

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CHEERED BY THRONG

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts One of the Most Brilliant Concerts of the Season.

TWO NOVELTIES ARE GIVEN

William Turner Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point," and a Symphony by Arnold Bax.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, last night in Carnegie Hall was one of the most brilliant that has been given in New York this season—brilliant for the music that it offered as well as for the manner in which this music was played, using the word "brilliant" in the sense of a conspicuously successful occasion. The audience listened with an attention and responsiveness that were atmospheric. It recalled a certain composer—Charles Martin Loeffler—and a certain singer—Mme. Poyla Frisch—and, needless to say, Mr. Koussevitzky, time and again. It would not have enough of them, and it cheered the worst performance of the evening, which was that of Ravel's "Bolero," produced by Mr. Toscanini earlier this season. But this was only one of the four items of a program of which the three others rivaled each other in interest of various kinds. It was a memorable evening.

The two first compositions were new to audiences in this city. They were William Turner Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point," and a new symphony "in E minor and C" by Arnold Bax, which the composer has not heard yet, since the work, dedicated to Mr. Koussvitzky, was performed for the first time anywhere on the 13th of last month in Boston, and, we believe, was played for the first time outside of Boston last night. This is a symphony of conspicuously original character, and, so far as one could judge from a score which was entirely a new experience, it was magnificently interpreted. But there was even more to come in the surpassing performance of Mr. Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," after St. Francis of Assisi, a performance which resulted in the greatest public triumph of Mr. Loeffler that this writer has witnessed. For once, so far as visible signs and tokens were concerned, he received his due. He has always had a devoted following consisting of an inner circle especially perceptive and responsive to his distinguished art. Last night an immense audience rendered him unstinted homage.

If the editor of the Boston Symphony program book did not inform us of the inspiration of Walton's ripping and salty overture, we would have more than a fair idea of the picture in his mind from the character of his music. It is extremely lively, very funny, and its recklessness is essentially British. The composer's imaginative point of departure was a print by the Englishman, Thomas Rowlandson, of old Portsmouth Point in the old days when England was fighting and trading with most of the world: the harbor, chock-a-block with wooden ships; the choked, dirty, disordered streets, lined with dens and rum-shops; sailors and their girls, officers and bearers and baggage pouring in from or out to the ships in the anchor; and the fighting, the boozing, the racket.

All this is in the music, which has a glorious and unbuttoned gusto. We do not know the Rowlandson prints, but it seems that their caricature could not be more spirited or spontaneous than Walton's. How salty it is, how refreshing in its Rabelaisian audacity after the pink-tea purity and polite jests of a Sullivan or other polite English composer of the mauve decade. This music has race in it, and this laughter is the laughter of a man. And how far more genuine and contagious than the smart ironies of a Lord Berners or another composer of sophisticated satire. Why, by the way, do our modern music societies, such as the League of Composers, not let us hear such a piece as Walton's "Façade," which is sung to orchestral accompaniment through a megaphone stuck in the mouth of a big face painted on a curtain. When he heard that, Mr. Ernest Newman waved his umbrella and cheered. There is something in the composer of "Portsmouth Point."

Nothing could have stood in more striking contrast to the vigorous jesting of Walton than the long, darkly colored, runic symphony of Arnold Bax. It is not important that his new symphony happens to be written in the modern harmonic vein, that it combines keys as well as chords, that it employs deep and black tints of the orchestra as a background for the ancestral utterances of the instruments. The important thing is the mood of the music, and the steel that has come into the expression of the composer. The thought of Bax as we have known him, is synonmous with the thought of a glamorous Celticism.

This symphony, in turn, is Celtic with a celticism that is heroic and profound. A great sword flashes against a background of wild and desolate nature. Winds sweep and flay the earth, thunders prophecy doom. Old chants are heard, old defiances and lamentations. But this, one believes, is rather a word precipitated by communion with nature rather than a specific poetic program. The symphony is free of title or program. The listener may give his own imagination free course to range as it will through Bax's pages. If the composer had specific thoughts in mind, they do not concern or shacktle us as listeners, and the best that is in his music springs from a source much deeper and older than that of any conscious thinking.

It is true that this symphony is too long, and that some passages of development might well be pruned and the whole piece pulled together. It is also true that the score is not devoid of the suggestion of effort on the part of the creator; effort in the sense that he girds his loins to deal with great things and abjure soft affetty. This score is important in itself, and it should be the prelude to greater ones. The symphony shows a Bax growing in power as well as fantasy, and with eyes fixed on distant peaks.

Mr. Loeffler's beautiful and exalted setting of St. Francis's Hymn to the Sun has been heard before in this city. Last night's performance, which was irresistably eloquent from beginning to end, and the illuminative familiarity which it fostered with the music, gave those who listened a better understanding than they could have had before of the composition. Its prevailing mood was felt more deeply, its details could not have been more clearly or exquisitely revealed. Mr. Loeffler has used motives of plain-chant as a natural speech, transforming them or fitting them at will to his expressive purpose.

He has found for the voice a melodic line of a sheer loveliness and simplicity which fittingly clothe the text. The orchestration is exceptionally transparent, and a sensuousness which is a part of Mr. Loeffler's temperament is apotheoized in certain exultant passages when the instruments enter with a sweep and glory of color that never cloys or makes figesh of the exquisite verse. The composition is a purification of conception and of style, the mature and alembicated produce of all the best elements of Mr. Loeffler's art.

These qualities found ideal expression from the orchestra which Mr. Koussvitzky moulded to the finest line and the subtlest nuance, and in Mme. Frisch's masterly treatment of musical line and text. Always an interpreter first, and a vocalist afterwards, she was in exceptional voice, and in her tones were the same transparencies and the same ecstatic gentleness that ferments text and music. There was a rare harmony of all the factors necessary to the finest interpretation, the effect of which was shown by the response of the audience.

Per contra, the performance of Ravel's "Bolero" was unfortunately self-conscious, unnecessarily stiff in rhythm, hard and dry in its sonorities, and, even technically, under the level of the rest of the concert, in which its orchestra played with exemplary finish and brilliancy of effect. However, Ravel's workmanship and wizardry in th employment of instruments, carried him to victory.

BROOKLYN
CITIZEN

Boston Orchestra to Give Brahms Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Sarge Koussevitzky, conductor, announces a Brahms Festival on a large scale to be given in the orchestra's own city on March 21-26.

In this week of special concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky will present the principal orchestral, choral and chamber works of the German master. The orchestra will be assisted by the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe Colleges; Arthur Schnabel, the German pianist, who is crossing from Europe for the occasion; the singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Jeannette Vreeland and Fraser Gange, and the Burgin String Quartet.

The purely orchestral works to be played include the Four Symphonies, the Academic Festival Overture, and the Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Choral works announced are "A German Requiem," "A Song of Destiny," the Liebeslieder Waltzes, and the Rhapsody for alto and male chorus Schnabel will appear with the orchestra in the two piano concertos, and likewise on the chamber music program which is to include works for piano solo, a violin sonata, and the Quintet in F minor.

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
JAN 1 C 1930

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

THE experiment of devoting an entire program to living composers was undertaken last night at Carnegie Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The result was, in quality as well as performance, one of the best concerts of the season. For the creative artists represented included Arnold Bax, Charles Martin Loeffler, who was present, and Maurice Ravel, whose "Bolero," the most sensational new work of the year, roused a capacity audience to the usual pandemonium.

Mr. Koussevitzky began the evening with an overture, "Portsmouth Point," by William Turner Walton, a youthful Englishman, whose work was chosen to represent Great Britain in the International Festival at Zurich during 1926. The title is taken from a print by the caricaturist, Thomas Rowlandson, of a quayside a century ago, with tippling sailors and their drabs, gold-laced officers, scuffling hooligans, a wooden-legged fiddler, a lady in a sedan chair and a background of sea and ships. This bustling and unhallowed scene was rendered into tones with a rollicking paganism and a spree of rhythms which brought spontaneous applause. But it was music solely of externals, and as such, despite its flashing vivacity, essentially cold and repellent.

But it was at the springs of spiritual beauty that Mr. Bax sought inspiration for his Symphony in E Minor and C Major, No. 2, which enjoyed at this concert its first hearing in New York, the "world premiere" having occurred in Boston, under Mr. Koussevitzky, on Dec. 13 last. The score, published in 1929, is dedicated to the Bostonian leader.

Even at first hearing, the symphony towered forth as an extraordinary work. Unlike many present-day compositions, it is rich in material and requires no padding to mask a poverty of ideas. Not often do we hear to-day a new work of a fabric so compact and closely reasoned. The use of the orchestra was masterly in its handling both of color and splendor. One characteristic was a superb employment of the very lowest tones of the tuba and trombones, and rarely is the entrance of the organ so dramatic as when its diapason tubes, literally shaking the hall, reinforced and deepened these abysmal voices.

But the work possessed far more than technical brilliance and originality. It was informed throughout by a singularly poetic imagination, rising at moments to something resembling lyric genius. This was particularly true of the slow movement, and in the finale, labeled "Allegro feroce," there emerged a surprising fairy-like scene, as delicate and fanciful as a Celtic legend. By every sign, the composition met with a most favorable reception. Its performance was one of highest credit to Mr. Koussevitsky and his colleagues. Since Mr. Toscanini's departure, I have not heard a brass choir treated with the power and mellowness attained by the Boston players. Where there might readily have been shattering noise, Mr. Koussevitsky wielded the secret of force with restraint.

After the intermission came Mr. Loeffler's setting of the "Canticle of the Sun," after the famous hymn of St. Francis of Assisi, which was composed for the opening of the New Chamber Music Hall in the Library of Congress at Washington, presented to the Nation by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. At the first performance, on Oct. 28, 1925, Mme. Povla Frijsh was the soloist, as she was again last night. After a resplendent performance, both by the soprano and the orchestra, there appeared upon the platform a slender, scholarly figure—that of Mr. Loeffler, now ending his 69th year. Twice he bowed with Mr. Koussevitzky and Mme. Frijsh, and then came forth alone. He might have returned many times more, for the audience was eager to pay its homage to the creator of the fine and distinguished beauty which still echoed about the walls.

Finally came the "Bolero," which was introduced in this country by Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 14 last. Mr. Koussevitzky began it more slowly and more softly than his Italian colleague—the snare drum, with its incessant metrical pattern, was at first almost inaudible. The Boston chieftain also built up the crescendo with less rapidity. But whereas, with Mr. Toscanini, the work remained an innocent if refulgent show piece, with Mr. Koussevitzky it became drenched with sensuous languors which ascended to the most thunderous orgies of passion. It should be added that Mr. Toscanini's soloists in this number were far more reliable than some of those in the Boston Orchestra, particularly the saxophone players and French horn.

No one could be expected to consider seriously such a production of "Carmen" as was put forward by the American Opera Company last night at the Casino Theatre. The frisking and romping that went on during the first two acts of this burlesque of Bizet's masterpiece might easily have been mistaken for a New Year's Eve jollification in a Broadway cabaret.

Of the type of singing and acting demanded, the youthful aggregation knew virtually nothing. Bettina Hall, intrusted with the title role, made her entrance by climbing out of a window, after which she writhed and sidled through the "Habanera" like a stepper in a popular revue. Charles Hedley, as Don Jose, like the rest of the soldiery, sported a uniform of blue and lavender velvet. It would be a futile task to chronicle his activities in the part, or the immature wrestlings of Nancy McCord with the difficulties of Micaela's music, or the astonishing idea of the duties of Escamillo disclosed by Willard Schindler, who might have been mistaken for the hero of a Wild West movie. What went on behind the footlights was no more extraordinary than the rough-shod accompaniment issuing from the orchestra pit, where Isaac Van Grove unleashed some strikingly unconventional notions concerning tempi.

NOEL STRAUS.

NEW YORK
WORLD
1930

Brahms Festival
March 21 in Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, announces a Brahms Festival on a large scale, to be given in the orchestra's own city March 21-26.

In this week of special concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will present the principal orchestral, choral and chamber works of the German master. The orchestra will be assisted by the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe Colleges; Artur Schnabel, the German pianist who is crossing from Europe for the occasion; the singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Jeannette Vreeland and Fraser Gange, and the Burgin String Quartet.

The purely orchestral works to be played include the Four Symphonies, the Academic Festival Overture and the Variations on a Theme, by Haydn.

Choral works announced are "A German Requiem," "A Song of Destiny," the Liebeslieder Waltzes and the Rhapsody for Alto with male chorus. Schnabel will appear with the orchestra in the two piano concertos, and likewise on the chamber music program, which is to include works for piano solo, a violin sonata and the Quintet in F Minor.

On its third visit of the season to New York, the Boston Orchestra will change the date of its Thursday evening concert to next Friday evening, Feb. 7, in Carnegie Hall.

At this and also at the Saturday matinee concert, Feb. 8, Serge Prokofieff will be the guest soloist, appearing with the orchestra in his Piano Concerto No. 2. At the Friday night concert Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Prokofieff's Scythian Suite. He will open the program with Mozart's "Eine K[illegible] Nachtmusik" and close it with t[illegible] from De Falla's ballet, "[illegible]ered Hat."

[illegible] concert, in addition [illegible] Second [illegible] C, [illegible] flute [illegible] players, singers, harpists [illegible] flute in short tunics, singers of dancing [illegible] time for a chorus of dancing [illegible] clapping hands to [illegible]

MUSIC

Herald Jan 18

GLAZOUNOV

By PHILIP HALE

Alexander Glazounov conducted yesterday, as a guest, the 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program comprized his Sixth Symphony; violin concerta (Benno Rabinoff, violinist); Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin."

Those who are fond of dividing a composer's musical life into periods will note that there was an interval of 11 years between the symphonic poem written when Glazounov was 20 years old, and about 10 years between the composition of the symphony (1896) and the violin concerto (1905). "Stenka Razin" is among the works that one might call pictorial-descriptive, suggested by Nature, or historical and legendary. To say that such works, as "Stenka Razin," "The Kremlin" "The Forest," "The Sea" are "romantic" while the symphony and the concerto are "classic," would be wrong; classical compositions may be romantic, not dryly academic. A wildly romantic work, romantic in the judgment of those hearing its early performances often becomes in later years acknowledged as "classic." Thus the foolish think to pay it honor, though the musical contents have remained the same. The symphony performed yesterday is as romantic and as imaginative as the symphonic poem. The former has no "program"; the latter is an illustration in tones of a legendary historical event; but the latter does not depend for enjoyment wholly on the fantastic tale. As for the concerto, it is a romantic piece for a virtuoso performance; but not written for the empty and vainglorious display of an accomplished violinist; not primarily planned as an applause trap; in fact the cadenza in which the violinist is expected to shine and "bring down the house" is the least interesting portion of the work, except possibly to violinists regarding first of all technical ingenuity on the part of the composer and technical proficiency on the part of the player.

Glazounov was congratulated by some of his Russian co-mates for abandoning pictorial and descriptive music and devoting himself to what they called "classic form." Whether they accepted his gorgeously orchestrated ballets is not known to us. His love of the ballet is hinted at in the Intermezzo of the Sixth symphony and even in the finale: but not in a too light, flippant and "popular" manner for symphonic dignity. This symphony is as conspicuous for melodic wealth as for contrapuntal skill, and cunning of instrumentation. The melodic lines are frank and appealing, as is the theme for the variations in the second movement; melodic material, which, often simple in itself, is developed by one well-versed in composition, who does not allow knowledge to choke beauty. When a man reads "Theme With Variations" on a program he trembles; he is prepared for the worst and steels himself not to express boredom, but keep a facial showing of reasonable interest and intelligence. Even when Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" is performed, one finds oneslf wondering how long it will be before the whole theme will be revealed in its splendid nudity. These variations by Glazounov are a delight from first to last; truly varied, admirably contrasted; orchestrated in a surprising and fascinating manner; the technical skill displayed serves only to enhance the euphonious and poetic charm. The first movement, with its mysterious opening arouses anticipation for a tragic, or heroic mood, which is interrupted only by the suavity and tenderness of the expressive song theme. And here as in the Variations and the following pages with the changing tempi and rhythmic devices is the abundant reason for the reputation that Glazounov enjoys of being a master of his art.

From a purely technical standpoint, the pedant might justly say that "Stenka Razin" is not to be ranked with the symphony or the concerto; but who would have this musical story of the Volga's savage ruler, the Persian Princess and Stenka's supreme sacrifice told differently? Here we have the wild irregularity that Bacon, discussing "Beauty," found necessary.

Mr. Rabinoff of New York played the concerto, introduced here by Mr. Zimbalist 18 years ago, and revived by Mr. Burgin early in 1927. The youth of the violinist, the honesty of his performance with an emotional quality that was within the bounds of the concerto, and the music itself, won instant and hearty recognition.

Mr. Glazounov conducted simply and modestly but none the less effectively. The orchestra responded affectionately, not merely respectfully, to his directions. It was a pleasure to see on the platform of Symphony hall a man interested in his music, but not parading it; appreciating the desire of the orchestra to further his wishes; apparently unconscious of the fact that his name and his works have been honored for many years in the whole world of music.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Eugene Goossens, as a guest, will conduct the concert of next week. Wagner, a "Faust" overture. Schumann, Symphony B flat major, No. 1. Goossens, Concertino for double String-Orchestra (1st time in Boston). Respighi, Roman Festivals (1st time in Boston).

TELEGRAM

32 JAN 1 0 193

Walton, Bax, Loeffler, Ravel Make Boston Symphony Program

Povla Frijsh Is Soloist in "The Song of Brother Sun" After St. Francis.

By PITTS SANBORN.

On a second visit for this season to Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, honored living Englishmen in the first half of its program yesterday evening. William Turner Walton's overture "Portsmouth Point" opened proceedings. There followed the local "premiere" of Arnold Bax's second symphony, which had had its first performance anywhere last month in Boston, naturally by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Walton's overture, performed with infectious spirit, again impressed one as a jolly work, good enough fun in the hearing, but of no particular importance. It was inspired by Thomas Rowlandson's print, published in 1814, depicting the hurly-burly at Portsmouth Point when all the world was at war.

As a matter of fact, Charles G. Harper's description of the picture in "The Portsmouth Road: The Sailors' Highway" is a more vivid rendering of the tumultuous scene than the Walton music.

In Celtic Twilight.

Mr. Bax's rhapsodic symphony springs from an antithetical England—an England that has known the Celtic twilight. Mr. Bax is a lyrist, unashamed in his romanticism, courageous in emotional expression. His symphony at a single hearing seemed not to sin through omission. But it is a work that deserves repeated hearings. The orchestral performance, here as in the overture, was magnificent.

After an intermission the program offered further Charles Martin Loeffler's "Song of Brother Sun," based on the canticle attributed to St. Francis of Assisi, and the Ravel "Bolero," which was a tremendous sensation some weeks ago at several Philharmonic-Symphony concerts led by Mr. Toscanini.

The Loeffler piece, for all its loftiness of spirit, impressed me as it had done before—a deal of modal monotony between a beautifully Parsifalian opening and a beautifully atmospheric close. Mrs. Povla Frijsh, sporting a black court train, delivered intelligently and sympathetically the solo part, which, however, taxed unduly the vocal resources of this extraordinary interpreter of songs. Yet, there were phrases that she voiced in unsurpassable fashion. At the conclusion Mr. Loeffler was led out on the stage by Mrs. Frijsh and Mr. Koussevitzky—a signal for an ovation from the packed house.

"Bolero" Wins Cheers.

Nevertheless, the overwhelming ovation—cheers and shouting—was reserved for Ravel's shrewdly contrived trick piece, "Bolero." Mr. Koussevitzky did not treat it to the taut, steely, perfectly graduated crescendo, taken at one unvarying, inexorable tempo, which simply bowled us over when Mr. Toscanini introduced it here, nor was the orchestral execution quite flawless.

The Russian batonist let the earlier repetitions of the single theme proceed at a freer, broader pace, and then hastened the later portion of the climax. Though one may prefer the Toscanini reading and regret the difficulties in which a saxophonist and a trombonist found themselves, the fact remains that this diabolical "Bolero" once more produced its effect.

NEW YORK
WORLD

JAN 11 1930

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra gave an extra concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall to aid the American Society for the Relief of Russian Exiles. The soloist was Benno Rabinoff, violinist and protege of Leopold Auer, who made an auspicious debut two seasons ago with the New York Symphony, conducted by Prof. Auer.

Mr. Rabinoff and the orchestra played the Prokofieff violin concerto; for the rest, Mr. Koussevitzky had chosen the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khowantchina," which has become almost standard repertoire in Chicago. Apparently the Metropolitan will have none of it. The program yesterday also contained the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and Tschaikowsky's "1912" Overture.

J. S.

NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 1 0

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

A New Symphony Performed by Mr. Koussevitzky and His Bostonians

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, in Carnegie Hall. Soloist, Povla Frijsh, soprano.

PROGRAM

Walton.....Overture, "Portsmouth Point"
Bax.....Symphony No. 2, in E minor and C
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegro feroce.
(First time in New York)
Loeffler
Canticum Fratris Solis (After St. Francis of Assisi)
For Voice and Orchestra
Ravel.....Bolero"

IN OUR happy and carefree time many composers of instrumental music rejoice in their pursuit of littleness, fetching from the sources of their inspiration symphonies that last ten minutes and suites that last five, and laying them before us with the jaunty pride of an elephant retrieving a coffee bean.

And these tabloid symphonic works are often triumphantly vacuous, as if their authors were anxious to prove to us that one need possess only the brain of a canary and the circulatory system of an earthworm in order to compose important music.

Many of the typical works of our musical day suggest the offspring of a Lilliputian and a minor problem in subtraction; and composers are proudest when they can point to a new score and say, "Look! I have purged it of significance and sensibility!"—delightfully unaware that they have, by that inspired process, also purged it of life.

* * *

These being conspicuous facts of the situation, it is an uncommon pleasure to welcome such an essay in the symphonic form as that by Mr. Arnold Bax, the Anglo-Celtic composer, which Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed to us last night for the first time in this borough. For Mr. Bax writes without apology after the ample fashion of the symphonic fathers. He scores, not for two piccolos and a B-flat jewsharp, but for the unashamedly ponderable apparatus of those who seem to have thought that a symphony is essentially an ample and deliberate affair, and not something to be disposed of as a sort of belated musical repartee to the invention of the telegraph.

* * *

Mr. Bax's symphony is in three movements, formidable in scope and content, and it lasts for almost forty minutes. It is scored for an orchestra of heroic size, fit to deal with what Carlyle so bravely called "the immensities and the eternities." And it is as substantial in its imaginative and intellectual yield as if tonal gnat's eggs had not been agreed upon as the only decent thing for the creative mind to hatch.

* * *

Mr. Bax completed the symphony in 1925, and it was published last year, with a dedication to Mr. Koussevitzky. This, however, did not deter Mr. Koussevitzky from performing it. He has already given the work twice in Boston, apparently with success.

The composer, in a letter spread upon the pages of Mr. Hale's annotations, says that "there is absolutely no communicable program associated with the music, which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work." Nevertheless, he speaks of the end of the symphony as publishing "a kind of oppressive catastrophic mood," and remarks that he has "put a great deal of emotion into the writing of it"; from which we are entitled to infer that the music is perhaps not so "severely absolute" as a strict interpretation of that phrase would suggest.

* * *

But, whether it is absolute or not, this is detaining music. It has fiber and strength and gravity; and at its best, as in the latter part of the Finale, it reminds us that music is still, if we wish it to be, an incomparable vehicle for the utterance of first and last things.

Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor of last night's Boston Symphony concert

When Mr. Bax's earlier symphony, in E-flat, was introduced here by Mr. Sokoloff and the Cleveland Orchestra four years ago, it was said that he had set his face against those Celtic witcheries and dreams that had so long and so conspicuously held him. For Mr. Bax, when he first became known here, was evidently a sort of musical Yeats—a Gael not unfamiliar with Gaul, since his lyric twilights had been touched with the slightly alien magic of the Bois.

In that earlier symphony he appeared to be chiefly concerned with fashioning a sterner and more drastic music, little occupied with faery spells and magic seas and haunted, melancholy woods. The fierce gloom of the North was felt in it, and a new aggressiveness and power.

* * *

These traits mark the new symphony that we heard last night. Yet, on the whole, it is less somber and austere a work than its predecessor. We are warned by it that the Celtic temperament, with its predilection for strangely colored loveliness, its wistful, melancholy tenderness, its incurable nostalgia, is a difficult thing to outlive. In the cello theme of the first movement, in the lyrical violin subject of the Andante (with its odd suggestion of an Irish Grieg—the ghost of the C minor violin sonata flits by), Mr. Bax reminds us that the Gael dies hard.

* * *

It was a deep satisfaction to hear again Mr. Loeffler's rapt, exalted music for the "Canticum Fratris Solis" of St. Francis that he set for voice and orchestra. Mr. Stokowski introduced the work to New York four years ago, when Mme. Povla Frijsh sang the solo part, as she did last night.

We might have wished for a somewhat more closely knit, more firmly integrated reading of the orchestral part, and for a voice of different quality to utter the moving song of poet and composer. Yet it was a privilege to hear the score, and to realize that music of such rarity and elevation, such spiritual exquisiteness, such luminous beauty, could still be written in our time.

Coming after it, the trickery of Ravel's "Bolero," the point of its effect blunted by repetition, seemed unexpectedly witless and inane.

SATURDAY, JANUARY

GOOSSENS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Guest Leader Cordially Applauded

First Performance in Boston of Respighi's New "Roman Festivals"

Eugene Goossens, the English conductor and composer now associated with the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N Y, appeared as guest conductor at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. His program included Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Schumann's First Symphony, and the first Boston performances of his own Concertino, and of Respighi's new "Roman Festivals." Mr Goossens was cordially applauded at every opportunity by orchestra and audience. He first appeared at these concerts as guest conductor Jan 22, 1926.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture," an early work intended originally as the first section of a grand "Faust Symphony" which was never completed, has not been heard here for some years past. It was meant to depict "Faust in Solitude." Wagner revised it rather perfunctorily and published it in 1855, apparently because he needed money. This score proves that Wagner could never have written a symphony that would have equalled his "music dramas." Yesterday's performance was painstakingly eloquent. It did not save the piece from dullness.

Schumann's Symphony in B flat, after Wagner's overture, sounded like a greater masterpiece than one has been accustomed to deem it. Mr Goossens, like Dr Koussevitzky, seems thoroughly convinced of the eloquence and significence of this symphony. His reading of it gets full value from every melody and every rhythm, and manages to make the scoring for orchestra sound effective, despite the proverbial ineptitudes of Schumann's instrumentation. All that one missed was the dreamy romanticism, the essentially Teutonic emotionalism characteristic of Schumann. Mr Goossens is too efficient, too deep in love with brilliance for its own sake, to get at the heart of Schumann's mystery.

With a modesty and good judgment rare among composers who serve as guest conductors, Mr Goossens put only one of his own works on yesterday's program. This was a Concertino for Double String Orchestra, which he has lately made from an octet for strings written in 1927, by adding an independent bass part and dividing the eight solo parts among first violins, second violins, violas and violoncellos. This concertino is terse, vivacious, unpretentious music, clearly and fluently written in a style not obtrusively modern.

Respighi's latest addition to his series of musical guides to Rome is entitled "Roman Festivals," and its predecessors, "Fountains of Rome" and "Pines of Rome," Boston audiences have frequently applauded. Like all writers of "best sellers" who try to repeat themselves, Respighi has now exhausted this vein of inspiration. "Roman Festivals" is almost a "reductio ad absurdam" of his whole procedure in his earlier successes.

There is a program note explaining that the four sections of the piece depict (1) the "Circus Maximus" in the days of Nero, with Christians being thrown to the lions. (2) Pilgrims in the Middle Ages jubilant at their first glimpse of the holy city from Monte Mario. (3) A harvest festival in the country near Rome with "hunting echoes, tinkling of bells, songs of love. Then in the tender evenfall arises a romantic serenade." (4) The night before Epiphany in the Piazza Navena. This last seems to be a Roman equivalent of the raucous Halloween of the old-fashioned American small town.

Respighi has chosen themes ranging from a German Easter hymn to the sort of popular Italianate tune ground out by old-fashioned hand organs. He has scored the piece for an orchestra to which almost every conceivable instrument from pipe organ to mandolin is added, always with a keen sense of sonority, and a megalomaniac frenzy to produce volume of tone as an end in itself. There is a sort of picture-postcard realism to the piece. The Pilgrim's hymn sounds like a pilgrim's hymn, the mandolin tune is just what one would expect of a mandolin player, the hand organ tune sounds like an amalgam of a dozen familiar specimens. But one passes in listening from amusement to boredom.

Now, if Respighi had only read Shaw's "Androcles and the Lion," he might have written appropriate, if obstreperous, music for that delicious farce about Roman martyrs saved by a fluke. But, one fears, Respighi takes himself too seriously for that.

The performance yesterday was worthy of the piece, save for a few muddled bits. Why is it that under no conductor can the Boston Symphony, as at present constituted, succeed in getting through an entire concert with no obvious wrong notes and false entrances?

Dr Koussevitzky will return from his vacation next week. The program now announced, subject, of course, to change with or without notice, includes Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," his new piano concerto and two of Mr Arbos' admirable arrangements of numbers from Albeniz' "Iberia." Prokofieff will appear as pianist in his concerto, but, unlike rival composers, he will leave the conducting to Dr Koussevitzky.

P. R.

GLAZOUNOV CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Post Jan 15

Distinguished Russian Composer Plays Own Pieces

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Twenty times since 1897, the name of Alexander Glazounov had appeared upon the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, and by 14 pieces was it thus represented. Yesterday afternoon three of these pieces were repeated, and under the direction of the composer himself, now on his first visit to the United States.

LINK WITH GREAT PAST

To many in yesterday's audience Glazounov, the man, was more interesting, at least for the moment, than Glazounov, the musician. Here was a composer in his 65th year whose career has extended over nearly half a century—for Glazounov was uncommonly precocious—who had won for himself an honorable place in music and who, above all, is a living link with a great past. For Glazounov, though much younger than Balakirev, Cui, Borodin and Rimsky-Korsakov, was first their protege and then their colleague. In particular did he work shoulder to shoulder with Borodin and Rimsky; and when the former died, leaving behind him uncompleted his "Prince Igor," it was Glazounov who wrote down from memory the overture and who, with Rimsky-Korsakov, completed the orchestration of that opera.

Throughout his useful life Glazounov has lived in the former capital of Russia. During the years of privation following the revolution it was reported that with many other artists he was in sore straits. It was even said that so wasted of body had he become that he could wrap his overcoat twice around him.

Economical of Gesture

No such emaciation, however, was observable in the man who yesterday walked forth upon the stage of Symphony Hall to face an orchestra standing in his honor and an applauding, though (for the most part) seated, audience. Indeed, the Glazounov of today is a portly figure, and his movements recall the old saying, "Large bodies move slowly." In conducting Mr. Glazounov proved singularly economical of movement and gesture, though the lethargy that characterizes his walk was absent from his beat. That was sufficiently clear-cut and decided. And if in directing he did not inspire the players to untoward exertions, at least, in the language of the orchestral musician, "he knows what he wants."

The development of Glazounov, the composer, has been curious. Some might even call it a retrogression. Beginning under the influence of the Russian "Five" he, too, wrote as a "nationalist"; witness the tone poem "Stenka Razin," a product of his 21st year, with which yesterday's concert closed.

More German Than Russian

But in time he seems to have felt this musical dialect, half slavic, half near-eastern, too confining. He yearned, it would appear, to become cosmopolitan, universal, in his speech. And the later Glazounov is far more German than Russian; witness the Sixth Symphony and the Violin Concerto that made the rest of yesterday's programme. In them is displayed abundant mastery of the resources of composition. As a musical scholar Glazounov has surpassed all of the five, save Rimsky, and even Rimsky had not the younger man's ability to fill a large canvas to sustain himself through a symphony without losing his sense of direction.

But the music of the later Glazounov, well made, well sounding (if at times skirting the edge of the superficial), has little distinctive voice, either racial or personal. It is sonorous, it is melodious, it is brilliantly orchestrated, it shows the hand of a master contrapuntist, but at the most it leaves the listener feeling comfortable and secure. It does not thrill or excite. It fails to quicken the deeper emotions.

"Stenka Razin" Lives

Report has it that Mr. Glazounov now holds "Stenka Razin," vivid musical picture of the River Volga and of the Cossack bandit that ravaged its shores, in small esteem. Yet it were kinder of him to respect the piece, for the signs are not wanting that it will remain his monument.

In conclusion a word should be said regarding the excellent playing of Benno Rabinoff, who, as solo violinist in the Concerto, made yesterday his first appearance in Boston. He was deservedly applauded. And it need hardly be added that the audience from first to last received both the distinguished guest and his music with genuine cordiality.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

THE COMING OF GLAZOUNOV

Alexander Glazounov, born at St. Petersburg now Leningrad, in 1865, one of the most prominent of Russian composers, director of the Leningrad Conservatory even before the revolution, conducted in this country for the first time on Nov. 21 of last year. The place was Detroit, for Mr. Gabrilowitch had been a pupil of his in orchestration; the orchestra was the Detroit Symphony orchestra, of which Mr. Gabrilowitch is the conductor. Mr. Glazounov then led his 6th Symphony, which is on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this week, when Mr. Glazounov will also conduct his violin concerto (Mr. Benno Rabinoff, violinist), and his symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." The three works have already been performed in Boston. Mr. Glazounov conducted at his own concert at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on Dec. 3.

Mr. Glazounov's father was a prosperous bookseller and publisher at St. Petersburg under the imperial regime. As a little boy Alexander was chiefly interested in pictures, but having taken piano lessons he attracted the attention of Balakirev, who was a friend of the boy's mother. She was of a musical nature. As Alexander showed unusual gifts for composition, Balakirev took him to Rimsky-Korsakov. The latter wrote about their meeting in his book, "My Musical Life":

"Casually, Balakirev once brought me the composition of a 14 or 15-year-old high school student, Sascha Glazounow. It was an orchestral score written in childish fashion. The boy's talent was indubitably clear. Shortly afterward (in the season of 1879-80), Balakirev introduced him, that he might take up his studies with me. While giving lessons in elementary theory to his mother, Eleyena Pavlovna Glazounova, I began also to teach the youthful Sascha. He was a charming boy with beautiful eyes, who played the piano very clumsily; N. N. Elyenowsky taught him piano playing. Elementary theory and solfeggio proved unnecessary for him, as he had a superior ear, and Elyenowsky had covered harmony also with him to a certain extent.

"After a few lessons in harmony I took him directly into counterpoint, to which he applied himself zealously. Besides, he always showed me his improvisations and jotted down fragments of minor pieces. Thus work at counterpoint and composition went on simultaneously. In moments of leisure Sascha Glazounov played a good deal, and on his own initiative constantly acquainted himself with musical literature. At that time he was particularly fond of Liszt. His musical development progressed not by the day, but literally by the hour."

Glazounov was only 16 when he brought to Rimsky-Korsakov the sketch for his first symphony. The work, completed in 1882, was performed the same year under the direction of Balakirev at a concert of the Free School of Music in St. Petersburg. "The audience was astonished," wrote Rimsky-Korsakov, "when the composer, in a student's uniform, appeared on the stage in response to calls for him." It was rumored, unjustly, that the youth's parents had paid Rimsky to write the symphony and put Alexander's name to it. Later the road to fame was made easier for the young musician through his friendship with Belaiev, who, having succeeded to the business and fortune of his father—a timber merchant—became an ardent supporter of Russian music, and founded a music publishing business in Leipzig, which brought out the works of Glazounov, Rimsky-Korsakov, Borodin and others of the national school.

Borodin interested himself in Glazounov's works, and brought them to the attention of Liszt. It was due to his influence that the young man's first symphony was produced at Weimar in 1884. Thereafter Glazounov's rise was rapid and continuous. His works were performed in every country of Europe, and he was invited to conduct his own music at the Paris Exposition of 1889. In 1900 Glazounov was invited to join the faculty of the St. Petersburg (Leningrad) Conservatory as professor of instrumentation and score-reading. Five years later, Rimsky-Korsakov resigned the directorship of the institution, and Glazounov succeeded him.

In 1891 the following cablegram, dated St. Petersburg, Oct. 8, was published in the newspapers of this city:

"A profound sensation was created here today. A young woman from Moscow was arrested, charged with being a Nihilist. She confessed, and admitted that she had left a trunk at the house of a well-known composer, Glazounov, in which was a revolutionary proclamation. The police proceeded to Glazounov's house and found the trunk. Glazounov protested his innocence, declaring that he was utterly ignorant of the contents of the trunk. He was nevertheless compelled to deposit as bail 15,000 roubles, in order to avoid arrest pending inquiries to be made in the case."

Glazounov suffered only temporary inconvenience. He was not imprisoned in the fortress of Saint Peter and Saint Paul, nor was he sent to Siberia; and later he wrote a cantata for the coronation of the present Tsar. In March, 1905, he, Liadov, and other leading teachers of the conservatory, espoused the cause of Rimsky-Korsakov, who was ejected from the conservatory for his sympathy with the students in political troubles, and they resigned their positions. But Glazounov was soon appointed director. He at once reinstated Rimsky-Korsakov as a teacher of composition. The catalogue of his works is long and varied, eight symphonies, two piano concertos, a violin concerto, many orchestral pieces, ballets, music for stage plays, cantatas, much chamber music, piano pieces, songs. It was once said of him that he had found in the ballet the fullest and freest form of expression—not the ballet as it was known in this country before the Russians visited us—foolish scenarios—performances that were often awkward, dull or the "labored intrepidity of indecorum," but the gorgeous ballets of St. Petersburg in the years of the Tsars. For the world's Columbian Exposition at Chicago in 1893 he wrote a triumphal march for orchestra and chorus which was performed. He had been commissioned to do this by Theodore Thomas.

He completed works left behind by Borodin—the opera "Prince Igor"—he wrote out the overture to it from memory—and the fragments of Borodin's third symphony.

At first Glazounov was given to fantastic and imaginative music. His suites and tone-poems told of carnivals, funerals, the voluptuous east, the forest with wood sprites, water nymphs, and will-of-the-wisps, the ocean, the Kremlin of Moscow with all its holy and dramatic associations. "Stenka Razin" is built on three themes: the first is the melancholy song of the barge-men of the Volga; the second theme, short, savage, bizarre, typifies the hero who gives his name to the piece; and the third, a seductive melody, pictures in tones the captive Persian princess. The chant of the barge-men is that which vitalizes the orchestral piece. It is forever appearing, transformed in a thousand ways. The river is personified. It is alive, enormous. One is reminded of Gogol's description of another Russian stream: "Marvellous is this river in peaceful weather, when it rolls at ease through forests and between mountains. You look at it, and you do not know whether it moves or not, such is its majesty. You would say that it were a road of blue ice, immeasurable, endless, sinuously making its way through verdure. What a delight for the broiling sun to cool his rays in the freshness of clear water, and for the trees on the bank to admire themselves in that looking-glass, the giant that he is! There is not a river like unto this one in the world."

Alfred Bruneau wrote in his "Musiques de Russie et Musiciens de France" (Paris, 1903), after a short study of the "Big Five,"—Balakirev, Borodin, Moussorgsky, Cui and Rimsky-Korsakov, who could not endure the name of Anton Rubinstein as a composer, and looked skew-eyed at Tchaikovsky as a "cosmopolite,"—these words concerning Glazounov: "His instrumentation has marvellous clearness, logic and strength, and a brilliance that sometimes dazzles. His sureness of hand is incomparable. But, to say everything—and I have the habit of saying everything—I wish that his truly extraordinary activity might slacken a little to the advantage of a high originality which I believe is in him, but to which he does not give the opportunity for a complete manifestation. He should fulfil the promise of his beginning; he should be the creator on whom we reckon—in a word, the man of his generation, a generation younger than that of the composers who were at first his counsellors. The new years, continuing the eternal evolution of ideas, necessitate new attempts."

It was said of Glazounov later with reference to his fourth symphony:

"At this stage the composer has already travelled far; on the road still before him he is to purify the elements of his creative substance and to divest it of everything which is not essentially musical. 'He has abandoned,' says Rimsky-Korsakov 'the thickets of "The Forest," the depths of "The Sea" and the walls of "The Kremlin"'; in the last named the musical reflection of the program, indicated by headings, has become quite faint; the romanticism of the andante of the fifth symphony of "Raymonda," of the sixth symphony and the "Middle Ages" suite is not in the vein of the contemporary descriptive composers. Glazounov has already gone far towards purging himself; he is already nearing his promised land, wherein music is absolutely self-sufficing, in the seventh symphony. With the eighth he reaches his destination.'"

Alexander Glazounov, composer and guest conductor at the Symphony concerts this week.

A Boston Brahms Festival

Dr Koussevitzky's plans for the Brahms festival to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next March are now announced in detail. They include performances of most of the major works of Brahms, in which the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, the noted German pianist Schnabel, the Burgin String Quartet, Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, bass, will assist. Schnabel is coming from Berlin especially for this festival.

Unlike the Beethoven festival given three years ago in commemoration of the centenary of the composer's death, this Brahms festival is not given to mark an anniversary. Dr Koussevitzky particularly admires the music of Brahms. There is a considerable public demand for opportunities to hear the orchestra outside its regular and extra subscription series of concerts, all places for which are taken by season subscribers, except for the Friday rush seats, and a very few Tuesday afternoon tickets. A festival is sure to attract very large audiences and worldwide attention.

The programs announced include those for the pair of subscription concerts March 22 and 23, for which no single tickets can be had, since they are sold out for the season. At these concerts the subscribers will hear the "Academic Festival" overture, and the Second and Third Symphonies. This time the program is wisely kept the same for Friday and Saturday.

There are to be four special concerts in the festival, for which season tickets are now being subscribed at Symphony Hall by means of the famous automatic subscription board first used there last Spring.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Among the early attractions in February will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The only appearance of the famed Boston organization in this city during the present season will take place February 5 at the Lyric under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Director Koussevitzky has brought the Boston back to its preeminent station, which it held in the days of Karl Muck before the World War, and during which the personnel of the orchestra was very badly disrupted. Mr. Koussevitzky's leaning toward the modern school of music has brought him considerable notoriety, and his highly interesting interpretations have caused him to be regarded as an authority on such things.

young dramatic

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians --- The Scr

A Single Line Is Glazunov's Musical Life

The Man and The Composer, From Past to Present His Firm-Set Self

HALF a century ago a shy youth of sixteen brought an orchestral score to his famous teacher, and, diffidently moving unyielding fingers across the keyboard, presented a pianistic equivalent of the Symphony of his imagination. This episode was lovingly noted by Rimsky-Korsakov—the teacher—in his "Musical Life." Alexander Constantinovich Glazunov—the pupil—was instantly accepted as the legitimate heir to the rare treasure of the Russian National School created by five non-professionals: a naval officer, Rimsky-Korsakov; an ensign of the guards, Musorgsky; a professor of chemistry, Borodin; an expert in fortification, Cui; and a broad-minded amphitryon, Balakirev.

The New World—in the geographical as well as in the chronological sense—is now welcoming Alexander Constantinovich Glazunov with a measure of sincere admiration and awesome respect that no other composer of universal fame has heretofore received. Popular emotions are often symbols; and Glazunov is a personification of ideals long dormant but none the less active beneath the surface. Tradition and faith may be these ideals. An irreproachable past may be the endearing feature. Glazunov, in all his years, has never looked over his shoulder to see the possible ruins of his civilization. Even Liadov, his closest associate, in his late years was moved by Skriabin's elusive harmonies, and sounded a foreign note in his final works.

It is a futile occupation to look for similar contemporary influences in Glazunov's music. Since the day when his first Symphony in E aroused Rimsky-Korsakov, his progress was sound and undisturbed. He has known no "periods." Even the youthful storm and stress, when a daring mind sets out to conquer the world, eluded him. Ravel and Strauss are now classical composers; but both of them have had their incendiary moments, and are still at work devising new and startling schemes, sometimes in defiance of the former faiths. There is no need to mention Stravinsky, the prodigy of avatars. If these reformed bad boys are accepted—or pardoned—the respect that they are enjoying in the popular mind, or among musicians of the old school, will never match the white purity of Glazunov's record.

Those who come in contact with Glazunov, the man, never fail to be impressed by the same high qualities that distinguish his music. Glazunov, the director of the Conservatory of St. Petersburg, the thoughtful and self-denying father of an institution that literally supplied the world with the major part of its virtuosi and composers of all descriptions—conservative, modern, modernistic—this Glazunov presiding over the directorial table and liberally dealing out aid, advice and financial help, still awaits his historian. The medieval law which functioned up to the Revolution of 1917, and which barred members of the Jewish faith from residence in the capitals, was the greatest burden on Glazunov's mind. A Russian of pure stock, he somehow managed to raise the "normal" percentage to the 53 per cent of the actual registration of Hebrew students in 1915, without breaking the law. Glazunov's solicitous regard for impecunious students led him to considerable expenditures from his private purse. How he could reconcile the mildness of his personal rule with the highest standards of discipline and learning at his Conservatory is a subject of wonderment.

Thus Glazunov outgrows the mere maker of music. He embodies principles that outlive the passion for the new. The world may grow independent ,and youngsters may sneer at eminence, but the halo of recognition will remain with the glorious past. Not too seldom revolutionaries themselves turn about and discover fantastic lights in abandoned valleys. Has not Chaikovsky been recently installed by Stravinsky in this fashion?

In his steady progress, Glazunov has never been over-confident. His correspondence with Chaikovsky shows that at one time, after the conspicuous failure of one of his secondary works he was seriously doubting his powers. Moreover, Chaikovsky, in a reply, while declaring himslef an admirer, admitted that there was a lack of something in Glazunov's music. What was that something? Chaikovsky promised to tell at the next personal meeting. But did the meeting take place, or did Chaikovsky speak his mind?

Glazunov's music is an open book. It does not present riddles, and conceals no key behind its pages or between its lines. Its methods may be traced to Liszt, its subject-matter to the Russians, its mood and form to Chopin. But the combination of these elements forms an unmistakeably individual style. This music may seem unearthly, or impress us with stationary aloofness, but its peculiar beauty, the ice-cold flame burning at the edges, kindle the imagination in spite of the absence of obvious ardors. Glazunov's themes make absorbing material for study. He likes to state the subject in the deep register of the alto, the G-string of the violin, the middle octave of the piano, the viola of the string-quartet. The melody ascends, accompanied by the bass in stately procession at a diverging angle. The design is noble, clear, yet inherently capable of manifold transformations, yielding itself to intricate embellishments. It is often built on a succession of thirds, ascending or descending, receding then by a second, to resolve the suspension. These thirds in further development may proceed without recession and compass two full octaves, passing through all seven notes of the scale. Taken together they form a chord, dissonant yet easily solvent, which is the "Glazunov chord."

Thematic material seems inexhaustible at Glazunov's hands; the thousand and one ways to fertilize a melody and to marshal its multiple variations through the spaces of musical structure have no secrets for him. He is deliberate in his methods; there is sobering poise in the exposition; exquisite balance in the tightening augmentations. Glazunov is past master of counterpoint and orchestration; so was the great Taneiev. But Taneiev's works have been relegated to the archives; not even his astonishing Symphony is ever heard. Glazunov, on the contrary, is in the repertory everywhere. There must be a hidden force in Glazunov's monumental creations that compels the public to listen to his music.

Ability, not necessarily desire, may father the thought. The genius for devising flexible melodies may have led Glazunov to the form of variation as the best medium. His greatest musical triumphs—the Intermezzo of the Sixth Symphony, the Variations for Pianoforte, to mention but a few—are embodied in such compositions. To touch a melody, without distorting its recognizable features is an art in itself, and it is Glazunov's art par excellence. This accounts for the logic of his development where musical leaves seem to grow out of the stem before our very ears. The leaves furl into buds, buds blossom into flowers. . . . To some they are a product of the hothouse, but incubated, or by nature born, they are as fragrant. . . .

In style, Glazunov is less overtly national than his illustrious predecessors. He abandons some formulas, among them pseudo-orientalism, with its famous lowered sixth. But he retains the "grand" manner, the richness of Russian modes. When he makes use of a folk-tune, such as the Song of Volga Boatmen in his early symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," he leaves nothing undone; by change of rhythm or pace, he adapts it to a variety of moods; or by a crafty feat of instrumentation breaks it asunder, then opposes the halved parts to each other. "Stenka Razin" was written in 1889, not for contrapuntal artifice, but for the crowds at the Paris Exposiion to enjoy. Glazunov's counterpoint, as Bach's counterpoint, is his natural idiom.

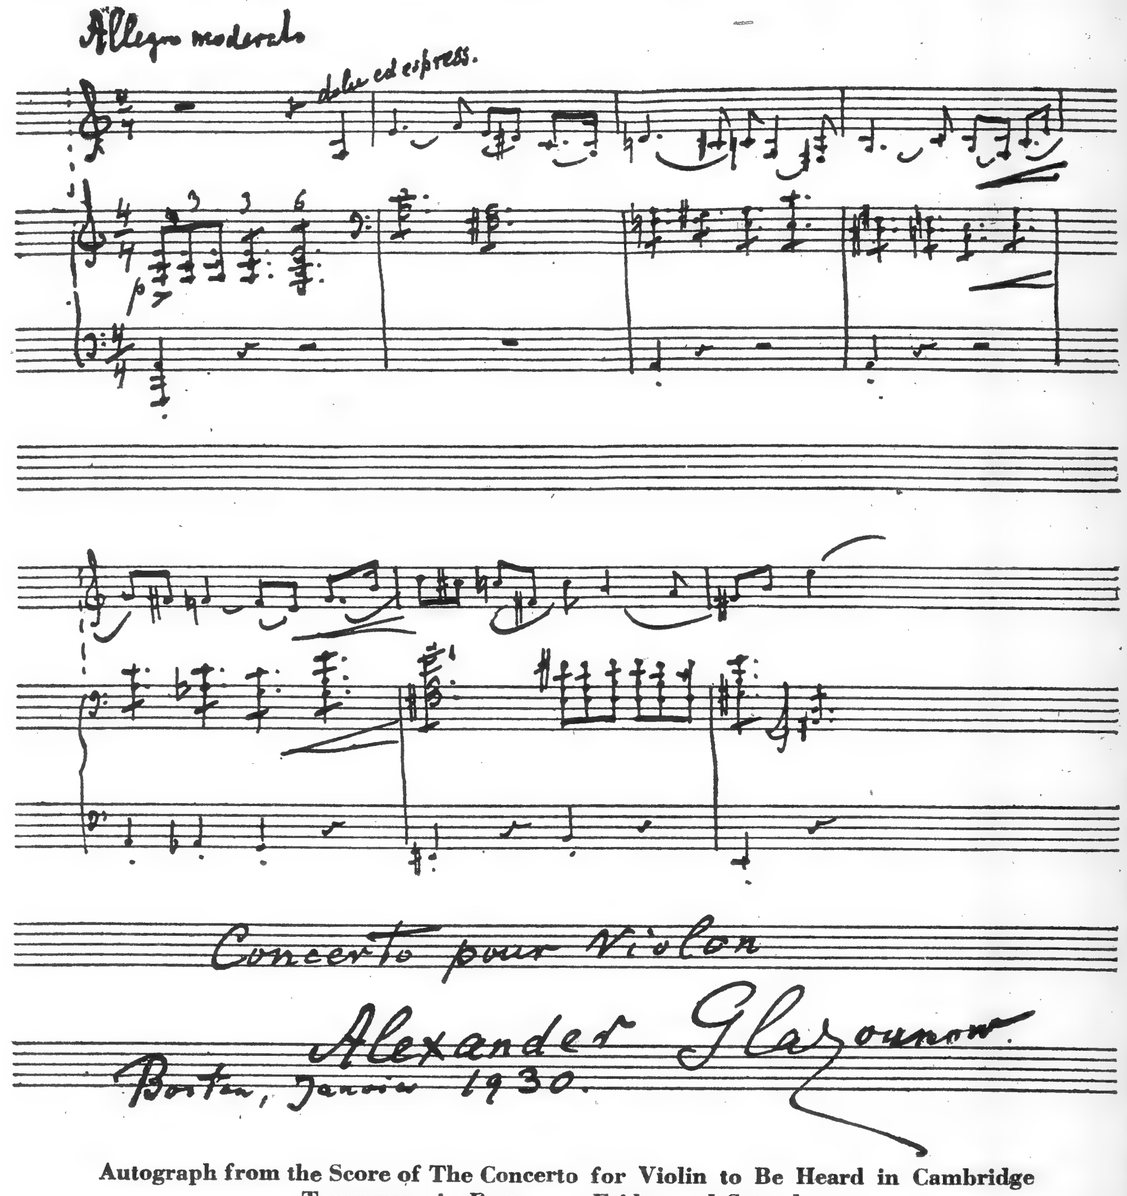
The scholarly Glazunov stands in delightful contrast with the Glazunov of ballet music. Here his sense of measure finds its most legitimate application. But it is not the sensuous ballet of the French: the music is light and nimble; there is little dramatization, and the intrinsic logic of the music never ceases to control the form or movement. Glazunov may also be programatic, as in the suite "Moyen Age," where there is a Death dancing and enticing, playing the open fifths on the fiddle: the traditional formula for devils and such. Glazunov is majestic in depicting forests, seas, or widespread wastes of land. There he employs huge orchestral masses suggesting the immensity of the subject. But he is never elephantine as Strauss in the "Alpine Symphony"; and certainly he resorts to no onomatopœia of thunder machines.

But Glazunov is primarily a composer of absolute music—Quartets, Symphonies, Concertos. Since 1915, when he wrote incidental music to the play, "The King of Judæa," by Constantin Romanov, the Tsar's cousin, his production has ceased. H. G. Wells, in his fantastic account of a journey to the post-revolutionary Petrograd, tells the story of Glazunov being unable to compose because of the shortage of music-paper. This may or may not have been the true cause of Glazunov's abstinence from creative work. Those who remember Glazunov and Russia in the dark days following "The End of St. Petersburg," recall with amazement the incredibly lean figure of the director of the Conservatory. They say, he could wrap his coat around him twice over, which represented the loss of some sixty pounds of weight. Composing may not have been in order in those days. . . .

Through wars and revoluutions, Glazunov has never been untrue to his artistic self. The fact that there are people who compose music based on unresolved dissonances concerns him as little as the existence of interesting but incomprehensible guttural sounds in African dialects. Political changes, changes of surroundings, want, physical privations, are contingencies to be met and to be endured. But integrity of character cannot and must not be influenced by such fates. Glazunov has given us an inspiring example. His has been a noble life in art. That is why his welcome has grown to the significance of a stirring event. NICOLAS SLONIMSKY

A Distinguished Russian Guest Comes This Week to The Symphony Concerts

Alexander Glazunov, Composer and Conductor
(Drawing by Syerov in Rimsky-Korsakov's "My Musical Life")



Autograph from the Score of The Concerto for Violin to Be Heard in Cambridge Tomorrow, in Boston on Friday and Saturday

BRAHMS FESTIVAL AT SYMPHONY HALL

A week of special concerts in which the principal orchestral, choral and chamber works of Brahms will be played is to be given March 21-26 at Symphony hall.

The Brahms festival will be given by the Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor; the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Artur Schnabey, German pianist, who will come from Europe for the occasion; the singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Jeannette Vreeland and Fraser Gange; and the Burgin string quartet.

Sunday afternoon, March 23, and the evenings of March 24, 25 and 26, there will be given the First and Fourth Symphonies, the two Pianoforte Concertos, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the "Song of Destiny" and "German Requiem" (Brahms's principal choral works), the "Liebeslieder," Rhapsody (alto and male chorus), Violin Sonata and Quintet in F minor. At the concerts of the previous Friday and Saturday, March 21 and 22, the Academic Festival Overture and the Second and Third Symphonies will be played. This pair of concerts, however, is not included in the subscription series, as they are already fully subscribed. Hamlet Thursday 23

Brahms Festival in March

A week of special concerts in which the principal orchestral, choral and chamber works of Brahms will be played, is to be given March 21-26, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall today.

The Brahms Festival will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Artur Schnabel, the famous German pianist who holds a particular fame in the music of Brahms and who will come from Europe for the occasion; the singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Jeanette Vreeland and Fraser Gange, and the Burgin String Quartet.

On Sunday afternoon, March 23, and the evenings of March 24, 25 and 26, there will be given the First and Fourth Symphonies, the two pianoforte concertos, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the "Song of Destiny" and "German Requiem," the "Liebeslieder," Rhapsody (alto and male chorus), Violin Sonata, and Quintet in F minor.

At the concerts of the previous Friday and Saturday, March 21 and 22, the "Academic Festival" Overture, and the Second and Third Symphonies will be played. This pair of concerts, however, is not included in the subscription series, since they are already fully subscribed.

All subscriptions are being made by means of the automatic subscription board in the Symphony Hall lobby. Monday Jan 13

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Eugene Goossens, as a guest, conducted the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. His program was as follows: Wagner, A Faust Overture; Schumann, Symphony No. 1, B flat major; Goossens, Concertino for Double String Orchestra; Respighi, Roman Festivals. The Concertino and the Roman Festivals were played in Boston for the first time.

Mr. Goossens's Concertino was originally written in 1927 as a String Octet and as such was performed for the first time in London last March. The first performance of the work in its present shape was in New York at a concert of the Composers' League in December of last year. The Concertino is interesting: not only as showing the technical skill of the composer; the music is alive, with a vivacity that is not academically perfunctory; it is new and sparkling wine in bottles that have not been covered with dust in the bin of a poker-backed conservative. The modern spirit that enlivens certain harmonic schemes is not that coming from an experimenter relying on polytony or any other "tony" for effect, in the desire to be abreast, or a little ahead, of the times. While the work is, as Mr. Goossens says,, somewhat in the style of the old Italian concertos—Vivaldi, for example—it might be by a Vivaldi writing today.

For the theme of the slow section Mr. Goossens invented a melody in folk-song fashion, a charming melody without affectation of simplicity but as appealing as though it expressed the emotion of some unknown, humble singer moved to vocal expression of what was felt within him.

The Concertino was brilliantly performed by the incomparable string section of the orchestra. The melody in the slow section was beautifully sung by the first viola, Mr. Lefranc, whose full, rich tone was not allowed to degenerate into cloying sentimentalism or lacrymose wailing. The audience evidently and fully appreciated the music and the performance.

Respighi's "Roman Festivals" was a disappointment, not wholly unanticipated. In 1916 the "Fountains of Rome" appeared; eight years later the "Pines of Rome;" to form a trilogy, Mr. Respighi completed the "Roman Festivals" in 1928: "Visions and evocations of Roman fetes." Mr. Toscanini brought out the composition for the first time anywhere in New York from manuscript last February. Mr. Goossens was the first to conduct it in London (June 13, 1929).

Mr. Respighi glorifies Rome again by describing in tones: First, the martyrs in the Circus Maximus, singing cheerfully in spite of the fact that wild beasts are about to devour them. Though the crowd at first shouts: "Hail! Nero!" the calmness of the martyrs is disquieting, and the people rise from their seats as agitated as those about to die are unperturbed. The second section portrays praying pilgrims on the highway, finally reaching a height from which the holy city is seen. A hymn of praise—church bells ring in answer. An October Festival is the subject of the third section—tinkling of bells, songs of love, a serenade. In the fourth section it is the night before the Epiphany. Fanfares of trumpets, country tunes, a barrel-organ and the voice of a "barker" sounding from a booth—a frantically jovial populace; in fact a "whoop it up," with the full strength of the company.

The composer s quoted as saying that his instrumentation represents "the maximum of orchestral sonority and color." One might say "noise and gaudy coloring." The most musical, and at the same time truly descriptive pages are those in which the pilgrims on their march finally arrive at the summit of the hill. And in the fourth section the wild tune of a pleasing vulgarity with the cadence used by Mascagni in "Cavalleria Rusticana" has true [illegible] befitting the scene. But too [illegible]tion is thick, not

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

JAN 10

Boston Symphony Will Play Dvorak's New World

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears at the Mosque the night of Monday, February 3, two weeks from last night, as the second attraction in the artists' course, presented by T. Michaux Moody, the symphony to be played will be Dvorak's "New World," one of the most noteworthy of modern compositions. It is of particular interest to all Americans, but especially so to Southerners, for some of its themes are based on the Negro folk music of the old South. Mr. Moody had considerable correspondence with the management and was permitted a choice from three symphonies. He selected the Dvorak composition because he felt that it would give the greatest pleasure to the largest number of people. Tickets for the concert are now being sold at Walter D. Moses and Company, where seats also may be obtained for the recital to be given the following Monday night, February 10, by Jascha Heifetz, violinist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MONDAY CONCERT

Dr Koussevitzky Back From Vacation

Conducting for the first time since his sojourn in New York, Dr Koussevitzky presented to his Monday evening audience a sequence of interesting selections of widely divergent styles. The classicism of Vivaldi, the fantasy of Mussorgsky, the bizarre Ravel, and the austere Sibelius, provided a variety of moods that bespoke a finely chosen program.

Alexander Siloti's arrangement of the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ spun its merry, fugal through two movements that might have easily been written by Bach. There is a perennial controversy among musical pundits whether Bach did not really write some of the works credited to Vivaldi. Certainly the Largo movement, which was conducted with beautiful, not overstressed, expressiveness by Koussevitzky, is comparable even to the famous air from Bach's Suite in D major. The organ admirably sustained the climaxes.

Nothing could be more different from Vivaldi's geometry than the Mussorgsky prelude to "Khovanstchina." This prelude, which illustrates the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin of Moscow, was performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in October 24, 1924, with Dr Koussevitzky conducting. The opera has for its subject the conflict between Old and New Russia. This prelude is a quaint thing. The theme has a strong resemblance to the Volga Boatman's Song, although it is disguised by its lyrical character, in contrast to the rhythmic effect of the popular tune. Dr Koussevitzky carried the extremely delicate passages at the end with a delightful finesse.

Ravel's bolero, dedicated to Ida Rubenstein, the dancer, was first brought out and danced by her at Paris in November, 1928. This remarkable piece might easily be dismissed as nothing but a novel sensation, if it were not for its unmistakable, compelling effect. It depicts a Spanish dance, and little by little excited to a frenzy as the dancer becomes more and more animated. Knives are drawn—the woman tossed from arms to arms. A drum gives the dance rhythm, which is maintained throughout; a flute pipes the theme, which is taken up by wind instruments in turn; then by groups of instruments. Without any rhythmic harmonic or melodic variation, "there is a steady crescendo for about 20 minutes, until there is an explosive modulation—brass and percussion instruments swell the din until at last there is what has been described as a tornado of sound."

The monotony of tune and rhythm, at first rather irritating, produces in its climax an irresistible effect. Needless to say, the orchestra made the most of this show piece. The audience, though not quite so wildly enthusiastic as when it was first performed here a few weeks ago, was warmly appreciative.

The last number on the program was Sibelius' Symphony in D major. Koussevitzky's conducting of the first two movements was not at all emphatic, but in the last two movements, played without interruption, he was more coherent; and particularly toward the final section of the last movement he maintained the stirring, singing theme that leads to the concluding, sonorous apotheosis.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The third concert in the Monday night series of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Vivaldi-Siloti, Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ; Moussorgsky, Prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina"; Ravel, Bolero; Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D major.

Dr. Koussevitzky has acquainted his audiences with several of Vivaldi's, the red-haired priest's, concertos. Hearing them, one fails to see the justice of opinions expressed by solemn writers, as Sir Hubert Perry, who spoke of Vivaldi's slow movements as showing "glibness and a certain mastery of technic," but added that the musical ideas are little more than "poses"—whatever that may mean. This music has lived, for it has nobility and beauty. Not without cause did Dr. Koussevitzky put this concerto on the first program he prepared for Boston.

The Prelude to "Khovanstchina" undoubtedly owes in great measure its charm to Rimsky-Korsakov who edited the pages that Moussorgsky left and orchestrated them. It matters little, whether the hearer is acquainted with the scene on the stage; as pure and absolute music, this Prelude has a peculiar charm if only for sheer euphony and atmosphere.

Ravel's "Bolero" excites at a first hearing, it pleases by the monotony of repetitions, which exerts a hypnotic influence. The clever trick of the composer, a veritable tour de force, does not surprise one after first acquaintance. The "Bolero" shows technical skill in the establishment of a long crescendo and in the sudden, unanticipated stormy modulation; and this is all.

It cannot be said by way of praise that Sibelius's Second Symphony is "characteristic" of him, for he is himself in all his music, an imposing figure in his loneliness, his deep-seated melancholy, his rage and passion suggestive of landscapes and seascapes of hi beloved Finland.

The various moods of these four compositions were fully appreciated by the accomplished and magnetic conductor, and the performance by the superb instrument on which he plays was of the highest order. H. F. B.

GOSSENS IS LEADER AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

EUGENE GOOSSENS, English composer and conductor, who has been in this country for the better part of the last six years, conducts this week's Boston Symphony concerts as guest. Following a week after the Russian Glazounov, who led a program composed entirely of his own works, Mr. Goossens was in the dilemma familier to most guest-conductors choosing their programs. If he features modern or unfamiliar works many complain at not seeing him with a program of classics by which his ability may be compared with others. If he chooses classics, others complain that these are overplayed.

Eugene Goossens

Mr. Goossens' opening number was a fortunate choice—Wagner's "Faust" Overture, which is not often played here. Unfortunately the Schumann B-flat Symphony has been given here often under Mr. Koussevitzky. Consequently there was reason for grumbling, although Mr. Goossens may not have been responsible.

Nor can the distinguished Englishman hope to make us forget Mr. Koussevitzky's glowing version of the Symphony. In 1[illegible] place Goossens would have us hear a Schumann of melodic line, played "straight," without the romantic ardor, the joy of Spring that Schumann would have his music express. In suiting his own temperament, Goossens does violence to Schumann's

In the second part of the program the conductor is on home territory—his own Concertino for Double String Orchestra and the latest of Respighi's war-horse, "Feste Romane." The Concertino is in nine voices, built up more or less on a single theme, though there is a slow section and the single movement has three distinct parts. The music is forthrightly modern, the development ingenious.

Again "Bolero" As A Monday Hears It

FOR the third program of the Monday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, returning to command, presented an uncommonly diversified program. Neither in style, national character, musical substance; nor instrumental color was there the slightest affinity between any two pieces. The items were Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for Orchestra and Organ, the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," Ravel's celebrated "Bolero" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, in D major. The audience extended a cordial greeting to Dr. Koussevitzky as he approached the conductor's stand. Thereafter, applause was the immediate reaction to the music at hand. Vivaldi's Concerto found but lukewarm favor. Musorgsky's Prelude delighted those who prefer melody and picturesque instrumental niceties above all else; it was undoubtedly a popular number. From those who listened carefully and who have acquired a special fondness for the composer, the Symphony of Sibelius drew hearty applause, though it easily could be seen that the audience as a whole would have received one of the familiar symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms or Chaikovsky with much greater cordiality. (Strange musical material, especially in the more serious forms, is not always popular at Monday concerts.) The summit of the evening, however—to the vast majority, at least—was Ravel s irresistible "Bolero."

As everyone knows, "Bolero" is the talk of the town. The piece is generally accepted and acclaimed by the public at large. Witness the growing tenseness as the repeated and amplified melody probed deeper and deeper under the musical skin. Possibly many grew really excited and only with difficulty refrained from shouting. More likely there was a large degree of humorous speculation as to which instrument would next take up the theme or how much louder it could be proclaimed; hearty and appreciative laughter would here be the natural reaction, which, to nervous persons easily excited by relentless rhythms, might become a trifle hysterical. It is to be questioned, however, whether the great popularity of the piece derives so much from its inherent musical qualities as from its obvious character. . . . "A child can follow it" . . . Among musicians and musical amateurs opinion is about evenly divided pro and con, with the composers expressing amazement and, no doubt, some envy at the seeming ease of the trick ("Why, I could have done as well with a stencil"). To one listener, if still another opinion is worthwhile, "Bolero" is a magnificent technical stroke that may also be a stroke of genius. Be that as it may, the audience received it with great enthusiasm, repeatedly calling Dr. Koussevitzky to the stage until he had brought the orchestra to their feet. But it was an orderly enthusiasm, far from the shouting and stamping of previous report.

The Prelude to Musorgsky's Opera, "Khovantchina," was deservedly popular for the grace and delicacy with which it was played, for the objective beauty of its melodic material, for the charming play of instrumental color. Dr. Koussevitzky usually reveals his pleasaure in such music by the gesture of satisfaction with which he drops his baton across the score.

The nobility and dignity of Sibelius as a composer of symphonic music are ever more apparent with the repeated hearings which Dr. Koussevitzky's performances afford. In this second symphony he composer is moving toward a more modern and more incisive style and at he same time a more profound musical tructure that is to be observed in other ompositions of similar date. The details y which these ends are effected have een mentioned before—the individualized hoirs and the gradually evolved structure built upon previously concise statements made earlier in the symphony. /ith greater familiarity, Sibelius will increase his appreciative audience and provide fuel for the enthusiasm of his already ardent following. As for yesterday's performance, the atmosphere of pontaneity and inspiration seemed not o pervading as upon previous occasions. The Concerto of Vivaldi for final acount, though it came first upon the proram. It pleases many as it pleased last vening. The general impression is one objectivity and classical symmetry and petition carried to extreme. Dr. Koussevitzky's violins, joining with the organ sonorous closing cadence [illegible]

Playwrights' Ways

To Each One His Own Particular Courses

THERE is no one way of thinking of a play: there are as many ways as there are authors. One man will think of an idea, and will create characters as he needs them for the expounding of that idea. Another man will think of a character, and will create situations in which to exhibit that character. A third will think of a situation, and then put people into it. Mr. Sutro plans his plays for six months before he puts pen to paper. Mr. Shaw thinks of a theme and turns people loose on it as he needs them.

Sir James Barrie is reputed to write his last act first, but this cannot be true so far as "Shall We Join the Ladies?" is concerned. Perhaps that is the single instance in which he wrote his first act first. If so, it was fatal to the play, for he seems never to have got beyond the first. I say "seems," for who but Sir James himself knows whether the play was ever finished? [St. John Ervine in The London Observer

Concert Chronicle

Youngsters and "Bolero"

CHILDREN cry for it. Or more accurately, clap, shout and stamp their pleasure in it. . . . A full house yesterday afternoon awaited the Symphony Orchestra's concert for children and young people. Upstairs and down it was well sprinkled with the middle teens which, some venture to believe, are more essential to the scheme and better worth the cultivating than tender ten-year-olds. Last number on the program was Monsieur Ravel's "Bolero", for nowadays the youngsters must be in the fashion along with their elders. The piece continues through fourteen minutes —considerable tax upon young attention. As everyone knows by this time, Monsieur Ravel reiterates a single dance-theme in a changeless rhythm through a long crescendo, passing it from instrument to instrument, from choir to choir, incessantly intensifying force and color until a masterly modulation and acceleration outspread sweeping, effulgent climax.

Needless to say, the cognoscenti were curious to discover what the youngsters would make of such a music. Usually they answer to sharp-cut rhythms and stir to dance-tunes. At the outset, however, "Bolero" made little impression. Not until the saxophones picked up the motiv, did the young audience sit up and take notice. Not until the strings sharpened and deepened it were they on edge. Thereafter, they were as excited as the rest of us at a first hearing of "Bolero"; while the end loosed the usual torrent of applause. The effect of the piece is primarily nervous. The middle teens have nerves. Their bodies twitched, their hands clenched, as adults' have been known to do. The twelve-year-olds, and under, were relatively impassive, even restless and baffled. Dr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra through "Bolero," and the sixth performance of the piece gave no ground for this or that reproach to his version. True, he begins more quietly and proceeds at a slower pace than did Mr. Toscanini in New York; but the conductor had both these indications from Mme. Rubinstein for whom, as dancer, Monsieur Ravel wrote the piece. In Paris, moreover, it was played, under the eye and ear of the composer, with a like outbursting climax.

The juveniles were not too responsive to the light rhythms and light scoring of three dances, led by Mr. Burgin, from a ballet of Rameau. More to their liking was the incisive, full-throated, march—drums, trumpets 'n ev'ything — from Prokoffiev's opera of "Three Oranges." And are donkeys an extinct animal for American children and youth, altogether outside daily experience? An audience of European youngsters would have laughed loudly when the long-eared species crossed the screen to become audible in Saint-Saëns's "Animals' Carnival." The young Bostonians of all ranks at Symphony Hall gave them no more than a glance and a smile. In fact, they went sentimental over Saint-Saëns's aviary-menagerie; liked best the cuckoo calling out of the woods and the swan swimming through succulent 'cello-song. Nor, as the signs went, were they much interested in Tournier's thin-bodied, adroitly contrived harp-fantasia or the wonders of tone and skill accomplished upon it by the virtuoso-Zighera. Give them Ravel and his tavern-tune. Or give them the figures out of eighteenth-century ballet or opera shown on the screen apropos Rameau's dances. Then they laughed heartily. Little "hundred percenters" that they are, anything not American or up-to-date was intrinsically comic.

Incidents and Prospects

Since two symphonies and a new Divertimento by Mr. Prokoffiev are as yet unheard in Boston, some regret that the Symphony Concerts this week contain only his early and familiar Scythian Suite in addition to the Concerto in which he will be guest-composer-pianist. The exactions of that piece, requiring thorough rehearsal, stood in the way of either Symphony or Divertimento; nor, had there been time and opportunity, were scores easily obtainable. . . . To end the program, Dr. Koussevitzky has put by the two Spanish pieces out of Albéniz for the usual dances from de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

The annual pair of choral concerts by the Symphony Orchestra assisted is set for Friday and Saturday, Feb. 14 and 15. Debussy's version for women's voices of Rosetti's "Blessed Damozel" and hrs incidental music to d'Annunzio's play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," will divide the program. The Choral Society of Radcliffe College, prepared by Mr. Woodworth, will be choir for the one: the chorus of The Cecilia, made ready by Arthur Fiedler, for the other. For the first times, the music to "Saint Sebastian," as some say the last work of Debussy's prime, will be heard in America in virtual entirety." Mme. Ritter-Ciampi, Parisian singer, will take the solo-parts.

For record beyond the longest memory, only two concerts are announced in Boston through next week—the first of the operatic fortnight—and both fall on Sunday afternoon. "The opera is coming to town," as they say in Tulsa and Wichita.

H T. P.

Transmanic [illegible]

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Eugene Goossens, as a guest, conducted the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. His program was as follows: Wagner, A Faust Overture; Schumann, Symphony No. 1, B flat major; Goossens, Concertino for Double String Orchestra; Respighi, Roman Festivals. The Concertino and the Roman Festivals were played in Boston for the first time.

Mr. Goossens's Concertino was originally written in 1927 as a String Octet and as such was performed for the first time in London last March. The first performance of the work in its present shape was in New York at a concert of the Composers' League in December of last year. The Concertino is interesting: not only as showing the technical skill of the composer; the music is alive, with a vivacity that is not academically perfunctory; it is new and sparkling wine in bottles that have not been covered with dust in the bin of a poker-backed conservative. The modern spirit that enlivens certain harmonic schemes is not that coming from an experimenter relying on polytony or any other "tony" for effect, in the desire to be abreast, or a little ahead, of the times. While the work is, as Mr. Goossens says,, somewhat in the style of the old Italian concertos—Vivaldi, for example—it might be by a Vivaldi writing today.

For the theme of the slow section Mr. Goossens invented a melody in folk-song fashion, a charming melody without affectation of simplicity but as appealing as though it expressed the emotion of some unknown, humble singer moved to vocal expression of what was felt within him.

The Concertino was brilliantly performed by the incomparable string section of the orchestra. The melody in the slow section was beautifully sung by the first viola, Mr. Lefranc, whose full, rich tone was not allowed to degenerate into cloying sentimentalism or lacrymose wailing. The audience evidently and fully appreciated the music and the performance.

Respighi's "Roman Festivals" was a disappointment, not wholly unanticipated. In 1916 the "Fountains of Rome" appeared; eight years later the "Pines of Rome;" to form a trilogy, Mr. Respighi completed the "Roman Festivals" in 1928: "Visions and evocations of Roman fetes." Mr. Toscanini brought out the composition for the first time anywhere in New York from manuscript last February. Mr. Goossens was the first to conduct it in London (June 13, 1929).

Mr. Respighi glorifies Rome again by describing in tones: First, the martyrs in the Circus Maximus, singing cheerfully in spite of the fact that wild beasts are about to devour them. Though the crowd at first shouts: "Hail! Nero!" the calmness of the martyrs is disquieting, and the people rise from their seats as agitated as those about to die are unperturbed. The second section portrays praying pilgrims on the highway, finally reaching a height from which the holy city is seen. A hymn of praise—church bells ring in answer. An October Festival is the subject of the third section—tinkling of bells, songs of love, a serenade. In the fourth section it is the night before the Epiphany. Fanfares of trumpets, country tunes, a barrel-organ and the voice of a "barker" sounding from a booth—a frantically jovial populace; in fact a "whoop it up," with the full strength of the company.

The composer s quoted as saying that his instrumentation represents "the maximum of orchestral sonority and color." One might say "noise and gaudy coloring." The most musical, and at the same time truly descriptive pages are those in which the pilgrims on their march finally arrive at the summit of the hill. And in the fourth section the wild tune of a pleasing vulgarity with the cadence used by Mascagni in "Cavalleria Rusticana" has true character befitting the scene. But too often the instrumentation is thick, not allowing contrasting themes to work fully their will, nor are the musical contents, even for festival representation, as significant as those of the "Fountains" and the "Pines." Yet the spirited performance, the admirable conducting by Mr. Goossens, the final blare, crash and general hullabaloo excited the audience to stormy applause.

The ability of Mr. Goossens as a conductor, his musically intelligent interpretations, his authority and his excellent taste, added to an ingratiating presence and a magnetic personality were made known to the Symphony audiences when he was invited to conduct this orchestra four years ago last Wednesday. His fine qualities were again revealed in his masterly, romantically poetic interpretation of the overture, much of which has aged, and the ever fresh symphony by Schumann.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik: Prokofieff, Scythian Suite; Prokofieff, piano concerto in G minor, No. 2 (first time in the United States, Mr. Prokofieff, pianist); Albeniz-Arbos, La Fete-Dieu a Seville and Triana (from "Iberia").

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MONDAY CONCERT

Dr Koussevitzky Back From Vacation

Conducting for the first time since his sojourn in New York, Dr Koussevitzky presented to his Monday evening audience a sequence of interesting selections of widely divergent styles. The classicism of Vivaldi, the fantasy of Mussorgsky, the bizarre Ravel, and the austere Sibelius, provided a variety of moods that bespoke a finely chosen program.

Alexander Siloti's arrangement of the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ spun its merry, fugal through two movements that might have easily been written by Bach. There is a perennial controversy among musical pundits whether Bach did not really write some of the works credited to Vivaldi. Certainly the Largo movement, which was conducted with beautiful, not overstressed, expressiveness by Koussevitzky, is comparable even to the famous air from Bach's Suite in D major. The organ admirably sustained the climaxes.

Nothing could be more different from Vivaldi's geometry than the Mussorgsky prelude to "Khovanstchina." This prelude, which illustrates the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin of Moscow, was performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in October 24, 1924, with Dr Koussevitzky conducting. The opera has for its subject the conflict between Old and New Russia. This prelude is a quaint thing. The theme has a strong resemblance to the Volga Boatman's Song, although it is disguised by its lyrical character, in contrast to the rhythmic effect of the popular tune. Dr Koussevitzky carried the extremely delicate passages at the end with a delightful finesse.

Ravel's bolero, dedicated to Ida Rubenstein, the dancer, was first brought out and danced by her at Paris in November, 1928. This remarkable piece might easily be dismissed as nothing but a novel sensation, if it were not for its unmistakable, compelling effect. It depicts a Spanish dance, and little by little excited to a frenzy as the dancer becomes more and more animated. Knives are drawn—the woman tossed from arms to arms. A drum gives the dance rhythm, which is maintained throughout; a flute pipes the theme, which is taken up by wind instruments in turn; then by groups of instruments. Without any rhythmic harmonic or melodic variation, "there is a steady crescendo for about 20 minutes, until there is an explosive modulation—brass and percussion instruments swell the din until at last there is what has been described as a tornado of sound."

The monotony of tune and rhythm, at first rather irritating, produces in its climax an irresistible effect. Needless to say, the orchestra made the most of this show piece. The audience, though not quite so wildly enthusiastic as when it was first performed here a few weeks ago, was warmly appreciative.

The last number on the program was Sibelius' Symphony in D major. Koussevitzky's conducting of the first two movements was not at all emphatic, but in the last two movements, played without interruption, he was more coherent; and particularly toward the final section of the last movement he maintained the stirring, singing theme that leads to the concluding, sonorous apotheosis.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The third concert in the Monday night series of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Vivaldi-Siloti, Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ; Moussorgsky, Prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina"; Ravel, Bolero; Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D major.

Dr. Koussevitzky has acquainted his audiences with several of Vivaldi's, the red-haired priest's, concertos. Hearing them, one fails to see the justice of opinions expressed by solemn writers, as Sir Hubert Perry, who spoke of Vivaldi's slow movements as showing "glibness and a certain mastery of technic," but added that the musical ideas are little more than "poses"—whatever that may mean. This music has lived, for it has nobility and beauty. Not without cause did Dr. Koussevitzky put this concerto on the first program he prepared for Boston.

The Prelude to "Khovanstchina" undoubtedly owes in great measure its charm to Rimsky-Korsakov who edited the pages that Moussorgsky left and orchestrated them. It matters little, whether the hearer is acquainted with the scene on the stage; as pure and absolute music, this Prelude has a peculiar charm if only for sheer euphony and atmosphere.

Ravel's "Bolero" excites at a first hearing, it pleases by the monotony of repetitions, which exerts a hypnotic influence. The clever trick of the composer, a veritable tour de force, does not surprise one after first acquaintance. The "Bolero" shows technical skill in the establishment of a long crescendo and in the sudden, unanticipated stormy modulation; and this is all.

It cannot be said by way of praise that Sibelius's Second Symphony is "characteristic" of him, for he is himself in all his music, an imposing figure in his loneliness, his deep-seated melancholy, his rage and passion suggestive of landscapes and seascapes of hi beloved Finland.

The various moods of these four compositions were fully appreciated by the accomplished and magnetic conductor, and the performance by the superb instrument on which he plays was of the highest order.

H. F. B.

GOSSENS IS LEADER AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

EUGENE GOOSSENS, English composer and conductor, who has been in this country for the better part of the last six years, conducts this week's Boston Symphony concerts as guest. Following a week after the Russian Glazounov, who led a program composed entirely of his own works, Mr. Goossens was in the dilemma familier to most guest-conductors choosing their programs. If he features modern or unfamiliar works many complain at not seeing him with a program of classics by which his ability may be compared with others. If he chooses classics, others complain that these are overplayed.

Eugene Goossens

Mr. Goossens' opening number was a fortunate choice—Wagner's "Faust" Overture, which is not often played here. Unfortunately the Schumann B-flat Symphony has been given here often under Mr. Koussevitzky. Consequently there was reason for grumbling, although Mr. Goossens may not have been responsible.

Nor can the distinguished Englishman hope to make us forget Mr. Koussevitzky's glowing version of the Symphony. In its place Goossens would have us hear a Schumann of melodic line, played "straight," without the romantic ardor, the joy of Spring that Schumann would have his music express. In suiting his own temperament, Goossens does violence to Schumann's

In the second part of the program the conductor is on home territory—his own Concertino for Double String Orchestra and the latest of Respighi's war-horse, "Feste Romane." The Concertino is in nine voices, built up more or less on a single theme, though there is a slow section and the single movement has three distinct parts. The music is forthrightly modern, the development ingenious.

Again "Bolero" As A Monday Hears It

For the third program of the Monday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, returning to command, presented an uncommonly diversified program. Neither in style, national character, musical substance; nor instrumental color was there the slightest affinity between any two pieces. The items were Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for Orchestra and Organ, the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," Ravel's celebrated "Bolero" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, in D major. The audience extended a cordial greeting to Dr. Koussevitzky as he approached the conductor's stand. Thereafter, applause was the immediate reaction to the music at hand. Vivaldi's Concerto found but lukewarm favor. Musorgsky's Prelude delighted those who prefer melody and picturesque instrumental niceties above all else; it was undoubtedly a popular number. From those who listened carefully and who have acquired a special fondness for the composer, the Symphony of Sibelius drew hearty applause, though it easily could be seen that the audience as a whole would have received one of the familiar symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms or Chaikovsky with much greater cordiality. (Strange musical material, especially in the more serious forms, is not always ponular at Monday concerts.) The summit of the evening, however—to the vast majority, at least—was Ravel's irresistible "Bolero."

As everyone knows, "Bolero" is the talk of the town. The piece is generally accepted and acclaimed by the public at large. Witness the growing tenseness as the repeated and amplified melody probed deeper and deeper under the musical skin. Possibly many grew really excited and only with difficulty refrained from shouting. More likely there was a large degree of humorous speculation as to which instrument would next take up the theme or how much louder it could be proclaimed; hearty and appreciative laughter would here be the natural reaction, which, to nervous persons easily excited by relentless rhythms, might become a trifle hysterical. It is to be questioned, however, whether the great popularity of the piece derives so much from its inherent musical qualities as from its obvious character. . . . . "A child can follow it" . . . Among musicians and musical amateurs opinion is about evenly divided pro and con, with the composers expressing amazement and, no doubt, some envy at the seeming ease of the trick ("Why, I could have done as well with a stencil"). To one listener, if still another opinion is worthwhile, "Bolero" is a magnificent technical stroke that may also be a stroke of genius. Be that as it may, the audience received it with great enthusiasm, repeatedly calling Dr. Koussevitzky to the stage until he had brought the orchestra to their feet. But it was an orderly enthusiasm, far from the shouting and stamping of previous report.

The Prelude to Musorgsky's Opera, "Khovantchina," was deservedly popular for the grace and delicacy with which it was played, for the objective beauty of its melodic material, for the charming play of instrumental color. Dr. Koussevitzky usually reveals his pleasaure in such music by the gesture of satisfaction with which he drops his baton across the score.

The nobility and dignity of Sibelius as a composer of symphonic music are ever more apparent with the repeated hearings which Dr. Koussevitzky's performances afford. In this second symphony the composer is moving toward a more modern and more incisive style and at the same time a more profound musical structure that is to be observed in other compositions of similar date. The details by which these ends are effected have been mentioned before—the individualized choirs and the gradually evolved structure built upon previously concise statements made earlier in the symphony. With greater familiarity, Sibelius will increase his appreciative audience and provide fuel for the enthusiasm of his already ardent following. As for yesterday's performance, the atmosphere of spontaneitv and inspiration seemed not so pervading as upon previous occasions.

The Concerto of Vivaldi for final account, though it came first upon the program. It pleases many as it pleased last evening. The general impression is one of objectivity and classical symmetry and repetition carried to extreme. Dr. Koussevitzky's violins, joining with the organ for sonorous closing cadence, alone give sensuous beautiy.

N. M. J.

Playwrights' Ways

To Each One His Own Particular Courses

THERE is no one way of thinking of a play: there are as many ways as there are authors. One man will think of an idea, and will create characters as he needs them for the expounding of that idea. Another man will think of a character, and will create situations in which to exhibit that character. A third will think of a situation, and then put people into it. Mr. Sutro plans his plays for six months before he puts pen to paper. Mr. Shaw thinks of a theme and turns people loose on it as he needs them.

Sir James Barrie is reputed to write his last act first, but this cannot be true so far as "Shall We Join the Ladies?" is concerned. Perhaps that is the single instance in which he wrote his first act first. If so, it was fatal to the play, for he seems never to have got beyond the first. I say "seems," for who but Sir James himself knows whether the play was ever finished? [St. John Ervine in The London Observer

Concert Chron[illegible]

Youngsters and "Bolero"

CHILDREN cry for it. C[illegible] curately, clap, shout ar[illegible] their pleasure in it. . . . [illegible] house yesterday afternoon awai[illegible] Symphony Orchestra's concert for[illegible] dren and young people. Upstairs down it was well sprinkled with the[illegible] dle teens which, some venture to be[illegible] are more essential to the scheme[illegible] better worth the cultivating than te[illegible] ten-year-olds. Last number on the[illegible] gram was Monsieur Ravel's "Bole[illegible] for nowadays the youngsters mus[illegible] in the fashion along with their elders[illegible] piece continues through fourteen mi[illegible] —considerable tax upon young a[illegible] tion. As everyone knows by this[illegible] Monsieur Ravel reiterates a single d[illegible] theme in a changeless rhythm th[illegible] a long crescendo, passing it from in[illegible] ment to instrument, from choir to [illegible] incessantly intensifying force and [illegible] until a masterly modulation and [illegible] eration outspread sweeping, effi[illegible] climax.

Needless to say, the cognoscenti [illegible] curious to discover what the youn[illegible] would make of such a music. U[illegible] they answer to sharp-cut rhythm[illegible] stir to dance-tunes. At the outset[illegible] ever, "Bolero" made little impr[illegible] Not until the saxophones picked [illegible] motiv, did the young audience sit [illegible] take notice. Not until the strings [illegible] ened and deepened it were they on[illegible] Thereafter, they were as excited a[illegible] rest of us at a first hearing of "Bol[illegible] while the end loosed the usual torren[illegible] applause. The effect of the piece is [illegible] marily nervous. The middle teens h[illegible] nerves. Their bodies twitched, th[illegible] hands clenched, as adults' have be[illegible] known to do. The twelve-year-olds, an[illegible] under, were relatively impassive, even restless and baffled. Dr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra through "Bolero," and the sixth performance of the piece gave no ground for this or that reproach to his version. True, he begins more quietly and proceeds at a slower pace than did Mr. Toscanini in New York; but the conductor had both these indications from Mme. Rubinstein for whom, as dancer, Monsieur Ravel wrote the piece. In Paris, moreover, it was played, under the eye and ear of the composer, with a like outbursting climax.

The juveniles were not too responsive to the light rhythms and light scoring of three dances, led by Mr. Burgin, from a ballet of Rameau. More to their liking was the incisive, full-throated, march—drums, trumpets 'n ev'ything — from Prokoffiev's opera of "Three Oranges." And are donkeys an extinct animal for American children and youth, altogether outside daily experience? An audience of European youngsters would have laughed loudly when the long-eared species crossed the screen to become audible in Saint-Saëns's "Animals' Carnival." The young Bostonians of all ranks at Symphony Hall gave them no more than a glance and a smile. In fact, they went sentimental over Saint-Saëns's aviary-menagerie; liked best the cuckoo calling out of the woods and the swan swimming through succulent 'cello-song. Nor, as the signs went, were they much interested in Tournier's thin-bodied, adroitly contrived harp-fantasia or the wonders of tone and skill accomplished upon it by the virtuoso-Zighera. Give them Ravel and his tavern-tune. Or give them the figures out of eighteenth-century ballet or opera shown on the screen apropos Rameau's dances. Then they laughed heartily. Little "hundred percenters" that they are, anything not American or up-to-date was intrinsically comic.

Tansmanic [illegible]

[illegible] piece, requiring [illegible] rehearsal, stood in the way of either Symphony or Divertimento; nor, had there been time and opportunity, were scores easily obtainable. . . . To end the program, Dr. Koussevitzky has put by the two Spanish pieces out of Albéniz for the usual dances from de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

The annual pair of choral concerts by the Symphony Orchestra assisted is set for Friday and Saturday, Feb. 14 and 15. Debussy's version for women's voices of Rosetti's "Blessed Damozel" and hrs incidental music to d'Annunzio's play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," will divide the program. The Choral Society of Radcliffe College, prepared by Mr. Woodworth, will be choir for the one: the chorus of The Cecilia, made ready by Arthur Fiedler, for the other. For the first times, the music to "Saint Sebastian," as some say the last work of Debussy's prime, will be heard in America in virtual entirety." Mme. Ritter-Ciampi, Parisian singer, will take the solo-parts.

For record beyond the longest memory, only two concerts are announced in Boston through next week—the first of the operatic fortnight—and both fall on Sunday afternoon. "The opera is coming to town," as they say in Tulsa and Wichita.

H T. P.

ebruary Third and Fourth oston, Massachusetts

ottender, surveys show.

[illegible] choice from [illegible] symphonies. He selected the Dvorak composition because he felt that it would give the greatest pleasure to the largest number of people. Tickets for the concert are now being sold at Walter D. Moses and Company, where seats also may be obtained for the recital to be given the following Monday night, February 10, by Jascha Heifetz, violinist.

Players --- Music and Musicians --- The

Dr. Koussevitzky Announces a Spring Festival of Brahms

Schnabel for Distinguished Guest

Four Special, Two Regular, Concerts of Orchestral, Choral, Chamber-Pieces

Arthur Schnabel, Pianist

EXCEPT in summer, when no one should work, Dr. Koussevitzky is not willingly a man of leisure. Nominally, through the current fortnight, he is on holiday. Actually, he has been preparing the programs and assembling the forces for the Brahms Festival, foreshadowed last autumn in the calendar of the Symphony Orchestra. As now and finally arranged, it will consist of four special concerts in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 23; Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, March 24, 25, 26. To them will be joined the preceding Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, March 21 and Saturday evening, March 22. For the special concerts, with the whole hall open to all comers, seats will go on sale, at the automatic subscription board, on Saturday morning next. For the two regular Symphony Concerts, no seats, except chance "returns," are available.

The Brahms Festival marks no anniversary from his career; but like the Beethoven Centenary Festival of 1927—one of the largest and best-remembered events in Dr. Koussevitzky's Bostonian progress—it is planned to range widely through his music. Two of the special concerts will be orchestral; one choral; one for chamber-pieces. At the regular Symphony Concerts, the Second Symphony, the Third Symphony and the Academic Overture will be played.

The special concert of Sunday afternoon, March 23, will be orchestral, including the Variations on a Theme of Haydn; the Second Piano-Concerto; the Fourth Symphony. The concert of Monday evening, March 24, will be choral, divided between "The Song of Destiny" and the German Requiem. Chamber-pieces will fill the concert of Tuesday evening, March 25: a Sonata for Violin and Piano; numbers from the "Liebeslieder" for small mixed chorus; piano-pieces; the Quintet in F minor for Piano and Strings. The final concert, on Wednesday evening, March 26, will array the Rhapsody for Alto, Chorus and Orchestra; the First Piano-Concerto; the First Symphony.

The forces concerned: As conductor through the whole festival, Dr. Koussevitzky; for orchestra, the Symphony Orchestra; for chorus, the Harvard Glee Club of Dr. Davison, the Radcliffe Choral Society of Mr. Woodworth; for the chamber concert, the Burgin String Quartet of members of the orchestra; for assisting singers at need, Mme. Matzenauer (of the Metropolitan Opera House), Miss Jeannette Vreeland, Mr. Fraser Gange. Finally, for illustrious guest, bidden to Boston especially for this festiv Schnabel, the pianist. Thoug seldom visited the United State been heard here rarely, his spreads over the length and b Europe. As musician, he exc classic repertory; while in Bra symphonic concertos, both in the festival, none transcends will share also in the chamb In four words, as the social w has it, "the guest of honor."

Goossens Brings Two Novel Pi

Respighi's "Feste Ro His Own Concertin at Symphony Hall

TO the Symphony Concerts o and Saturday, Mr. Eugene of stimulating memory, ret guest-conductor. Following est custom courteously and, probabl relish, to them he will bring tw numbers: his own Concertino for String-Orchestra, as yet heard fr stages; "Feste Romane," or "Roma tivals," the third of Ottorino Res symphonic poems about the Eterna He will also begin both concerts revival of Wagner's "Faust Ove so long unheard at Symphony Hal be virtually strange piece.

Conductor as Composer

Mr. Goossens first wrote his Conc as an Octet for Strings in 1927. In of 1929, it received first performa this form by the joint efforts of t ternational String Quartet and th tronieri Quartet of Milan. Whe transformed it into a Concertino he doned the Octet, substituting for Double String Orchestra, rather o model of the concerti of Vivaldi; inv a new independent bass for the secc the two groups making the doub chestra; divided equally violins, violoncellos, so that the concertino s be something more than an eight-v composition. In this form it was heard at a concert of the League of posers in New York on Dec. 18 last; in Detroit on Jan. 2 and 3, when Goossens was guest-conductor for th sent Gabrilowitsch. Although the certino is comprised in a single ment, within those confines it through an Allegro moderato, an An espressivo, a final Allegro. For the formances of the Detroit Symphon chestra Mr. Goossens contributed th formative note:

The work is based on the rhythm figure heard at the outset, a figu which also forms the basis of t concluding Allegro. The theme the slow movement is in folk-so vein, and constitutes a contrast The first and third sections. Just b fore the end of the Finale, the All gro movement is interrupted by sudden change of time and key an Andante 4-4, in which the prin pal theme temporarily assumes darker, somber, and altogether mo sinister aspect, as though the ga jovial nature of the Finale had bee interrupted by some tragic remini cence. This lasts but a short tim however, and the Concertino co cludes with a lively Presto.

Respighi By and Large

And now to his "Fountains of Ro (1917) and his "Pines of Rome" (19 Signor Respighi has added the new "F tivals of Rome"—by report the last of series. In 1928 the symphonic poem written. First performance came in N York almost a year ago under Mr. T canini, Feb. 28, 1929. At that time Gilman wrote in the program-book the Philharmonic Society that the wo was still in manuscript. The prin score is now at hand, under date of 19 It assembles an orchestra the like which has not been assembled befo Behold the list of known and unkno instruments: three flutes and picco wo oboes and English horn; two cla nets, bass-clarinet, small clarinet in two bassoons and double bassoon; fo horns; four trumpets; two trombon bass trombone, bass tuba; tympa Basque drum (or tambourine); clapp rattle; small and large tambourine; t ingle; cymbals; bass drum with cymbal tached; tam-tam; little bells; two chur bells; xylolphone; two tavolette; ha piano two and four hands; organ; thr Roman trumpets (buccine), mandolin; t usual quintet of strings. Mr. Gilm quoted Respighi as having said that th instrumentation "represents the ma mum of orchestral sonority and color!"

Though there are four divisions "Feste Romane," it proceeds from begi

Continued on Following Page

Goossens Brings Two Novel Pieces

Continued from Preceding Page

ning to end without pause. Respighi has written a "program" herewith quoted:

I. Circenses (Circuses).—"A threatening sky hangs over the Massino Circus, but it is the people's holiday: 'Ave Nero.' The iron doors are unlocked, the strains of a religious song and the howling of wild beasts float on the air. The crowd rises in agitation; unperturbed, the song of the martyrs develops, conquers and then is lost in the tumult."

A feature of this division is the martial solo-like theme given to the three Roman trumpets and dominating a considerable portion of the movement. Of the buccina Grove has this to say: "An instrument of the bugle type of bore. It was curved to nearly a circle, and the bell rested on the shoulder of the player. A specimen found at Pompeii and now preserved at the National Museum at Naples is pitched in G, its proper tones therefore correspond with those of the French horn when pitched in G." The theme enters after three measures of vigorous introduction, and is heard first over a roll on the tam-tam. It is interrupted several times by this introduction, which then in a mighty crescendo takes on the value of a theme. A middle section is introduced by heavily rhythmed staccato chords in all the low-pitched instruments. The main portion of this section is a lyric Andante in the higher pitched instruments. The original Allegro returns, re-introduces the buccina and the opening introductory figure; grows more and more vivid until it reaches an Allegro vivo of frenzed brilliance, including, at the high point a huge chord on the organ. There is a pause of effective silence, and a few heavily marked chords, Largo, lead into the second main division.

II. Giubileo (The Jubilee).—"The pilgrims trail along the highway, praying. Finally appears from the summit of Monte Mario, to ardent eyes and groping souls, the holy city: 'Rome! Rome! A hymn of praise bursts forth, the churches ring out their reply."

This division begins Doloroso e Stanco (Sadly and Wearily). There is a string figure by way of introduction. A clarinet and a bassoon sing their somber theme, based on the harmonies of the old church-modes which are favorite matter with Respighi. There is climax and much repetition of the theme. An Allegro moderato follows, gay and joyous, for full orchestra, with bright use of high-pitched instruments. Against it eventually horns, trumpets and trombones introduce canonically another plain-song-like motif. The whole grows to an Allegro festoso, which is a tumultuous orchestral ensemble with brass and organ on the plain-song theme. There are persistent bell-effects. The Jubilee subsides to a quiet close, continuing, however, to

III. The October Festival—"The October festival in the Roman 'Castelli' covered with vines: hunting echoes, tinkling of bells, songs of love. Then in the tender even-fall arises a romantic serenade." The movement is Allegro giocoso. There are light chords; a horn begins a jovial theme. The mood continues through many instruments and motifs and combinations. When a contrast appears, it remains broadly within the original mood. Then a very gradual, long continued slowing down, punctuated by rhapsodic cadenza-like passages for various instruments, under some of which might be written, "By courtesy of Nicolai Andreievitch Rimsky-Korsakov." "October Festivals" is linked to

IV. The Epiphany—"The night before Epiphany in the Piazza Navona: a characteristic rhythm of trumpets dominates the frantic clamor; above the swelling noise float, from time to time, rustic motives, saltarello-cadenzas, the strains of a barrel-organ at a booth and the ballyhoo at the door; the harsh song of the drunken and the lively stornello in which is expressed the popular feeling. 'Lasstece passà, semo Romani!' (We are Romans, let us pass!")

Vivo. The carnival-spirit prevails. The movement is one of energies and vigors of brilliances and tours de force, of sonorities piled on sonorities, mostly at driving speeds. Thus to describe the music is sufficient characterization. The Italian dance "Saltarello" interrupts with the hard-voiced small clarinet taking the tune. This makes way for a "Tempo pesante di Valse," flute, harp, piano, bells, with the organ giving the waltz-rhythm. The saltarello is resumed. Then there is return to the Vivo of the beginning. From this point onward there seems no end to the successive climaxes—high point after high point. Is Signor Respighi deliberately trying to surpass the tremendous close that he piled up in "Pini di Roma"? A final Prestissimo with massed brass and whirling percussion at last brings conclusion.

A. H. M.

Macy Company A

Players --- Music and Musicians --- The Sc

Dr. Koussevitzky Announces a Spring Festival of Brahms

Schnabel for Distinguished Guest

Four Special, Two Regular, Concerts of Orchestral, Choral, Chamber-Pieces

Arthur Schnabel, Pianist

EXCEPT in summer, when no one should work, Dr. Koussevitzky is not willingly a man of leisure. Nominally, through the current fortnight, he is on holiday. Actually, he has been preparing the programs and assembling the forces for the Brahms Festival, foreshadowed last autumn in the calendar of the Symphony Orchestra. As now and finally arranged, it will consist of four special concerts in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 23; Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, March 24, 25, 26. To them will be joined the preceding Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, March 21 and Saturday evening, March 22. For the special concerts, with the whole hall open to all comers, seats will go on sale, at the automatic subscription board, on Saturday morning next. For the two regular Symphony Concerts, no seats, except chance "returns," are available.

The Brahms Festival marks no anniversary from his career; but like the Beethoven Centenary Festival of 1927—one of the largest and best-remembered events in Dr. Koussevitzky's Bostonian progress—it is planned to range widely through his music. Two of the special concerts will be orchestral; one choral; one for chamber-pieces. At the regular Symphony Concerts, the Second Symphony, the Third Symphony and the Academic Overture will be played.

The special concert of Sunday afternoon, March 23, will be orchestral, including the Variations on a Theme of Haydn; the Second Piano-Concerto; the Fourth Symphony. The concert of Monday evening, March 24, will be choral, divided between "The Song of Destiny" and the German Requiem. Chamber-pieces will fill the concert of Tuesday evening, March 25: a Sonata for Violin and Piano; numbers from the "Liebeslieder" for small mixed chorus; piano-pieces; the Quintet in F minor for Piano and Strings. The final concert, on Wednesday evening, March 26, will array the Rhapsody for Alto, Chorus and Orchestra; the First Piano-Concerto; the First Symphony.

The forces concerned: As conductor through the whole festival, Dr. Koussevitzky; for orchestra, the Symphony Orchestra; for chorus, the Harvard Glee Club of Dr. Davison, the Radcliffe Choral Society of Mr. Woodworth; for the chamber concert, the Burgin String Quartet of members of the orchestra; for assisting singers at need, Mme. Matzenauer (of the Metropolitan Opera House), Miss Jeannette Vreeland, Mr. Fraser Gange. Finally, for illustrious guest, bidden to Boston especially for this festival, Arthur Schnabel, the pianist. Though he has seldom visited the United States and has been heard here rarely, his renown spreads over the length and breadth of Europe. As musician, he excels in the classic repertory; while in Brahms's two symphonic concertos, both included in the festival, none transcends him. He will share also in the chamber-concert In four words, as the social vocabulary has it, "the guest of honor."

Goossens Brings Two Novel Pieces

Respighi's "Feste Romane," His Own Concertino, at Symphony Hall

TO the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Mr. Eugene Goossens, of stimulating memory, returns as guest-conductor. Following established custom courteously and, probably, with relish, to them he will bring two novel numbers: his own Concertino for Double String-Orchestra, as yet heard from few stages; "Feste Romane," or "Roman Festivals," the third of Ottorino Respighi's symphonic poems about the Eternal City. He will also begin both concerts with a revival of Wagner's "Faust Overture," so long unheard at Symphony Hall as to be virtually strange piece.

Conductor as Composer

Mr. Goossens first wrote his Concertino as an Octet for Strings in 1927. In March of 1929, it received first performance in this form by the joint efforts of the International String Quartet and the Poltronieri Quartet of Milan. When he transformed it into a Concertino he abandoned the Octet, substituting for it a Double String Orchestra, rather on the model of the concerti of Vivaldi; invented a new independent bass for the second of the two groups making the double orchestra; divided equally violins, violas, violoncellos, so that the concertino should be something more than an eight-voiced composition. In this form it was first heard at a concert of the League of Composers in New York on Dec. 18 last; again in Detroit on Jan. 2 and 3, when Mr. Goossens was guest-conductor for the absent Gabrilowitsch. Although the Concertino is comprised in a single movement, within those confines it runs through an Allegro moderato, an Andante espressivo, a final Allegro. For the performances of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra Mr. Goossens contributed this informative note:

> The work is based on the rhythmic figure heard at the outset, a figure which also forms the basis of the concluding Allegro. The theme of the slow movement is in folk-song vein, and constitutes a contrast to The first and third sections. Just before the end of the Finale, the Allegro movement is interrupted by a sudden change of time and key to an Andante 4-4, in which the principal theme temporarily assumes a darker, somber, and altogether more sinister aspect, as though the gay, jovial nature of the Finale had been interrupted by some tragic reminiscence. This lasts but a short time, however, and the Concertino concludes with a lively Presto.

Respighi By and Large

And now to his "Fountains of Rome" (1917) and his "Pines of Rome" (1924), Signor Respighi has added the new "Festivals of Rome"—by report the last of the series. In 1928 the symphonic poem was written. First performance came in New York almost a year ago under Mr. Toscanini, Feb. 28, 1929. At that time Mr. Gilman wrote in the program-book of the Philharmonic Society that the work was still in manuscript. The printed score is now at hand, under date of 1929. It assembles an orchestra the like of which has not been assembled before. Behold the list of known and unknown instruments: three flutes and piccolo; wo oboes and English horn: two clarinets, bass-clarinet, small clarinet in D; two bassoons and double bassoon; four horns; four trumpets; two trombones, bass trombone, bass tuba; tympani; Basque drum (or tambourine): clapper; rattle: small and large tambourine: triangle; cymbals: bass drum with cymbal attached; tam-tam; little bells; two church bells; xylolphone; two tavolette; harp, piano two and four hands; organ; three Roman trumpets (buccine), mandolin; the usual quintet of strings. Mr. Gilman quoted Respighi as having said that this instrumentation "represents the maximum of orchestral sonority and color!"

Though there are four divisions to "Feste Romane," it proceeds from begin-

Continued on Following Page

Symphony

Early Wagner, Late Respighi, Another Guest

Eugene Goossens as Conductor Through A Variegated Symphony Concert

Transcript Feb Jan 24

NOT until Monday does the master of the house return. Consequently on Friday the weekly shifting of the symphonic scene. To the stage across which the elderly Glazunov had lumbered, now loped the relatively youthful Eugene Goossens. His slight, trim figure, from top to toe stamped Sackville Street, replaced, on the director's stand, the bulky presence of the loose-clad Russian. The conductor-composer from London, via Rochester which is in New York, swung a long stick through longer arcs, or pointing it now to floor, again to ceiling, beat the measure; whereas the professor from Leningrad plied a short baton in narrow radius. Inviting the orchestra to his will, Mr. Glazunov stood as firm as a rock; urging it to his purpose, Mr. Goossens whipped and tossed about pictorially. The all-father of musical Russia only incidentally a conductor, trusted his symphony, his concerto, his tone-poem to the band as one trusts a friend to the conveying ship or airplane. The busy Briton, who composes in the intervals of conducting, had an explicit notion of what he wished for Schumann, Wagner and Respighi, no less than for his own Concertino.

Mr. Glazunov's program, a week ago, was the choice of a composer setting thrice over, before a friendly audience, his characteristic work. Mr. Goossens assembled a list that ranged out of the middle nineteenth century into the early twentieth; gave diversified room for his prowess as conductor; accorded with the custom of these concerts. Only incidentally, as it seemed, was one of the chosen pieces—and the briefest—his own. With Wagner's "Faust Overture" he restored a long-neglected music to Symphony Hall. With Respighi's "Roman Festivals" he proffered to the audience the newest specimen of a composer whom it had often applauded. If with Schumann's "Spring Symphony," he poached upon one of Dr. Koussevitzky's happiest hunting-grounds, he wished plainly to follow the "Faust Overture" with another example of mid-nineteenth century romanticism. In turn, the tone-picturing of Signor Respighi descends in direct line from Berlioz and Liszt. Indeed, through three-fourths and more of the concert, Mr. Goossens might have been a conductor whose specialty was the romantics. Only in the Concertino for Strings did he disclose himself as the temperate modernist he is. In form, the piece harks back to the ancients; in substance, it is self-contained music of line rather than suggestive music of color. In performance, the composer-conductor measured "expression." For what child of the Stravinskian age does not feel his lip curl at sight or sound of that benighted word?

"Roman Festivals" is orchestral sound and fury, interjected tunes and pasted labels, signifying musically next to nothing. For a season or two back Schumann's Symphony in B-flat has become a bedtime story at Symphony Hall that, if we are to smile contentedly from our cribs, Dr. Koussevitzky must tell in his inimitable way. Mr. Goossens's Concertino proved interesting and pleasurable in slender, modest fashion. Of no concert could it be high point. Consequently the matinée began at the peak with Wagner's "Faust Overture"; thereafter descended gradually toward the lush Italian bombast. Wagner's Overture dates from 1855, though it had been in his head, his letters and on his work-table through the forties. When it was last heard at the Symphony Concerts escaped even the all-remembering editor of the program-book. Some said in Mr. Monteux's time; others as far back as Dr. Muck's. However many the years, it was fresh and interesting to hear; while Mr. Goossens set it forth as painstakingly, warmly, sympathetically, as though he were reading a masterpiece.

There are many Wagners in the Overture—the Wagner who about this time had written "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman"; the Wagner who was to write "Tristan" and "The Twilight of The Gods"; the Wagner who in those days could put to paper as mechanical and form-filling measures as any routineer; the Wagner who could invent themes and melodies that still arrest the hearer; who already had the instinct and was finding the means to tonal color, atmosphere, suggestion. Dismiss the pages that to the ninetenn-thirties exhibit only the padding conventions of the eighteen-fifties; put aside clear resemblances to the earliest operas and vague anticipations of the later music-dramas. Even so, a considerable residue remains. The motiv of the brooding, despairing Faust, the motiv of the longing that comforts and haunts him, are salient, defining, well imagined materia musica. Within the form Wagner treats them graphically, intensively, for themselves, in contrast, in conflict, in final ebb to weary silence.

Here unmistakably is music that evokes a figure, infuses it with emotion. Outside the padded or the mechanized pages, development and delineation go mated. Already Wagner feels his orchestra; uses it imaginatively; more than once, individually. The "Faust Overture" is romantic music according to the prescriptions of the time, yet uneasy and straining within them. If the hearer likes, it is as conventional of the eighteen-forties as many a page of "The Flying Dutchman" or "Tannhäuser"; yet quite as often and more compactly and insistently, it is foreshadowing of the mature Wagner. To many a listener, it was no curiosity that Mr. Goossens was upturning.

"I am a Roman citizen" said the loyal Respighi to himself, and first the fountains, then the pines, now the festivals of his city, stirred him to musical composition. The earliest impact was the most spontaneous. "Roman Fountains," expands in well-devised, well-conducted tonal and pictorial design; the music speaks agreeably for itself; enforced by program-clews, works pleasurable illusion. A kindling Italian warmth, an honest Italian liveliness, suffuse the tone-poem. "Roman Pines" would do it all again, self-consciously, calculatingly, laboriously. The children on the Pincian must play like little modernists; a phonograph-nightingale sing from the Janiculum; the legions stamp and clatter along the Appian Way. Swell your sensations, Citizen Respighi seems to believe, and therewith are they intensified. Sound and fury delight him but he still skirts the edge of bombast. With "Roman Festivals" into that pit he lurches and wallows.

At the Circus Maximus of the Emperors the tone-poem begins, but the song of the Christian martyrs is barely audible through the brazen clamors of the amphitheater—a truly circus-music. . . . The pilgrims climb the hill road; for the while reiterated accent and dun color suggest their weary, monotonous tread. (Il Signore fancies marching rhythms.) Afar they see the church that is goal and vision. A second brazen tumult of rejoicing, a-boom with bells, forthwith engulfs them. . . . Out into the hills to make merry in the October festivals. Hunting horns sound; night-wanderers near and far oblige with a pretty serenade. The toiling Respighi gains his breath but fails to take away the listener's. . . . Back to the Piazza Navona for the people's fête at Epiphany. Before it is done Respighi has rhythmed a saltarello; imitated a hand-organ—the prize is divided between him and Stravinsky of a scene in "Petrushka"—sung a lewd ditty; blown up his orchestra nigh to bursting.

At a guess "Roman Festivals" contains adroit, avorsome, eclectic details according to the Signore's habit, but out of the din they pierce only to be blunted in bombast. Not sonority but sound is Respighi's goal: like the toper who so loved the wine that he drowned himself in the cask, the composer perishes in his own din. The fountains have run dry; the echoes from the pines gone mute; but the brasses may yet roar and the drums bang. With sonorities as with much else, there may be delusions of grandeur. Mr. Goossens and the orchestra were dutiful to the composer.

Listen to such rambunctious and empty stuff. Then hark back to Mr. Goossens's own Concertino. Good to hear and to feel was a music that ran in long lean lines; that out of flowing, fanciful, skillful counterpoint wove them through the divided or the mated voices of the string choir; clothed them piquantly or pungently in its timbres; spiced in not too many or too obtrusive modernisms: passed from the discreet animation of the beginning to the discreet sentiment of the songful section; thence to the tempered gayety, once darkened, of the end. Mr. Goossens's Concertino is no masterpiece; but it is the poised and practised music of a fertile mind and an alert hand. There is science in it, which was more to be desired at the moment than Respighi's fistful of bombast.

Science is likely to deny the possessor the expansive and rapturous, the dreamful and the blissful, temperament. Mr. Goossens's Schumann of the "Spring Symphony" was as dry as November when he should have blossomed like May. In him were no songful ardors. Not once did he stride the hillsides or muse in the shade. The conductor rushed him whenever he quickened the pace; cooled and checked him, whenever he would sing. Even Mr. Boettcher's soulful horn and Mr. Laurent's trilling flute—in the Scherzo—could gain him no more than brief release. Hereabouts Dr. Koussevitzky, and no other, is Schumann's prophet.

H. T. P.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 19 193

37

Directs Symphony—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor, will direct the Boston Symphony when it is presented here at the Mosque on the night of February 3.

Critic Praises Orchestra That Plays On Feb. 3

Boston Symphony With Serge Koussevitzky Directing at the Mosque

"Without giving way to the natural impulse to use superlatives, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, must be conceded to be a great orchestra, a supremely great orchestra," declared the critic of the Minneapolis Star following a recent concert in that city by the Boston organization, which will appear at the Mosque the night of Monday, January 3. The 112 musicians, with their famous conductor, will be presented by T. Michaux Moody as the second attraction in the artists' course of five concerts, and tickets are now on sale at Walter D. Moses & Co. both for the series and for this single concert. Tickets for Jascha Heifetz, appearing in the same course, also are available.

"The Boston orchestra's gift to Minneapolis last evening was a revelation of what symphonic music can be,' continued the Star's critic, "and this is said with no disrespect to our own orchestra. The enjoyment it aroused was of the kind that leaves the concertgoer in an exhausted, inarticulate state, drained dry of emotion and ecstasy. First and foremost the Boston orchestra is a marvelous unit, trained to the finest edge of technical perfection—a single musical instrument that plays as one man might play. No music is so intricate or dazzling that it cannot be elucidated, with overpowering conviction by the 112 men who make up the personnel. Its choirs are flawless in tone production and each is welded to the other with uncanny precision.

"Second, Serge Koussevitzky is a controlling genius whose strength and sensitiveness and intelligence are everywhere apparent. He is a great clarifer, and one feels also a great lover of music's sensuous beauty. His interpretations live and breathe; their appeal is so magnetic that the hearer's attention is riveted into an almost painful absorption. How many times he was recalled during the evening it is impossible to say. After one number I counted up to seven and then wearied." This is the orchestra that Richmond music lovers and others from all near-by towns are soon to

Music

Monteux

Goossens in Boston

For the second and last week Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter v tion, Eugene Goossens held his baton over the Boston Symphony chestra. On the afternoon of Jan in Symphony Hall, Boston, he rected this program: Wagn "Faust Overture," Schumann's flat Symphony, Goossens's Con tino for double-string orchestra Respighi's "Feste Romane." The last-mentioned items were heard for the first time in Bosto Known to Bostonians through music and through former visits, Goossens is always a welcome itor. He was greeted warmly by a ence and orchestra. An authorita conductor, he has developed s his last sojourn in Boston a r vehement technique with his s which, however, need not inte with enjoyment of the music directs.

The constitution of his prog puzzled us somewhat. Here w man, conducting a single progra the season with one of the fines chestras in the world, and he to open his list with an ove which is interesting chiefly fo forecasting of the great m dramas, conspicuously "Tristan" to set down in the place of h the "Spring" Symphony, whic one of Dr. Koussevitzky's fav repertory pieces. His readings meticulous, but they did not upon this music the dazzling of revelation.

It is true that Mr. Goossens is the only conductor to hesitate a venturing outside the safe phonic enclosure of Beetho Brahms and Schumann. But here was an opportunity. The Boston Orchestra has never played, for example, Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral" Symphony nor has it been heard for some years in the "London" Symphony. There is music of Bax and of Delius which would have been welcome, all without going outside the conductor's homeland; and symphonic music has been written in France, Russia, even Finland. Why Schumann?

For novelties, first, Mr. Goossens's Concertino, remade from a string octet and first performed in its present form at a concert of the League of Composers in New York last December. It is a well-formed, rhythmically lively piece, based as to its first and last movements on a not particularly salient figure. The slow movement, with a theme in folk song style, is the most appealing of the three. In it some charming effects are achieved with the divided strings.

Finally, what is said to be the concluding volume of Respighi's sesquipedalian Roman directory. This reporter heard the first performance of this work under Toscanini in New York a year ago, and so perhaps was too well prepared for it. With its cries of wild beasts, resounding church bells, barrel organs, guitar, and battery requiring 10 artillerymen, it caused on the present occasion some excited applause and a few shouts; but its essential meretriciousness cannot be concealed.

L. A. S.

THIRD MONDAY NIGHT CONCERT

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns to Conduct Symphony

Post Jan 28

Last evening, as conductor of the third of the Monday evening series of Symphony Concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky returned to the post from which he has been temporarily absent on mid-season holiday. To his hearers last evening, who received him and the following programme with enthusiasm, Dr. Koussevitzky presented Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, as edited by Siloti, the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina"; Ravel's Bolero, the orchestral sensation of the year, and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

There are not a few among the admirers of the great Finnish composer who hold this Symphony in D major to be his masterpiece, remarkable in their several ways, as are most of his essays in that form. An epic of his native land, depicting, so it is said by those acquainted with Sibelius, Finland groaning under Russian oppression, but finally rejoicing in the hope of a deliverer, this Symphony is the fervid utterance of an ardent patriot that at the same time voices the struggle and aspirations of all humanity. When Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it early in the present season he showed himself to be in deep sympathy with the work. Indeed, the performance then, and again last evening, fell in eloquence no whit below the performance of the work given here several years ago by the Finnish conductor, Georg Schneevoigt.

When Ravel's Bolero was played for a second time at a Friday afternoon concert, it failed to create the furore that had followed its first hearing here a few weeks before. Nor did last evening's audience give vent to any unusual manifestation of excitement when the piece was concluded. There was, of course, sufficient applause to prompt Dr. Koussevitzky to call the players to their feet, but a like tribute had already rewarded the Prelude of Moussorgsky, which so vividly portrays the coming of dawn over the Kremlin in Moscow.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

POST

Brahms Festival by Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, announces a Brahms festival on a large scale to be given in the orchestra's own city on March 21-26. In this week of special concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will present the principal orchestral, choral and chamber works of the German master. The orchestra will be assisted by the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe Colleges; Artur Schnabel, the German pianist, who is crossing from Europe for the occasion; the singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Jeannette Vreeland and Fraser Gange, and the Burgin String Quartet.

The purely orchestral works to be played include the four symphonies, the "Academic Festival" overture and the "Variations on a Theme by Haydn." Choral works announced are "A German Requiem," "A Song of Destiny," the "Liebeslieder" waltzes and the "Rhapsody for Alto With Male Chorus." Schnabel will appear with the orchestra in the two piano concertos and likewise on the chamber music program, which is to include works for piano solo, a violin sonata and the Quintet in F minor.

Symphony

Early Wagner, Late Respighi, Another Guest

Eugene Goossens as Conductor Through A Variegated Symphony Concert

NOT until Monday does the master of the house return. Consequently on Friday the weekly shifting of the symphonic scene. To the stage across which the elderly Glazunov had lumbered, now loped the relatively youthful Eugene Goossens. His slight, trim figure, from top to toe stamped Sackville Street, replaced, on the director's stand, the bulky presence of the loose-clad Russian. The conductor-composer from London, via Rochester which is in New York, swung a long stick through longer arcs, or pointing it now to floor, again to ceiling, beat the measure; whereas the professor from Leningrad plied a short baton in narrow radius. Inviting the orchestra to his will, Mr. Glazunov stood as firm as a rock; urging it to his purpose, Mr. Goossens whipped and tossed about pictorially. The all-father of musical Russia only incidentally a conductor, trusted his symphony, his concerto, his tone-poem to the band as one trusts a friend to the conveying ship or airplane. The busy Briton, who composes in the intervals of conducting, had an explicit notion of what he wished for Schumann, Wagner and Respighi, no less than for his own Concertino.

Mr. Glazunov's program, a week ago, was the choice of a composer setting thrice over, before a friendly audience, his characteristic work. Mr. Goossens assembled a list that ranged out of the middle nineteenth century into the early twentieth; gave diversified room for his prowess as conductor; accorded with the custom of these concerts. Only incidentally, as it seemed, was one of the chosen pieces—and the briefest—his own. With Wagner's "Faust Overture" he restored a long-neglected music to Symphony Hall. With Respighi's "Roman Festivals" he proffered to the audience the newest specimen of a composer whom it had often applauded. If with Schumann's "Spring Symphony," he poached upon one of Dr. Koussevitzky's happiest hunting-grounds, he wished plainly to follow the "Faust Overture" with another example of mid-nineteenth century romanticism. In turn, the tone-picturing of Signor Respighi descends in direct line from Berlioz and Liszt. Indeed, through three-fourths and more of the concert, Mr. Goossens might have been a conductor whose specialty was the romantics. Only in the Concertino for Strings did he disclose himself as the temperate modernist he is. In form, the piece harks back to the ancients; in substance, it is self-contained music of line rather than suggestive music of color. In performance, the composer-conductor measured "expression." For what child of the Stravinskian age does not feel his lip curl at sight or sound of that benighted word?

"Roman Festivals" is orchestral sound and fury, interjected tunes and pasted labels, signifying musically next to nothing. For a season or two back Schumann's Symphony in B-flat has become a bedtime story at Symphony Hall that, if we are to smile contentedly from our cribs, Dr. Koussevitzky must tell in his inimitable way. Mr. Goossens's Concertino proved interesting and pleasurable in slender, modest fashion. Of no concert could it be high point. Consequently the matinée began at the peak with Wagner's "Faust Overture"; thereafter descended gradually toward the lush Italian bombast. Wagner's Overture dates from 1855, though it had been in his head, his letters and on his work-table through the forties. When it was last heard at the Symphony Concerts escaped even the all-remembering editor of the program-book. Some said in Mr. Monteux's time; others as far back as Dr. Muck's. However many the years, it was fresh and interesting to hear; while Mr. Goossens set it forth as painstakingly, warmly, sympathetically, as though he were reading a masterpiece.

There are many Wagners in the Overture—the Wagner who about this time had written "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman"; the Wagner who was to write "Tristan" and "The Twilight of The Gods"; the Wagner who in those days could put to paper as mechanical and form-filling measures as any routineer; the Wagner who could invent themes and melodies that still arrest the hearer; who already had the instinct and was finding the means to tonal color, atmosphere, suggestion. Dismiss the pages that to the ninetenn-thirties exhibit only the padding conventions of the eighteen-fifties; put aside clear resemblances to the earliest operas and vague anticipations of the later music- dramas. Even so, a considerable residue remains. The motiv of the brooding, despairing Faust, the motiv of the longing that comforts and haunts him, are salient, defining, well imagined materia musica. Within the form Wagner treats them graphically, intensively, for themselves, in contrast, in conflict, in final ebb to weary silence.

Here unmistakably is music that evokes a figure, infuses it with emotion. Outside the padded or the mechanized pages, development and delineation go mated. Already Wagner feels his orchestra; uses it imaginatively; more than once, individually. The "Faust Overture" is romantic music according to the prescriptions of the time, yet uneasy and straining within them. If the hearer likes, it is as conventional of the eighteen-forties as many a page of "The Flying Dutchman" or "Tannhäuser"; yet quite as often and more compactly and insistently, it is foreshadowing of the mature Wagner. To many a listener, it was no curiosity that Mr. Goossens was upturning.

"I am a Roman citizen" said the loyal Respighi to himself, and first the fountains, then the pines, now the festivals of his city, stirred him to musical composition. The earliest impact was the most spontaneous. "Roman Fountains," expands in well-devised, well-conducted tonal and pictorial design; the music speaks agreeably for itself; enforced by program-clews, works pleasurable illusion. A kindling Italian warmth, an honest Italian liveliness, suffuse the tone-poem. "Roman Pines" would do it all again, self-consciously, calculatingly, laboriously. The children on the Pincian must play like little modernists; a phonograph-nightingale sing from the Janiculum; the legions stamp and clatter along the Appian Way. Swell your sensations, Citizen Respighi seems to believe, and therewith are they intensified. Sound and fury delight him but he still skirts the edge of bombast. With "Roman Festivals" into that pit he lurches and wallows.

At the Circus Maximus of the Emperors the tone-poem begins, but the song of the Christian martyrs is barely audible through the brazen clamors of the amphitheater—a truly circus-music. . . . The pilgrims climb the hill road; for the while reiterated accent and dun color suggest their weary, monotonous tread. (Il Signore fancies marching rhythms.) Afar they see the church that is goal and vision. A second brazen tumult of rejoicing, a-boom with bells, forthwith engulfs them. . . . Out into the hills to make merry in the October festivals. Hunting horns sound; night-wanderers near and far oblige with a pretty serenade. The toiling Respighi gains his breath but fails to take away the listener's. . . . Back to the Piazza Navona for the people's fête at Epiphany. Before it is done Respighi has rhythmed a saltarello; imitated a hand-organ—the prize is divided between him and Stravinsky of a scene in "Petrushka"—sung a lewd ditty; blown up his orchestra nigh to bursting.

At a guess "Roman Festivals" contains adroit, avorsome, eclectic details according to the Signore's habit, but out of the din they pierce only to be blunted in bombast. Not sonority but sound is Respighi's goal: like the toper who so loved the wine that he drowned himself in the cask, the composer perishes in his own din. The fountains have run dry; the echoes from the pines gone mute; but the brasses may yet roar and the drums bang. With sonorities as with much else, there may be delusions of grandeur. Mr. Goossens and the orchestra were dutiful to the composer.

Listen to such rambunctious and empty stuff. Then hark back to Mr. Goossens's own Concertino. Good to hear and to feel was a music that ran in long lean lines; that out of flowing, fanciful, skillful counterpoint wove them through the divided or the mated voices of the string choir; clothed them piquantly or pungently in its timbres; spiced in not too many or too obtrusive modernisms: passed from the discreet animation of the beginning to the discreet sentiment of the songful section; thence to the tempered gayety, once darkened, of the end. Mr. Goossens's Concertino is no masterpiece; but it is the poised and practised music of a fertile mind and an alert hand. There is science in it, which was more to be desired at the moment than Respighi's fistful of bombast.

Science is likely to deny the possessor the expansive and rapturous, the dreamful and the blissful, temperament. Mr. Goossens's Schumann of the "Spring Symphony" was as dry as November when he should have blossomed like May. In him were no songful ardors. Not once did he stride the hillsides or muse in the shade. The conductor rushed him whenever he quickened the pace; cooled and checked him, whenever he would sing. Even Mr. Boettcher's soulful horn and Mr. Laurent's trilling flute—in the Scherzo—could gain him no more than brief release. Hereabouts Dr. Koussevitzky, and no other, is Schumann's prophet.

H. T. P.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 19 193.

37

Directs Symphony—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor, will direct the Boston Symphony when it is presented here at the Mosque on the night of February 3.

Critic Praises Orchestra That Plays On Feb. 3

Boston Symphony With Serge Koussevitzky Directing at the Mosque

"Without giving way to the natural impulse to use superlatives, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, must be conceded to be a great orchestra, a supremely great orchestra," declared the critic of the Minneapolis Star following a recent concert in that city by the Boston organization, which will appear at the Mosque the night of Monday, January 3. The 112 musicians, with their famous conductor, will be presented by T. Michaux Moody as the second attraction in the artists' course of five concerts, and tickets are now on sale at Walter D. Moses & Co. both for the series and for this single concert. Tickets for Jascha Heifetz, appearing in the same course, also are available.

"The Boston orchestra's gift to Minneapolis last evening was a revelation of what symphonic music can be,' continued the Star's critic, "and this is said with no disrespect to our own orchestra. The enjoyment it aroused was of the kind that leaves the concertgoer in an exhausted, inarticulate state, drained dry of emotion and ecstasy. First and foremost the Boston orchestra is a marvelous unit, trained to the finest edge of technical perfection—a single musical instrument that plays as one man might play. No music is so intricate or dazzling that it cannot be elucidated, with overpowering conviction by the 112 men who make up the personnel. Its choirs are flawless in tone production and each is welded to the other with uncanny precision.

"Second, Serge Koussevitzky is a controlling genius whose strength and sensitiveness and intelligence are everywhere apparent. He is a great clarifer, and one feels also a great lover of music's sensuous beauty. His interpretations live and breathe; their appeal is so magnetic that the hearer's attention is riveted into an almost painful absorption. How many times he was recalled during the evening it is impossible to say. After one number I counted up to seven and then wearied." This is the orchestra that Richmond music lovers and others from all near-by towns are soon to

Music

Goossens in Boston

For the second and last week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation, Eugene Goossens held his long baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On the afternoon of Jan. 24, in Symphony Hall, Boston, he directed this program: Wagner's "Faust Overture," Schumann's B flat Symphony, Goossens's Concertino for double-string orchestra and Respighi's "Feste Romane." The two last-mentioned items were then heard for the first time in Boston.

Known to Bostonians through his music and through former visits, Mr. Goossens is always a welcome visitor. He was greeted warmly by audience and orchestra. An authoritative conductor, he has developed since his last sojourn in Boston a more vehement technique with his stick, which, however, need not interfere with enjoyment of the music he directs.

The constitution of his program puzzled us somewhat. Here was a man, conducting a single program in the season with one of the finest orchestras in the world, and he chose to open his list with an overture which is interesting chiefly for its forecasting of the great music-dramas, conspicuously "Tristan"; and to set down in the place of honor the "Spring" Symphony, which is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's favorite repertory pieces. His readings were meticulous, but they did not throw upon this music the dazzling light of revelation.

It is true that Mr. Goossens is not the only conductor to hesitate about venturing outside the safe symphonic enclosure of Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann. But here was an opportunity. The Boston Orchestra has never played, for example, Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral" Symphony nor has it been heard for some years in the "London" Symphony. There is music of Bax and of Delius which would have been welcome, all without going outside the conductor's homeland; and symphonic music has been written in France, Russia, even Finland. Why Schumann?

For novelties, first, Mr. Goossens's Concertino, remade from a string octet and first performed in its present form at a concert of the League of Composers in New York last December. It is a well-formed, rhythmically lively piece, based as to its first and last movements on a not particularly salient figure. The slow movement, with a theme in folk song style, is the most appealing of the three. In it some charming effects are achieved with the divided strings.

Finally, what is said to be the concluding volume of Respighi's sesquipedalian Roman directory. This reporter heard the first performance of this work under Toscanini in New York a year ago, and so perhaps was too well prepared for it. With its cries of wild beasts, resounding church bells, barrel organs, guitar, and battery requiring 10 artillerymen, it caused on the present occasion some excited applause and a few shouts; but its essential meretriciousness cannot be concealed.

L. A. S.

THIRD MONDAY NIGHT CONCERT

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns to Conduct Symphony

Last evening, as conductor of the third of the Monday evening series of Symphony Concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky returned to the post from which he has been temporarily absent on mid-season holiday. To his hearers last evening, who received him and the following programme with enthusiasm, Dr. Koussevitzky presented Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, as edited by Siloti, the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina"; Ravel's Bolero, the orchestral sensation of the year; and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

There are not a few among the admirers of the great Finnish composer who hold this Symphony in D major to be his masterpiece, remarkable in their several ways, as are most of his essays in that form. An epic of his native land, depicting, so it is said by those acquainted with Sibelius, Finland groaning under Russian oppression, but finally rejoicing in the hope of a deliverer, this Symphony is the fervid utterance of an ardent patriot that at the same time voices the struggle and aspirations of all humanity. When Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it early in the present season he showed himself to be in deep sympathy with the work. Indeed, the performance then, and again last evening, fell in eloquence no whit below the performance of the work given here several years ago by the Finnish conductor, Georg Schneevoigt.

When Ravel's Bolero was played for a second time at a Friday afternoon concert, it failed to create the furore that had followed its first hearing here a few weeks before. Nor did last evening's audience give vent to any unusual manifestation of excitement when the piece was concluded. There was, of course, sufficient applause to prompt Dr. Koussevitzky to call the players to their feet, but a like tribute had already rewarded the Prelude of Moussorgsky, which so vividly portrays the coming of dawn over the Kremlin in Moscow.

IS CLIPPING FROM
POST

Festival by Boston Symphony Orchestra

ton Symphony Orchestra, Dr. oussevitzky conductor, an- Brahms festival on a large e given in the orchestra's own larch 21-26. In this week of ncerts Dr. Koussevitzky will le principal orchestral, choral er works of the German mas- orchestra will be assisted by ses of Harvard and Radcliffe Artur Schnabel, the German o is crossing from Europe asion; the singers, Margaret Jeannette Vreeland and ge, and the Burgin String y orchestral works to be de the four symphonies, ic Festival" overture and s on a Theme by Haydn." announced are "A Ger- ," "A Song of Destiny," der" waltzes and the Alto With Male Chorus." appear with the orches- o piano concertos and e chamber music pro- to include works for violin sonata and the inor.

Ice orced arryin amily

Symphony

Early Wagner, Late Respighi, Another Guest

Eugene Goossens as Conductor Through A Variegated Symphony Concert

NOT until Monday does the master of the house return. Consequently on Friday the weekly shifting of the symphonic scene. To the stage across which the elderly Glazunov had lumbered, now loped the relatively youthful Eugene Goossens. His slight, trim figure, from top to toe stamped Sackville Street, replaced, on the director's stand, the bulky presence of the loose-clad Russian. The conductor-composer from London, via Rochester which is in New York, swung a long stick through longer arcs, or pointing it now to floor, again to ceiling, beat the measure; whereas the professor from Leningrad plied a short baton in narrow radius. Inviting the orchestra to his will, Mr. Glazunov stood as firm as a rock; urging it to his purpose. Mr. Goossens whipped and tossed about pictorially. The all-father of musical Russia only incidentally a conductor, trusted his symphony, his concerto, his tone-poem to the band as one trusts a friend to the conveying ship or airplane. The busy Briton, who composes in the intervals of conducting, had an explicit notion of what he wished for Schumann, Wagner and Respighi, no less than for his own Concertino.

Mr. Glazunov's program, a week ago, was the choice of a composer setting thrice over, before a friendly audience, his characteristic work. Mr. Goossens assembled a list that ranged out of the middle nineteenth century into the early twentieth; gave diversified room for his prowess as conductor; accorded with the custom of these concerts. Only incidentally, as it seemed, was one of the chosen pieces—and the briefest—his own. With Wagner's "Faust Overture" he restored a long-neglected music to Symphony Hall. With Respighi's "Roman Festivals" he proffered to the audience the newest specimen of a composer whom it had often applauded. If with Schumann's "Spring Symphony," he poached upon one of Dr. Koussevitzky's happiest hunting-grounds, he wished plainly to follow the "Faust Overture" with another example of mid-nineteenth century romanticism. In turn, the tone-picturing of Signor Respighi descends in direct line from Berlioz and Liszt. Indeed, through three-fourths and more of the concert, Mr. Goossens might have been a conductor whose specialty was the romantics. Only in the Concertino for Strings did he disclose himself as the temperate modernist he is. In form, the piece harks back to the ancients; in substance, it is self-contained music of line rather than suggestive music of color. In performance, the composer-conductor measured "expression." For what child of the Stravinskian age does not feel his lip curl at sight or sound of that benighted word?

"Roman Festivals" is orchestral sound and fury, interjected tunes and pasted labels, signifying musically next to nothing. For a season or two back Schumann's Symphony in B-flat has become a bedtime story at Symphony Hall that, if we are to smile contentedly from our cribs, Dr. Koussevitzky must tell in his inimitable way. Mr. Goossens's Concertino proved interesting and pleasurable in slender, modest fashion. Of no concert could it be high point. Consequently the matinée began at the peak with Wagner's "Faust Overture"; thereafter descended gradually toward the lush Italian bombast. Wagner's Overture dates from 1855, though it had been in his head, his letters and on his work-table through the forties. When it was last heard at the Symphony Concerts escaped even the all-remembering editor of the program-book. Some said in Mr. Monteux's time; others as far back as Dr. Muck's. However many the years, it was fresh and interesting to hear; while Mr. Goossens set it forth as painstakingly, warmly, sympathetically, as though he were reading a masterpiece.

There are many Wagners in the Overture—the Wagner who about this time had written "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman"; the Wagner who was to write "Tristan" and "The Twilight of The Gods"; the Wagner who in those days could put to paper as mechanical and form-filling measures as any routineer; the Wagner who could invent themes and melodies that still arrest the hearer; who already had the instinct and was finding the means to tonal color, atmosphere, suggestion. Dismiss the pages that to the nineteenn-thirties exhibit only the padding conventions of the eighteen-fifties; put aside clear resemblances to the earliest operas and vague anticipations of the later music- dramas. Even so, a considerable residue remains. The motiv of the brooding, despairing Faust, the motiv of the longing that comforts and haunts him, are salient, defining, well imagined materia musica. Within the form Wagner treats them graphically, intensively, for themselves, in contrast, in conflict, in final ebb to weary silence.

Here unmistakably is music that evokes a figure, infuses it with emotion. Outside the padded or the mechanized pages, development and delineation go mated. Already Wagner feels his orchestra; uses it imaginatively; more than once, individually. The "Faust Overture" is romantic music according to the prescriptions of the time, yet uneasy and straining within them. If the hearer likes, it is as conventional of the eighteen-forties as many a page of "The Flying Dutchman" or "Tannhäuser"; yet quite as often and more compactly and insistently, it is foreshadowing of the mature Wagner. To many a listener, it was no curiosity that Mr. Goossens was upturning.

"I am a Roman citizen" said the loyal Respighi to himself, and first the fountains, then the pines, now the festivals of his city, stirred him to musical composition. The earliest impact was the most spontaneous. "Roman Fountains," expands in well-devised, well-conducted tonal and pictorial design; the music speaks agreeably for itself; enforced by program-clews, works pleasurable illusion. A kindling Italian warmth, an honest Italian liveliness, suffuse the tone-poem. "Roman Pines" would do it all again, self-consciously, calculatingly, laboriously. The children on the Pincian must play like little modernists; a phonograph-nightingale sing from the Janiculum; the legions stamp and clatter along the Appian Way. Swell your sensations, Citizen Respighi seems to believe, and therewith are they intensified. Sound and fury delight him but he still skirts the edge of bombast. With "Roman Festivals" into that pit he lurches and wallows.

At the Circus Maximus of the Emperors the tone-poem begins, but the song of the Christian martyrs is barely audible through the brazen clamors of the amphitheater—a truly circus-music. . . . The pilgrims climb the hill road; for the while reiterated accent and dun color suggest their weary, monotonous tread. (Il Signore fancies marching rhythms.) Afar they see the church that is goal and vision. A second brazen tumult of rejoicing, a-boom with bells, forthwith engulfs them. . . . Out into the hills to make merry in the October festivals. Hunting horns sound; night-wanderers near and far oblige with a pretty serenade. The toiling Respighi gains his breath but fails to take away the listener's. . . . Back to the Piazza Navona for the people's fête at Epiphany. Before it is done Respighi has rhythmed a saltarello; imitated a hand-organ—the prize is divided between him and Stravinsky of a scene in "Petrushka"—sung a lewd ditty; blown up his orchestra nigh to bursting.

At a guess "Roman Festivals" contains adroit, avorsome, eclectic details according to the Signore's habit, but out of the din they pierce only to be blunted in bombast. Not sonority but sound is Respighi's goal: like the toper who so loved the wine that he drowned himself in the cask, the composer perishes in his own din. The fountains have run dry; the echoes from the pines gone mute; but the brasses may yet roar and the drums bang. With sonorities as with much else, there may be delusions of grandeur. Mr. Goossens and the orchestra were dutiful to the composer.

Listen to such rambunctious and empty stuff. Then hark back to Mr. Goossens's own Concertino. Good to hear and to feel was a music that ran in long lean lines; that out of flowing, fanciful, skillful counterpoint wove them through the divided or the mated voices of the string choir; clothed them piquantly or pungently in its timbres; spiced in not too many or too obtrusive modernisms; passed from the discreet animation of the beginning to the discreet sentiment of the songful section; thence to the tempered gayety, once darkened, of the end. Mr. Goossens's Concertino is no masterpiece; but it is the poised and practised music of a fertile mind and an alert hand. There is science in it, which was more to be desired at the moment than Respighi's fistful of bombast.

Science is likely to deny the possessor the expansive and rapturous, the dreamful and the blissful, temperament. Mr. Goossens's Schumann of the "Spring Symphony" was as dry as November when he should have blossomed like May. In him were no songful ardors. Not once did he stride the hillsides or muse in the shade. The conductor rushed him whenever he quickened the pace; cooled and checked him, whenever he would sing. Even Mr. Boettcher's soulful horn and Mr. Laurent's trilling flute—in the Scherzo—could gain him no more than brief release. Hereabouts Dr. Koussevitzky, and no other, is Schumann's prophet.

H. T. P.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 19 193.

37

Directs Symphony—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor, will direct the Boston Symphony when it is presented here at the Mosque on the night of February 3.

Critic Praises Orchestra That Plays On Feb. 3

Boston Symphony With Serge Koussevitzky Directing at the Mosque

"Without giving way to the natural impulse to use superlatives, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, must be conceded to be a great orchestra, a supremely great orchestra," declared the critic of the Minneapolis Star following a recent concert in that city by the Boston organization, which will appear at the Mosque the night of Monday, January 3. The 112 musicians, with their famous conductor, will be presented by T. Michaux Moody as the second attraction in the artists' course of five concerts, and tickets are now on sale at Walter D. Moses & Co. both for the series and for this single concert. Tickets for Jascha Heifetz, appearing in the same course, also are available.

"The Boston orchestra's gift to Minneapolis last evening was a revelation of what symphonic music can be,' continued the Star's critic, "and this is said with no disrespect to our own orchestra. The enjoyment it aroused was of the kind that leaves the concertgoer in an exhausted, inarticulate state, drained dry of emotion and ecstasy. First and foremost the Boston orchestra is a marvelous unit, trained to the finest edge of technical perfection—a single musical instrument that plays as one man might play. No music is so intricate or dazzling that it cannot be elucidated, with overpowering conviction by the 112 men who make up the personnel. Its choirs are flawless in tone production and each is welded to the other with uncanny precision.

"Second, Serge Koussevitzky is a controlling genius whose strength and sensitiveness and intelligence are everywhere apparent. He is a great clarifer, and one feels also a great lover of music's sensuous beauty. His interpretations live and breathe; their appeal is so magnetic that the hearer's attention is riveted into an almost painful absorption. How many times he was recalled during the evening it is impossible to say. After one number I counted up to seven and then wearied." This is the orchestra that Richmond music lovers and others from all near-by towns are soon to hear, and indications are that a tremendous audience will greet the great Dr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra.

STUDEBAKER
AUTOMOBILES
DUE ERSKINE

BIRMINGHAM
Co.
A Store Near You

which is interesting chiefly for its forecasting of the great music-dramas, conspicuously "Tristan"; and to set down in the place of honor the "Spring" Symphony, which is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's favorite repertory pieces. His readings were meticulous, but they did not throw upon this music the dazzling light of revelation.

It is true that Mr. Goossens is not the only conductor to hesitate about venturing outside the safe symphonic enclosure of Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann. But here was an opportunity. The Boston Orchestra has never played, for example, Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral" Symphony nor has it been heard for some years in the "London" Symphony. There is music of Bax and of Delius which would have been welcome, all without going outside the conductor's homeland; and symphonic music has been written in France, Russia, even Finland. Why Schumann?

For novelties, first, Mr. Goossens's Concertino, remade from a string octet and first performed in its present form at a concert of the League of Composers in New York last December. It is a well-formed, rhythmically lively piece, based as to its first and last movements on a not particularly salient figure. The slow movement, with a theme in folk song style, is the most appealing of the three. In it some charming effects are achieved with the divided strings.

Finally, what is said to be the concluding volume of Respighi's sesquipedalian Roman directory. This reporter heard the first performance of this work under Toscanini in New York a year ago, and so perhaps was too well prepared for it. With its cries of wild beasts, resounding church bells, barrel organs, guitar, and battery requiring 10 artillerymen, it caused on the present occasion some excited applause and a few shouts; but its essential meretriciousness cannot be concealed.

L. A. S.

THIRD MONDAY NIGHT CONCERT

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns to Conduct Symphony

Last evening, as conductor of the third of the Monday evening series of Symphony Concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky returned to the post from which he has been temporarily absent on mid-season holiday. To his hearers last evening, who received him and the following programme with enthusiasm, Dr. Koussevitzky presented Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, as edited by Siloti, the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina"; Ravel's Bolero, the orchestral sensation of the year, and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

There are not a few among the admirers of the great Finnish composer who hold this Symphony in D major to be his masterpiece, remarkable in their several ways, as are most of his essays in that form. An epic of his native land, depicting, so it is said by those acquainted with Sibelius, Finland groaning under Russian oppression, but finally rejoicing in the hope of a deliverer, this Symphony is the fervid utterance of an ardent patriot that at the same time voices the struggle and aspirations of all humanity. When Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it early in the present season he showed himself to be in deep sympathy with the work. Indeed, the performance then, and again last evening, fell in eloquence no whit below the performance of the work given here several years ago by the Finnish conductor, Georg Schneevoigt.

When Ravel's Bolero was played for a second time at a Friday afternoon concert, it failed to create the furore that had followed its first hearing here a few weeks before. Nor did last evening's audience give vent to any unusual manifestation of excitement when the piece was concluded. There was, of course, sufficient applause to prompt Dr. Koussevitzky to call the players to their feet, but a like tribute had already rewarded the Prelude of Moussorgsky, which so vividly portrays the coming of dawn over the Kremlin in Moscow.

IS CLIPPING FROM
POST

Festival by Boston Symphony Orchestra

ton Symphony Orchestra, Dr. oussevitzky conductor, an- Brahms festival on a large e given in the orchestra's own larch 21-26. In this week of ncerts Dr. Koussevitzky will he principal orchestral, choral er works of the German mas- orchestra will be assisted by ses of Harvard and Radcliffe Artur Schnabel, the German o is crossing from Europe asion; the singers, Margaret Jeannette Vreeland and ge, and the Burgin String y orchestral works to be de the four symphonies, ic Festival" overture and ns on a Theme by Haydn." announced are "A Ger- ," "A Song of Destiny," der" waltzes and the Alto With Male Chorus." appear with the orches- o piano concertos and e chamber music pro- to include works for violin sonata and the inor.

Ice orced t arryin amily

GOOSSENS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Bost. Jan. 25

Concertino for Strings From His Pen Proves Agreeable

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The annual mid-season vacation of Dr. Koussevitzky is an excellent institution. The conductor needs and deserves his holiday. It was a pleasure last week both to hear and to see so distinguished a musician as Mr. Glazounov. Eugene Goossens, who conducted yesterday afternoon and who leads the band again this evening, has his points as director. And when Dr. Koussevitzky returns to his post next week he will be more than ever appreciated.

LACKS DRAMATIC FORCE

An admirable interpreter of contemporary music, Mr. Goossens appears to have little feeling for the music of the romantic composers. Yet he delights to place it upon his programmes. Presumably, like many another artist, he does not recognize his limitations. Yesterday, for example, Mr. Goossens began with Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and followed that piece with Schumann's First Symphony. Of the passages in Wagner's early score in which the composer anticipates his later methods and proceedures, such as the sombre and brooding introduction, Mr. Goossens made much. But he could not reanimate those pages that have become relatively old-fashioned. Here and there is need of a transfiguring imagination, of a strong lyric and dramatic feeling. And Mr. Goossens lacks these things. Where Wagner most required help, he received it least.

And so with Schumann's symphony. Gone from yesterday's performance were the rapture, the ardor, the songful warmth that Dr. Koussevitzky brings to this often inept yet essentially rhapsodic and exuberant score. Mr. Goossens would revitalize the music by means of rhythmic energy and a general quickening of the pace, but his efforts were in vain. Lifeless the music hung on his hands. Indeed, to hear the symphony yesterday was to realize even more keenly the almost miraculous transformation wrought by Dr. Koussevitzky when he conducts it. The notes were played yesterday, but of themselves they will no longer serve.

Own Concertino Admirable

Of the second part of the programme there is a different tale to tell. Not only was Mr. Goossen's own Concertino for double string orchestra, heard for the first time here, excellently played, the music itself proved altogether agreeable. As composer Mr. Goossens has no very individual voice, but he can write effectively and with charm.

In the matter of performance the final number, Respighi's new "Feste Romana," also received, so far as might be gathered, its due. As to the value of the work itself, that is another matter. Respighi's music, in fact, seems to be undergoing a process of spiritual degeneration. Despite its obvious effectiveness, the "Pines of Rome" was a distinct fall-off from its predecessor, the "Fountains of Rome," and now this latest addition to Respighi's tonal guide-book or Musical Baedeker of the Eternal City, "Roman Festivals," is considerably lower in the aesthetic scale.

Of the four sections—"Circus Maximus," "The Jubilee," "The October Excursions" and "Epiphany"—the two middle ones have the most of musical quality. The first of all is mere movie-music; the last is best described as a "filthy din." Of course the audience liked it, and applauded it, and applauded piece, band and conductor to the echo. And had the music been even noisier and more blatantly vulgar the audience would have liked it even better.

It was long ago demonstrated that the worth of music is not to be gauged by the fervor with which the general public receives it. Even the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts are, after all, only human.

NEW YORK
SUN

FEB

On its third visit to New York this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will change the date of its Thursday evening concert to next Friday evening, February 7, in Carnegie Hall.

At this and also at the Saturday matinee concert, Serge Prokofieff will be the guest soloist, appearing with the orchestra in his piano concerto No. 2. At the Friday night concert, Koussevitzky will conduct Prokofieff's Scythian suite. He will open the program with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and close it with three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat."

At the matinee concert, in addition to Prokofieff's concerto, the Second Symphony of Bax in E minor and C, which was previously played at the evening concert, will be repeated in this series. It will be preceded by Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point." De Falla's dances will likewise close this program.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 2 - 1930

Bostonians at Academy

Serge Prokofieff will be the assisting soloist at the Academy of Music on Thursday night, when Mr. Koussevitsky brings his Boston Symphony Orchestra here for its third visit of the season. The Russian composer will participate in his own second concerto for piano and orchestra. Three dances from the De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat," and Tschaikofsky's Sixth Symphony are the other program numbers.

CONDUCTOR RETURNS TO SYMPHONY

Bost. Feb 1

Prokofieff Plays Own Piano Concerto With Virtuosity

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The annual interregnum at Symphony Hall is over. Dr. Koussevitzky has returned as conductor to the regular series of concerts. Yesterday's audience welcomed him with fervor that allowed of but one interpretation, and the orchestra played as it has not played on a Friday afternoon since Dr. Koussevitzky began his holiday.

PROKOFIEFF AT PIANO

Audiences the world over respond to personalities, and there were two yesterday in Symphony Hall, the returning conductor and the composer-soloist, Serge Prokofieff. The latter played his Second Pianoforte Concerto, hitherto unheard in the United States, and, together with orchestra and conductor, acknowledged the long-protracted applause bestowed upon his Scythian Suite.

This, it may be remarked in passing, was not Mr. Prokofieff's initial appearance at these concerts. Four years ago he played at a pair of them his Third Concerto and since 1922 his name had appeared no less than 14 times on the symphony programmes, a substantial total for a modernist composer.

Similar to Suite

The Concerto of yesterday, played by Mr. Prokofieff with unassuming virtuosity, by no means compares in interest with its immediate successor. This earlier music, composed in 1913, when Mr. Prokofieff was but 23, is so similar in genenal character to the Scythian Suite, a product of the ensuing year, that it suffered by following the latter piece on yesterday's programme. There was a disturbing suggestion that the savage rites of the Scythian barbarians were over-long continued. To speak technically, there was too much of the principal musical ingredients of the young Prokofieff's style: His insistent quadruple rhythms; his persistent diatonic dissonance; his love of shrill, highly percussive orchestration.

Not before had the Scythian Suite been so brilliantly played here. And had the Concerto not come after it, there would have been no need for complaining. This Suite is a remarkable achievement, especially for so young a man, and it owes little to any other composer, even to Stravinsky.

All Too Brilliant

All in all, yesterday's was a brilliant, even a too brilliant concert, with the dances from De Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat," more sharp rhythms and highly spiced if somewhat more sensuous orchestration, succeeding to Prokofieff's pieces.

Only Mozart's unpretending "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" which, in a performance of rare grace and deftness by a portion of the string choir, began the concert, offered a note of genuine contrast.

MUSIC

Herald Jan 31 Feb 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 14th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine kleine Nachtmusik. Prokofieff, Scythian Suite. Prokofieff, Piano Concerto No. 2, G minor (Mr. Prokofieff, pianist. First performance in the United States). De Falla, Three Dances from the "Three Cornered Hat."

No doubt some in the audience yesterday were disconcerted by the splendid savagery of the "Scythian Suite." What would they have had? The Scythians were not a genteel folk, nor did they discuss philosophy in sacred groves. The men had bloody hands; they drank the blood of the first men they killed in battle; they cut off heads; they scalped and made themselves cloaks of scalps; sometimes they flayed the entire body of an enemy; they valued drinking cups made from skulls; they were cunning in the art of impalement. They strangled native men, to accompany a dead king, stuffed their bodies and mounted them on beautiful horses in a circle to guard the tomb.

If a composer chooses to take a Scythian legend for his subject—it would be interesting to know where Mr. Prokofieff found this legend—would the disgruntled have had him write suave music, mellifluous melodies, interwoven with academic precision, with familiar progressions and cadences, discreetly orchestrated, possibly with the introduction of a mandolin and a celesta for pretty tinkling and gum-drop effects, all in orthodox form?

How some amiable souls are frightened by music that departs in any way from a long-established order! How they delight in condemning individuality, originality; in finding the unfamiliar, or the unexpected disagreeable! "Let us dream again," they say at a concert; "waking would be pain." Mr. Prokofieff, selecting a barbaric legend, writing in superbly barbaric vein, awakens the sleepers and all those who demand sweet music as an aid to digestion, with occasional loud pages to permit conversation with those seated near them.

Is it possible that there were any in the audience yesterday who failed to appreciate the wild imagination of the composer, the originality of his thought and the musical expression of his thought; who were not thrilled and excited by the long and magnificent crescendo and climax depicting the rising of the sun; or by the demoniacal fury of the Evil-God and the pagan monsters dancing their delirious dance? Mr. Prokofieff's second concerto written and performed in 1913 was remade from sketches in 1923. The score left in his apartment when he first came to this country was lost when the Soviet Government took possession of his rooms. The concerto, as played by him yesterday, is an engrossing work, unusual in its construction, unusual in the musical ideas and the handling of them. There is the incredible cadenza in the first movement; the Scherzo with its perpetual movement, music for frenzied whirling dervishes. The one obviously melodic line is in the finale, a haunting theme suggestive of melancholy folk song, which is treated in a masterly manner. In this finale there is abundant evidence of technical skill, especially when two themes are united, but by no means in the perfunctory school-prize-composition manner for class-room admiration.

The piano is used chiefly as a percussion instrument; and there is great dependence, as in so many contemporaneous compositions for piano and orchestra, on percussion effects and rhythm. Farewell to the long cantilena, to the worship of sensuous sounds. Is this to be deplored? Music is for the most part an expression of the life and thought of its period. Long before the war Thomas Hardy wrote: "Gay prospects wed happily with gay times, but also, if times be not gay! . . . Haggard Egdon appealed to a subtler and scarcer instinct, to a more recently learned emotion, than that which responds to the sort of beauty called charming. Indeed, it is a question if the exclusive reign of this orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. The new vale of Tempe may be a gaunt waste in Thule."

Mr. Prokofieff played in the already well-known Prokofieff manner, brilliantly; yet as if he were playing for his own enjoyment, with little or no regard for what the audience might think; sure of himself but never in the flaming yet restless manner of a virtuoso speeding his way in the full expectation of thunderous applause and opera glasses glued to the eyes of palpitating dames. He played as a man and a musician considering his technical dexterity as taken for granted; busied in the revelation through sound of that which stirred him to composition. Not only was he loudly applauded by the audience; at the end the orchestra, standing, joined the conductor in doing him homage.

What is it that makes the music of Mozart a lasting joy? The perfect expression of pure beauty. Here is this little serenade, which simple as it seems demands the utmost sympathy and the keenest sense of loveliness for conveying its enchantment to men and women of the present generation. The performance yesterday was beyond all praise. And if Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra shone gloriously in the playing of Mozart's music, their interpretation of the far different speech of Prokofieff and De Falla was equally resplendent.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program of Feb. 14 and 15 will comprise Debussy's "Blessed Damozel" and "The Martyrdom of Saint-Sebastian." The former has been performed at these concerts and at other concerts in Boston. "Saint-Sebastian" was performed in full at a concert by the Boston opera company, Andre Caplet, conductor, and orchestral excerpts from it have been played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the concerts of the 14th and 15th Mme. Ritter-Ciampi, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and the Cecilia Chorus will assist.

PROKOFIEFF PLAYS NEW CONCERTO

America Feb 1

By MOSES SMITH

SERGE PROKOFIEFF, brilliant Russian composer and pianist, makes his second appearance at this week's Symphony Concerts, almost four years to a day after his first appearance. He is present as guest-composer as well as soloist, for the program includes the "Scythian Suite" as well as the Second Piano Concerto. To begin and end the program, Mr. Koussevitsky, returning after a fortnight's vacation, has Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and three dances from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat."

Prokofieff's gigantic stature as a composer has been driven home to Bostonians by Mr. Koussevitsky's repeated featuring of his works on the Boston Symphony programs. His playing of the solo part of the concerto reminded us what an extraordinary pianist he is. Revised in 1923 from an early manuscript, it is full of terribly difficult passage-work, requiring consummate virtuosity.

Prokofieff plays it not only brilliantly, but with astonishing ease. His performance has superb clarity, which is enhanced by his percussive treatment of the instrument, both in writing for it and playing at it. The composition itself, which is being heard here for the first time, is good to hear. The form is almost strictly classical, and even themes suggest Liszt and Berlioz. But the harmonic treatment is modern. The development of the various movements is the work of an outstanding musician.

The composer received, at the matinee, a greeting of marked enthusiasm which stretched itself out for many minutes.

SYMPHONY HAS GUEST SOLOIST

Prokofieff Recalled Many Times After Playing Concerto

Tues Feb 1

Another representative modernist, Serge Prokofieff, was guest and soloist at yesterday's concert of the Symphony orchestra. It was as a pianist that Prokofieff first won the attention of American audiences, but of recent years his compositions have found their place on the programs of all of our major orchestras.

Boston went wild with delight at his striking "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," heard here a short season or two ago, and all of his compositions have a vital quality that makes each one an exciting and emotionol experience.

Yesterday's program, after the opening Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," tenderly beautiful and played with that perfection and delicacy that the orchestra brings to it, concerned itself with the guest composer's "Scythian Suite." The suite is rich in pictorial suggestion, opening with the invocation to Veles, proceeding to the dance of the black spirits and ending triumphantly with the procession of the sun. There is wild discordance throughout the four movements, and yet in "Night" there is a tenderness and a softening of tone that catches the soothing silence its title implies.

For the first time in the United States, the same composer's Second Piano Concerto, with M. Prokofieff at the piano, was performed. The original manuscript was lost for many years, and only recently has the composer rearranged it from early notes. In contrast to the Scythian Suite, this later work, resembling its early form only in theme, shows clearly the influence of later years and broadening experience. The Scherzo and Intermezzo, surrounded by their noisy first and last movements, found the audience eager and responsive.

The composer and artist was recalled half a dozen times at the completion of the concerto. His technique at the keyboard is astounding. He plays his music simply and in straightforward manner, with no striving for effective tonal values, and its rapidly moving phrases melt under his finger tips.

The remainder of the program was taken up with three dances by another modernist, the Spanisher composer, De Falla. They were delightful bits of rhythm and melody, and although far less exciting, there will be those who think that they far exceed in importance the much praised Ravel "Bolero." There is form and substance under their apparent lightness.

The audience was decidedly enthusiastic throughout the afternoon.

SCIENCE MONITOR, B

Music in

Feb 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Prokofieff was honored at the fourteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the placing of his "Scythian" Suite and his Second Piano Concerto, in G minor, on the program. The concerto had its first American performance on the afternoon of Jan. 31 in Symphony Hall, Boston, with the composer as soloist.

Mr. Prokofieff is of course well known to Boston audiences. He played his Third Piano Concerto in the same hall four years ago. His Violin Concerto had its first American performance by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston orchestra. Besides the "Scythian" Suite, Bostonians had also heard previously the "Classical" Symphony, the choral piece, "Sept, Ils sont Sept," and the suites from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and from the ballets, "Chout" and "Le Pas d'Acier."

The Second Piano Concerto, Mr. Prokofieff says, is "really the fourth." By that he means that although it was composed in 1913, it was remade completely in 1923. This was because the orchestral parts were lost when his Leningrad apartment was confiscated by order of the Soviet Government. Sketches of the piano part were saved, and from these the composer reconstructed the present version, which differs greatly from the original.

The performance of the work was received with far more than ordinary enthusiasm, and the composer was recalled repeatedly, until he brought back Dr. Koussevitzky, who made the orchestra share in the ovation. The response of the audience was due in part no doubt to the virtuosity of Mr. Prokofieff as pianist—he tosses off astonishing technical feats without apparent effort; but it was no less a tribute to his talent as composer. The concerto speaks in an idiom at once Russian and individual. The four movements, built on classic models, utilize contemporary resources. The themes are salient, and their treatment is musicianly. Rhythmic vigor marks the work throughout. There is liberal opportunity for display of pianistic abilities. Besides two cadenzas, there is a scherzo in the nature of a moto perpetuo, in sixteenth notes by the two hands in the interval of an octave. This was accomplished by the player with nonchalance and brilliance.

The "Scythian" Suite, written in 1914, when the composer was only 23, has a vitality that makes it seem extraordinarily fresh today. It received a scintillant publication at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Another compelling utterance was that of Three Dances from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat," which closed the program.

Yet none of these contemporary items can dull the memory of the exquisite performance of the opening number, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," by a reduced string orchestra. The only difficulty is that Dr. Koussevitzky, possessed of so sensitive and obedient an instrument, tends at times to show off its paces at a speed somewhat detrimental to Mozart's aristocratic art.

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST

ON ITS third visit to New York of the season next week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will change the date of its Thursday evening concert to Friday evening in Carnegie Hall. At this and also at the Saturday matinee concert Serge Prokofieff will be the guest soloist, appearing with the orchestra in his Piano Concerto No. 2. At the Friday night concert Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Prokofieff's Scythian Suite. He will open the program with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and close it with three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

At the matinee concert, in addition to Prokofieff's concerto, the Second Symphony of Bax in E minor and C, which was previously played at the evening concert, will be repeated in this series. It will be preceded by Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point." De Falla's dances will likewise close this program.

GOOSSENS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Pat Jan. 25

Concertino for Strings From His Pen Proves Agreeable

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The annual mid-season vacation of Dr. Koussevitzky is an excellent institution. The conductor needs and deserves his holiday. It was a pleasure last week both to hear and to see so distinguished a musician as Mr. Glazounov. Eugene Goossens, who conducted yesterday afternoon and who leads the band again this evening, has his points as director. And when Dr. Koussevitzky returns to his post next week he will be more than ever appreciated.

LACKS DRAMATIC FORCE

An admirable interpreter of contemporary music, Mr. Goossens appears to have little feeling for the music of the romantic composers. Yet he delights to place it upon his programmes. Presumably, like many another artist, he does not recognize his limitations. Yesterday, for example, Mr. Goossens began with Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and followed that piece with Schumann's First Symphony. Of the passages in Wagner's early score in which the composer anticipates his later methods and proceedures, such as the sombre and brooding introduction, Mr. Goossens made much. But he could not reanimate those pages that have become relatively old-fashioned. Here and there is need of a transfiguring imagination, of a strong lyric and dramatic feeling. And Mr. Goossens lacks these things. Where Wagner most required help, he received it least.

And so with Schumann's symphony. Gone from yesterday's performance were the rapture, the ardor, the songful warmth that Dr. Koussevitzky brings to this often inept yet essentially rhapsodic and exuberant score. Mr. Goossens would revitalize the music by means of rhythmic energy and a general quickening of the pace, but his efforts were in vain. Lifeless the music hung on his hands. Indeed, to hear the symphony yesterday was to realize even more keenly the almost miraculous transformation wrought by Dr. Koussevitzky when he conducts it. The notes were played yesterday, but of themselves they will no longer serve.

Own Concertino Admirable

Of the second part of the programme there is a different tale to tell. Not only was Mr. Goossen's own Concertino for double string orchestra, heard for the first time here, excellently played, the music itself proved altogether agreeable. As composer Mr. Goossens has no very individual voice, but he can write effectively and with charm.

In the matter of performance the final number, Respighi's new "Feste Romana," also received, so far as might be gathered, its due. As to the value of the work itself, that is another matter. Respighi's music, in fact, seems to be undergoing a process of spiritual degeneration. Despite its obvious effectiveness, the "Pines of Rome" was a distinct fall-off from its predecessor, the "Fountains of Rome," and now this latest addition to Respighi's tonal guide-book or Musical Baedeker of the Eternal City, "Roman Festivals," is considerably lower in the aesthetic scale.

Of the four sections—"Circus Maximus," "The Jubilee," "The October Excursions" and "Epiphany"—the two middle ones have the most of musical quality. The first of all is mere movie-music; the last is best described as a "filthy din." Of course the audience liked it, and applauded it, and applauded piece, band and conductor to the echo. And had the music been even noisier and more blatantly vulgar the audience would have liked it even better.

It was long ago demonstrated that the worth of music is not to be gauged by the fervor with which the general public receives it. Even the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts are, after all, only human.

NEW YORK
SUN

FEB - 1926

On its third visit to New York this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will change the date of its Thursday evening concert to next Friday evening, February 7, in Carnegie Hall.

At this and also at the Saturday matinee concert, Serge Prokofieff will be the guest soloist, appearing with the orchestra in his piano concerto No. 2. At the Friday night concert, Koussevitzky will conduct Prokofieff's Scythian suite. He will open the program with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and close it with three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat."

At the matinee concert, in addition to Prokofieff's concerto, the Second Symphony of Bax in E minor and C, which was previously played at the evening concert, will be repeated in this series. It will be preceded by Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point." De Falla's dances will likewise close this program.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 2 - 1926

Bostonians at Academy

Serge Prokofieff will be the assisting soloist at the Academy of Music on Thursday night, when Mr. Koussevitsky brings his Boston Symphony Orchestra here for its third visit of the season. The Russian composer will participate in his own second concerto for piano and orchestra. Three dances from the De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat," and Tschaikofsky's Sixth Symphony are the other program numbers.

CONDUCTOR RETURNS TO SYMPHONY

Post Feb 1

Prokofieff Plays Own Piano Concerto With Virtuosity

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The annual interregnum at Symphony Hall is over. Dr. Koussevitzky has returned as conductor to the regular series of concerts. Yesterday's audience welcomed him with a fervor that allowed of but one interpretation, and the orchestra played as it has not played on a Friday afternoon since Dr. Koussevitzky began his holiday.

PROKOFIEFF AT PIANO

Audiences the world over respond to personalities, and there were two yesterday in Symphony Hall, the returning conductor and the composer-soloist, Serge Prokofieff. The latter played his Second Pianoforte Concerto, hitherto unheard in the United States, and, together with orchestra and conductor, acknowledged the long-protracted applause bestowed upon his Scythian Suite.

This, it may be remarked in passing, was not Mr. Prokofieff's initial appearance at these concerts. Four years ago he played at a pair of them his Third Concerto and since 1922 his name had appeared no less than 14 times on the symphony programmes, a substantial total for a modernist composer.

Similar to Suite

The Concerto of yesterday, played by Mr. Prokofieff with unassuming virtuosity, by no means compares in interest with its immediate successor. This earlier music, composed in 1913, when Mr. Prokofieff was but 23, is so simil[ar] in genenal character to the Scythi[an] Suite, a product of the ensuing ye[ar] that it suffered by following the la[ter] piece on yesterday's programme. T[here] was a disturbing suggestion that [the] savage rites of the Scythian barba[rians] were over-long continued. To [be] technically, there was too much [of] principal musical ingredients [in] young Prokofieff's style: His [use] quadruple rhythms; his p[re]diatonic dissonance; his love [of] highly percussive orchestratio[n].

Not before had the Scyth[ian] been so brilliantly played. [If] had the Concerto not com[e] there would have been no [re]plaining. This Suite is a achievement, especially fo[r] man, and it owes little composer, even to Stravi[nsky].

All Too Bri[ef]

All in all, yesterday' even a too brilliant dances from De F[alla's] Cornered Hat," m[ost] and highly spiced sensuous orches[tra] Prokofieff's piec[e]

Only Mozart Kleine Nacht[musik] formance of by a portion the concert o[n] contrast.

MUSIC

Herald Jan 31 Feb 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 14th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine kleine Nachtmusik. Prokofieff, Scythian Suite. Prokofieff, Piano Concerto No. 2, G minor (Mr. Prokofieff, pianist. First performance in the United States). De Falla, Three Dances from the "Three Cornered Hat."

No doubt some in the audience yesterday were disconcerted by the splendid savagery of the "Scythian Suite." What would they have had? The Scythians were not a genteel folk, nor did they discuss philosophy in sacred groves. The men had bloody hands; they drank the blood of the first men they killed in battle; they cut off heads; they scalped and made themselves cloaks of scalps; sometimes they flayed the entire body of an enemy; they valued drinking cups made from skulls; they were cunning in the art of impalement. They strangled native men, to accompany a dead king, stuffed their bodies and mounted them on beautiful horses in a circle to guard the tomb.

If a composer chooses to take a Scythian legend for his subject—it would be interesting to know where Mr. Prokofieff found this legend—would the disgruntled have had him write suave music, mellifluous melodies, interwoven with academic precision, with familiar progressions and cadences, discreetly orchestrated, possibly with the introduction of a mandolin and a celesta for pretty tinkling and gum-drop effects, all in orthodox form?

How some amiable souls are frightened by music that departs in any way from a long-established order! How they delight in condemning individuality, originality; in finding the unfamiliar, or the unexpected disagreeable! "Let us dream again," they say at a concert; "waking would be pain." Mr. Prokofieff, selecting a barbaric legend, writing in superbly barbaric vein, awakens the sleepers and all those who demand sweet music as an aid to digestion, with occasional loud pages to permit conversation with those seated near them.

Is it possible that there were any in the audience yesterday who failed to appreciate the wild imagination of the compos[er], the originality of his thought [by] the musical expression of his [ideas]? Who were not thrilled and ex[alted] by the long and magnificent [crescendo] and climax depicting the ris[ing] of the sun; or by the demoniacal [laughter] of the Evil-God and the pagan [worshippers] dancing their delirious dance? [Prok]ofieff's second concerto writ[ten] and performed in 1913 was remade [in] Kharkov in 1923. The score left [the] apartment when he first came [to] the country was lost when the Soviet [Gov]ernment took possession of his [effects]. The concerto, as played by him [yes]terday, is an engrossing work, unusual in its construction, unusual in musical ideas and the handling of [them]. There is the incredible cadenza [in the] first movement; the Scherzo with [its] perpetual movement, music for frenzied whirling dervishes. The one obvious melodic line is in the finale, a [stri]ng theme suggestive of melancholy folk song, which is treated in a [play]ful manner. In this finale there [is] abundant evidence of technical skill, [espe]cially when two themes are united, [but] by no means in the perfunctory school-prize-composition manner for class-room admiration.

The piano is used chiefly as a percussion instrument; and there is great dependence, as in so many contemporaneous compositions for piano and orchestra, on percussion effects and rhythm. Farewell to the long cantilena, to the worship of sensuous sounds. Is this to be deplored? Music is for the most part an expression of the life and thought of its period. Long before the war Thomas Hardy wrote: "Gay prospects wed happily with gay times, but also, if times be not gay! . . . Haggard Egdon appealed to a subtler and scarcer instinct, to a more recently learned emotion, than that which responds to the sort of beauty called charming. Indeed, it is a question if the exclusive reign of this orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. The new vale of Tempe may be a gaunt waste in Thule."

Mr. Prokofieff played in the already well-known Prokofieff manner, brilliantly; yet as if he were playing for his own enjoyment, with little or no regard for what the audience might think; sure of himself but never in the flaming yet restless manner of a virtuoso speeding his way in the full expectation of thunderous applause and opera glasses glued to the eyes of palpitating dames. He played as a man and a musician considering his technical dexterity as taken for granted; busied in the revelation through sound of that which stirred him to composition. Not only was he loudly applauded by the audience; at the end the orchestra, standing, joined the conductor in doing him homage.

What is it that makes the music of Mozart a lasting joy? The perfect expression of pure beauty. Here is this little serenade, which simple as it seems demands the utmost sympathy and the keenest sense of loveliness for conveying its enchantment to men and women of the present generation. The performance yesterday was beyond all praise. And if Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra shone gloriously in the playing of Mozart's music, their interpretation of the far different speech of Prokofieff and De Falla was equally resplendent.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program of Feb. 14 and 15 will comprise Debussy's "Blessed Damozel" and "The Martyrdom of Saint-Sebastian." The former has been performed at these concerts and at other concerts in Boston. "Saint-Sebastian" was performed in full at a concert by the Boston opera company, Andre Caplet, conductor, and orchestral excerpts from it have been played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the concerts of the 14th and 15th Mme. Ritter-Ciampi, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and the Cecilia Chorus will assist.

America Feb 1

PROKOFIEFF PLAYS NEW CONCERTO

By MOSES SMITH

SERGE PROKOFIEFF, brilliant Russian composer and pianist, makes his second appearance at this week's Symphony Concerts, almost four years to a day after his first appearance. He is present as guest-composer as well as soloist, for the program includes the "Scythian Suite" as well as the Second Piano Concerto. To begin and end the program, Mr. Koussevitsky, returning after a fortnight's vacation, has Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and three dances from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat."

Prokofieff's gigantic stature as a composer has been driven home to Bostonians by Mr. Koussevitsky's repeated featuring of his works on the Boston Symphony programs. His playing of the solo part of the concerto reminded us what an extraordinary pianist he is. Revised in 1923 from an early manuscript, it is full of terribly difficult passagework, requiring consummate virtuosity.

Prokofieff plays it not only brilliantly, but with astonishing ease. His performance has superb clarity, which is enhanced by his percussive treatment of the instrument, both in writing for it and playing at it. The composition itself, which is being heard here for the first time, is good to hear. The form is almost strictly classical, and even themes suggest Liszt and Berlioz. But the harmonic treatment is modern. The development of the various movements is the work of an outstanding musician.

The composer received, at the matinee, a greeting of marked enthusiasm which stretched itself out for many minutes.

SYMPHONY HAS GUEST SOLOIST

Prokofieff Recalled Many Times After Playing Concerto

Tran Feb 1

Another representative modernist, Serge Prokofieff, was guest and soloist at yesterday's concert of the Symphony orchestra. It was as a pianist that Prokofieff first won the attention of American audiences, but of recent years his compositions have found their place on the programs of all of our major orchestras.

Boston went wild with delight at his striking "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," heard here a short season or two ago, and all of his compositions have a vital quality that makes each one an exciting and emotionol experience.

Yesterday's program, after the opening Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," tenderly beautiful and played with that perfection and delicacy that the orchestra brings to it, concerned itself with the guest composer's "Scythian Suite." The suite is rich in pictorial suggestion, opening with the invocation to Veles, proceeding to the dance of the black spirits and ending triumphantly with the procession of the sun. There is wild discordance throughout the four movements, and yet in "Night" there is a tenderness and a softening of tone that catches the soothing silence its title implies.

For the first time in the United States, the same composer's Second Piano Concerto, with M. Prokofieff at the piano, was performed. The original manuscript was lost for many years, and only recently has the composer rearranged it from early notes. In contrast to the Scythian Suite, this later work, resembling its early form only in theme, shows clearly the influence of later years and broadening experience. The Scherzo and Intermezzo, surrounded by their noisy first and last movements, found the audience eager and responsive.

The composer and artist was recalled half a dozen times at the completion of the concerto. His technique at the keyboard is astounding. He plays his music simply and in straightforward manner, with no striving for effective tonal values, and its rapidly moving phrases melt under his finger tips.

The remainder of the program was taken up with three dances by another modernist, the Spanisher composer, De Falla. They were delightful bits of rhythm and melody, and although far less exciting, there will be those who think that they far exceed in importance the much praised Ravel "Bolero." There is form and substance under their apparent lightness.

The audience was decidedly enthusiastic throughout the afternoon.

SCIENCE MONITOR, B

Music in

Feb 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Prokofieff was honored at the fourteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the placing of his "Scythian" Suite and his Second Piano Concerto, in G minor, on the program. The concerto had its first American performance on the afternoon of Jan. 31 in Symphony Hall, Boston, with the composer as soloist.

Mr. Prokofieff is of course well known to Boston audiences. He played his Third Piano Concerto in the same hall four years ago. His Violin Concerto had its first American performance by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston orchestra. Besides the "Scythian" Suite, Bostonians had also heard previously the "Classical" Symphony, the choral piece, "Sept, Ils sont Sept," and the suites from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and from the ballets, "Chout" and "Le Pas d'Acier."

The Second Piano Concerto, Mr. Prokofieff says, is "really the fourth." By that he means that although it was composed in 1913, it was remade completely in 1923. This was because the orchestral parts were lost when his Leningrad apartment was confiscated by order of the Soviet Government. Sketches of the piano part were saved, and from these the composer reconstructed the present version, which differs greatly from the original.

The performance of the work was received with far more than ordinary enthusiasm, and the composer was recalled repeatedly, until he brought back Dr. Koussevitzky, who made the orchestra share in the ovation. The response of the audience was due in part no doubt to the virtuosity of Mr. Prokofieff as pianist—he tosses off astonishing technical feats without apparent effort; but it was no less a tribute to his talent as composer. The concerto speaks in an idiom at once Russian and individual. The four movements, built on classic models, utilize contemporary resources. The themes are salient, and their treatment is musicianly. Rhythmic vigor marks the work throughout. There is liberal opportunity for display of pianistic abilities. Besides two cadenzas, there is a scherzo in the nature of a moto perpetuo, in sixteenth notes by the two hands in the interval of an octave. This was accomplished by the player with nonchalance and brilliance.

The "Scythian" Suite, written in 1914, when the composer was only 23, has a vitality that makes it seem extraordinarily fresh today. It received a scintillant publication at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Another compelling utterance was that of Three Dances from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat," which closed the program.

Yet none of these contemporary items can dull the memory of the exquisite performance of the opening number, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," by a reduced string orchestra. The only difficulty is that Dr. Koussevitzky, possessed of so sensitive and obedient an instrument, tends at times to show off its paces at a speed somewhat detrimental to Mozart's aristocratic art.

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST

ON ITS third visit to New York of the season next week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will change the date of its Thursday evening concert to Friday evening in Carnegie Hall. At this and also at the Saturday matinee concert Serge Prokofieff will be the guest soloist, appearing with the orchestra in his Piano Concerto No. 2. At the Friday night concert Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Prokofieff's Scythian Suite. He will open the program with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and close it with three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

At the matinee concert, in addition to Prokofieff's concerto, the Second Symphony of Bax in E minor and C, which was previously played at the evening concert, will be repeated in this series. It will be preceded by Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point." De Falla's dances will likewise close this program.

COMPOSER PLAYS PIANO CONCERTO

Prokofieff Is Soloist at Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Conducts "Scythian Suite, Mozart and De Falla

Serge Prokofieff, the noted Russian modernist composer, appeared as soloist in his own G minor concerto for piano at yesterday's Symphony concert. Dr Koussevitzky, returning after two weeks' absence, was warmly applauded. He conducted Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," and three dances from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" with his usual fervor.

Prokofieff played his third piano concerto at these concerts Jan 29, 1926. Dr Koussevitzky, a firm believer in Prokofieff's genius, has conducted a number of his works here in the past five seasons, notably the little "Classical Symphony," the "Sept, ils sont Sept," for tenor, chorus, and orchestra, and the "Scythian Suite," each of which has been much talked of.

The second piano concerto, played yesterday, is a rewritten version of an early work, using the same themes, but treating them in a more modernistic style. The themes date from 1913, the revision from 1923. This concerto has not previously been heard in the United States. It gives the soloist ample opportunity to display technique, but is not as interesting musically as Prokofieff's violin concerto.

The orchestral accompaniment, like the solo part, is intricate in texture, full of the acrid harmonies and strident rhythms characteristic of Prokofieff, yet one felt that the music had been first conceived in a far simpler and more conventional idiom and form. Its elaboration seemed a tour de force.

Prokofieff, like other modernist composers, thinks of the piano as primarily an instrument of percussion. This concerto makes no attempts at lyricism. There are no slow, sweet melodies, no grand, sonorous climaxes. Nothing, in short, at all after the style of Liszt or Rubinstein.

The piece makes great demands on the skill of the soloist. Nobody can crack at Prokofieff's expense the old joke that "he plays like a composer." On the contrary, he plays like a pianist of very unusual ability. Were it not for his other works, one would think from this concerto that he was only interested in writing show pieces for piano to astonish audiences by his muscular energy and agility.

The "Scythian Suite," repeated yesterday in honor of the composer, sounded less startling and more intelligible than it did five years ago. One noted in the instrumentation details that have become common property in the past 15 years, so that such assimilative and eclectic writers as Respighi now use these once astonishing procedures in routine fashion. One discovered how much of the dissonance in Prokofieff's score is produced by carrying the use of the orthodox harmonic device of organ points to a perfectly logical extreme.

One's general impression of Prokofieff's music is that he is the Saint-Saens of our day, extremely able, with genuine originality in small works, but incapable of working on a big scale without borrowing from the inspiration of greater men.

Dr Koussevitzky reduced the size of the orchestra for Mozart's serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," one of the most ingratiating of the lesser works of the composer of "Don Juan" and the G minor Symphony. This restored the original balance of tonal values in the orchestra, but made one regret the necessity of playing Mozart in so large a hall.

The chief defect of the performance was a failure to follow the graceful curves of Mozart's melodies. Dr Koussevitzky made them all rather stiff and angular, so that they sounded a bit too much like the tinkling tune Liadov entitled "The Musical Snuff Box."

The three familiar dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," were substituted for the announced arrangements by Arbos from Albeniz' piano music. This change was probably owing to the amount of rehearsal time demanded by Prokofieff's exacting concerto. De Falla's music, played with zest and rhythmic intensity, was again delightful.

Brahms Festival Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as previously announced, is to give a Brahms festival next month. The program for the subscription concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday series, for March 21 and 22, is planned to be a part of the festival. It will include the "Academic Festival" overture, and the Second and Third Symphonies of Brahms. Except for the "rush" seats Fridays, these concerts are completely sold out. The only tickets available for non-subscribers to the series of 24 Fridays and 24 Saturdays will be the few turned in to be sold for the endowment fund by owners unable to use them.

The rest of the festival includes four extra concerts, for which season tickets went on sale 10 days ago at Symphony Hall. The demand is already so great that sold-out houses seem certain. These extra concerts are planned as follows:

Sunday, March 23, at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Second Piano Concerto; and Fourth Symphony. Soloist, Arthur Schnabel.

Monday, March 24, at 8:15. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. "Song of Destiny" (Schicksalslied") and "German Requiem." Soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Margaret Matzenauer, Fraser Gange.

Tuesday, March 25. Chamber concert by Burgin Quartet, Arthur Schnabel and others. The program will include one of the violin sonatas, a group of piano pieces, the "Liebeslieder" for mixed chorus, the Quintet in F minor, and songs for Mme Matzenauer.

Wednesday, March 25, at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rhapsody for alto, chorus and orchestra. First piano concerto, and First Symphony. Soloists, Margaret Matzenauer and Arthur Schnabel.

This is a very attractive set of programs, and should suffice to sell out the hall for the series. In order to make the festival completely representative of Brahms' best work it would only be necessary to secure such a violinist as Kreisler to play the violin concerto and one of the violin sonatas. But even without them this series will be a notable event, something to be remembered and talked of long after. Boston concert goers are once more indebted to Dr Koussevitzky's zeal and ambition for what promises to be a remarkable series of concerts.

No doubt, as for the Beethoven festival, many music lovers will come from outside Boston, not merely from the rest of New England, but from farther afield. If the custom of giving festivals devoted to the work of a single composer, so prevalent in Germany and Austria, can be established here it will add a valuable element to the musical life of the Nation.

The only such festival in America is now the one given at Bethlehem, Penn, every May, and devoted to the works of Bach. Other American festivals have hitherto featured not composers, but performers.

TIMES

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second and brilliantly successful New York concert of the week-end yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

It may be said, for it is true that Boston has now an orchestra which is without a superior, if it has an equal in this country, a band that Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to a unique flexibility, sensitiveness and virtuosity, which surpassed itself yesterday in the quality and spirit of its performance.

The reason for the special lustre of these performances lay probably in the fact that the men of the Boston Orchestra, at the end of one of their crowded periodic tours, had had a period of comparative rest and relaxation between two concerts given on Friday and Saturday in one city. In any event, the orchestra excelled itself, and its leader seemed in equal spirits. Even the rather trite excerpts from de Falla's ballet, repeated from the Friday program, were played with such color and elan that they thrilled the most indifferent or critical.

The concert had, furthermore, the value of repeating three important modern works. Mr. Prokofieff was present to take again the soloist's part in the performance of his Second piano concerto, introduced on Friday night. The first half of the program consisted of Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point" and Arnold Bax's Second symphony in E minor and C. These works had special interest for the Boston Symphony's public when they were presented here by Mr. Koussevitzky earlier in the season.

The score of Walton did not suffer from repetition, and the scores of Bax and Prokofieff gained by the process. The symphony more clearly than ever established its inherent melodic and imaginative life. Its Celticism is not mere local idiom or epigram; this essence is not a matter of effects which are exterior. On the contrary, Bax seems to have found his way back to an ancient source of power. A part of that power, also, lies in the impress of northern nature and mystery that characterizes much of the heroic music.

Stravinsky is obviously present in the joyous, zestful, ridiculous music of Walton. But this is British humor, and British music, fresh minted, and, for all its derivations, as genuine as a pound sterling! Parts of Mr. Prokofieff's concerto gain with repeated hearing, as, for example, the third movement, which, with the first, appears to have more originality and actual creative impulse than other pages. Nevertheless, the opinion will not down that Mr. Prokofieff has written better music and better concertos.

It is an excellent proceeding for a conductor to repeat works of proved importance and interest as Mr. Koussevitzky did on this occasion. In this way he increased rather than diminished the interest of the concert, although it is also true that he has accustomed us to look to him, more than to any conductor on this side of the water, for interesting new music.

will bring the long anticipated performance of choral works by Debussy. His "Blessed Damozel," and his music from d'Annunzio's play "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" will fill the program. The Radcliffe Choral Society and the Cecilia Society will assist. Mme Ritter-Ciampi, a Parisian opera singer, will be the soloist. P. R.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE

FEB 7 - 1926

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Serge Prokofiew Plays His Second Concerto at the Academy of Music—'Pelleas et Melisande'

SERGE PROKOFIEW was the soloist at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Mr. Koussevitsky conducted at the Academy of Music last evening. One of the most talented of the younger contemporary composers, and as well an excellent pianist, he scarcely required an introduction to his audience, though this was, we believe, his first Brooklyn appearance. Much of his music had been heard in the past at the Academy. Two years ago, we recall; the Classical Symphony was performed at one of Mr. Koussewitsky's concerts, and somewhat earlier a suite from the opera "The Love of Three Oranges" and the Violin Concerto had been introduced to Brooklyn.

* * *

Once heard, Mr. Prokofiew's music is not easily or quickly forgotten. Its individuality of style, which sets it apart from the bulk of modern music, makes it memorable, whatever we may think of the intrinsic value of its content. Whether or not what Mr. Prokofiew has to say is important, or for any other reason worth saying, he says it in a manner that is his own, and in a manner, moreover, whose originality represents the extension and development, rather than the arbitrary denial, of the principles in which Mr. Prokofiew was schooled.

For example, Mr. Prokofiew subscribes to neither of two prevalent and fallacious theories relative to musical form: he regards form neither as unimportant and impeding to the free expression of musical ideas nor as all-essential; it is, to him, no more than a necessary and flexible mould in which to shape his materials. His attitude toward harmony is equally that of a progressive conservative. He does not reject the principle of polytonality, neither is he scornful of simple diatonic and chromatic harmonization, though he rarely uses the latter for the sake of anachronistic, neo-classical effect. Moreover, Mr. Prokofiew is capable of writing melody. Eight-measure and longer melodic phrases are common in his works, in which the effect of linear continuity is further enhanced by the symphonic development—not merely the reiteration—of thematic fragments and motifs. That, in spite of this conservative attitude toward methods and technique of composition Mr. Prokofiew's music should bear the stamp of a striking originality, is a testimony to the authenticity of his imaginative and creative gifts.

* * *

The dominant characteristics of Mr. Prokofiew's music are its fantastic humor and its rude, brutish vigor: the former, exemplified in the ballet "Chout" and in "The Love of Three Oranges," stems from Rimsky-Korsakow and Strawinsky; the latter, whose great expression may be found in the Scythian Suite, is a more individual trait. Both appear in the Second Piano Concerto, which received its first New York performance last evening, with Mr. Prokofiew at the solo instrument. Written in 1913, played in Russia during the same year and in Italy two years later, the publication of the Concerto was delayed, and when in 1918 the manuscript score was confiscated by the Soviet Government (Mr. Prokofiew had unwisely left it, among other effects, in his Leningrad apartments), the composer retained only his original sketches. From these the Concerto was rewritten and rescored in 1923, and in its present form represents the felicitous combination of old matter and a new manner.

It is not great music; in the first and fourth movements it does not quite come off, since in these the material does not justify the serious and elaborate treatment that Mr. Prokofiew has given it. The Scherzo and the Intermezzo, the first a grotesque, the second a tragic humoresque, aim less high and achieve their goal. Mr. Prokofiew is at his best (a statement to which the Scythian Suite alone among his works supplies an exception) when he writes in a spirit of fantasy or of farce. It need scarcely be added that the Second Concerto is resourcefully scored, and that the piano part is brilliant and difficult—the effect of glissando scales in the Intermezzo is a particularly happy one. Mr. Prokofiew is a much better pianist than the majority of composers, and if his touch is hammerlike and his tone cold and stony, this is advantageous rather than otherwise in the performance of his own music.

Mr. Koussewitsky's contributions to last evening's program were Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony and three dances from De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat."

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

Serge Koussevitzky Gives Boston Symphony Recital

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to the Lyric last night for their one brief visit of the season, and played in a way that made us shiver to think of losing them. Their concert was vigorous and superbly musical.

Opening with a deftly respectable expression of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, they ran right into a tornado of applause with the new "Bolero" of Ravel, an ingeniously monotonous but infinitely disturbing Spanish dance.

The simplicity of this work is almost impudent; a single wail repeated over and over again by one instrument after another against a drumbeat reminiscent of the African bush, never quickened but always strengthened. And yet Baltimore couldn't help liking it more than any new work it had heard for years. It took a Koussevitzky to handle the very subtle crecendo of the "Bolero."

The closing half of the concert was all Wagner, and not according to schedule. The "Valkyrie's Ride," the Vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" and the "Meistersinger" overture followed one another breathlessly and beautifully. The content was drained its utmost from each work in the playing, and the result was magnificent.

Surely we have had no more luscious symphony concert this season than Mr. Koussevitzky's. A. S. K.

NEW YORK
WORLD

FEB 8 1926

39

Other Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Soloist, Serge Prokofieff, pianist.

Eine Kleine Nachtmusik.....Mozart
Scythian Suite, op. 20; second piano concerto in G minor, op. 16.....Prokofieff
Three dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos".....De Falla

The gorgeous and barbaric dissonance, occasionally relieved by a bitter discord or a choleric humor in quieter vein, so apparent in that music of Serge Prokofieff which American audiences have been permitted to hear, swelled to a climax of unfettered sound in Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Prokofieff himself, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky to support his every move, was giving a first New York performance of his second piano concerto (G minor, opus 16).

It is elaborately orchestrated, in the manner of Stravinsky, with weird intervals, atonal contrasts and gymnastics for the piano of inhuman complexity. It was difficult, as we had not heard the work before, to understand just what Mr. Prokofieff intended to convey, or whether he intended to convey anything in particular. In the second movement, apparently a scherzo from the suggested rhythmic pattern, Mr. Prokofieff and the orchestra were at odds for a fleeting instant.

Mr. Koussevitzky also conducted the visitor's Scythian Suite (opus 20) and three dances from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat." The Mozart Ein Kleine Nachmusik (Kochel 525) was uneven, some of it almost expressionless. The menuetto, for instance, was stodgy; the rondo traveled at a which approached a mild hysteria.

COMPOSER PLAYS PIANO CONCERTO

Prokofieff Is Soloist at Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Conducts "Scythian Suite, Mozart and De Falla

Serge Prokofieff, the noted Russian modernist composer, appeared as soloist in his own G minor concerto for piano at yesterday's Symphony concert. Dr Koussevitzky, returning after two weeks' absence, was warmly applauded. He conducted Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," and three dances from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" with his usual fervor.

Prokofieff played his third piano concerto at these concerts Jan 29, 1926. Dr Koussevitzky, a firm believer in Prokofieff's genius, has conducted a number of his works here in the past five seasons, notably the little "Classical Symphony," the "Sept, ils sont Sept," for tenor, chorus, and orchestra, and the "Scythian Suite," each of which has been much talked of.

The second piano concerto, played yesterday, is a rewritten version of an early work, using the same themes, but treating them in a more modernistic style. The themes date from 1913, the revision from 1923. This concerto has not previously been heard in the United States. It gives the soloist ample opportunity to display technique, but is not as interesting musically as Prokofieff's violin concerto.

The orchestral accompaniment, like the solo part, is intricate in texture, full of the acrid harmonies and strident rhythms characteristic of Prokofieff, yet one felt that the music had been first conceived in a far simpler and more conventional idiom and form. Its elaboration seemed a tour de force.

Prokofieff, like other modernist composers, thinks of the piano as primarily an instrument of percussion. This concerto makes no attempts at lyricism. There are no slow, sweet melodies, no grand, sonorous climaxes. Nothing, in short, at all after the style of Liszt or Rubinstein.

The piece makes great demands on the skill of the soloist. Nobody can crack at Prokofieff's expense the old joke that "he plays like a composer." On the contrary, he plays like a pianist of very unusual ability. Were it not for his other works, one would tnink from this concerto that he was only interested in writing show pieces for piano to astonish audiences by his muscular energy and agility.

The "Scythian Suite," repeated yesterday in honor of the composer, sounded less startling and more intelligible than it did five years ago. One noted in the instrumentation details that have become common property in the past 15 years, so that such assimilative and eclectic writers as Respighi now use these once astonishing procedures in routine fashion. One discovered how much of the dissonance in Prokofieff's score is produced by carrying the use of the orthodox harmonic device of organ points to a perfectly logical extreme.

One's general impression of Prokofieff's music is that he is the Saint-Saens of our day, extremely able, with genuine originality in small works, but incapable of working on a big scale without borrowing from the inspiration of greater men.

Dr Koussevitzky reduced the size of the orchestra for Mozart's serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," one of the most ingratiating of the lesser works of the composer of "Don Juan" and the G minor Symphony. This restored the original balance of tonal values in the orchestra, but made one regret the necessity of playing Mozart in so large a hall.

The chief defect of the performance was a failure to follow the graceful curves of Mozart's melodies. Dr Koussevitzky made them all rather stiff and angular, so that they sounded a bit too much like the tinkling tune Liadov entitled "The Musical Snuff Box."

The three familiar dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," were substituted for the announced arrangements by Arbos from Albeniz' piano music. This change was probably owing to the amount of rehearsal time demanded by Prokofieff's exacting concerto. De Falla's music, played with zest and rhythmic intensity, was again delight-

THE SUN AND NEW YORK HERALD

TIMES

Brahms Festival Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as previously announced, is to give a Brahms festival next month. The program for the subscription concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday series, for March 21 and 22, is planned to be a part of the festival. It will include the "Academic Festival" overture, and the Second and Third Symphonies of Brahms. Except for the "rush" seats Fridays, these concerts are completely sold out. The only tickets available for non-subscribers to the series of 24 Fridays and 24 Saturdays will be the few turned in to be sold for the endowment fund by owners unable to use them.

The rest of the festival includes four extra concerts, for which season tickets went on sale 10 days ago at Symphony Hall. The demand is already so great that sold-out houses seem certain. These extra concerts are planned as follows:

Sunday, March 23, at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Second Piano Concerto; and Fourth Symphony. Soloist, Arthur Schnabel.

Monday, March 24, at 8:15. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. "Song of Destiny" (Schicksalslied") and "German Requiem." Soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Margaret Matzenauer, Fraser Gange.

Tuesday, March 25. Chamber concert by Burgin Quartet, Arthur Schnabel and others. The program will include one of the violin sonatas, a group of piano pieces, the "Liebeslieder" for mixed chorus, the Quintet in F minor, and songs for Mme Matzenauer.

Wednesday, March 25, at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rhapsody for alto, chorus and orchestra. First piano concerto, and First Symphony. Soloists, Margaret Matzenauer and Arthur Schnabel.

This is a very attractive set of programs, and should suffice to sell out the hall for the series. In order to make the festival completely representative of Brahms' best work it would only be necessary to secure such a violinist as Kreisler to play the violin concerto and one of the violin sonatas. But even without them this series will be a notable event, something to be remembered and talked of long after. Boston concert goers are once more indebted to Dr Koussevitzky's zeal and ambition for what promises to be a remarkable series of concerts.

No doubt, as for the Beethoven festival, many music lovers will come from outside Boston, not merely from the rest of New England, but from farther afield. If the custom of giving festivals devoted to the work of a single composer, so prevalent in Germany and Austria, can be established here it will add a valuable element to the musical life of the Nation.

The only such festival in America is now the one given at Bethlehem, Penn, every May, and devoted to the works of Bach. Other American festivals have hitherto featured not composers, but performers.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second and brilliantly successful New York concert of the week-end yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

It may be said, for it is true that Boston has now an orchestra which is without a superior, if it has an equal in this country, a band that Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to a unique flexibility, sensitiveness and virtuosity, which surpassed itself yesterday in the quality and spirit of its performance.

The reason for the special lustre of these performances lay probably in the fact that the men of the Boston Orchestra, at the end of one of their crowded periodic tours, had had a period of comparative rest and relaxation between two concerts given on Friday and Saturday in one city. In any event, the orchestra excelled itself, and its leader seemed in equal spirits. Even the rather trite excerpts from de Falla's ballet, repeated from the Friday program, were played with such color and elan that they thrilled the most indifferent or critical.

The concert had, furthermore, the value of repeating three important modern works. Mr. Prokofieff was present to take again the soloist's part in the performance of his Second piano concerto, introduced on Friday night. The first half of the program consisted of Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point" and Arnold Bax's Second symphony in E minor and C. These works had special interest for the Boston Symphony's public when they were presented here by Mr. Koussevitzky earlier in the season.

The score of Walton did not suffer from repetition, and the scores of Bax and Prokofieff gained by the process. The symphony more clearly than ever established its inherent melodic and imaginative life. Its Celticism is not mere local idiom or epigram; this essence is not a matter of effects which are exterior. On the contrary, Bax seems to have found his way back to an ancient source of power. A part of that power, also, lies in the impress of northern nature and mystery that characterizes much of the heroic music.

Stravinsky is obviously present in the joyous, zestful, ridiculous music of Walton. But this is British humor, and British music, fresh minted, and, for all its derivations, as genuine as a pound sterling! Parts of Mr. Prokofieff's concerto gain with repeated hearing, as, for example, the third movement, which, with the first, appears to have more originality and actual creative impulse than other pages. Nevertheless, the opinion will not down that Mr. Prokofieff has written better music and better concertos.

It is an excellent proceeding for a conductor to repeat works of proved importance and interest as Mr. Koussevitzky did on this occasion. In this way he increased rather than diminished the interest of the concert, although it is also true that he has accustomed us to look to him, more than to any conductor on this side of the water, for interesting new music.

will bring the long anticipated performance of choral works by Debussy. His "Blessed Damozel," and his music from d'Annunzio's play "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" will fill the program. The Radcliffe Choral Society and the Cecilia Society will assist. Mme Ritter-Ciampi, a Parisian opera singer, will be the soloist. P. R.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Serge Prokofiew Plays His Second Concerto at the Academy of Music—'Pelleas et Melisande'

SERGE PROKOFIEW was the soloist at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Mr. Koussevitsky conducted at the Academy of Music last evening. One of the most talented of the younger contemporary composers, and as well an excellent pianist, he scarcely required an introduction to his audience, though this was, we believe, his first Brooklyn appearance. Much of his music had been heard in the past at the Academy. Two years ago, we recall; the Classical Symphony was performed at one of Mr. Koussewitsky's concerts, and somewhat earlier a suite from the opera "The Love of Three Oranges" and the Violin Concerto had been introduced to Brooklyn.

* * *

Once heard, Mr. Prokofiew's music is not easily or quickly forgotten. Its individuality of style, which sets it apart from the bulk of modern music, makes it memorable, whatever we may think of the intrinsic value of its content. Whether or not what Mr. Prokofiew has to say is important, or for any other reason worth saying, he says it in a manner that is his own, and in a manner, moreover, whose originality represents the extension and development, rather than the arbitrary denial, of the principles in which Mr. Prokofiew was schooled.

For example, Mr. Prokofiew subscribes to neither of two prevalent and fallacious theories relative to musical form: he regards form neither as unimportant and impeding to the free expression of musical ideas nor as all-essential; it is, to him, no more than a necessary and flexible mould in which to shape his materials. His attitude toward harmony is equally that of a progressive conservative. He does not reject the principle of polytonality, neither is he scornful of simple diatonic and chromatic harmonization, though he rarely uses the latter for the sake of anachronistic, neo-classical effect. Moreover, Mr. Prokofiew is capable of writing melody. Eight-measure and longer melodic phrases are common in his works, in which the effect of linear continuity is further enhanced by the symphonic development—not merely the reiteration—of thematic fragments and motifs. That, in spite of this conservative attitude toward methods and technique of composition Mr. Prokofiew's music should bear the stamp of a striking originality, is a testimony to the authenticity of his imaginative and creative gifts.

* * *

The dominant characteristics of Mr. Prokofiew's music are its fantastic humor and its rude, brutish vigor: the former, exemplified in the ballet "Chout" and in "The Love of Three Oranges," stems from Rimsky-Korsakow and Strawinsky; the latter, whose great expression may be found in the Scythian Suite, is a more individual trait. Both appear in the Second Piano Concerto, which received its first New York performance last evening, with Mr. Prokofiew at the solo instrument. Written in 1913, played in Russia during the same year and in Italy two years later, the publication of the Concerto was delayed, and when in 1918 the manuscript score was confiscated by the Soviet Government (Mr. Prokofiew had unwisely left it, among other effects, in his Leningrad apartments), the composer retained only his original sketches. From these the Concerto was rewritten and rescored in 1923, and in its present form represents the felicitous combination of old matter and a new manner.

It is not great music; in the first and fourth movements it does not quite come off, since in these the material does not justify the serious and elaborate treatment that Mr. Prokofiew has given it. The Scherzo and the Intermezzo, the first a grotesque, the second a tragic humoresque, aim less high and achieve their goal. Mr. Prokofiew is at his best (a statement to which the Scythian Suite alone among his works supplies an exception) when he writes in a spirit of fantasy or of farce. It need scarcely be added that the Second Concerto is resourcefully scored, and that the piano part is brilliant and difficult—the effect of glissando scales in the Intermezzo is a particularly happy one. Mr. Prokofiew is a much better pianist than the majority of composers, and if his touch is hammerlike and his tone cold and stony, this is advantageous rather than otherwise in the performance of his own music.

Mr. Koussewitsky's contributions to last evening's program were Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony and three dances from De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat."

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

Serge Koussevitzky Gives Boston Symphony Recital

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to the Lyric last night for their one brief visit of the season, and played in a way that made us shiver to think of losing them. Their concert was vigorous and superbly musical.

Opening with a deftly respectable expression of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, they ran right into a tornado of applause with the new "Bolero" of Ravel, an ingeniously monotonous but infinitely disturbing Spanish dance.

The simplicity of this work is almost impudent; a single wail repeated over and over again by one instrument after another against a drumbeat reminiscent of the African bush, never quickened but always strengthened. And yet Baltimore couldn't help liking it more than any new work it had heard for years. It took a Koussevitzky to handle the very subtle crecendo of the "Bolero."

The closing half of the concert was all Wagner, and not according to schedule. The "Valkyrie's Ride," the Vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" and the "Meistersinger" overture followed one another breathlessly and beautifully. The content was drained its utmost from each work in the playing, and the result was magnificent.

Surely we have had no more luscious symphony concert this season than Mr. Koussevitzky's. A. S. K.

NEW YORK
WORLD

Other Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Soloist, Serge Prokofieff, pianist.

Eine Kleine Nachtmusik.....Mozart
Scythian Suite, op. 20; second piano concerto in G minor, op. 16.....Prokofieff
Three dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos".....De Falla

The gorgeous and barbaric dissonance, occasionally relieved by a bitter discord or a choleric humor in quieter vein, so apparent in that music of Serge Prokofieff which American audiences have been permitted to hear, swelled to a climax of unfettered sound in Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Prokofieff himself, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky to support his every move, was giving a first New York performance of his second piano concerto (G minor, opus 16).

It is elaborately orchestrated, in the manner of Stravinsky, with weird intervals, atonal contrasts and gymnastics for the piano of inhuman complexity. It was difficult, as we had not heard the work before, to understand just what Mr. Prokofieff intended to convey, or whether he intended to convey anything in particular. In the second movement, apparently a scherzo from the suggested rhythmic pattern, Mr. Prokofieff and the orchestra were at odds for a fleeting instant.

Mr. Koussevitzky also conducted the visitor's Scythian Suite (opus 20) and three dances from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat." The Mozart Ein Kleine Nachmusik (Kochel 525) was uneven, some of it almost expressionless. The menuetto, for instance, was stodgy; the rondo traveled at a which approached a mild hysteria.

COMPOSER PLAYS PIANO CONCERTO

Prokofieff Is Soloist at Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Conducts "Scythian Suite, Mozart and De Falla

Serge Prokofieff, the noted Russian modernist composer, appeared as soloist in his own G minor concerto for piano at yesterday's Symphony concert. Dr Koussevitzky, returning after two weeks' absence, was warmly applauded. He conducted Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," and three dances from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" with his usual fervor.

Prokofieff played his third piano concerto at these concerts Jan 29, 1926. Dr Koussevitzky, a firm believer in Prokofieff's genius, has conducted a number of his works here in the past five seasons, notably the little "Classical Symphony," the "Sept, ils sont Sept," for tenor, chorus, and orchestra, and the "Scythian Suite," each of which has been much talked of.

The second piano concerto, played yesterday, is a rewritten version of an early work, using the same themes, but treating them in a more modernistic style. The themes date from 1913, the revision from 1923. This concerto has not previously been heard in the United States. It gives the soloist ample opportunity to display technique, but is not as interesting musically as Prokofieff's violin concerto.

The orchestral accompaniment, like the solo part, is intricate in texture, full of the acrid harmonies and strident rhythms characteristic of Prokofieff, yet one felt that the music had been first conceived in a far simpler and more conventional idiom and form. Its elaboration seemed a tour de force.

Prokofieff, like other modernist composers, thinks of the piano as primarily an instrument of percussion. This concerto makes no attempts at lyricism. There are no slow, sweet melodies, no grand, sonorous climaxes. Nothing, in short, at all after the style of Liszt or Rubinstein.

The piece makes great demands on the skill of the soloist. Nobody can crack at Prokofieff's expense the old joke that "he plays like a composer." On the contrary, he plays like a pianist of very unusual ability. Were it not for his other works, one would think from this concerto that he was only interested in writing show pieces for piano to astonish audiences by his muscular energy and agility.

The "Scythian Suite," repeated yesterday in honor of the composer, sounded less startling and more intelligible than it did five years ago. One noted in the instrumentation details that have become common property in the past 15 years, so that such assimilative and eclectic writers as Respighi now use these once astonishing procedures in routine fashion. One discovered how much of the dissonance in Prokofieff's score is produced by carrying the use of the orthodox harmonic device of organ points to a perfectly logical extreme.

One's general impression of Prokofieff's music is that he is the Saint-Saens of our day, extremely able, with genuine originality in small works, but incapable of working on a big scale without borrowing from the inspiration of greater men.

Dr Koussevitzky reduced the size of the orchestra for Mozart's serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," one of the most ingratiating of the lesser works of the composer of "Don Juan" and the G minor Symphony. This restored the original balance of tonal values in the orchestra, but made one regret the necessity of playing Mozart in so large a hall.

The chief defect of the performance was a failure to follow the graceful curves of Mozart's melodies. Dr Koussevitzky made them all rather stiff and angular, so that they sounded a bit too much like the tinkling tune Liadov entitled "The Musical Snuff Box."

The three familiar dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," were substituted for the announced arrangements by Arbos from Albeniz' piano music. This change was probably owing to the amount of rehearsal time demanded by Prokofieff's exacting concerto. De Falla's music, played with zest and rhythmic intensity, was again delightful. It sounded more spontaneous, simpler, and less studied, than before.

The orchestra goes on tour next week. The concerts of Feb 14 and 15 will bring the long anticipated performance of choral works by Debussy. His "Blessed Damozel," and his music from d'Annunzio's play "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" will fill the program. The Radcliffe Choral Society and the Cecilia Society will assist. Mme Ritter-Ciampi, a Parisian opera singer, will be the soloist. P. R.

Brahms Festival Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as previously announced, is to give a Brahms festival next month. The program for the subscription concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday series, for March 21 and 22, is planned to be a part of the festival. It will include the "Academic Festival" overture, and the Second and Third Symphonies of Brahms. Except for the "rush" seats Fridays, these concerts are completely sold out. The only tickets available for non-subscribers to the series of 24 Fridays and 24 Saturdays will be the few turned in to be sold for the endowment fund by owners unable to use them.

The rest of the festival includes four extra concerts, for which season tickets went on sale 10 days ago at Symphony Hall. The demand is already so great that sold-out houses seem certain. These extra concerts are planned as follows:

Sunday, March 23, at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Second Piano Concerto; and Fourth Symphony. Soloist, Arthur Schnabel.

Monday, March 24, at 8:15. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. "Song of Destiny" (Schicksalslied") and "German Requiem." Soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Margaret Matzenauer, Fraser Gange.

Tuesday, March 25. Chamber concert by Burgin Quartet, Arthur Schnabel and others. The program will include one of the violin sonatas, a group of piano pieces, the "Liebeslieder" for mixed chorus, the Quintet in F minor, and songs for Mme Matzenauer.

Wednesday, March 25, at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rhapsody for alto, chorus and orchestra. First piano concerto, and First Symphony. Soloists, Margaret Matzenauer and Arthur Schnabel.

This is a very attractive set of programs, and should suffice to sell out the hall for the series. In order to make the festival completely representative of Brahms' best work it would only be necessary to secure such a violinist as Kreisler to play the violin concerto and one of the violin sonatas. But even without them this series will be a notable event, something to be remembered and talked of long after. Boston concert goers are once more indebted to Dr Koussevitzky's zeal and ambition for what promises to be a remarkable series of concerts.

No doubt, as for the Beethoven festival, many music lovers will come from outside Boston, not merely from the rest of New England, but from farther afield. If the custom of giving festivals devoted to the work of a single composer, so prevalent in Germany and Austria, can be established here it will add a valuable element to the musical life of the Nation.

The only such festival in America is now the one given at Bethlehem, Penn, every May, and devoted to the works of Bach. Other American festivals have hitherto featured not composers, but performers.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second and brilliantly successful New York concert of the week-end yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

It may be said, for it is true that Boston has now an orchestra which is without a superior, if it has an equal in this country, a band that Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to a unique flexibility, sensitiveness and virtuosity, which surpassed itself yesterday in the quality and spirit of its performance.

The reason for the special lustre of these performances lay probably in the fact that the men of the Boston Orchestra, at the end of one of their crowded periodic tours, had had a period of comparative rest and relaxation between two concerts given on Friday and Saturday in one city. In any event, the orchestra excelled itself, and its leader seemed in equal spirits. Even the rather trite excerpts from de Falla's ballet, repeated from the Friday program, were played with such color and elan that they thrilled the most indifferent or critical.

The concert had, furthermore, the value of repeating three important modern works. Mr. Prokofieff was present to take again the soloist's part in the performance of his Second piano concerto, introduced on Friday night. The first half of the program consisted of Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point" and Arnold Bax's Second symphony in E minor and C. These works had special interest for the Boston Symphony's public when they were presented here by Mr. Koussevitzky earlier in the season.

The score of Walton did not suffer from repetition, and the scores of Bax and Prokofieff gained by the process. The symphony more clearly than ever established its inherent melodic and imaginative life. Its Celticism is not mere local idiom or epigram; this essence is not a matter of effects which are exterior. On the contrary, Bax seems to have found his way back to an ancient source of power. A part of that power, also, lies in the impress of northern nature and mystery that characterizes much of the heroic music.

Stravinsky is obviously present in the joyous, zestful, ridiculous music of Walton. But this is British humor, and British music, fresh minted, and, for all its derivations, as genuine as a pound sterling! Parts of Mr. Prokofieff's concerto gain with repeated hearing, as, for example, the third movement, which, with the first, appears to have more originality and actual creative impulse than other pages. Nevertheless, the opinion will not down that Mr. Prokofieff has written better music and better concertos.

It is an excellent proceeding for a conductor to repeat works of proved importance and interest as Mr. Koussevitzky did on this occasion. In this way he increased rather than diminished the interest of the concert, although it is also true that he has accustomed us to look to him, more than to any conductor on this side of the water, for interesting new music.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE

FEB 7 - 1930

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Serge Prokofiew Plays His Second Concerto at the Academy of Music—'Pelleas et Melisande'

SERGE PROKOFIEW was the soloist at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Mr. Koussevitzky conducted at the Academy of Music last evening. One of the most talented of the younger contemporary composers, and as well an excellent pianist, he scarcely required an introduction to his audience, though this was, we believe, his first Brooklyn appearance. Much of his music had been heard in the past at the Academy. Two years ago, we recall; the Classical Symphony was performed at one of Mr. Koussewitsky's concerts, and somewhat earlier a suite from the opera "The Love of Three Oranges" and the Violin Concerto had been introduced to Brooklyn.

* * *

Once heard, Mr. Prokofiew's music is not easily or quickly forgotten. Its individuality of style, which sets it apart from the bulk of modern music, makes it memorable, whatever we may think of the intrinsic value of its content. Whether or not what Mr. Prokofiew has to say is important, or for any other reason worth saying, he says it in a manner that is his own, and in a manner, moreover, whose originality represents the extension and development, rather than the arbitrary denial, of the principles in which Mr. Prokofiew was schooled.

For example, Mr. Prokofiew subscribes to neither of two prevalent and fallacious theories relative to musical form: he regards form neither as unimportant and impeding to the free expression of musical ideas nor as all-essential; it is, to him, no more than a necessary and flexible mould in which to shape his materials. His attitude toward harmony is equally that of a progressive conservative. He does not reject the principle of polytonality, neither is he scornful of simple diatonic and chromatic harmonization, though he rarely uses the latter for the sake of anachronistic, neo-classical effect. Moreover, Mr. Prokofiew is capable of writing melody. Eight-measure and longer melodic phrases are common in his works, in which the effect of linear continuity is further enhanced by the symphonic development—not merely the reiteration—of thematic fragments and motifs. That, in spite of this conservative attitude toward methods and technique of composition Mr. Prokofiew's music should bear the stamp of a striking originality, is a testimony to the authenticity of his imaginative and creative gifts.

* * *

The dominant characteristics of Mr. Prokofiew's music are its fantastic humor and its rude, brutish vigor: the former, exemplified in the ballet "Chout" and in "The Love of Three Oranges," stems from Rimsky-Korsakow and Strawinsky; the latter, whose great expression may be found in the Scythian Suite, is a more individual trait. Both appear in the Second Piano Concerto, which received its first New York performance last evening, with Mr. Prokofiew at the solo instrument. Written in 1913, played in Russia during the same year and in Italy two years later, the publication of the Concerto was delayed, and when in 1918 the manuscript score was confiscated by the Soviet Government (Mr. Prokofiew had unwisely left it, among other effects, in his Leningrad apartments), the composer retained only his original sketches. From these the Concerto was rewritten and rescored in 1923, and in its present form represents the felicitous combination of old matter and a new manner.

It is not great music; in the first and fourth movements it does not quite come off, since in these the material does not justify the serious and elaborate treatment that Mr. Prokofiew has given it. The Scherzo and the Intermezzo, the first a grotesque, the second a tragic humoresque, aim less high and achieve their goal. Mr. Prokofiew is at his best (a statement to which the Scythian Suite alone among his works supplies an exception) when he writes in a spirit of fantasy or of farce. It need scarcely be added that the Second Concerto is resourcefully scored, and that the piano part is brilliant and difficult—the effect of glissando scales in the Intermezzo is a particularly happy one. Mr. Prokofiew is a much better pianist than the majority of composers, and if his touch is hammerlike and his tone cold and stony, this is advantageous rather than otherwise in the performance of his own music.

Mr. Koussewitsky's contributions to last evening's program were Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony and three dances from De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat."

NEW YORK
WORLD

FEB 8 - 1930

39

Other Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Soloist, Serge Prokofieff, pianist.

Eine Kleine Nachtmusik.....Mozart
Scythian Suite, op. 20; second piano concerto in G minor, op. 16.....Prokofieff
Three dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos".....De Falla

The gorgeous and barbaric dissonance, occasionally relieved by a bitter discord or a choleric humor in quieter vein, so apparent in that music of Serge Prokofieff which American audiences have been permitted to hear, swelled to a climax of unfettered sound in Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Prokofieff himself, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky to support his every move, was giving a first New York performance of his second piano concerto (G minor, opus 16).

It is elaborately orchestrated, in the manner of Stravinsky, with weird intervals, atonal contrasts and gymnastics for the piano of inhuman complexity. It was difficult, as we had not heard the work before, to understand just what Mr. Prokofieff intended to convey, or whether he intended to convey anything in particular. In the second movement, apparently a scherzo from the suggested rhythmic pattern, Mr. Prokofieff and the orchestra were at odds for a fleeting instant.

Mr. Koussevitzky also conducted the visitor's Scythian Suite (opus 20) and three dances from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat." The Mozart Ein Kleine Nachmusik (Kochel 525) was uneven, some of it almost expressionless. The menuetto, for instance, was stodgy; the rondo traveled at a which approached a mild hysteria.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

Serge Koussevitzky Gives Boston Symphony Recital

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to the Lyric last night for their one brief visit of the season, and played in a way that made us shiver to think of losing them. Their concert was vigorous and superbly musical.

Opening with a deftly respectable expression of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, they ran right into a tornado of applause with the new "Bolero" of Ravel, an ingeniously monotonous but infinitely disturbing Spanish dance.

The simplicity of this work is almost impudent; a single wail repeated over and over again by one instrument after another against a drumbeat reminiscent of the African bush, never quickened but always strengthened. And yet Baltimore couldn't help liking it more than any new work it had heard for years. It took a Koussevitzky to handle the very subtle crecendo of the "Bolero."

The closing half of the concert was all Wagner, and not according to schedule. The "Valkyrie's Ride," the Vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" and the "Meistersinger" overture followed one another breathlessly and beautifully. The content was drained its utmost from each work in the playing, and the result was magnificent.

Surely we have had no more luscious symphony concert this season than Mr. Koussevitzky's. A. S. K.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Concert --- Films --- Scho

The Afternoon Of Prokofiev, Double Guest

Dr. Koussevitzky Also Returns, The "Scythian Suite" and A Masterly Concerto

SIDE by side, yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Prokofiev shared the Symphony Concert. The conductor returned from his winter holiday; for three weeks his faithful audience had not looked upon him. Renewing annual custom, it clapped him, as he walked to his place, with general, hearty warmth. By exception the orchestra joined in this greeting, or so much of it as was on the stage—the string choir assembled for Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik." It rose, applauded, received the conductor's collective handclasp laid between Mr. Burgin's fingers. . . . The first turn of the guest came at the end of his "Scythian Suite." Dr. Koussevitzky had not only loosed its force, vividness and sweeps of savage power. He had also given just quality to its finer-strung, less overt pages. Applause mounted, quickly summoning Mr. Prokofiev from balcony to stage.

At the end of his second Concerto, with the composer as pianist, the house prolonged its plaudits. His upstanding figure had caught its eye; the likable mannerism of little jerky bows pleased its fancy. Whether it liked or disliked the surface and the substance of the piece, its ears told it that it had listened to a remarkable music in as remarkable performance. Mr. Prokofiev claimed no lion's share, to conductor and orchestra turning applause indeed intended for all three. Upon this triple or quadruple exercise in good feeling silence finally descended and the concert came to a close with the three familiar dances from de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

The "Scythian Suite" dates from 1914 and from the composer's twenty-third year. It is "early Prokofiev," as the chroniclers now reckon his work. The more minute even assign it to his "Stravinskian period." It was played in 1924 at the Symphony Concerts and carried all before it. Repeated in 1928, it seemed less impressive. Recently, in the maturity of the later thirties, Mr. Prokofiev has written a Third Symphony, produced last spring by the Paris Symphony Orchestra; a Divertimento in four divisions, heard last December at the Lamoureux Concerts. Some would have had one or both at Symphony Hall, though practical difficulties stood in the way; were prepared to demur to the repetition of the "Scythian Suite." The event silenced them. For in Dr. Koussevitzky's performance of Friday, maybe with the composer sitting by at rehearsals, the music gained new quality, different from that remembered and more impressive.

Most of us recalled the "Scythian Suite" as a graphic, quasi-barbaric music. We remembered the frenzied invocation, at the beginning, "Allegro feroce," of the tribal sun-god; the malignent, distorted dance of the evil-god and his monsters; the race and clash of the finale into the sonorities and intensities of an orchestral sunrise. In our waiting ears was the rough, tense, reiterated beat of Prokofiev's rhythms; his harsh, dissonant, quasi-primitive harmony, now piercing, again pungent; his hard, sharp, astringent use of the orchestra; his liking for quasi-metallic timbres; his writing of a colorless music, in the romantic sense of the words, that yet generated both pictorial and emotional effect. The performance of yesterday transmuted most of these memories into renewed and immediate sensations; took also another course.

Recollection is untrustworthy when it stretches over six years. Yet as it seemed yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky was less vehement with the invocation, the dance, the combat and the sunrise, whereby all four gained in effect of stripped, savage, primeval power. The listener may have heard Prokofiev from a "Stravinskian period"; but was more inclined to hear him as one who had taken the same road under the same promptings—reaction from the romanticism and mysticism, the elaborating, refining and impressionizing of the last preceding musical time. For Prokofiev, the road led into the "Scythian Suite" and "They Are Seven"; for Stravinsky into "Le Sacre" and, ultimately, "Noces." Such work of the two composers marches side by side, rather than with Prokofiev in imitation of Stravinsky and competition with him.

The complement to these sensations was the new effect of other pages in the "Scythian Suite." To the invocation of the sun-god succeeds programatically the sacrifice to Ala, his daughter. Therein Prokofiev sounds a music of simple melodic outline, softened rhythms, thin harmonies, sparse color. Yet from it proceeds an illusion of mysterious rites in a primitive world, when dreading tribes would pierce through the veils upon the kindlier gods, and propitiate them. The dance of the monsters ended, the musical scene shifts to Ala in the moon-crossed darkness and the evil-god stealing upon her to do her "great harm."

[Continued on col. 2, below]

[Continued from col. one]

Again Prokofiev writes his simplified, thin-coated, dissonant, astringent music, but with an illusion at odds with the means. For this tonal scene of Ala and the evil-god is woven into ominous atmosphere; while through it goes bare, melancholy, bitter suggestion, sensuous but far removed from romantic cast. Both are of no "Stravinskian period," but of Prokofiev's own imagination. In a word, less a repetition of the "Scythian Suite" than fresh revelation of the music and the composer.

Mr. Prokofiev does not write piano-concertos as a composer who fears that, did he fail to set hand to them, he would neglect his duty to his God, to man and to the art of music. By clear evidence of the Second heard yesterday, of the Third, heard four years ago, he writes them out of musical fecundity and inclination, not to say prepossession, for the form and the instrument. In these latter days, with many a composer, a piano-concerto seems a determined task at last accomplished. With Mr. Prokofiev, it is spontaneous self-expression. Moreover, he can design and fill a piano-concerto in the grand style—not the style of Liszt and the romantics; but rather of the lesser, half-forgotten virtuoso-composers at the middle of the last century who derived their piano-style from Beethoven and mixed it with Hummel. For musical paradox over the supper table, it is quite possible to argue that—virtuoso-display aside—this Second Concerto of Prokofiev is more akin to the symphonic concertos of Brahms than to either by Liszt.

Be that as it may (as they wave aside troublesome matters in the musical plays), Mr. Prokofiev stretches a wide canvas in this Concerto in G minor and fills it full. There are four movements; none lengthy, but each abounding in appropriate matter. The piano and the pianist are displayed in a curious, intricate, teeming scherzo; again in the variations of the finale. The orchestra is not merely accompaniment, but intrinsic and distinctive part of a symphonic design. Neither it, the conductor nor the pianist may escape the incessant exactions. Mr. Prokofiev's seeming simplicities are sometimes more difficult than another composer's elaboration. (No wonder Dr. Koussevitzky judged the preparation of this Concerto, with a revival of the "Scythian Suite," quite enough for four days' rehearsal).

The familiar, anticipated Prokofiev sounds from the insistent duple rhythms, the short-breathed motivs, the simplified melody, the contrasts of diatonic and chromatic measures, with a recurring preference for the diatonic; the thin, rude harmonies, the sparing timbres; the swift fluency or the driving force of every sequence; even the wit of the final G fortissimo flourished out at the end, like a gamin taking leave around the corner and (probably) making the long nose with both hands. Throughout also, the "classical" Prokofiev. Under the rush and glitter of the scherzo, toccata-form; in the finale, canons. An Intermezzo—the nearest approach to a slow movement—of formal pattern impeccable. In the first movement, first subject, second subject, passage-work, cadenza—all on the classic model descending from Beethoven rather than in the romantic procedure incarnate in Liszt; yet with room to spare for range and caprice. And throughout a complex technique oftener stripped than luxuriant.

Of course, there are those who care not at all for such a piano-concerto, or for the sort of piano-playing that makes it sound. They will not have the piano an instrument of percussion, of hammers and wires all compact with relatively incidental pedals. It must be made to sing, if not to smear. They resent a music vitalized by rhythm; that returns again and again to the capricious play of figures; that contents itself with a melody that some label crude and others naive. They prefer sentiment to sonorities; emotion to austerities. They would have a anguishing luxuriance caress them; not a propulsive force to whip them forward. They thrill to the technique that dazzles out bravura; sit stony before another that conquers complexities. A colorless pianoforte-tone, sublimating hammers and wires, is vexation to their ears. They pine for the old richness and glamour: will have none of the new bareness and directness. There is no altering our pianistic prepossessions; to everyone his own, though they be changeless. But there is a new-old way in which to compose piano-concertos and in this Second Concerto of Prokofiev it is exemplified and fulfilled. There is also a new-old way in which to play and disclose them, of which, yesterday, Mr. Prokofiev and Dr. Koussevitzky were imparting and prevailing masters. So runs the world away.

The afternoon began with the little serenade of Mozart, on next week's tour to disclose the virtuoso graces of the string choir; its bright, transparent, fine-textured tone; its happy felicities, supplementing the conductor's, with a music in which adept artifice ripples suave flow, the one as spontaneous as the other. The afternoon ended with the dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat." Richmond and Washington and Baltimore shall also know the valiance and range of the orchestra with rhythm and color. And New York, hearing both serenade and ballet-music, shall again be made aware.

H. T. P.

NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Eight Concerts For Orchestras On Week's List

Boston Symphony to Play on Thursday in Brooklyn, Friday in Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, paying its third New York visit of the season this week under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, has reversed the usual dates of its evening programs at Carnegie Hall and the Brooklyn Academy of Music, and will play in Brooklyn Thursday night and at Carnegie Hall Friday evening. The second Carnegie Hall concert will be, as usual, on Saturday afternoon.

In all three concerts Serge Prokofieff, Russian composer-pianist, will be the soloist in his second piano concerto (op. 16, in G minor). Friday's program also includes his 'Scythian Suite." On Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat William Walton's "Portsmouth Point," and Arnold Bax's second symphony, which were heard by his Thursday evening Carnegie Hall subscribers last month. The Prokofieff concerto will be preceded on the Brooklyn program by another Russian number, Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony.

For The Symphony Orchestra

Additional Subscribers Raise the Guarantee Fund to $75,000

SINCE the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra made first report, two weeks ago, seventy-two additional subscribers have contributed to the Guarantee Fund that meets the annual deficit. The pledges now amount to $75,402.67, material and desirable increase. The Trustees, however, still need $25,000 more if they are to clear away the deficit carried over from the season of 1928-1929 and meet also that of 1929-30. The concerts continue in undiminished range and quality. There are as many as possible at the highest advisable prices. At home and abroad audiences fill the house. Orchestra, conductor, management, can do no more. The interest and good-will of the public must provide the rest. It is easiest to pay for something in which we take pride and pleasure. The additional subscribers are:

Adams, Miss Clara A.
Alford, Miss Martha A.
Ames, Mrs. Hobart
Ames, Mrs. William H.

Bartol, Miss Dorothy
Bartol, Mrs. John W.
Beal, Miss Ida G.
Best, Mrs. Edward H.
Blake, Miss M. L.
Brown, Miss Edith B.
Bruzza, Leo, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Buckingham, Miss Mary H.
Buff, Miss A. E.
Burgess, Mrs. George Sargent

Coale, Mrs. George O. G.
Coffin, Winthrop
Crosby, Mrs. S. V. R.
Curtis, Miss Mary
Curtiss, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic H.
Cutter, Mr. and Mrs. R. Ammi

Dane, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B.
Davis, Mrs. Charles H.
Day, Mrs. Henry B.
Duncan, Mrs.

Forbes, Allyn B.
Forbes, Mrs. Ralph E.

Gage, Mrs. Homer
Garritt, Mrs. Walter G.
Gardner, Roy R.
Gibson, Mrs. Kirkland H.
Gilbert, Miss Helen C.
Goodwin, Miss Frances
Greene, Mrs. E. Farnham
Greenough, Mrs. Henry V.
Griffith, Miss Josephine

Hamlin, Miss Jenny L.
Harris, Miss Frances K.
Haughton, Miss Alison
Heilman, William C.
Holbrook, Miss Mary S.

Jones, Miss Margaret H.

Koshland, Mr. and Mrs. Abraham
Koshland, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse

Lasell, Miss Elizabeth
Littell, Miss Lucy
Lucas, Mrs. William Henry

Manning, Mr. and Mrs. Earl G.
Moseley, Mrs. Frederick S.
McMichael, Mrs. L. G.

Neilson, Mrs. W. LaCoste
Nutter, George R.

Peabody, Mrs. Endicott
Pfaelzer, Mrs. Franklin T.
Potter, Mrs. Murray A.

Richards, Mrs. J. L.
Roberts, Mrs. Coolidge S.
Rosenau, Dr. M. J.
Rubenstein, Philip

Schneider, Miss Elizabeth
Smith, Louis C.
Sortwell, Mrs. Alvin F.
Spaulding, Miss Emma F.
Sprague, Mrs. Charles
Stackpole, Miss Alice
Stone, Miss Katharine H.
Sturgis, John H.

Tappan, Miss Mary A.
Thomas, Mrs. W. B.
Thurber, Miss Elizabeth

Vaillant, Mrs. George W.

Wadsworth, Mrs. Alexander F.
Ware, Miss Mary Lee
Waring, Mrs. Guy
Wheelwright, A. W.

Program For Concert Has Variety

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Make Only Appearance Of Season February 5

RECOGNIZED as a symphonic program maker par excellence, Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gives further evidence of his right to that distinction by the announcement of the works to be played when the Boston makes its single appearance of the season here at the Lyric February 5 under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Where an orchestra makes a number of appearances during a season the making of a satisfying program presents no such difficult problem as that for one concert a year. Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged to give Baltimore several tried numbers and several new to this city. Among the latter is Ravel's Bolero, which created a veritable furore when presented by Toscanini in New York this winter. The Bostonians have presented it in those places, where it gives regular series of concerts.

The Schubert Unfinished will be the symphony, and its shortness permits of more numbers, with the result that the followers of Wagner have had several of their favorites included.

The complete program is as follows:

Prelude and Fugue.....Bach-Schonberg
Unfinished Symphony.....Schubert
Bolero .....Ravel
Prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde.....Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Introduction to third act and prelude to The Meistersingers.....Wagner

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

AT SYMPHONY

While Boston has been enjoyin of the visiting Chicagoans, its ow cal organization, the Symphony been playing in New York. In e the brief series of spectacular prod
Opera House we are likely to und value of Mr. Koussevitzky and hi it is our privilege to hear for six year. As a reminder, part of the Olin Downes, the music critic of Times, on the orchestra's concer in Carnegie hall is worth reproduc

It may be said, for it is true ton has now an orchestra whic a superior, if it has an equal in try, a band that Mr. Kouss brought to a unique flexibilit ness and virtuosity.

Chicago, of course, has a very orchestra of its own. But it seems we let it hear the best in return tunity of hearing its opera com might well try to engage the Bo as one feature of the 1933 celebra

Richmond Times-Dispatch
FEB. 4 1930

Music

By George Harris

Boston Symphony Orchest

The third symphony concert season and the second in T. M Moody's artists' series of concert place last night at the Mosque. Th have crowded in on us lately, two orchestral concerts and seven performances of opera, all within two weeks, but, although this fact somewhat lessened the size of the audience, enthusiasm showed no signs of fatigue. There was a brilliance in the performance last night that would have roused the most jaded.
This performance was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conducting of Dr. Serge Kousse-vitzky. We have heard this renowned and perfect organizatioin several times in recent years, its last ap pearance being a memorable oc during last season. Its programs not always been as satisfying a might have been, considering th have so little orchestral musi the program last night was the finest I have ever heard by an orchestral conductor,—ad fitted to the taste of any a and particularly fitted to o sical tastes and musical need in Richmond.

This program was original nounced to begin with a Bac lude and Fugue arranged for tra by Schoenberg, but this be given up because the orc score did not arrive from Eur time. In its place was pu Concerto for orchestra by V which may have made a happie fect than an extreme modernist's arrangement of Bach might have done.
At any rate the Vivaldi is a magnificent composition, with its eighteenth century severity, but yet wit some extraordinary prophesies of musical developments. At this perio of orchestral writing wind-instruments and the brasses were used only as re-enforcement of the strings, so that the impression is of a composition played by strings alone. It was a marvelous opportunity to hear the well-nigh perfect string section of this orchestra, whose beauty of tone was enhanced y a new arrangement of the orchestra on the stage. The stage was wider, and the players all sat further forward, so that there was a brilliance that we have not hitherto heard in an orchestral concert in the Mosque.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin" is again a composition played almost entirely by strings, but is a work of a totally different type of imagination and of effect. Its spiritual beauty could not have failed to impress a single listener. So much music for this section of the organization built up the program in a remarkable manner. Having so much string sonority, when the wood-winds and brass did come, they brought a marvelous effect of contrast and of color.

Thus we were transported into a new world when the "Bolero," by Ravel began. It is a startling work through its very simplicity. It never modulates, but it is the reiteration of one little melody over and over again, each time there being color and intensification added to it through orchestration. It has a strange psychological force in it, for this reiteratation puts one into a sort of hypnotic state of excitement, showing that monotony has more effect on the nerves than variety. The piece is a scathing comment on the list-lessness of Moorish Spain, as it reveals to us a primitive state of emotion that exists nowhere else in Europe. This piece is exciting, but it is horribly tragic.

After an intermission, during which the habit formed during last week's opera made more people than ever before during a concert go out for a smoke, we had the great joy of listening to the Dvorak "New World Symphony." It is ever fresh, and its beauties were revealed almost in a new light at last night's performance.
To come back to the building up of the program, each composition so far had kept very rigidly to one tonality, and now the Symphony unfolded into a moving mass of harmonic color, whose effect on us was much more telling than if we had more harmonic color before it. And even so, this work is simple, so that its one great discordant clash at the end of it all was more thrilling than I have ever known it. Delicacy and beauty of tone alternate with great force in the playing of the orchestra, and Dr.
Koussevitzky's reading of it brought out every possible detail of the work's great imagination. In spite of the fact that the Cesar Franck Symphony is more profound than anything we heard last night, last night's program and the performance of it made possible the most enjoyable orchestral concert I have ever heard in Richmond.

Symphony Concert --- Films --- Scho

The Afternoon Of Prokofiev, Double Guest

Dr. Koussevitzky Also Returns, The "Scythian Suite" and A Masterly Concerto

SIDE by side, yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Prokofiev shared the Symphony Concert. The conductor returned from his winter holiday; for three weeks his faithful audience had not looked upon him. Renewing annual custom, it clapped him, as he walked to his place, with general, hearty warmth. By exception the orchestra joined in this greeting, or so much of it as was on the stage—the string choir assembled for Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik." It rose, applauded, received the conductor's collective handclasp laid between Mr. Burgin's fingers. . . . The first turn of the guest came at the end of his "Scythian Suite." Dr. Koussevitzky had not only loosed its force, vividness and sweeps of savage power. He had also given just quality to its finer-strung, less overt pages. Applause mounted, quickly summoning Mr. Prokofiev from balcony to stage.

At the end of his second Concerto, with the composer as pianist, the house prolonged its plaudits. His upstanding figure had caught its eye; the likable mannerism of little jerky bows pleased its fancy. Whether it liked or disliked the surface and the substance of the piece, its ears told it that it had listened to a remarkable music in as remarkable performance. Mr. Prokofiev claimed no lion's share, to conductor and orchestra turning applause indeed intended for all three. Upon this triple or quadruple exercise in good feeling silence finally descended and the concert came to a close with the three familiar dances from de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

The "Scythian Suite" dates from 1914 and from the composer's twenty-third year. It is "early Prokofiev," as the chroniclers now reckon his work. The more minute even assign it to his "Stravinskian period." It was prayed in 1924 at the Symphony Concerts and carried all before it. Repeated in 1928, it seemed less impressive. Recently, in the maturity of the later thirties, Mr. Prokofiev has written a Third Symphony, produced last spring by the Paris Symphony Orchestra; a Divertimento in four divisions, heard last December at the Lamoureux Concerts. Some would have had one or both at Symphony Hall, though practical difficulties stood in the way; were prepared to demur to the repetition of the "Scythian Suite." The event silenced them. For in Dr. Koussevitzky's performance of Friday, maybe with the composer sitting by at rehearsals, the music gained new quality, different from that remembered and more impressive.

Most of us recalled the "Scythian Suite" as a graphic, quasi-barbaric music. We remembered the frenzied invocation, at the beginning, "Allegro feroce," of the tribal sun-god; the malignent, distorted dance of the evil-god and his monsters; the race and clash of the finale into the sonorities and intensities of an orchestral sunrise. In our waiting ears was the rough, tense, reiterated beat of Prokofiev's rhythms; his harsh, dissonant, quasi-primitive harmony, now piercing, again pungent; his hard, sharp, astringent use of the orchestra; his liking for quasi-metallic timbres; his writing of a colorless music, in the romantic sense of the words, that yet generated both pictorial and emotional effect. The performance of yesterday transmuted most of these memories into renewed and immediate sensations; took also another course.

Recollection is untrustworthy when it stretches over six years. Yet as it seemed yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky was less vehement with the invocation, the dance, the combat and the sunrise, whereby all four gained in effect of stripped, savage, primeval power. The listener may have heard Prokofiev from a "Stravinskian period"; but was more inclined to hear him as one who had taken the same road under the same promptings—reaction from the romanticism and mysticism, the elaborating, refining and impressionizing of the last preceding musical time. For Prokofiev, the road led into the "Scythian Suite" and "They Are Seven"; for Stravinsky into "Le Sacre" and, ultimately, "Noces." Such work of the two composers marches side by side, rather than with Prokofiev in imitation of Stravinsky and competition with him.

The complement to these sensations was the new effect of other pages in the "Scythian Suite." To the invocation of the sun-god succeeds programatically the sacrifice to Ala, his daughter. Therein Prokofiev sounds a music of simple melodic outline, softened rhythms, thin harmonies, sparse color. Yet from it proceeds an illusion of mysterious rites in a primitive world, when dreading tribes would pierce through the veils upon the kindlier gods, and propitiate them. The dance of the monsters ended, the musical scene shifts to Ala in the moon-crossed darkness and the evil-god stealing upon her to do her "great harm."

[Continued on col. 2, below]

[Continued from col. one]

Again Prokofiev writes his simplified, thin-coated, dissonant, astringent music, but with an illusion at odds with the means. For this tonal scene of Ala and the evil-god is woven into ominous atmosphere; while through it goes bare, melancholy, bitter suggestion, sensuous but far removed from romantic cast. Both are of no "Stravinskian period," but of Prokofiev's own imagination. In a word, less a repetition of the "Scythian Suite" than fresh revelation of the music and the composer.

Mr. Prokofiev does not write piano-concertos as a composer who fears that, did he fail to set hand to them, he would neglect his duty to his God, to man and to the art of music. By clear evidence of the Second heard yesterday, of the Third, heard four years ago, he writes them out of musical fecundity and inclination, not to say prepossession, for the form and the instrument. In these latter days, with many a composer, a piano-concerto seems a determined task at last accomplished. With Mr. Prokofiev, it is spontaneous self-expression. Moreover, he can design and fill a piano-concerto in the grand style—not the style of Liszt and the romantics; but rather of the lesser, half-forgotten virtuoso-composers at the middle of the last century who derived their piano-style from Beethoven and mixed it with Hummel. For musical paradox over the supper table, it is quite possible to argue that—virtuoso-display aside—this Second Concerto of Prokofiev is more akin to the symphonic concertos of Brahms than to either by Liszt.

Be that as it may (as they wave aside troublesome matters in the musical plays), Mr. Prokofiev stretches a wide canvas in this Concerto in G minor and fills it full. There are four movements; none lengthy, but each abounding in appropriate matter. The piano and the pianist are displayed in a curious, intricate, teeming scherzo; again in the variations of the finale. The orchestra is not merely accompaniment, but intrinsic and distinctive part of a symphonic design. Neither it, the conductor nor the pianist may escape the incessant exactions. Mr. Prokofiev's seeming simplicities are sometimes more difficult than another composer's elaboration. (No wonder Dr. Koussevitzky judged the preparation of this Concerto, with a revival of the "Scythian Suite," quite enough for four days' rehearsal).

The familiar, anticipated Prokofiev sounds from the insistent duple rhythms, the short-breathed motivs, the simplified melody, the contrasts of diatonic and chromatic measures, with a recurring preference for the diatonic; the thin, rude harmonies, the sparing timbres; the swift fluency or the driving force of every sequence; even the wit of the final G fortissimo flourished out at the end, like a gamin taking leave around the corner and (probably) making the long nose with both hands. Throughout also, the "classical" Prokofiev. Under the rush and glitter of the scherzo, toccata-form; in the finale, canons. An Intermezzo—the nearest approach to a slow movement—of formal pattern impeccable. In the first movement, first subject, second subject, passage-work, cadenza—all on the classic model descending from Beethoven rather than in the romantic procedure incarnate in Liszt; yet with room to spare for range and caprice. And throughout a complex technique oftener stripped than luxuriant.

Of course, there are those who care not at all for such a piano-concerto, or for the sort of piano-playing that makes it sound. They will not have the piano an instrument of percussion, of hammers and wires all compact with relatively incidental pedals. It must be made to sing, if not to smear. They resent a music vitalized by rhythm; that returns again and again to the capricious play of figures; that contents itself with a melody that some label crude and others naive. They prefer sentiment to sonorities; emotion to austerities. They would have a anguishing luxuriance caress them; not a propulsive force to whip them forward. They thrill to the technique that dazzles out bravura; sit stony before another that conquers complexities. A colorless pianoforte-tone, sublimating hammers and wires, is vexation to their ears. They pine for the old richness and glamour; will have none of the new bareness and directness. There is no altering our pianistic prepossessions; to everyone his own, though they be changeless. But there is a new-old way in which to compose piano-concertos and in this Second Concerto of Prokofiev it is exemplified and fulfilled. There is also a new-old way in which to play and disclose them, of which, yesterday, Mr. Prokofiev and Dr. Koussevitzky were imparting and prevailing masters. So runs the world away.

The afternoon began with the little serenade of Mozart, on next week's tour to disclose the virtuoso graces of the string choir; its bright, transparent, fine-textured tone; its happy felicities, supplementing the conductor's, with a music in which adept artifice ripples suave flow, the one as spontaneous as the other. The afternoon ended with the dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat." Richmond and Washington and Baltimore shall also know the valiance and range of the orchestra with rhythm and color. And New York, hearing both serenade and ballet-music, shall again be made aware. H. T. P.

Feb. 2 NEW YORK
1930 HERALD TRIBUNE

Eight Concerts For Orchestras On Week's List

Boston Symphony to Play on Thursday in Brooklyn, Friday in Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, paying its third New York visit of the season this week under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, has reversed the usual dates of its evening programs at Carnegie Hall and the Brooklyn Academy of Music, and will play in Brooklyn Thursday night and at Carnegie Hall Friday evening. The second Carnegie Hall concert will be, as usual, on Saturday afternoon.

In all three concerts Serge Prokofieff, Russian composer-pianist, will be the soloist in his second piano concerto (op. 16, in G minor). Friday's program also includes his 'Scythian Suite." On Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat William Walton's "Portsmouth Point," and Arnold Bax's second symphony, which were heard by his Thursday evening Carnegie Hall subscribers last month. The Prokofieff concerto will be preceded on the Brooklyn program by another Russian number, Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony.

For The Symphony Orchestra

Additional Subscribers Raise the Guarantee Fund to $75,000

SINCE the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra made first report, two weeks ago, seventy-two additional subscribers have contributed to the Guarantee Fund that meets the annual deficit. The pledges now amount to $75,402.67, material and desirable increase. The Trustees, however, still need $25,000 more if they are to clear away the deficit carried over from the season of 1928-1929 and meet also that of 1929-30. The concerts continue in undiminished range and quality. There are as many as possible at the highest advisable prices. At home and abroad audiences fill the house. Orchestra, conductor, management, can do no more. The interest and good-will of the public must provide the rest. It is easiest to pay for something in which we take pride and pleasure. The additional subscribers are:

Adams, Miss Clara A.
Alford, Miss Martha A.
Ames, Mrs. Hobart
Ames, Mrs. William H.

Bartol, Miss Dorothy
Bartol, Mrs. John W.
Beal, Miss Ida G.
Best, Mrs. Edward H.
Blake, Miss M. L.
Brown, Miss Edith B.
Bruzza, Leo, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Buckingham, Miss Mary H.
Buff, Miss A. E.
Burgess, Mrs. George Sargent

Coale, Mrs. George O. G.
Coffin, Winthrop
Crosby, Mrs. S. V. R.
Curtis, Miss Mary
Curtiss, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic H.
Cutter, Mr. and Mrs. R. Ammi

Dane, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B.
Davis, Mrs. Charles H.
Day, Mrs. Henry B.
Duncan, Mrs.

Forbes, Allyn B.
Forbes, Mrs. Ralph E.

Gage, Mrs. Homer
Garritt, Mrs. Walter G.
Gardner, Roy R.
Gibson, Mrs. Kirkland H.
Gilbert, Miss Helen C.
Goodwin, Miss Frances
Greene, Mrs. E. Farnham
Greenough, Mrs. Henry V.
Griffith, Miss Josephine

Hamlin, Miss Jenny L.
Harris, Miss Frances K.
Haughton, Miss Alison
Heilman, William C.
Holbrook, Miss Mary S.

Jones, Miss Margaret H.

Koshland, Mr. and Mrs. Abraham
Koshland, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse

Lasell, Miss Elizabeth
Littell, Miss Lucy
Lucas, Mrs. William Henry

Manning, Mr. and Mrs. Earl G.
Moseley, Mrs. Frederick S.
McMichael, Mrs. L. G.

Neilson, Mrs. W. LaCoste
Nutter, George R.

Peabody, Mrs. Endicott
Pfaelzer, Mrs. Franklin T.
Potter, Mrs. Murray A.

Richards, Mrs. J. L.
Roberts, Mrs. Coolidge S.
Rosenau, Dr. M. J.
Rubenstein, Philip

Schneider, Miss Elizabeth
Smith, Louis C.
Sortwell, Mrs. Alvin F.
Spaulding, Miss Emma F.
Sprague, Mrs. Charles
Stackpole, Miss Alice
Stone, Miss Katharine H.
Sturgis, John H.

Tappan, Miss Mary A.
Thomas, Mrs. W. B.
Thurber, Miss Elizabeth

Vaillant, Mrs. George W.

Wadsworth, Mrs. Alexander F.
Ware, Miss Mary Lee
Waring, Mrs. Guy
Wheelwright, A. W.

Program For Concert Has Variety

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Make Only Appearance Of Season February 5

RECOGNIZED as a symphonic program maker par excellence, Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gives further evidence of his right to that distinction by the announcement of the works to be played when the Boston makes its single appearance of the season here at the Lyric February 5 under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Where an orchestra makes a number of appearances during a season the making of a satisfying program presents no such difficult problem as that for one concert a year. Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged to give Baltimore several tried numbers and several new to this city. Among the latter is Ravel's Bolero, which created a veritable furore when presented by Toscanini in New York this winter. The Bostonians have presented it in those places, where it gives regular series of concerts.

The Schubert Unfinished will be the symphony, and its shortness permits of more numbers, with the result that the followers of Wagner have had several of their favorites included.

The complete program is as follows:

Prelude and Fugue.....Bach-Schonberg
Unfinished Symphony.....Schubert
Bolero .....Ravel
Prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde.....Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Introduction to third act and prelude to The Meistersingers.....Wagner

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

AT SYMPHONY HALL

While Boston has been enjoying the singing of the visiting Chicagoans, its own great musical organization, the Symphony Orchestra, has been playing in New York. In enthusiasm for the brief series of spectacular productions at the Opera House we are likely to underestimate the value of Mr. Koussevitzky and his band, whom it is our privilege to hear for six months every year. As a reminder, part of the comment of Olin Downes, the music critic of the New York Times, on the orchestra's concert Saturday is in Carnegie hall is worth reproducing.

It may be said, for it is true, that Boston has now an orchestra which is without a superior, if it has an equal in this country, a band that Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to a unique flexibility, sensitiveness and virtuosity.

Chicago, of course, has a very fine symphony orchestra of its own. But it seems only fair that we let it hear the best in return for our opportunity of hearing its opera company. Chicago might well try to engage the Boston orchestra as one feature of the 1933 celebration.

[Concluded on col. 2, top]

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

Side-Glances At Prokofiev Now Returned

A Trait Here, A Page There, Of The Manifold and Puissant Composer

SOME years ago an intelligent, far-seeing Russian critic made a startling prediction: that the time would come when Serge Prokofiev, in the halo of European fame, would be welcomed as master in his native country. He was mistaken only in that he allowed fifteen years for the event to happen. In the year 1927, not a decade after Prokofiev went a-wandering around the globe, he visited Russia as a recognized and even loved master-musician. Who could think of such good fortune for the poor, ugly duckling, Prokofiev might have said, recalling his music and text to Andersen's fairy-tale.

Prokofiev is now an accepted composer. Amateur pianists everywhere struggle with the Gavotte from his Classical Symphony with the same fervor that they formerly applied to Rakhmaninov's C-sharp minor Prelude. According to Mr. Casella, boys in the streets of Moscow whistle the tune of Prokofiev's March from "Love for Three Oranges." Prokofiev is on the operatic stage from Leningrad to Chicago; Diaghilev's ballet has been miming and dancing to his music for half a generation. His scores are on the library shelves of every respectable orchestra—conductorless or leader-bound. Out of the air, the radio-audience hears him. He is a celebrated figure, on his way to eminence.

At first Prokofiev's career was centered on his pianistic powers. In his student-years—at the Leningrad Conservatory, under Glazunov's directorship—he was known chiefly as a pianist of stupendous ability. He did not even graduate in composition. Thus, his First Concerto which he played at the final exercises, and which must have annoyed some of his professors, was only an auxiliary for a display of his technical brilliance on the chosen instrument. He received the first prize as pianist. His compositions were merely tolerated, or ranked with such pastimes as playing chess, in which game Prokofiev was more than proficient. He won against every competitor in the all-Russian chess tournament for amateurs. Alekhine, the chess world-champion, thinks highly of Prokofiev's talents in this direction. But not the chessboard, nor even the keyboard of the piano has elevated Prokofiev to his present position. His fame is the composer's fame—to the virtual exclusion of his achievements in other fields.

Prokofiev's evolution was singularly sane. He showed signs of musical genius at a very early age. At eight or nine he contrived an "opera" with all the paraphernalia of dramatic happenings essential to the form. His libretto abounded in conspiracies, duels, narrow escapes from death. The first and the last performance took place at his uncle's mansion. The metaphorical curtain dropped prematurely when the composer was ordered to bed. Children's compositions ought to be studied with at least as much interest as infantile drawings. There may be more spontaneity in the mind of a musical child than in compositions of a worldly gentleman making music his means to success.

Prokofiev's Opus One is a Piano-Sonata, now discoverable only in such treasuries of published and manuscript music as the Library of Congress. It is a pleasing perambulation over the keyboard, strangely Brahmsian in design, but musically unpromising. Prokofiev's genius is disclosed for the first time in his Piano-Concerto—the graduation piece. There is magnificent daring in that music. The opening passages for the solo-instrument recall the finger-exercises of the celebrated Hanon, but Prokofiev strikes fire. It was new departure in the toccata style—a continuous flow of percussive tones dispensed with magnificent dash and effectiveness. There is suggestion of phenomenally long-winded breath; the usual abrupt cutting-off only enhances the impression. Prokofiev's music is angular, or, more specifically, quadrangular He sees no need of capricious digressions which only diminish the effect. He is not searching for new rhythms. He prefers not to break the old. One, two; left, right; up, down—Prokofiev's music marches along, leaps upwards and snaps like an exhilarating muscular exercise. The secret of increasing tension by the hammering-out of a persistent rhythm was discovered by Prokofiev long before Ravel invented "Bolero." Prokofiev faces the charges of crudeness and even monotony with a stone-face. He is champion of direct action in music. And direct action demands fearless determination and perseverance—at all costs.

Primitive music and primitive rhythms hold fascination for every one who abhors decadent moods. Fairy tales are product of a primitive mind. Prokofiev is attracted to such sources. His first opera, "The Gambler," is based on a story of fantastic realism. Such texts are peculiarly suitable to Prokofiev's genius. He may introduce a few measures of photographic verity like the swiveling figure for the roulette-ball. One nearly feels it as it winds up in the fatal zero. "The Flaming Angel" and "Love for Three Oranges" are other texts that fed Prokofiev's inspiration. There is no need to recall the magnificent nonsense of the ballet, "Chout." But how strikingly sensible the music!

Prokofiev wrote "The Scythian Suite," when he was twenty. The score reflects the men and the gods of the half-legendary tribe of Scythians that roved over the plains of Russia before the Slavs came to inhabit the land. They were nomads and were last heard from some two thousand years ago. Their mysterious disappearance enhanced the fascination of their name. As the languid mid-Victorians yearned to be "early English ere it is too late," so the Russians, suffering from a fashionable ennui, recalled their possible ancestors. Prokofiev's music was revolutionary. When the first performance of the work was announced in Moscow, a not uncommon incident occurred: the orchestral parts were not ready in time, and another piece was substituted at the last moment. This did not prevent the headlong critic, Sabaneiev, from showering on Prokofiev all sorts of invective for his music. Prokofiev gave out the facts of cancellation in an open letter; the critic was forthwith asked to resign. At that time such dishonesty could not be tolerated. We all know that nowadays critics get away with worse things. From the Scythian Suite a straight line leads to "They Are Seven" on a cryptic text of age-old antiquity, for tenor solo, chorus and full orchestra. It is a sort of lingering explosion, releasing all the energies that matter may contain. Prokofiev breaks up the musical tone as scientists would split the atom. The score is a stunning revelation of power.

The lyrical Prokofiev is in striking contrast to the Prokofiev of savage force. His lyricism is often reflective. It may take on a sardonic aspect when the composer looks soberly at his subjective indulgence. But the stirring quality of his lyrical pages is undeniable. Again, his uncanny efficiency works miracles: With a few notes stripped of all elaboration he produces an irresistible effect. His songs to the gentle words of Russia's poignant poetess, Akhmatova, are such revelations of a moving emotion translated into the simplest musical signs. There is often sadness or self-pity; but a cheerful tone somehow breaks through. Prokofiev is pre-eminently an optimistic composer. Like all fairy tales, his music promises a happy ending. Even when he touches stark realism, the measures still flow free. His grotesque stage-figures, like The-Sailor-with-A-Bracelet or The Bread-Smugglers in the ballet, "Pas d' Acier," do not repel.

Beside Stravinsky, Prokofiev stands out as healthy and virile composer. There is a heartening tendency nowadays towards sanity in music, and in this movement Prokofiev is one of the chief figures. Not in vain does he mention Vladimir Dukelsky as his favorite composer among the young; for Dukelsky's music is straight as an arrow, and it hits as unfailingly. The more meandering Auric and Poulenc lack the stamina that Dukelsky possesses, as birthright. After all, the business of music is to produce a tonic, effect. Prokofiev's rhythms and energies are eminently musical.

NICOLAS SLONIMSKY

Mme. Povla Frijsh, the singer, now in high Bostonian vogue, will return to Jordan Hall for a concert on Saturday afternoon, March 15, in final appearance for the season. Mail orders for tickets may now be sent to her manager, Mr. Aaron Richmond, in the Pierce Building.

The Eaglet of Russian Music Grows Into a Big Eagle

Serge Prokofiev

Composer and Pianist, Guest at The Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday

Concert-Chronicle

Concerto Grandioso

AS already noted on these pages, Mr. Prokofiev will be guest of the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of Friday and Saturday. Redoubtable pianist as well as composer, he will play his Second Concerto, in C minor, Opus 16, 1913—(1923). The date in parenthesis indicates a revision. For after an interval Prokofiev has revised more than one of his pieces. Rarely, however, has he made radical changes of form, substance, or orchestral dress. He has polished surfaces rather than altered essentials.

The second Concerto is built in four into committees co-operating with t

Miss Le Gallienne In Spanish Frame

TO her repertory in New York, Miss Le Gallienne has added a new comedy, "The Women Have Their Way." Such trifling interludes [begins Mr. Atkinson in The Times] are not worth doing unless they are done well. It is the virtue of this one that Miss Le Gallienne and her company play it capitally—con brio. Textually it is the wor of the Quintero Brothers of Spain, whos "Sunny Morning" and "The Lady fro Alfaqueque" have already appeared Fourteenth Street, and whose "A Hu dred Years Old" is now Otis Skinner touring vehicle. They are not treme dous fellows, but they can set dow trifles with dexterity; and when the Civ Repertory company is not flagellatir souls it can set trifles spinning in the a with uncommon merriment. Miss L

Continued on Following Page

Feather from The Plun

Autographed Measures from The Full Score of Pr Concerto

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

Intermezzo 4-4; Finale 4-4. Note the absolute preponderance of the duple time, which is Prokofiev's most characteristic rhythm. The solo instrument enters in the original key of G minor, after a short introduction of strings pizzicati. The first subject is stated on the background of an expansive accompanying figure, in triplets. It consists of a thrice repeated rhythmic figure of a dotted eighth note, a sixteenth note, and a quarter note—the figure that underlies the entire movement and reappears in the Intermezzo. The longer notes form a harmonic scale on which multiple sudden modulations are made. The orchestra picks up the principal subject after a brief pianistic interlude. The triplet figure continues with the principal subject exploring the heights of the pianistic range. The second subject is of capricious design seasoned with dissonant intervals in open superposition. The rhythm is now supported by figures in four sixteenth notes ending with an explosive forte on the first beat of each measure. There is an interplay of rhythms with some passage-work leading to a long and elaborate cadenza. The chief subject is restated "narrante" with the simplest accompaniment in familiar triplets. The movement ends in a unison on the key-note in pianissimo.

The second movement, Scherzo (Vivace), is an uninterrupted avalanche of trills and figurations in the manner of a toccata. While the solo instrument is thus occupied, the orchestra sets in a rhythmic background in ingratiating fashion.

The third movement, Intermezzo (Allegro Moderato), is of a graver nature. The rhythmic element is very strong. A scale-like theme is stated in the orchestra. A meditative interlude of short duration follows for the piano alone. The orchestra picks up the lead with several subjects, or bits of melody, passing in quick succession. A broad theme, accompanied by pianoforte passages in brilliant display, forms a bridge to the rhythmic figure of the introduction, thus imparting a cyclic aspect to the movement. It ends where it began: on the key-note in unison, in deep bass register. The Finale is a Rondo in the Dorian mode. The first period is diatonic; the second, chromatic. The piano has several ingenious variations in the best "Grand Concerto" style. There are short episodes. The original Allegro Tempestoso returns, strengthening the feeling of a cyclic design through the entire work. After all sorts of dazzling artifice, the Concerto lands on the same naked, defiant G, this time in crashing fortissimo.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

FEB

MUSIC

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the only program it has scheduled for Washington this season at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon. A packed house greeted every number enthusiastically. Mrs. Herbert Hoover, who had friends with her in the presidential box, led the applause.

There are other old and firmly established orchestras that come to the National Capital. However, each time that the Boston Orchestra appears here with its Russian conductor leading it the impression of supreme co-ordination and beautiful, finished interpretation is deepened. This orchestra demonstrates the essence of polish and culture in the art of music.

Mr. Koussevitsky opened his program yesterday with the famous "Pathetique" symphony (No. 6, in B minor), of Tschaikowsky, his countryman. The conductor's perfect control over his men and his ability to draw from the different sections at different times the faintest whisper of sound, yet always rounded tone, was shown time and again during the afternoon. It was first evident in the opening phrases of the symphony. Also, in the closing phrases, which ended the first movement so beautifully that the audience restrained from applause and sat unusually silent while many late comers sought their seats with less disturbing influence than is customary. Perhaps the loveliest moments in the symphony were those of the third, more vivacious movement. The melodies danced along under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, coming from the orchestra with the appearance of effortless achievement and unified beauty. The more somber final movement was given masterly reading and the conductor and his men were given an ovation.

The new "Bolero" of Maurice Ravel was [illegible] a Sp[illegible] est[illegible] th[illegible] me[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

FEB 6

varying orchestral effects. Beginning with a mere whisper of the first mention of the tune, Mr. Koussevitzky built skillfully to what was certainly a stupendous climax of towering sound from the entire orchestra. One suspects, however, that in the hands of a less gifted conductor, with an orchestra of lesser musicians, this work would sound deadly dull, for even with yesterday's reading there were moments of arid monotony.

The organlike quality of unison of tone noticeable in the work of the orchestra was especially effective in the mysterious beauty that dominates Wagner's prelude music for [illegible]grin." It was exquisitely interpreted.

The prelude to another Wagner opera, "Die Meistersinger von Nuremburg," was the last number of the program. The audience lingered to show its appreciation. —H. F.

4-H Boy Wins Scholarship.

COLLEGE PARK, Md., February 5.—Ora Bussard, 15 years old, of Washington County, has been awarded the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.'s $100 scholarship for outstanding 4-H Club work in Maryland during 1929, it is announced by the University of Maryland extension service. A similar scholarship for a 4-H Club boy has not yet been awarded.

BALTIMORE
EVE. SUN

FEB 6 1930

MUSIC

By F. W. Strehlau

Boston Symphony's Interpretation Of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony Marked By Artistic Restraint, Critic Finds—Appearance Takes Added Importance From Fact New York Philharmonic Will Discontinue Visits

FOLLOWING immediately the announcement that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society would discontinue its concerts in this city next season, the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its only appearance here this season seemed almost providential, for it served to draw attention to the possibility of this organization being restored to its former position of prominence in the local musical field. This was probably in the minds of many persons in the audience at the Lyric last night and possibly gave an added touch to the enthusiasm manifested as the program progressed.

The Bostonians, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, opened with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the one which some admirers of the composer sought to have completed, if possible, in the same spirit as the two movements extant, a suggestion th[illegible] brought out a number of attemp[illegible] none of which appeared satisfactory the judges, who finally awarded t[illegible] prize for a work which, in its opinion, seemed to catch the spirit of Schubert rather than the form.

As played last night, the opus [illegible]ounded somewhat subdued, with [illegible]ather less of the carefree fancy, the [illegible]ight-hearted flow and the serenity expressed than some other interpretations have invested it with. But it was [illegible] dignified and a well-tempered presentation, full of sentiment, delicately [illegible]haded and admirably emphasized, and [illegible]evoid of all extravagances or temperamental exaggerations. It was in re[illegible]nement of artistic restraint rather [illegible]han in exuberance that the strength o[illegible] [illegible]e performance lay, and it was this [illegible]mosphere that gave it distinction.

The real feature of the evening, how[illegible]er, was Ravel's "Bolero," a work [illegible]hich had its premiere here and which [illegible]as written expressly for Ida Rubin[illegible]tein, the exotic Paris dancer. It is [illegible]aring in conception and brilliant in [illegible]xecution, affording the fullest scope [illegible]r the exercise of that peculiarly subtle [illegible]d remarkable craftsmanship which [illegible] come to be associated with this [illegible]mposer. That anyone should have [illegible]ertained the idea of producing a [illegible]g score built up on numerous repeti[illegible]ns of a single dance theme would be [illegible]linarily considered fantastic in the [illegible]treme. But the Frenchman's fertility [illegible] invention, his accurate and compre[illegible]sive knowledge of the scope of in[illegible]ments; his art in weaving a fabric [illegible]rich tonal effects enabled him to [illegible]mplish the seemingly impossible [illegible] turn out a work relieved from all sense of monotony and transformed into an arresting creation. The theme, sung first by the flute, then by the clarinet and then successively by almost every class of instruments in the orchestra, including one that sounded suspiciously like a saxophone, if it was something else, gains progressively in sonority and in colorfulness until it reaches a shattering climax. At first mildly appealing, it steadily grows in its hold upon the attention until it fairly grips the auditor and leaves him at the end in a mood to become highly demonstrative. The work was played in a manner to give it full flavor and expression, and it evoked tumultuous applause.

The printed program also listed two parts of the Albeniz "Iberia" in an arrangement for orchestra by F. Arbos, but for some reason a change was made and the last part of the concert was devoted to Wagner, with the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkuere" substituted for the Spanish numbers and with the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde" and the Vorspiel from "Die Meistersinger" retained. All three of these Wagner excerpts were played with a due regard for their majestic, ecstatic character, the intensity of the "Tristan" score, with its poignant love theme, being admirably projected, while the emergence of the lovely prize song from amid the confusion and the clamor of the Vorspiel was impressively achieved. Moreover, the tonal picture of the tempestuous ride of the Valkyries again ass[illegible] its power.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

FEB

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Orchestra In Rendering The Bolero Of Ravel And Schubert's Unfinished Work

A curtain from the past seemed to have been lifted a little in the concert last night at the Lyric of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the listener was permitted to look back some years, when the conductor's platform was occupied successively by Gehricke, Nikisch, Fiedler, Muck and now last, but by no means least, Serge Koussevitzky. The old spirit was rekindled by Dr. Koussevitzky. The Phœnix rose from the ashes and last night's concert was especially fine.

Whether the audience came to hear the Boston Orchestra, or to hear it play under the Russian's able direction, or to hear the amazing Bolero of Ravel made no difference. It heard them all, and in addition some Wagner excerpts played with uncommon enthusiasm. The Schubert Unfinished Symphony in B Minor was the first offering. It has been some time since the lovely fragment has been heard here and its beauty has not diminished.

Dr. Koussevitzky read the Schubert in a chaste and gentle spirit, with a brooding sadness giving way to the brightness never long absent in Schubert's music. It was wholly dignified and rich in tone color.

Considerable expectancy awaited the performance of the Ravel Bolero, the latest work from the pen of the French tone painter, dedicated to the bizaare dancer, Ida Rubinstein. Amazing and extraordinary are rightly used to describe this creation of the versatile French savant of notes and staffs, who can take a musical text from a Spanish dance form, couch it in modern harmonies and expound upon it musically better than any Spaniard. Such a master of orchestration is this man that he can take a theme, bend it into the rhythm of a Spanish Bolero and, never changing either the theme or the tempo, repeat it many, many times, always for a different instrument, and make the very monotony increase the intensity of the thing until it reaches a stupendous, cumulative climax, involving the full resources of the modern orchestra. If it is, as one able critic called it, "an aristocratic disguise of a music-hall dance," it is also a piece de resistance of complicated orchestration that is fascinating, a tribute to the subtle craftmanship of the French master orchestrator, and the Bostonians presented it with such superb artistry that it was electrifying.

Whether it might appear as an anticlimax, or whether the versatile conductor chose to preserve the unities in the second half of the concert, Albeniz's Iberia was shelved and three Wagner excerpts comprised the latter part of the program. The Ride of the Valkyries took the place of the Spanish suite, and having been lashed into excitement by the Ravel, the organization presented an equally noteworthy [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

FEB 5 [illegible]

OVATION GIVEN TO BOSTON SYMPHONY

Rain pouring outside had nothing to do with the showers of applause that stormed Poli's Theatre yesterday afternoon, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Before one of the largest and most distinguished audiences, that assembled at an afternoon musicale this season, headed by the gracious Mrs. Hoover who with guests occupied the President's box, Serge Koussevitzky, whose triumphs in Washington are nothing new, directed a most refreshing and impressive program.

The gorgeous Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, better known as the "Pathetique" was a stupendous introduction to the pretentious numbers that were presented.

Dr. Koussevitsky imbues all his readings with the forcefulness of his dynamic self. It is something of a mystery why he still keeps to the fashion of leaving the score open before him. He does not need it. He refers to it so seldom that it is easy to see he is absolutely familiar with every measure. To watch the keenly cut, smart, direct and inconspicuous gestures he gives to carry his men through the most complex struggles of a master composer's mind, is a study in itself.

"The Pathetique," with its great Russian somberness, passing into a more care-free mood and returning in the finale to the most profound preplexities of human nature resigned, aroused exclamations of ecstacy when the echo of the last note died in the auditorium.

Koussevitsky always has something of a novelty on his programs. Yesterday it was Ravel's "Bolero," a most fascinating piece, worked out on a single theme, which is brought from the faintest tapping of drums against a flute melody, through all the instruments as a solo, to one great flourishing finale of the ensemble.

Not monotonous this constant repetition, but fascinating beyond all conceptions. The regular beat works its way into the being of the listener and soon he is carrying on with the orchestra, slowly, never varying, but always increasing in volume until the whole world is filled with the enchanting song of the "Bolero."

The "Prelude to Lohengrin" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," both works of Wagner, brought the concert to a glowing conclusion, with deliberate applause for the conductor and his men, indicating that excellent music is appreciated in Washington even if the hour is late.

MADELINE ENSIGN.

TIMES

ORCHESTRA CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra to Celebrate Fiftieth Anniversary.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, second oldest in the United States, will celebrate next season (1930-1931) its fiftieth anniversary. This will be the seventh season of the orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky, its eminent Russian conductor.

Plans are already afoot for special concerts of importance, suitable to the occasion. Igor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff, the two foremost living Russian composers, have promised Koussevitsky to write special pieces for the Boston Symphony orchestra's fiftieth year. There will be special concerts, such as a Bach Festival in the spring of 1931, which is to include a performance of the Mass in B minor.

It is hoped that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, will be able to make a special visit to America and appear as guest conductor.

George Henschel, although of advanced age, is in excellent health and is living in retirement at his home in England. He has not been in this country since the three years, 1881-1884, when he guided this orchesta through its first three seasons.

Since 1924 the conductor has been Serge Koussevitsky. According to the general opinion, this illustrious line of leaders has had a worthy successor in Koussevitzky. New and glorious chapters have been added to the history of this greatest of orchestras.

Koussevitzky plans to make his coming, sixth, season perhaps the most eventful which the Boston Symphony orchestra has known. There is a large demand for tickets for the Hartford concert at Bushnell Hall. Many taking advantage of reserving tickets now which will be held until March 1, at [illegible]cCoy's, 89 Asylum street.

MUSIC

Koussevitzky leads his orchestra with style and distinction, and pure music, unadorned by orchestral tricks, is the result

By RUTH HOWELL

THERE'S no conductor with more style and yet more reserve and elegance than the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky. And his orchestra, which played at Poli's yesterday, follows his lead in the matters of style as well as music, with the inevitable result of a well nigh perfect orchestra.

The concert yesterday was a beautiful one. There was the music, such things as Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony and Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin." Koussevitzky made them full of flowing music, not needful of orchestral or interpretative tricks to make them interesting.

There is something to this business of an orchestra having the same permanent conductor. The players take on a consistent style and their playing is always sure, confident and evidently satisfying to themselves as well as to the audience. Koussevitzky's men are perfectly drilled—so perfectly that the drilling is forgotten and they throw themselves into their playing with a happy ease.

Something like Mengelberg, Koussevitzky interprets things in sections rather than with a continuous sweep. However, the instruments play together perfectly and there is no roughness in the performance ever.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony was a marvelously restrained, exquisitely melodic and richly harmonic thing as the Russian leader conducted it. He took it so easily, and it was a happy flow of music, given out deliberately, yet answering immediately to the slightest quickening impulse of the leader.

The "Lohengrin" prelude, not much played lately, was like the soft light of a springtime moon before a cloud hides its silver brilliance. The "Meistersinger" prelude was both happy and beautiful, tho the crowded and roofed-in stage held back the resonance of the horns somewhat.

If you hadn't known what a Bolero was before, you did after the concert yesterday. It was a wonder Ravel's "Bolero" didn't get the audience to swaying sidewise in unison; didn't send them out stepping to that persistent rhythm; didn't make them dream the rhythm all night. Such was the atmosphere of the novel number, a marvel of orchestration, and particularly acceptable, as modern music, heard the first time, goes. It was fun to listen to, and should be a happy program number when orchestra players employ their instruments with talent and precision in solo work.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

MUSIC.

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the only program it has scheduled for Washington this season at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon. A packed house greeted every number enthusiastically. Mrs. Herbert Hoover, who had friends with her in the presidential box, led the applause.

There are other old and firmly established orchestras that come to the National Capital. However, each time that the Boston Orchestra appears here with its Russian conductor leading it the impression of supreme co-ordination and beautiful, finished interpretation is deepened. This orchestra demonstrates the essence of polish and culture in the art of music.

Mr. Koussevitsky opened his program yesterday with the famous "Pathetique" symphony (No. 6, in B minor), of Tschaikowsky, his countryman. The conductor's perfect control over his men and his ability to draw from the different sections at different times the faintest whisper of sound, yet always rounded tone, was shown time and again during the afternoon. It was first evident in the opening phrases of the symphony. Also, in the closing phrases, which ended the first movement so beautifully that the audience restrained from applause and sat unusually silent while many late comers sought their seats with less disturbing influence than is customary. Perhaps the loveliest moments in the symphony were those of the third, more vivacious movement. The melodies danced along under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, coming from the orchestra with the appearance of effortless achievement and unified beauty. The more somber final movement was given masterly reading and the conductor and his men were given an ovation.

The new "Bolero" of Maurice Ravel was well worth hearing. This work has a simple and attractive melody with Spanish color and rhythm. The interest in its development lies entirely with the handling of the different instruments' reading of this same melody in varying orchestral effects. Beginning with a mere whisper of the first mention of the tune, Mr. Koussevitzky built skillfully to what was certainly a stupendous climax of towering sound from the entire orchestra. One suspects, however, that in the hands of a less gifted conductor, with an orchestra of lesser musicians, this work would sound deadly dull, for even with yesterday's reading there were moments of arid monotony.

The organlike quality of unison of tone noticeable in the work of the Boston orchestra was especially effective in the mysterious beauty that dominates Wagner's prelude music for "Lohengrin." It was exquisitely interpreted. The prelude to another Wagnerian opera, "Die Meistersinger von Nuremburg," was the last number of the program. The audience lingered to show its appreciation. —H. F.

4-H Boy Wins Scholarship.

COLLEGE PARK, Md., February 5.—Ora Bussard, 15 years old, of Washington County, has been awarded the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.'s $100 scholarship for outstanding 4-H Club work in Maryland during 1929, it is announced by the University of Maryland extension service. A similar scholarship for a 4-H Club boy has not yet been awarded.

BALTIMORE
EVE. SUN
FEB 6 193

MUSIC

By F. W. Strehlau

Boston Symphony's Interpretation Of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony Marked By Artistic Restraint, Critic Finds—Appearance Takes Added Importance From Fact New York Philharmonic Will Discontinue Visits

FOLLOWING immediately the announcement that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society would discontinue its concerts in this city next season, the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its only appearance here this season seemed almost providential, for it served to draw attention to the possibility of this organization being restored to its former position of prominence in the local musical field. This was probably in the minds of many persons in the audience at the Lyric last night and possibly gave an added touch to the enthusiasm manifested as the program progressed.

The Bostonians, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, opened with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the one which some admirers of the composer sought to have completed, if possible, in the same spirit as the two movements extant, a suggestion th brought out a number of attemp none of which appeared satisfactory the judges, who finally awarded t prize for a work which, in its opinion, seemed to catch the spirit of Schubert rather than the form.

As played last night, the opus sounded somewhat subdued, with rather less of the carefree fancy, the light-hearted flow and the serenity expressed than some other interpretations have invested it with. But it was a dignified and a well-tempered presentation, full of sentiment, delicately shaded and admirably emphasized, and devoid of all extravagances or temperamental exaggerations. It was in refinement of artistic restraint rather than in exuberance that the strength of the performance lay, and it was this atmosphere that gave it distinction.

The real feature of the evening, however, was Ravel's "Bolero," a work which had its premiere here and which was written expressly for Ida Rubinstein, the exotic Paris dancer. It is daring in conception and brilliant in execution, affording the fullest scope for the exercise of that peculiarly subtle and remarkable craftsmanship which has come to be associated with this composer. That anyone should have entertained the idea of producing a big score built up on numerous repetitions of a single dance theme would be ordinarily considered fantastic in the extreme. But the Frenchman's fertility of invention, his accurate and comprehensive knowledge of the scope of instruments; his art in weaving a fabric of rich tonal effects enabled him to accomplish the seemingly impossible and turn out a work relieved from all sense of monotony and transformed into an arresting creation. The theme, sung first by the flute, then by the clarinet and then successively by almost every class of instruments in the orchestra, including one that sounded suspiciously like a saxophone, if it was something else, gains progressively in sonority and in colorfulness until it reaches a shattering climax. At first mildly appealing, it steadily grows in its hold upon the attention until it fairly grips the auditor and leaves him at the end in a mood to become highly demonstrative. The work was played in a manner to give it full flavor and expression, and it evoked tumultuous applause.

The printed program also listed two parts of the Albeniz "Iberia" in an arrangement for orchestra by F. Arbos, but for some reason a change was made and the last part of the concert was devoted to Wagner, with the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkuere" substituted for the Spanish numbers and with the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde" and the Vorspiel from "Die Meistersinger" retained. All three of these Wagner excerpts were played with a due regard for their majestic, ecstatic character, the intensity of the "Tristan" score, with its poignant love theme, being admirably projected, while the emergence of the lovely prize song from amid the confusion and the clamor of the Vorspiel was impressively achieved. Moreover, the tonal picture of the tempestuous ride of the Valkyries again as its power.

IPHONY

...ducts Orchestra
In Rendering The Bolero Of Ravel
And Schubert's Unfinished Work

A curtain from the past seemed to have been lifted a little in the concert last night at the Lyric of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the listener was permitted to look back some years, when the conductor's platform was occupied successively by Gehricke, Nikisch, Fiedler, Muck and now last, but by no means least, Serge Koussevitzky. The old spirit was rekindled by Dr. Koussevitzky. The Phœnix rose from the ashes and last night's concert was especially fine.

Whether the audience came to hear the Boston Orchestra, or to hear it play under the Russian's able direction, or to hear the amazing Bolero of Ravel made no difference. It heard them all, and in addition some Wagner excerpts played with uncommon enthusiasm. The Schubert Unfinished Symphony in B Minor was the first offering. It has been some time since the lovely fragment has been heard here and its beauty has not diminished.

Dr. Koussevitzky read the Schubert in a chaste and gentle spirit, with a brooding sadness giving way to the brightness never long absent in Schubert's music. It was wholly dignified and rich in tone color.

Considerable expectancy awaited the performance of the Ravel Bolero, the latest work from the pen of the French tone painter, dedicated to the bizaare dancer, Ida Rubinstein. Amazing and extraordinary are rightly used to describe this creation of the versatile French savant of notes and staffs, who can take a musical text from a Spanish dance form, couch it in modern harmonies and expound upon it musically better than any Spaniard. Such a master of orchestration is this man that he can take a theme, bend it into the rhythm of a Spanish Bolero and, never changing either the theme or the tempo, repeat it many, many times, always for a different instrument, and make the very monotony increase the intensity of the thing until it reaches a stupendous, cumulative climax, involving the full resources of the modern orchestra. If it is, as one able critic called it, "an aristocratic disguise of a music-hall dance," it is also a piece de resistance of complicated orchestration that is fascinating, a tribute to the subtle craftmanship of the French master orchestrator, and the Bostonians presented it with such superb artistry that it was electrifying.

Whether it might appear as an anti-climax, or whether the versatile conductor chose to preserve the unities in the second half of the concert, Albeniz's Iberia was shelved and three Wagner excerpts comprised the latter part of the program. The Ride of the Valkyries took the place of the Spanish suite, and having been lashed into excitement by the Ravel, the organization presented an equally noteworthy performance of the well-loved Wagner pieces. Of a kind with the thunderous interpretation given by the Philharmonic last month, was the rousing performance of the ride of the storm-maidens. No less engrossing was the Prelude and Liebestod from Tristan and Isolde, that ecstasy of love which makes the listener sit intense until he finds his hands clenched at its conclusion. A fresh performance of the Prelude to Die Meistersinger concluded a symphony concert which left an audience on its toes with enthusiasm for the work of Dr. Koussevitzky, and ready for more. H. S. T.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

MUSIC

Koussevitzky leads his orchestra with style and distinction, and pure music, unadorned by orchestral tricks, is the result

By RUTH HOWELL

THERE'S no conductor with more style and yet more reserve and elegance than the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky. And his orchestra, which played at Poli's yesterday, follows his lead in the matters of style as well as music, with the inevitable result of a well nigh perfect orchestra.

The concert yesterday was a beautiful one. There was the music, such things as Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony and Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin." Koussevitzky made them full of flowing music, not needful of orchestral or interpretative tricks to make them interesting.

There is something to this business of an orchestra having the same permanent conductor. The players take on a consistent style and their playing is always sure, confident and evidently satisfying to themselves as well as to the audience. Koussevitzky's men are perfectly drilled—so perfectly that the drilling is forgotten and they throw themselves into their playing with a happy ease.

Something like Mengelberg, Koussevitzky interprets things in sections rather than with a continuous sweep. However, the instruments play together perfectly and there is no roughness in the performance ever.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony was a marvelously restrained, exquisitely melodic and richly harmonic thing as the Russian leader conducted it. He took it so easily, and it was a happy flow of music, given out deliberately, yet answering immediately to the slightest quickening impulse of the leader.

The "Lohengrin" prelude, not much played lately, was like the soft light of a springtime moon before a cloud hides its silver brilliance. The "Meistersinger" prelude was both happy and beautiful, tho the crowded and roofed-in stage held back the resonance of the horns somewhat.

If you hadn't known what a Bolero was before, you did after the concert yesterday. It was a wonder Ravel's "Bolero" didn't get the audience to swaying sidewise in unison; didn't send them out stepping to that persistent rhythm; didn't make them dream the rhythm all night. Such was the atmosphere of the novel number, a marvel of orchestration, and particularly acceptable, as modern music, heard the first time, goes. It was fun to listen to, and should be a happy program number when orchestra players employ their instruments with talent and precision in solo work.

TIMES

ORCHESTRA CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra to Celebrate Fiftieth Anniversary.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, second oldest in the United States, will celebrate next season (1930-1931) its fiftieth anniversary. This will be the seventh season of the orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky, its eminent Russian conductor.

Plans are already afoot for special concerts of importance, suitable to the occasion. Igor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff, the two foremost living Russian composers, have promised Koussevitsky to write special pieces for the Boston Symphony orchestra's fiftieth year. There will be special concerts, such as a Bach Festival in the spring of 1931, which is to include a performance of the Mass in B minor.

It is hoped that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, will be able to make a special visit to America and appear as guest conductor.

George Henschel, although of advanced age, is in excellent health and is living in retirement at his home in England. He has not been in this country since the three years, 1881-1884, when he guided this orchesta through its first three seasons.

Since 1924 the conductor has been Serge Koussevitsky. According to the general opinion, this illustrious line of leaders has had a worthy successor in Koussevitzky. New and glorious chapters have been added to the history of this greatest of orchestras.

Koussevitzky plans to make hi coming, sixth, season perhaps the mos eventful which the Boston Symphon orchestra has known. There is a larg demand for tickets for the Hartfor concert at Bushnell Hall. Many takin advantage of reserving tickets now which will be held until March 1, a McCoy's, 89 Asylum street.

...fore him. ... it. He refers to it so seldom that it is easy to see he is absolutely familiar with every measure. To watch the keenly cut, smart, direct and inconspicuous gestures he gives to carry his men through the most complex struggles of a master composer's mind, is a study in itself.

"The Pathetique," with its great Russian somberness, passing into a more care-free mood and returning in the finale to the most profound preplexities of human nature resigned, aroused exclamations of ecstacy when the echo of the last note died in the auditorium.

Koussevitsky always has something of a novelty on his programs. Yesterday it was Ravel's "Bolero," a most fascinating piece, worked out on a single theme, which is brought from the faintest tapping of drums against a flute melody, through all the instruments as a solo, to one great flourishing finale of the ensemble.

Not monotonous this constant repetition, but fascinating beyond all conceptions. The regular beat works its way into the being of the listener and soon he is carrying on with the orchestra, slowly, never varying, but always increasing in volume until the whole world is filled with the enchanting song of the "Bolero."

The "Preludē to Lohengrin" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," both works of Wagner, brought the concert to a glowing conclusion, with deliberate applause for the conductor and his men, indicating that excellent music is appreciated in Washington even if the hour is late.

MADELINE ENSIGN.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES PROKOFIEFF'S WORK

Composer, the Pianist, in a Brilliant Performance of This Concerto.

WAGNER CYCLE IS OPENED

"Meistersinger" Is Sung With Rare Harmony, With Miss Mueller as Eva and Schorr as Sachs.

By OLIN DOWNES.

It was the turn of Serge Prokofieff at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Prokofieff, who is scant of hair, but tall, blonde, with an appearance of boyishness, figured on the program as composer and also as pianist in the performance of his second concerto, heard for the first time in this city. Mr. Koussevitzky gave an amazingly brilliant performance of the Prokofieff "Scythian" Suite. Suite and Concerto evoked storms of applause. The composer, after both performances, was repeatedly called out, bowing from the platform. Mr. Koussevitzky, who greatly admires Mr. Prokofieff's talent, signaled the orchestra to rise in his honor, while the conductor himself applauded. All this bordered on unconditional triumph. Those who had reservations were silent and outnumbered.

It has not always been thus. Mr. Prokofieff, who will be 39 years of age next April 24, has already been for a considerable period a storm centre of modern music. Fifteen years ago, with the "Scythian" Suite already to his credit, he was the terrible infant of contemporaneous composition. When he came to America for the first time he took much castigation from the press, but he always had a lesser or greater number of fanatical admirers, and there were not lacking those willing to take up cudgels for him. What more does a composer need for fame? Mr. Prokofieff may or may not be a great composer of tomorrow. We don't know about tomorrow, and shall not try to. At present he occupies a position before the public for which less sincere composers would be willing to resort to any trick or make any sacrifice. He is a figure, and conspicuous in the musical talk of the day.

There is no question that his music is of contemporaneous inspiration, in spite of the intentional, if not deliberate, barbarisms of the "Scythian" Suite. Tribal ceremonies, and sacrifices, dances, lamentations, fighting and salute to the rising of the sun—these things may emanate from atavistic sources in the subconsciousness of the composer, but they are as modern as Flaubert. The battle with the Evil God, as portrayed by Prokofieff, is as impersonal and as metallic as the battle with the armed elephants in "Salammbo." And just as the characters in "Salammbo" are figures and not characters, men as yet only a few centuries removed from beasts, therefore only capable of action and unaware of the conscious reasonings and emotions of men, so is this music hieratic and unemotional, done in hard surfaces, savage without hate or fear, since its existence has nothing to do with these feelings. But here is force, severity and hugeness of line, and a feeling of terror in the presence of unknown things. And the spirit of this unemotional music paves pages already old-fashioned in workmanship, in rhythmical periods and formal character, and music not wholly sufficient unto itself, since there are purely reiterative and repetitive measures which are actually dance, and would be in their real place as accompaniment of the dance.

But the final pages—those depicting the sunrise, with the harmonies that shatter like the points of a thousand spears against the sustained tones of the trumpets, are—if not among the greates—among the most brilliant pages of recent musical literature. These things were impressed upon the listener in the most exceptional way by the masterly performance of Mr. Koussevitsky and his men. It is hard to believe that Mr. Prokofieff has ever had a more brilliant interpretation.

The piano concerto is more advanced and more absolutely musical in its intention than the early suite. It is pure musical form. The first movement has lyrical ideas which are clear, melodic and of a flowing beauty, and they are subjected to delightful and astonishing treatment. In later movements are stretches intentionally symmetrical and conventional in form. They are worked out largely on the basis of rhythm, though contrapuntal devices are also employed. There is little of a lyrical nature after the first movement. The second, as the program book tells us, is a kind of "moto perpetuo," for the two hands playing in octaves against the orchestral part, the whole having the effect of a rapid technical etude.

There is the insistence upon so-called "pure" form, rhythm, design. As a matter of fact, for a record of a first hearing, this writer finds many of these purely formal ideas purely monotonous and undistinguished. He finds commonplace figures overworked; variation, frequently ingenious, but in the end monotonous, rather than development of germinal motives; a good deal of banality and not very much musical fertility or intensity. Mr. Prokofieff, for his part, played the piano with ample technic and tonal power, and with the rhythmical pulse so essential to this music.

Prokofieff was introduced with an air of innocence with Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," which Mr. Koussevitzky's men have played more than once, and, in the past, very well in this city. The concerto was followed by three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat." They are lively but commonplace by the side of the same composer's score of "Amor Brujo" and there is obvious indebtedness to one Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff. A fascinating concert, whatever its pros and cons, with the novelty of material that so many orchestral concerts in New York lack, and a standard of orchestral virtuosity which has not been surpassed, if it has been equalled, this Winter in New York City.

"Meistersinger" at Metropolitan.

DIE MEISTERSINGER, music drama, in three acts. German book and music by Richard Wagner. First of special matinee cycle. At the Metropolitan Opera House.

Eva	Maria Mueller
Magdalene	Marion Telva
Walther von Stolzing	Rudolf Laubenthal
Hans Sachs	Friedrich Schorr
Beckmesser	Gustav Schuetzendorf
Pogner	Leon Rothier
Kothner	Arnold Gabor
Vogelgesang	Max Bloch
Zorn	Marek Windheim
Moser	Max Altglass
Eisslinger	Giordano Paltrinieri
Nachtigall	Louis D'Angelo
Ortel	Paolo Ananian
Poltz	James Wolfe
Schwartz	William Gustafson
David	George Meader
A Night Watchman	Arnold Gabor

Conductor, Artur Bodanzky.

The performance of Wagner's "Meistersinger" given yesterday afternoon in the Metropolitan Opera House as part of the special matinee cycle of operas of that composer, had as one of its finest characteristics the Sachs of Mr. Schorr, happily returned to the Metropolitan fold for the last part of the season. Maria Mueller also appeared for the first time this Winter as Eva. Most of the other parts were taken as on recent occasions, although Mr. Rothier's Pogner was matter for observation. Mr. Bodanzky, risen from a bad attack of sciatica, conducted, under considerable physical discomfort, one of the most spirited performances of that opera that we have heard from his baton.

The cast was an interesting one, and with a few minor exceptions it was well balanced. Fortunate the company which can offer its most important rôle of the opera such a singer and interpreter as Mr. Schorr. The performance would have been worth while if for nothing else than his noble and tender impersonation, for the great art with which he sang such passages as the monologue in Sachs's study, and his beautiful shadings of each phrase and detail of interpretation. Miss Mueller gave pleasure when she did not force or edge her tones—and this was infrequent—by her comeliness and grace, and the freshness and youth of her tones. She was not a disillusion to the beholder but credibly the fraulein whom Walther desired to court by song. This Walther, in turn, sang with better quality of tone and a finer legato than Mr. Laubenthal has customarily vouchsafed this season. The grouping for the quintet, the stage picture as the joyous and modest song welled from the heart of Wagner's maiden, supplied a spectacle as well as sound which visualized the plot and the period of its inspiration.

In sum, then, this was a rarely harmonious, balanced and effective performance. Nor must there be forgotten the magnificent effect of the choral passages in the last scene—a scene which is perhaps the greatest in musical form and inspiration in the whole literature of opera. Honor to the chorus, and to the incomparable glory of Wagner's music!

The performance was received with deserved enthusiasm by a large and demonstrative audience.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

BOSTON SYMPHONY FINDS FAVOR HERE

Koussevitzky's Leadership Marks Performance at Poli's Theater.

MRS. HOOVER ATTENDS

The magic of a Russian composer united with the wizardry of a Slavic conductor made the presentation of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, noteworthy in every sense of the word.

So subtle was the blending of the various orchestral voices under the well-nigh inspired baton of Dr. Koussevitzky that at times the orchestra appeared to have but one beautiful voice, so marvelous was the ensemble tone in its perfect unison of sound.

His reading was quietly done, but with dynamic force that grew upon one more and more as one watched the conductor lead his musicians from movement to movement, winning a perfect response and the utmost of their musical powers from them.

After the first movement, "The Adagio," the audience broke into such prolonged applause that it would not be quieted until Dr. Koussevitzky had acknowledged it individually several times and again and again sharing the ovation generously with his musicians.

The other movements of the symphony possessed individual beauties of their own, well exhibited by yesterday's orchestra.

A novelty was presented in "Bolero" by Ravel, in which the orchestra was put to a severe test by the solo voices read into the constant but never monotonous repetition of a single theme of the characteristic Spanish rhythm. Out of this demand upon his orchestra resources the conductor managed to produce a number so entrancing that again the audience broke out in an applause most unusual in volume for Washington, led with vigorous hand clapping by Mrs. Herbert Hoover, who occupied a stage box with a party of friends.

The concert, which was presented under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, was concluded with two fine Wagner preludes in which Dr. Koussevitzky displayed familiarity and understanding of this master.

E. E. P.

BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
FEB 7 - 1930

Music

By FELIX DEYO

PROKOFIEFF IN BROOKLYN WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

WHILST LEAVING the Academy of Music last night, oozing our way through the thronged promenade-foyer, we could not avoid overhearing some verbal reactions on the part of Brooklyn's most conservative of audiences, namely, that which attends the annual series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts here, held under the usually safe and sane auspices of the Institute devoted to arts and sciences. For the major part of the departing audience were ruffling their feathers in disapprobation; had they not been obliged to hear Serge Sergievich Prokofieff, an "enfant terrible" (to them at least) of modern Russian music, play his own Second Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra? They had. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducts the Boston band, and who is courageous enough to now and then give a dose of contemporary music to his Brooklyn listeners, despite their obvious resentment, is pro-Prokofieff, and such an enthusiasm is, to a lot of folks, as pernicious as psitticosis. But back to the overheard comments—they were nothing if not uncomplimentary to the Russian composer - pianist. We miss our sürmise if the week-end mail of Messrs. Woodman and Atkins, who more or less father the musical enterprises of the Brooklyn Institute, is not glutted with letters of indignation (of the so-called righteous variety), from their local customers. It was only a few seasons past, we recall, when a protest meeting was held on the spur of the moment, during the entracte of a Boston Symphony concert, against Aaron Copland's "Music for The Theatre," which Mr. Koussevitzky had just played. Although Mr. Copland is perhaps Brooklyn's finest young creative musician, and although his compositions represent the forward trend of the twentieth century musical thought, his own townsmen would have none of it.

Prokofieff has been soloist here on two previous occasions under Mr. Koussevitzky, but in a less radical sample of his art than the Second Concerto. This latter, which reached Brooklyn ears at last night's concert, is not a new product, however, having been composed in 1913 and revised in 1923. There are four movements, of moderate length, and the music has much, very much, in common with this composer's larger style, a style peculiarly stark and primitive, recreative of ancient epic Asiatic Russia. It is savage, mostly, with a few alleviative moments. But we consider this opus a sincere one, in which century-past ancestors seem to address themselves musically to their present-day posterity in the person of Prokofieff. He, in turn, has transmitted these inheritances to us in a forthright manner; the music is intensely rhythmic, bristlingly staccato, and has a barbarian eloquence all its own. Such a work conveys valuable interest. It is not necessary that all music one hears should satisfy merely the sentimental complex; there are other moods to be taken care of as well, also certain historical phases of musical evolution must be acknowledged. It is in this sense that we felt Mr. Prokofieff's concerto a significant contribution to last night's programme. And he played the solo instrument part as it should be played.

* * *

THE OTHER matters engaging the audience's attention, and more to its liking, were Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" and Three Dances from Manuel De Falla's "El Sombero de Tres Picos." Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the former was vapid and unstirring. The thematic framework proved intact, but the interior substances failed to make themselves audible. We have heard gramaphone recordings of this symphony that were more impressive. It is a score that needs other than just neat, meticulous and super calm interpretation, such as Mr. Koussevitzky gave last night.

The "Three Cornered Hat" dances revealed the orchestra's virtuosic mettle. The dances themselves are likable. De Falla can write anything, one feels. One remains not fully convinced, however, that he can write something. He superimposes brilliant dissonances on the classical foundations of secure consonances. Unfortunately, in accord with old Spanish customs, his musical ideas all run to the dance forms, which preclude the more intimate expressions of tonal language

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 2 -

Music

By George Harris

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The name, Arturo Vivaldi, brings before my mind a red-headed man in priest's vestments walking about a little room in one of those labyrinthine sections of Venice and practicing strenuously on the violin. This was early in the eighteenth century and the period of the great development of technical skill on stringed instruments. Vivaldi developed his own technique, and, probably finding no pieces that could sufficiently display his powers, he made up new pieces that could. But he played in St. Mark's, and the strange atmosphere of that cathedral fired his imagination in such a way as to fill these technical compositions with great beauty. Very little seems to be known about Vivaldi, but we do know that Sebastian Bach admired his compositions, and arranged many of them for clavier or for organ. Vivaldi was a great virtuoso, but his interest broadened into writing for orchestra as well as for solo violin, and it is one of these orchestral compositions that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to open its program with tonight.

The Prelude to Wagner's romantic opera, "Lohengrin," follows. This work was first produced at Weimar in 1850 under the direction of Liszt, and was enough of an advance in musical treatment of operatic material over Wagner's earlier operas to create something of a stir. In this his power of interpreting definite ideas by music was more marked than hitherto, and this opera was a big step forward in that realm of unified music and drama that has its influence on every opera since. The story of "Lohengrin" is that of the mystic knight who comes to save a maiden from disgrace. The condition of his saving her is that she shall not ask his name nor whence he comes, but evil forces about her impel her to do so, with the resultant tragedy of his departure. Lohengrin is a Knight of the Holy Grail, an order that Wagner dealt with more fully in his last opera, "Parsifal," and the Prelude to "Lohengrin" is descriptive of the mystic religious character of the knight and of the order to which he belongs.

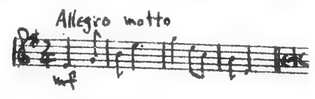
Next comes the "Bolero" by Ravel, a modern French composer, born in the Basses-Pyrenees in 1875, and now living in Paris. This Bolero, dedicated to Ida Rubenstein, was brought out by her and danced by her in Paris in November, 1928. The settings and the costumes were designed to represent a scene that Goya might have painted: A Spanish inn, with the dancer on a trestle table, men surrounding it. At first calm, the actors on the Parisian stage were little by little excited to frenzy as the dancer became more and more animated. Knives were drawn—the woman was tossed from arms to arms, until her partner intervened, they danced until quiet was restored. So was the scene described by French and English reporters.

The first performance in the United States as a concert piece was by the Philharmonic Society of New York in November, 1929.

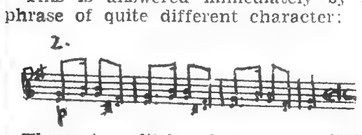
The Bolero is not a very ancient dance of Spain. It is said that Don Sebastian Terezo, an accomplished and celebrated dancer of his time, invented it about 1780. It is a modest, noble dance, much more decent than the fandango, but, like that dance, it is performed by two persons. In tempo and in its measures it resembles the minuet, but it impresses by rhythmic accentuation rather than by melodic variety. The name, "Bolero" or "Volero," is supposed by some to come from "volar," to fly, "because a Manchega expert had danced the Seguidillas so wonderfully and lightly that he seemed to fly." I am indebted to the notes in the Boston Symphony Orchestra program, on the occasion of the first performance of this piece in Boston recently for the above information.

It is extraordinary that a foreigner should come to us and depict certain phases of American spirit as marvelously as Dvorak has done in the "New World Symphony," which is to close tonight's program. Dvorak, a Czech, was born near Prague in 1841, and in later life came to New York for three years as director of a musical conservatory. Although he imbibed much that was American and expressed for us something that is national, he yet kept in this work his own individuality. In this symphony there are Negro and Indian themes, but more important than those is the freshness of the younger nation and a sense of vast stretches of prairie. In the second movement one feels a serious aspect in nature, but in the other movements all is an easy-going confidence in life, anything like tragedy being touched on only in rare moments of climax.

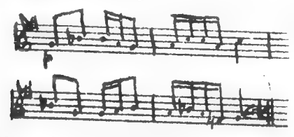
The structure of this symphony is fairly classical, it being divided into the four usual movements, but it is given a unification such as we heard in the Cesar Franck Symphony two weeks ago by the return in the last movement of all the important musical ideas that have occurred during the work. There is a slow introduction, which is atmospheric rather than [illegible] main part of the movement dicated. This quickly leads into the efinite rhythm of the main part and with it into the definite form of the first theme, which begins as follows:



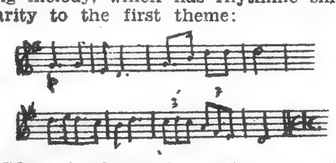
This is answered immediately by a phrase of quite different character:



These two little phrases constitute this theme in its first statement, but as the symphony continues they are dealt with separately. This mood is intensified, and then quickly leads to the second melody:

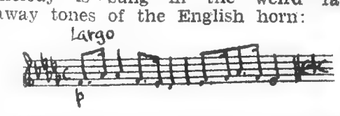


This is also intensified, and the first part of the movement is then in a way summed up by the following melody, which has rhythmic similarity to the first theme:

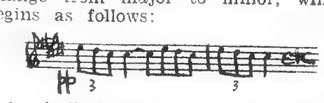


The development section of the movement is taken up with a sort of conversation between this last melody and the first, which leads, hardly perceptibly, into a return of the first theme in its original state. The other melodies come again in their original form, and the first theme is further intensified to bring the movement to a close.

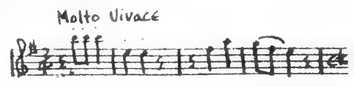
The second movement is descriptive of broad stretches of prairie, with the peace of night upon them. The first melody is sung in the weird far-away tones of the English horn:



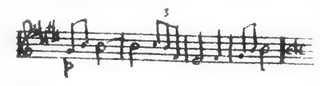
This is followed by a minor melody in the same key, except for this change from major to minor, which begins as follows:



An imitation of bird-notes suggests the coming of dawn, and then, after a strange echo of the first theme of the first movement, there is a return to the peaceful mood of the beginning of this movement. The third movement is the Scherzo, and is in the conventional form of a first section, a second section, with a repetition of the first section after it. The main idea that begins this movement is summed up in the following little phrase:

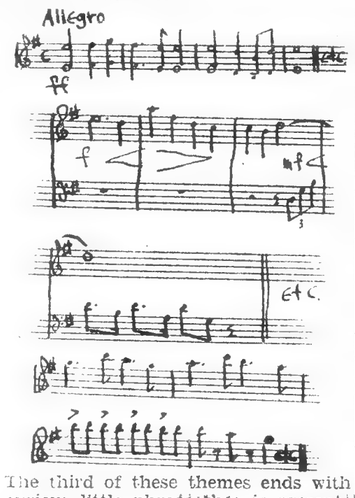


Then a second idea— still in the first section—begins as follows, in a slower tempo:



The second section is ushered in by another echo of the first theme of the first movement, and consists of a calmer musical idea, followed by something rather whimsical, neither of which is possible in abbreviated quotation. At the end there is an added bit, in which another repetition of the first theme of the first movement brings the Scherzo to an interesting climax.

The last movement is, like the first, in sonata form, with its statement of three themes, the development of them, and a final repetition of them, after which the climax of the whole work is held back for a moment while one hears suggestions of ideas from earlier movements. These three themes are as follows:



The third of these themes ends with a curious little phrase that is presently developed into something very much like "Three Blind Mice."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

Symphony Concert

The only concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give here this winter will take place at the Lyric at 8:30 tonight. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The program will include Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor and two Wagner excerpts, the prelude and liebestod from Tristan und Isolde and the prelude from Die Meistersinger.

There will be an opportunity to hear several novelties, first of which will be two dances from Albeniz's Iberia-La-Fete-Dieu, and the other Ravel's Bolero. The latter created a furor when

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

44

Music

By George Harris

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third symphony concert of this season and the second in T. Michaux Moody's artists' series of concerts took place last night at the Mosque. Things have crowded in on us lately, two orchestral concerts and seven performances of opera, all within two weeks, but, although this fact somewhat lessened the size of the audience, enthusiasm showed no signs of fatigue.' There was a brilliance in the performance last night that would have roused the most jaded. This performance was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conducting of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. We have heard this renowned and perfect organizatioin several times in recent years, its last appearance being a memorable occasion during last season. Its programs have not always been as satisfying as they might have been, considering that we have so little orchestral music, but the program last night was one of the finest I have ever heard chosen by an orchestral conductor,—admirably fitted to the taste of any audience, and particularly fitted to our musical tastes and musical needs here in Richmond.

This program was originally announced to begin with a Bach Prelude and Fugue arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg, but this had to be given up because the orchestral score did not arrive from Europe in time. In its place was put the Concerto for orchestra by Vivaldi, which may have made a happier effect than an extreme modernist's arrangement of Bach might have done. At any rate the Vivaldi is a magnificent composition, with its eighteenth century severity, but yet with some extraordinary prophesies of later musical developments. At this period of orchestral writing wind-instruments and the brasses were used only as re-enforcement of the strings, so that the impression is of a composition played by strings alone. It was a marvelous opportunity to hear the well-nigh perfect string section of this orchestra, whose beauty of tone was enhanced y a new arrangement of the orchestra on the stage. The stage was wider, and the players all sat farther forward, so that there was a brilliance that we have not hitherto heard in an orchestral concert in the Mosque.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin" is again a composition played almost entirely by strings, but is a work of a totally different type of imagination and of effect. Its spiritual beauty could not have failed to impress a single listener. So much music for this section of the organization built up the program in a remarkable manner. Having so much string sonority, when the wood-winds and brass did come, they brought a marvelous effect of contrast and of color.

Thus we were transported into a new world when the "Bolero," by Ravel began. It is a startling work through its very simplicity. It never modulates, but it is the reiteration of one little melody over and over again, each time there being color and intensification added to it through orchestration. It has a strange psychological force in it, for this reiteration puts one into a sort of hypnotic state of excitement, showing that monotony has more effect on the nerves than variety. The piece is a scathing comment on the listlessness of Moorish Spain, as it reveals to us a primitive state of emotion that exists nowhere else in Europe. This piece is exciting, but yet is horribly tragic.

After an intermission, during which the habit formed during last week's opera made more people than ever before during a concert go out for a smoke, we had the great joy of listening to the Dvorak "New World Symphony." It is ever fresh, and its beauties were revealed almost in a new light at last night's performance. To come back to the building up of the program, each composition so far had kept very rigidly to one tonality, and now the Symphony unfolded into a moving mass of harmonic color, whose effect on us was much more telling than if we had more harmonic color before it. And even so, this work is simple, so that its one great discordant clash at the end of it all was more thrilling than I have ever known it. Delicacy and beauty of tone alternate with great force in the playing of the orchestra, and Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it brought out every possible detail of the work's great imagination. In spite of the fact that the Cesar Franck Symphony is more profound than anything we heard last night, last night's program and the performance of it made possible the most enjoyable orchestral concert I have ever heard in Richmond.

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

FEB 4 - 192[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS FINE

Well-Chosen Numbers Have Enthusiastic Reception in Richmond.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

Last night brought the second great symphony orchestra to Richmond within a month, with the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Mosque. In spite of the preceding week of opera, there was a large audience present—or perhaps, we should say because of the preceding week of opera there was a large audience present, because, ideally, interest should increase in direct proportion to the attractiveness and quantity of artistic sustenance. This has not always been the case with Richmond, but occasionally our hope rises with such an unexpected manifestation. At any rate, there was a sizzable audience and an enthusiastically appreciative one.

It was an exceedingly well-balanced program Dr. Koussevitsky chose for Richmond this season, including the D minor Vivaldi Concerto in three movements, edited by Alexander Siloti. This served not only to bring forward a work that was originally written for a very small string orchestra, or simfonietta, which was in itself interesting, but to give opportunity to concentrate in hearing the fine string choir of this orchestra, which has given it so large a proportion of its fame. Particularly lovely were the first and last movements.

This was followed by the Prelude to "Lohengrin," opening with its ethereal, shimmering effect of light in the highest register of the divided violins with the motive very softly enunciated, then taken up by the deeper strings and gradually increasing in volume until it is intoned by the trombones—then quietly dying away again in a long diminuendo to the high tones of the strings again.

There seems not to be the brilliance of climax in this that we have heard before, the brasses being held down to a neffect of depth and sonority rather than the shining splendor that the content of the music suggests. It was, however, very soul-satisfying.

Novelty Presented.

Following his custom, Dr. Koussevitsky brought us a novelty—this time a much happier one than Honegger's "Rugby." Maurice Ravel, who among French composers manages cleverly to be fastidious while avoiding the pitfall of becoming insipid, has incorporated in the "Bolero" which was played last night his admiration and feeling for the Spanish idiom. Without being a deeply significant work, it is clever, exciting and emotionally stirring. It begins in an almost unbelievably delicate pianissimo with the plucked strings of second violins and the theme barely breathed by the oboe, and it builds up and intensifies into a thrilling crescendo by the gradual addition of instruments from both choirs ending in a crashing chord with drums and cymbals. It was given an exciting reading by these Bostonians.

The program closed with Dvorak's "New World Symphony," which was written after having lived in America for several years.

No matter how often one hears this symphony, one always discovers new beauties, notwithstanding there are no subleties in either its musical or spiritual content. It is built upon themes derived from Negro songs, which he felt were the gerf of true American folk-music. It is not necessary to argue this point to recognize that he has made use of these recognizably racial tunes in an unique and ingenious manner to build up a symphony which has an American idiom, if there is such a thing. It is plaintively expressive ,emotionally fine and melodically lovely, and was given a sympathetic reading last night by the Russian conductor.

It is to be devoutly hoped that arrangements for opera in Richmond will not preclude the opportunity to hear symphony orchestras. There must be both—without forgetting chamber music and piano recitals There wa sa time when Richmond would listen to nothing but song; but we believe, and we hear it frequently said, that Richmond is growing more musically sophisticated. Certainly, the appreciation of the two symphony concerts we have had woull seem to indicate it, and in any event Richmond ewes a debt of gratitude to those who have made these two memorable concerts available to Richmond.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN A FINE CONCERT

In spite of bad weather the usual capacity house, with Mrs. Hoover in the President's box and standing room at a premium, greeted Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra at Poli's yesterday afternoon, presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene as the fourth concert of her Artists' Course. The whole program was read with masterly appreciation and was received with greatest enthusiasm.

Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, the "Pathetique," which has not been heard here lately, was played most satisfactorily and with full understanding of the composer, for Tschaikowsky's symphonies express the man himself. The Adagio is built around a lovely song, which Russian somberness conquers at times, and one feels a mental struggle. The Allegro con grazia is in one of the unusual Russian five-eighths rhythms strangely akin to a waltz, beautiful, but the note of fatality always present, beaten out like a pulse by the drums.

The second Allegro is the bright movement; care and brooding are cast to the winds and an elfin freedom pervades wind-swept trees. The Finale takes up the burden of human perplexities again, but resignedly, and dies out softly in the basses. Mr. Koussevitzky had his men up to share the storm of applause at its finish.

New to Washington, and his latest orchestral score, was Ravel's "Bolero," which is tremendously clever composition as well as fascinating music. It begins with the softest tapping on the tenor drum, which gradually grows louder, and flute announces the theme, from solo instrument to solo instrument, then from group to group this lovely theme is carried and worked up until the whole orchestra is involved, the tempo slow two beats, never varying, but the tone increasing in volume until it ends in a gorgeous ensemble. The audience was most emphatic in appreciation, and again the orchestra shared the applause.

Two Wagner numbers came next, the Prelude to Lohengrin, which was presented like fragile shimmering moonlight on water, and then in great contrast, the colorful majestic and very mundane Prelude to "Die Meistersingers." There were many recalls before the audience was willing to go home.—FLORENCE HYDE.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

CONCERT SERIES SOUGHT HERE

Dr. A. R. L. Dohme, a director of the Lyric and the Baltimore Opera Club, today arranged for a series of conferences within the next two days on plans to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra give a series of concerts in Baltimore next winter, which may necessitate an underwriting of from $15,000 to $20,000.

Before leaving Baltimore after a concert at the Lyric last night, George E. Judd, assistant manager of the orchestra, said the Baltimore proposal should be made within two weeks, the time limit fixed for arranging the itinerary for next season.

Mr. Judd said the orchestra, which gives 72 concerts during the Boston season, was in great demand. Last night's performance, the only concert in Baltimore by the Symphony this season, resulted in five recalls for Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor.

The Baltimore Federation of Labor has been requested in a letter from the American Musical Union to use its influence against patronage of the Boston orchestra's concerts, on the ground that the Symphony is unfair to union labor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

FEB [illegible]

Who Will Help?

While the echoes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's lone concert of the season still linger about the Lyric, it seems an opportune time to start a movement for a regular season of concerts by this organization.

It has been announced that the New York Philharmonic orchestra will not return to this city next season.

This leaves Baltimore with only the Baltimore and Philadelphia Orchestras to gratify our taste for symphonic music.

There is every reason why the Boston Orchestra should give a series of concerts here.

There was a time, not many years ago, when that organization was both a social and a cultural magnet in this city.

Then came the World War, disrupting etsablished customs, and the Boston lost favor here.

Baltimore music lovers were threatened with an orchestra famine, but a little group of intelligent, public-spirited men and women took the situation in hand, gave strong support to the Philadelphia Orchestra and made it first in the hearts of our music patrons.

Now is the time to do the same thing on behalf of the Boston Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

Boston Symphony May Give Series Of Concerts Next Year

Success Of Only Appearance Here This Season Leads Dr. A. R. L. Dohme To Advance Possibility. Must Act Within Two Weeks

The Boston Symphony, in its only concert of the season in Baltimore at the Lyric last night, met with such an enthusiastic reception that Dr. A. R. L. Dohme, a director of the Lyric and of the Baltimore Opera Club, consulted with George E. Judd, assistant manager of the orchestra, as to the possibility of the organization giving a series of concerts here next winter.

Mr. Judd said there was a great demand for the orchestra and it was giving seventy-two concerts a season in Boston, often playing four times in one week. He said the Baltimore project might necessitate an underwriting of $15,000 to $20,000.

Must Act In Two Weeks

Mr. Judd said that if Baltimore was interested in having the orchestra here itinerary for the coming season will be made at that time.

The enthusiasm reached its peak at the performance last night when at the close of the first half of the concert Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor, was recalled five times and the orchestra was brought to its feet.

Labor Attacks Orchestra

Because the Boston Symphony Orchestra is "unfair to union labor," according to the American Musical Union, the Baltimore Federation of Labor was asked last night in a letter from the Musical Union to use its influence against the patronage of the Boston orchestra's concerts.

The request was in the form of a letter sent by the Musical Union and calling attention to the fact that the orchestra was giving a concert here last night. No action was taken as the letter had arrived too late.

TWO STRAUSSES BY SYMPHONY

Unusual List for Tuesday Afternoon Concert

Seemingly Dr. Koussevitzky credits the subscribers to the Tuesday afternoon Symphony Concerts with voracious musical appetites and vigorous musical digestions. In the past he has been known to offer these Tuesday audiences two symphonies to a concert, and yesterday, in the third concert of the current series, he conducted two symphonic poems of Richard Strauss. Not since the distinguished composer himself a quarter of a century ago conducted at a Symphony Pension Fund concert a programme of his own music had two of the Strauss poems appeared on a single programme in this city.

The tone-poems in question, and they came in the second half of yesterday's programme, were "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." In the course of many performances of "Tod und Verklaerung" Dr. Koussevitzky has at length brought his version of that symphonic poem to a veritable pinnacle of eloquence. With his reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" some are inclined to take trifling exceptions; others look upon it as an unsurpassed revelation of the piece's musical content. In any event, it was a brilliant and inspiriting performance that the work received yesterday.

As a preface to the Strauss poems, Dr. Koussevitzky placed on his list of yesterday the Overture and first ballet from Schubert's incidental music to the play, "Rosamunde," and that composer's "Unfinished" Symphony. Generally relegated to the Pop concerts, the pleasing Overture received yesterday, a virtuoso performance, and the charming ballet music was played with appropriate lightness and grace. The conductor's highly individual yet unquestionably effective version of the "Unfinished" Symphony particularly pleased yesterday's large audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

Serge Koussevitzky Gives Boston Symphony Recital

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to the Lyric last night for their one brief visit of the season, and played in a way that made us shiver to think of losing them. Their concert was vigorous and superbly musical.

Opening with a deftly respectable expression of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, they ran right into a tornado of applause with the new "Bolero" of Ravel, an ingeniously monotonous but infinitely disturbing Spanish dance.

The simplicity of this work is almost impudent; a single wail repeated over and over again by one instrument after another against a drumbeat reminiscent of the African bush, never quickened but always strengthened. And yet Baltimore couldn't help liking it more than any new work it had heard for years. It took a Koussevitzky to handle the very subtle crecendo of the "Bolero."

The closing half of the concert was all Wagner, and not according to schedule. The "Valkyrie's Ride," the Vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" and the "Meistersinger" overture followed one another breathlessly and beautifully. The content was drained its utmost from each work in the playing, and the result was magnificent.

Surely we have had no more luscious symphony concert this season than Mr. Koussevitzky's. A. S. K.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

44

Music

By George Harris

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third symphony concert of this season and the second in T. Michaux Moody's artists' series of concerts took place last night at the Mosque. Things have crowded in on us lately, two orchestral concerts and seven performances of opera, all within two weeks, but, although this fact somewhat lessened the size of the audience, enthusiasm showed no signs of fatigue. There was a brilliance in the performance last night that would have roused the most jaded. This performance was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conducting of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. We have heard this renowned and perfect organizatioin several times in recent years, its last appearance being a memorable occasion during last season. Its programs have not always been as satisfying as they might have been, considering that we have so little orchestral music, but the program last night was one of the finest I have ever heard chosen by an orchestral conductor,—admirably fitted to the taste of any audience, and particularly fitted to our musical tastes and musical needs here in Richmond.

This program was originally announced to begin with a Bach Prelude and Fugue arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg, but this had to be given up because the orchestral score did not arrive from Europe in time. In its place was put the Concerto for orchestra by Vivaldi, which may have made a happier effect than an extreme modernist's arrangement of Bach might have done. At any rate the Vivaldi is a magnificent composition, with its eighteenth century severity, but yet with some extraordinary prophesies of later musical developments. At this period of orchestral writing wind-instruments and the brasses were used only as re-enforcement of the strings, so that the impression is of a composition played by strings alone. It was a marvelous opportunity to hear the well-nigh perfect string section of this orchestra, whose beauty of tone was enhanced y a new arrangement of the orchestra on the stage. The stage was wider, and the players all sat farther forward, so that there was a brilliance that we have not hitherto heard in an orchestral concert in the Mosque.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin" is again a composition played almost entirely by strings, but is a work of a totally different type of imagination and of effect. Its spiritual beauty could not have failed to impress a single listener. So much music for his section of the organization built up the program in a remarkable manner. Having so much string sonority, when the wood-winds and brass did come, they brought a marvelous effect of contrast and of color.

Thus we were transported into a new world when the "Bolero," by Ravel began. It is a startling work through its very simplicity. It never modulates, but it is the reiteration of one little melody over and over again, each time there being color and intensification added to it through orchestration. It has a strange psychological force in it, for this reiteration puts one into a sort of hypnotic state of excitement, showing that monotony has more effect on the nerves than variety. The piece is a scathing comment on the listlessness of Moorish Spain, as it reveals to us a primitive state of emotion that exists nowhere else in Europe. This piece is exciting, but it is horribly tragic.

After an intermission, during which the habit formed during last week's opera made more people than ever before during a concert go out for a smoke, we had the great joy of listening to the Dvorak "New World Symphony." It is ever fresh, and its beauties were revealed almost in a new light at last night's performance. To come back to the building up of the program, each composition so far had kept very rigidly to one tonality, and now the Symphony unfolded into a moving mass of harmonic color, whose effect on us was much more telling than if we had more harmonic color before it. And even so, this work is simple, so that its one great discordant clash at the end of it all was more thrilling than I have ever known it. Delicacy and beauty of tone alternate with great force in the playing of the orchestra, and Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it brought out every possible detail of the work's great imagination. In spite of the fact that the Cesar Franck Symphony is more profound than anything we heard last night, last night's program and the performance of it made possible the most enjoyable orchestral concert I have ever heard in Richmond.

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

FEB 4 - 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS FINE

Well-Chosen Numbers Have Enthusiastic Reception in Richmond.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

Last night brought the second great symphony orchestra to Richmond within a month, with the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Mosque. In spite of the preceding week of opera, there was a large audience present—or perhaps, we should say because of the preceding week of opera there was a large audience present, because, ideally, interest should increase in direct proportion to the attractiveness and quantity of artistic sustenance. This has not always been the case with Richmond, but occasionally our hope rises with such an unexpected manifestation. At any rate, there was a sizzable audience and an enthusiastically appreciative one.

It was an exceedingly well-balanced program Dr. Koussevitsky chose for Richmond this season, including the D minor Vivaldi Concerto in three movements, edited by Alexander Siloti. This served not only to bring forward a work that was originally written for a very small string orchestra, or simfonietta, which was in itself interesting, but to give opportunity to concentrate in hearing the fine string choir of this orchestra, which has given it so large a proportion of its fame. Particularly lovely were the first and last movements.

This was followed by the Prelude to "Lohengrin," opening with its ethereal, shimmering effect of light in the highest register of the divided violins with the motive very softly enunciated, then taken up by the deeper strings and gradually increasing in volume until it is intoned by the trombones—then quietly dying away again in a long diminuendo to the high tones of the strings again.

There seems not to be the brilliance of climax in this that we have heard before, the brasses being held down to a neffect of depth and sonority rather than the shining splendor that the content of the music suggests. It was, however, very soul-satisfying.

Novelty Presented.

Following his custom, Dr. Koussevitsky brought us a novelty—this time a much happier one than Honegger's "Rugby." Maurice Ravel, who among French composers manages cleverly to be fastidious while avoiding the pitfall of becoming insipid, has incorporated in the "Bolero" which was played last night his admiration and feeling for the Spanish idiom. Without being a deeply significant work, it is clever, exciting and emotionally stirring. It begins in an almost unbelievably delicate pianissimo with the plucked strings of second violins and the theme barely breathed by the oboe, and it builds up and intensifies into a thrilling crescendo by the gradual addition of instruments from both choirs ending in a crashing chord with drums and cymbals. It was given an exciting reading by these Bostonians.

The program closed with Dvorak's "New World Symphony," which was written after having lived in America for several years.

No matter how often one hears this symphony, one always discovers new beauties, notwithstanding there are no subleties in either its musical or spiritual content. It is built upon themes derived from Negro songs, which he felt were the gerf of true American folk-music. It is not necessary to argue this point to recognize that he has made use of these recognizably racial tunes in an unique and ingenious manner to build up a symphony which has an American idiom, if there is such a thing. It is plaintively expressive ,emotionally fine and melodically lovely, and was given a sympathetic reading last night by the Russian conductor.

It is to be devoutly hoped that arrangements for opera in Richmond will not preclude the opportunity to hear symphony orchestras. There must be both—without forgetting chamber music and piano recitals. There wa sa time when Richmond would listen to nothing but song; but we believe, and we hear it frequently said, that Richmond is growing more musically sophisticated. Certainly, the appreciation of the two symphony concerts we have had woull seem to indicate it, and in any event Richmond ewes a debt of gratitude to those who have made these two memorable concerts available to Richmond.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN A FINE CONCERT

In spite of bad weather the usual capacity house, with Mrs. Hoover in the President's box and standing room at a premium, greeted Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra at Poli's yesterday afternoon, presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene as the fourth concert of her Artists' Course. The whole program was read with masterly appreciation and was received with greatest enthusiasm.

Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, the "Pathetique," which has not been heard here lately, was played most satisfactorily and with full understanding of the composer, for Tschaikowsky's symphonies express the man himself. The Adagio is built around a lovely song, which Russian somberness conquers at times, and one feels a mental struggle. The Allegro con grazia is in one of the unusual Russian five-eighths rhythms strangely akin to a waltz, beautiful, but the note of fatality always present, beaten out like a pulse by the drums.

The second Allegro is the bright movement; care and brooding are cast to the winds and an elfin freedom pervades wind-swept trees. The Finale takes up the burden of human perplexities again, but resignedly, and dies out softly in the basses. Mr. Koussevitzky had his men up to share the storm of applause at its finish.

New to Washington, and his latest orchestral score, was Ravel's "Bolero," which is tremendously clever composition as well as fascinating music. It begins with the softest tapping on the tenor drum, which gradually grows louder, and flute announces the theme, from solo instrument to solo instrument, then from group to group this lovely theme is carried and worked up until the whole orchestra is involved, the tempo slow two beats, never varying, but the tone increasing in volume until it ends in a gorgeous ensemble. The audience was most emphatic in appreciation, and again the orchestra shared the applause.

Two Wagner numbers came next, the Prelude to Lohengrin, which was presented like fragile shimmering moonlight on water, and then in great contrast, the colorful majestic and very mundane Prelude to "Die Meistersingers." There were many recalls before the audience was willing to go home.—FLORENCE HYDE.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

CONCERT SERIES SOUGHT HERE

Dr. A. R. L. Dohme, a director of the Lyric and the Baltimore Opera Club, today arranged for a series of conferences within the next two days on plans to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra give a series of concerts in Baltimore next winter, which may necessitate an underwriting of from $15,000 to $20,000.

Before leaving Baltimore after a concert at the Lyric last night, George E. Judd, assistant manager of the orchestra, said the Baltimore proposal should be made within two weeks, the time limit fixed for arranging the itinerary for next season.

Mr. Judd said the orchestra, which gives 72 concerts during the Boston season, was in great demand. Last night's performance, the only concert in Baltimore by the Symphony this season, resulted in five recalls for Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor.

The Baltimore Federation of Labor has been requested in a letter from the American Musical Union to use its influence against patronage of the Boston orchestra's concerts, on the ground that the Symphony is unfair to union labor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

FEB 5 1926

Who Will Help?

While the echoes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's lone concert of the season still linger about the Lyric, it seems an opportune time to start a movement for a regular season of concerts by this organization.

It has been announced that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will not return to this city next season.

This leaves Baltimore with only the Baltimore and Philadelphia Orchestras to gratify our taste for symphonic music.

There is every reason why the Boston Orchestra should give a series of concerts here.

There was a time, not many years ago, when that organization was both a social and a cultural magnet in this city.

Then came the World War, disrupting etsablished customs, and the Boston lost favor here.

Baltimore music lovers were threatened with an orchestra famine, but a little group of intelligent, public-spirited men and women took the situation in hand, gave strong support to the Philadelphia Orchestra and made it first in the hearts of our music patrons.

Now is the time to do the same thing on behalf of the Boston Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

Boston Symphony May Give Series Of Concerts Next Year

Success Of Only Appearance Here This Season Leads Dr. A. R. L. Dohme To Advance Possibility. Must Act Within Two Weeks

The Boston Symphony, in its only concert of the season in Baltimore at the Lyric last night, met with such an enthusiastic reception that Dr. A. R. L. Dohme, a director of the Lyric and of the Baltimore Opera Club, consulted with George E. Judd, assistant manager of the orchestra, as to the possibility of the organization giving a series of concerts here next winter.

Mr. Judd said there was a great demand for the orchestra and it was giving seventy-two concerts a season in Boston, often playing four times in one week. He said the Baltimore project might necessitate an underwriting of $15,000 to $20,000.

Must Act In Two Weeks

Mr. Judd said that if Baltimore was interested in having the orchestra here next season for a series of concerts its proposal should be submitted within the next two weeks because the itinerary for the coming season will be made at that time.

The enthusiasm reached its peak at the performance last night when at the close of the first half of the concert Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor, was recalled five times and the orchestra was brought to its feet.

Labor Attacks Orchestra

Because the Boston Symphony Orchestra is "unfair to union labor," according to the American Musical Union, the Baltimore Federation of Labor was asked last night in a letter from the Musical Union to use its influence against the patronage of the Boston orchestra's concerts.

The request was in the form of a letter sent by the Musical Union and calling attention to the fact that the orchestra was giving a concert here last night. No action was taken as the letter had arrived too late.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

Serge Koussevitzky Gives Boston Symphony Recital

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to the Lyric last night for their one brief visit of the season, and played in a way that made us shiver to think of losing them. Their concert was vigorous and superbly musical.

Opening with a deftly respectable expression of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, they ran right into a tornado of applause with the new "Bolero" of Ravel, an ingeniously monotonous but infinitely disturbing Spanish dance.

The simplicity of this work is almost impudent; a single wail repeated over and over again by one instrument after another against a drumbeat reminiscent of the African bush, never quickened but always strengthened. And yet Baltimore couldn't help liking it more than any new work it had heard for years. It took a Koussevitzky to handle the very subtle crecendo of the "Bolero."

The closing half of the concert was all Wagner, and not according to schedule. The "Valkyrie's Ride," the Vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" and the "Meistersinger" overture followed one another breathlessly and beautifully. The content was drained its utmost from each work in the playing, and the result was magnificent.

Surely we have had no more luscious symphony concert this season than Mr. Koussevitzky's. A. S. K.

45

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 5 - 1930

Russian Works Given by Boston Symphony Here

Prokofieff Compositions, With Author as Soloist, Heard in Carnegie Hall

ScythianSuite onProgram

Score of Concerto, Lost in Russia, Was Rewritten

Two Russian Serges, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Prokofieff, played the leading roles in last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, where Serge Koussevitzky devoted the major part of his program to two works of Serge Prokofieff. In his second piano concerto the composer appeared as soloist, and also mounted the stage to acknowledge applause after his Scythian Suite.

The Scythian Suite, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to us in 1924, ten years after its composition, has become almost a standard work of the modern department of our repertoire; this was its eighth performance in this borough The concerto, which Dr. Koussevitzky and the composer introduced to Brooklyn Thursday night and Manhattan yesterday evening, is older than the suite in one sense and newer in another. The work was composed, it is recorded in Philip Hale's admirable program notes, in 1913, and played several times before Prokofieff came here in 1918. During his absence his Leningrad apartment was confiscated by the Soviet government and the score and orchestral parts were lost. Sketches of the piano part, however, were saved, and from these Prokofieff reconstructed the work.

The new version, which retains the themes and form of the original work but is in the composer's instrumental style of ten years later, makes, nevertheless, a fairly homogeneous impression. It uses, much of the time, mildly subacid rather than radically dissonant harmonies, along with occasional reversions to tuneful Russian romanticism; it contains much effective instrumental writing and well wrought combinations or contrasts of the solo and the orchestral parts. It gives the pianist no lack of opportunity to display ability, but in the manner of other works of contemporary composers avoids at least readily apparent emotion, its effectiveness depending mainly upon external characteristics.

Mr. Prokofieff, impassive in mien, gave a vigorous, fluent and brilliant performance, and also won unusually fervent applause after the Scythian suite, which has its most impressive moments early and late in its course, and also includes a few measures of less interest. The pungent, inspiriting musical depiction of the sunrise at the close received a notably proclamative performance from Dr. Koussevitzky's excellent orchestra.

The Prokofieff numbers were preceded by Mozart's serenade "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and followed by the concert excerpts from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

F. D. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
FEB 8 - 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE; TWO OPERAS AT 'MET'

By GRENA BENNETT.

AFTER one had listened to the "Scythian" Suite played last evening in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one felt that composer Prokofieff was the real heir to Strauss' crown as "The Despot of Din." Only rarely does the concert patron hear such a tumultuous work, such ear-splitting episodes based on acid bitter disonance. And yet the work had moments of muted comfort, but these were all but obliterated in the savage, barbaric noises which Mr. Prokofieff invented to illustrate an ancient people's invocations to good and evil dieties.

So far as the orchestration is concerned, it is an excellent work, but other than that its bid for an auditor's approval deserves little response.

Composer Plays

Mr. Prokofieff appeared in person to play the piano part in his G minor concerto, presented here for the first time last night. The work was composed seventeen years ago. The manuscript was lost or destroyed when the Soviet Government confiscated the composer's property in 1918. Fragments of the piano part were salvaged, however, and the concerto was reconstructed from these.

The Bostonians began their programme with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachatuck," a charming, joyous work, whose melodious, glamorous passages were played with faultless musicianship. Three dainty dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," brought the concert to a close.

* * *

Music Notes and Comment

Alfredo Casella is unfortunately not to return to Boston this year to conduct the Pops, which he has in the past three seasons raised to an artistic level never before attained at these concerts. His successor, according to the official announcement, will be Arthur Fiedler, whose popular success last Summer with the Esplanade concerts will be remembered by all. Mr Fiedler is the son of Emmanuel Fiedler, who was for 25 years a member of the Boston Symphony. He is the first resident Boston musician to become conductor of the Pops. Arthur Fiedler is this season conducting the Cecilia Society chorus, and has for several seasons conducted the Boston Sinfonietta, a small group specializing in modern music. As a member of the Boston Symphony he plays viola, and on occasion celesta and piano. The wide range of his musical experience is obvious. His many Boston friends will wish Mr Fiedler success in his new position. It is a great opportunity for a musician still in his 30's.

Dr Koussevitzky has arranged an unusual program for this week's Boston Symphony concerts in the regular series. It includes Debussy's early setting for orchestra and women's voices of a French translation of D. G. Rossetti's, "The Blessed Damozel," in which the assisting chorus will be the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth; and his incidental music for d'Annunzio's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," which to some is the masterpiece of his last years. In this number the assisting chorus will be the Cecilia Society, trained by its new conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

Mme Ritter-Ciampi, a French soprano of considerable reputation, is coming to America for the first time to appear at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday.

Her mother was Cecile Ritter, the operatic singer, and her father was the baritone, Ezio Ciampi. Her uncle was the pianist, Theodore Ritter. She toured France with Raoul Pugno and made her operatic debut in 1918 as Virginia in "Paul and Virginia"—a part which her mother had notably sung in 1876. She became a principal singer of the Opera Comique for three seasons and subsequently joined the Grand Opera of Paris, where she has appeared in many principal roles. Mme Ritter-Ciampi has meanwhile appeared with the principal orchestras of Paris and given numerous recitals in France, Belgium and Spain. She was the leading soprano in the Mozart Cycle at the Champs Elysees in 1928 under Bruno Walter. Her appearance in "Don Juan" in Berlin last Winter,

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second and brilliantly successful New York concert of the week-end yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

It may be said, for it is true that Boston has now an orchestra which is without a superior, if it has an equal in this country, a band that Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to a unique flexibility, sensitiveness and virtuosity, which surpassed itself yesterday in the quality and spirit of its performance.

The reason for the special lustre of these performances lay probably in the fact that the men of the Boston Orchestra, at the end of one of their crowded periodic tours, had had a period of comparative rest and relaxation between two concerts given on Friday and Saturday in one city. In any event, the orchestra excelled itself, and its leader seemed in equal spirits. Even the rather trite music from de Falla's ballet, repeated from the Friday program, were played with such color and elan that they thrilled the most indifferent or critical.

The concert had, furthermore, the value of repeating three important modern works. Mr. Prokofieff was present to take again the soloist's part in the performance of his Second piano concerto, introduced on Friday night. The first half of the program consisted of Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point" and Arnold Bax's Second symphony in E minor and C. These works had special interest for the Boston Symphony's public when they were presented here by Mr. Koussevitzky earlier in the season.

The score of Walton did not suffer from repetition, and the scores of Bax and Prokofieff gained by the process. The symphony more clearly than ever established its inherent melodic and imaginative life. Its Celticism is not mere local idiom or epigram; this essence is not a matter of effects which are exterior. On the contrary, Bax seems to have found his way back to an ancient source of power. A part of that power, also, lies in the impress of northern nature and mystery that hangs over much of the heroic music.

Stravinsky is obviously present in the joyous, zestful, ridiculous music of Walton. But this is British humor, and British music, fresh minted, and, for all its derivations, as genuine as a pound sterling! Parts of Mr. Prokofieff's concerto gain with repeated hearing, as, for example, the third movement, which, with the first, appears to have more originality and actual creative impulse than other pages. Nevertheless, the opinion will not down that Mr. Prokofieff has written better music and better concertos.

It is an excellent proceeding for a conductor to repeat works of proved importance and interest as Mr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

The Washington Post.

THE WASHINGTON POST CO
Washington, D. C.
EDWARD B. McLEAN,
President and Publisher.

Wednesday, February 5, 1930.

BOSTON SYMPHONY FINDS FAVOR HERE

Koussevitzky's Leadership Marks Performance at Poli's Theater.

MRS. HOOVER ATTENDS

The magic of a Russian composer united with the wizardry of a Slavic conductor made the presentation of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, noteworthy in every sense of the word.

So subtle was the blending of the various orchestral voices under the well-nigh inspired baton of Dr. Koussevitzky that at times the orchestra appeared to have but one beautiful voice, so marvelous was the ensemble tone in its perfect unison of sound.

His reading was quietly done, but with dynamic force that grew upon one more and more as one watched the conductor lead his musicians from movement to movement, winning a perfect response and the utmost of their musical powers from them.

After the first movement, "The Adagio," the audience broke into such prolonged applause that it would not be quieted until Dr. Koussevitzky had acknowledged it individually several times and again and again sharing the ovation generously with his musicians.

The other movements of the symphony possessed individual beauties of their own, well exhibited by yesterday's orchestra.

A novelty was presented in "Bolero" by Ravel, in which the orchestra was put to a severe test by the solo voices read into the constant but never monotonous repetition of a single theme of the characteristic Spanish rhythm. Out of this demand upon his orchestra resources the conductor managed to produce a number so entrancing that again the audience broke out in an applause most unusual in volume for Washington, led with vigorous hand clapping by Mrs. Herbert Hoover, who occupied a stage box with a party of friends.

The concert, which was presented under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, was concluded with two fine Wagner preludes in which Dr. Koussevitzky displayed familiarity and understanding of this master.

E. E. P.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN TUESDAY CONCERT

Globe-Jrl. 2/6

Music by Schubert and Richard Strauss Played

The third concert of the Tuesday series was given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr Koussevitzky conducted the program devoted to Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture and first ballet, the "Unfinished Symphony," and Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel."

Yesterday's concert provided a high musical contrast. Moreover the applause heard provided evidence that listeners accustomed to the highly-spiced Strauss music, and more modern and more startling creations, have not lost the desire to listen to nor the power to enjoy the melodic simplicity that is Schubert.

Schubert's simpler musical structures loom queerly against the intricacies and complexities of the Strauss tone poems. Yet no "then and now" idea comes to mind. Music, with the timeless and ever vital human emotional quality that pervades all of Schubert's work never can be looked upon as obsolete, or at best as something quaintly antique. Perhaps the future holds the secret of the ultimate fate of the Straussian music.

While Dr Koussevitzky temperamentally, is perhaps more suited to the Strauss pieces, he did not give the Schubert music mere perfunctory performance. The limpid beauty and the delicate traceries of the "Rosamunde" excerpts were excellently defined. Tempi and dynamics were wisely chosen for the "Unfinished" Symphony; the pace maintained and the tonal volumes evoked served to bring forth all the nostalgic emotion of the symphony without broadening it into a distortion of the Schubert character.

"Death and Transfiguration" is in the main personal music, even though there may be episodes where perhaps the technical devices used seem to produce a breadth far greater than that of individual experience. Mere sweeping orchestral brilliance, too, does not in this case paint the surface of something quite hollow within.

Dr Koussevitzky's readings of the tone poems were forceful and brilliant. Vivid and intense was the stark reality of "Death and Transfiguration"; exuberant was the "Till Eulenspiegel."

The fourth Tuesday concert of the season will be given on Feb 25, at 3 o'clock.

Sale Of Seats For Symphony Here Is Brisk

Musical Richmond is looking forward with extreme eagerness to hearing Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the 112 musicians comprising the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, give Dvorak's great "New World Symphony" when that half-century old organization appears at the Mosque the night of February 3. It will be presented by T. Michaux Moody as the second attraction in his artists' course of five concerts, and seats are now on sale at Walter D. Moses and Company where the demand for tickets is steady and brisk. The symphony chosen after careful consideration is thought to be entirely satisfying to all types of concert-goers, for it is essentially American and in certain of its themes there is a flavor of the Negro spirituals of the Old South. It is regarded by critics and the public as one of the very greatest of modern symphonic compositions.

The program also will include a prelude and fugue by Bach, arranged by Arnold Schonberg, "Bolero," a composition by Ravel which has been joyously acclaimed in all sections of this country and Europe, and the prelude to Wagner's mighty opera, "Lohengrin." This entire program is regarded as altogether satisfying and it is thought that the performance probably will be as near perfect as it is possible to make anything perfection. Dr. Koussevitzky as been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1924, and in that time it has developed and expanded tremendously. He always conducts his players himself and the schedule is now so full that there is very little time for touring. More than sixty concerts will be given by the orchestra this season in Boston alone, and nearly every seat was sold before the season opened.

Dr. Koussevitzky is, of course, a Russian, as are most great conductors, and each summer he conducts a set of concerts in Paris, while his wonderful performances are known and appreciated in every European capital. As his own orchestra approaches its fiftieth year, its precision, ensemble and tonal beauty remain unexcelled

"Bolero" Written for Dancer— Ravel's "Bolero," which will be one of the presentations by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears at the Mosque next month, was written for and dedicated to Mme. Ida Rubenstein, below, known the world over as one of the greatest of actresses and tragediennes. —Kadel and Herbert Photo.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Russian Works Given by Boston Symphony Here

Prokofieff Compositions, With Author as Soloist, Heard in Carnegie Hall

ScythianSuite onProgram

Score of Concerto, Lost in Russia, Was Rewritten

Two Russian Serges, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Prokofieff, played the leading roles in last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, where Serge Koussevitzky devoted the major part of his program to two works of Serge Prokofieff. In his second piano concerto the composer appeared as soloist, and also mounted the stage to acknowledge applause after his Scythian Suite.

The Scythian Suite, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to us in 1924, ten years after its composition, has become almost a standard work of the modern department of our repertoire; this was its eighth performance in this borough The concerto, which Dr. Koussevitzky and the composer introduced to Brooklyn Thursday night and Manhattan yesterday evening, is older than the suite in one sense and newer in another. The work was composed, it is recorded in Philip Hale's admirable program notes, in 1913, and played several times before Prokofieff came here in 1918. During his absence his Leningrad apartment was confiscated by the Soviet government and the score and orchestral parts were lost. Sketches of the piano part, however, were saved, and from these Prokofieff reconstructed the work.

The new version, which retains the themes and form of the original work but is in the composer's instrumental style of ten years later, makes, nevertheless, a fairly homogeneous impression. It uses, much of the time, mildly subacid rather than radically dissonant harmonies, along with occasional reversions to tuneful Russian romanticism; it contains much effective instrumental writing and well wrought combinations or contrasts of the solo and the orchestral parts. It gives the pianist no lack of opportunity to display ability, but in the manner of other works of contemporary composers avoids at least readily apparent emotion, its effectiveness depending mainly upon external characteristics.

Mr. Prokofieff, impassive in mien, gave a vigorous, fluent and brilliant performance, and also won unusually fervent applause after the Scythian suite, which has its most impressive moments early and late in its course, and also includes a few measures of less interest. The pungent, inspiriting musical depiction of the sunrise at the close received a notably proclamative performance from Dr. Koussevitzky's excellent orchestra.

The Prokofieff numbers were preceded by Mozart's serenade "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and followed by the concert excerpts from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

F. D. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

FEB 3 - 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE; TWO OPERAS AT 'MET'

By GRENA BENNETT.

AFTER one had listened to the "Scythian" Suite played last evening in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one felt that composer Prokofieff was the real heir to Strauss' crown as "The Despot of Din." Only rarely does the concert patron hear such a tumultuous work, such ear-splitting episodes based on acid bitter disonance. And yet the work had moments of muted comfort, but these were all but obliterated in the savage, barbaric noises which Mr. Prokofieff invented to illustrate an ancient people's invocations to good and evil dieties.

So far as the orchestration is concerned, it is an excellent work, but other than that its bid for an auditor's approval deserves little response.

Composer Plays

Mr. Prokofieff appeared in person to play the piano part in his G minor concerto, presented here for the first time last night. The work was composed seventeen years ago. The manuscript was lost or destroyed when the Soviet Government confiscated the composer's property in 1918. Fragments of the piano part were salvaged, however, and the concerto was reconstructed from these.

The Bostonians began their programme with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachatuck," a charming, joyous work, whose melodious, glamorous passages were played with faultless musicianship. Three dainty dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," brought the concert to a close.

* * *

Music Notes and Comment

Alfredo Casella is unfortunately not to return to Boston this year to conduct the Pops, which he has in the past three seasons raised to an artistic level never before attained at these concerts. His successor, according to the official announcement, will be Arthur Fiedler, whose popular success last Summer with the Esplanade concerts will be remembered by all. Mr Fiedler is the son of Emmanuel Fiedler, who was for 25 years a member of the Boston Symphony. He is the first resident Boston musician to become conductor of the Pops. Arthur Fiedler is this season conducting the Cecilia Society chorus, and has for several seasons conducted the Boston Sinfonietta, a small group specializing in modern music. As a member of the Boston Symphony he plays viola, and on occasion celesta and piano. The wide range of his musical experience is obvious. His many Boston friends will wish Mr Fiedler success in his new position. It is a great opportunity for a musician still in his 30's.

Dr Koussevitzky has arranged an unusual program for this week's Boston Symphony concerts in the regular series. It includes Debussy's early setting for orchestra and women's voices of a French translation of D. G. Rossetti's, "The Blessed Damozel," in which the assisting chorus will be the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth; and his incidental music for d'Annunzio's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," which to some is the masterpiece of his last years. In this number the assisting chorus will be the Cecilia Society, trained by its new conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

Mme Ritter-Ciampi, a French soprano of considerable reputation, is coming to America for the first time to appear at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday.

Her mother was Cecile Ritter, the operatic singer, and her father was the baritone, Ezio Ciampi. Her uncle was the pianist, Theodore Ritter. She toured France with Raoul Pugno and made her operatic debut in 1918 as Virginia in "Paul and Virginia"—a part which her mother had notably sung in 1876. She became a principal singer of the Opera Comique for three seasons and subsequently joined the Grand Opera of Paris, where she has appeared in many principal roles. Mme Ritter-Ciampi has meanwhile appeared with the principal orchestras of Paris and given numerous recitals in France, Belgium and Spain. She was the leading soprano in the Mozart Cycle at the Champs Elysees in 1928 under Bruno Walter. Her appearance in "Don Juan" in Berlin last Winter,

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second and brilliantly successful New York concert of the week-end yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

It may be said, for it is true that Boston has now an orchestra which is without a superior, if it has an equal in this country, a band that Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to a unique flexibility, sensitiveness and virtuosity, which surpassed itself yesterday in the quality and spirit of its performance.

The reason for the special lustre of these performances lay probably in the fact that the men of the Boston Orchestra, at the end of one of their crowded periodic tours, had had a period of comparative rest and relaxation between two concerts given on Friday and Saturday in one city. In any event, the orchestra excelled itself, and its leader seemed in equal spirits. Even the rather trite music from de Falla's ballet, repeated from the Friday program, were played with such color and elan that they thrilled the most indifferent or critical.

The concert had, furthermore, the value of repeating three important modern works. Mr. Prokofieff was present to take again the soloist's part in the performance of his Second piano concerto, introduced on Friday night. The first half of the program consisted of Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point" and Arnold Bax's Second symphony in E minor and C. These works had special interest for the Boston Symphony's public when they were presented here by Mr. Koussevitzky earlier in the season.

The score of Walton did not suffer from repetition, and the scores of Bax and Prokofieff gained by the process. The symphony more clearly than ever established its inherent melodic and imaginative life. Its Celticism is not mere local idiom or epigram; this essence is not a matter of effects which are exterior. On the contrary, Bax seems to have found his way back to an ancient source of power. A part of that power, also, lies in the impress of northern nature and mystery that hangs over much of the heroic music.

Stravinsky is obviously present in the joyous, zestful, ridiculous music of Walton. But this is British humor, and British music, fresh minted, and, for all its derivations, as genuine as a pound sterling! Parts of Mr. Prokofieff's concerto gain with repeated hearing, as, for example, the third movement, which, with the first, appears to have more originality and actual creative impulse than other pages. Nevertheless, the opinion will not down that Mr. Prokofieff has written better music and better concertos.

It is an excellent proceeding for a conductor to repeat works of proved importance and interest as Mr. Koussevitzky did on this occasion. In this way he increased rather than diminished the interest of the concert, although it is also true that he has accustomed us to look to him, more than to any conductor on this side of the water, for interesting new music.

Musical Richmond is looking forward with extreme eagerness to hearing Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the 112 musicians comprising the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, give Dvorak's great "New World Symphony" when that half-century old organization appears at the Mosque the night of February 3. It will be presented by T. Michaux Moody as the second attraction in his artists' course of five concerts, and seats are now on sale at Walter D. Moses and Company where the demand for tickets is steady and brisk. The symphony chosen after careful consideration is thought to be entirely satisfying to all types of concert-goers, for it is essentially American and in certain of its themes there is a flavor of the Negro spirituals of the Old South. It is regarded by critics and the public as one of the very greatest of modern symphonic compositions.

The program also will include a prelude and fugue by Bach, arranged by Arnold Schonberg, "Bolero," a composition by Ravel which has been joyously acclaimed in all sections of this country and Europe, and the prelude to Wagner's mighty opera, "Lohengrin." This entire program is regarded as altogether satisfying and it is thought that the performance probably will be as near perfect as it is possible to make anything perfection. Dr. Koussevitzky as been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1924, and in that time it has developed and expanded tremendously. He always conducts his players himself and the schedule is now so full that there is very little time for touring. More than sixty concerts will be given by the orchestra this season in Boston alone, and nearly every seat was sold before the season opened.

Dr. Koussevitzky is, of course, a Russian, as are most great conductors, and each summer he conducts a set of concerts in Paris, while his wonderful performances are known and appreciated in every European capital. As his own orchestra approaches its fiftieth year, its precision, ensemble and tonal beauty remain unequalled

The Washington Post.

THE WASHINGTON POST CO
Washington, D. C.
EDWARD B. McLEAN,
President and Publisher.

Wednesday, February 5, 1930.

45

BOSTON SYMPHONY FINDS FAVOR HERE

Koussevitzky's Leadership Marks Performance at Poli's Theater.

MRS. HOOVER ATTENDS

The magic of a Russian composer united with the wizardry of a Slavic conductor made the presentation of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, noteworthy in every sense of the word.

So subtle was the blending of the various orchestral voices under the well-nigh inspired baton of Dr. Koussevitzky that at times the orchestra appeared to have but one beautiful voice, so marvelous was the ensemble tone in its perfect unison of sound.

His reading was quietly done, but with dynamic force that grew upon one more and more as one watched the conductor lead his musicians from movement to movement, winning a perfect response and the utmost of their musical powers from them.

After the first movement, "The Adagio," the audience broke into such prolonged applause that it would not be quieted until Dr. Koussevitzky had acknowledged it individually several times and again and again sharing the ovation generously with his musicians.

The other movements of the symphony possessed individual beauties of their own, well exhibited by yesterday's orchestra.

A novelty was presented in "Bolero" by Ravel, in which the orchestra was put to a severe test by the solo voices read into the constant but never monotonous repetition of a single theme of the characteristic Spanish rhythm. Out of this demand upon his orchestra resources the conductor managed to produce a number so entrancing that again the audience broke out in an applause most unusual in volume for Washington, led with vigorous hand clapping by Mrs. Herbert Hoover, who occupied a stage box with a party of friends.

The concert, which was presented under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, was concluded with two fine Wagner preludes in which Dr. Koussevitzky displayed familiarity and understanding of this master.

E. E. P.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN TUESDAY CONCERT

Globe-Jrl. 2/12

Music by Schubert and Richard Strauss Played

The third concert of the Tuesday series was given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr Koussevitzky conducted the program devoted to Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture and first ballet, the "Unfinished Symphony," and Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel."

Yesterday's concert provided a high musical contrast. Moreover the applause heard provided evidence that listeners accustomed to the highly-spiced Strauss music, and more modern and more startling creations, have not lost the desire to listen to nor the power to enjoy the melodic simplicity that is Schubert.

Schubert's simpler musical structures loom queerly against the intricacies and complexities of the Strauss tone poems. Yet no "then and now" idea comes to mind. Music, with the timeless and ever vital human emotional quality that pervades all of Schubert's work never can be looked upon as obsolete, or at best as something quaintly antique. Perhaps the future holds the secret of the ultimate fate of the Straussian music.

While Dr Koussevitzky temperamentally, is perhaps more suited to the Strauss pieces, he did not give the Schubert music mere perfunctory performance. The limpid beauty and the delicate traceries of the "Rosamunde" excerpts were excellently defined. Tempi and dynamics were wisely chosen for the "Unfinished" Symphony; the pace maintained and the tonal volumes evoked served to bring forth all the nostalgic emotion of the symphony without broadening it into a distortion of the Schubert character.

"Death and Transfiguration" is in the main personal music, even though there may be episodes where perhaps the technical devices used seem to produce a breadth far greater than that of individual experience. Mere sweeping orchestral brilliance, too, does not in this case paint the surface of something quite hollow within.

Dr Koussevitzky's readings of the tone poems were forceful and brilliant. Vivid and intense was the stark reality of "Death and Transfiguration"; exuberant was the "Till Eulenspiegel."

The fourth Tuesday concert of the season will be given on Feb 25, at 3 o'clock.

'Bolero" Written for Dancer— Ravel's "Bolero," which will be one of the presentations by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears at the Mosque next month, was written for and dedicated to Mme. Ida Rubenstein, below, known the world over as one of the greatest of actresses and tragediennes. —Kadel and Herbert Photo.

From Late Editions of Yesterday's Times.

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES PROKOFIEFF'S WORK

Composer, the Pianist, in a Brilliant Performance of This Concerto.

WAGNER CYCLE IS OPENED

"Meistersinger" Is Sung With Rare Harmony, With Miss Mueller as Eva and Schorr as Sachs.

By OLIN DOWNES.

It was the turn of Serge Prokofieff at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Prokofieff, who is scant of hair, but tall, blonde, with an appearance of boyishness, figured on the program as composer and also as pianist in the performance of his second concerto, heard for the first time in this city. Mr. Koussevitzky gave an amazingly brilliant performance of the Prokofieff "Scythian" Suite. Suite and Concerto evoked storms of applause. The composer, after both performances, was repeatedly called out, bowing from the platform. Mr. Koussevitzky, who greatly admires Mr. Prokofieff's talent, signaled the orchestra to rise in his honor, while the conductor himself applauded. All this bordered on unconditional triumph. Those who had reservations were silent and outnumbered.

It has not always been thus. Mr. Prokofieff, who will be 39 years of age next April 24, has already been for a considerable period a storm centre of modern music. Fifteen years ago, with the "Scythian" Suite already to his credit, he was the terrible infant of contemporaneous composition. When he came to America for the first time he took much castigation from the press, but he always had a lesser or greater number of fanatical admirers, and there were not lacking those willing to take up cudgels for him. What more does a composer need for fame? Mr. Prokofieff may or may not be a great composer of tomorrow. We don't know about tomorrow, and shall not try to. At present he occupies a position before the public for which less sincere composers would be willing to resort to any trick or make any sacrifice. He is a figure, and conspicuous in the musical talk of the day.

There is no question that his music is of contemporaneous inspiration, in spite of the intentional, if not deliberate, barbarisms of the "Scythian" Suite. Tribal ceremonies, rid sacrifices, dances, lamentations, fighting and salute to the rising of the sun—these things may emanate from atavistic sources in the subconsciousness of the composer, but they are as modern as Flaubert. The battle with the Evil God, as portrayed by Prokofieff, is as impersonal and as metallic as the battle with the armed elephants in "Salammbo." And just as the characters in "Salammbo" are figures and not characters, men as yet only a few centuries removed from beasts, therefore only capable of action and unaware of the conscious reasonings and emotions of men, so is this music hieratic and unemotional, done in hard surfaces, savage without awe or fear, since its existence has nothing to do with these feelings. There is force, severity and hugeness of line, and a feeling of terror before the presence of unknown things. It is the spirit of this unemotional music saves pages already old-fashioned in workmanship, in rhythmical methods and formal character, and music not wholly sufficient unto itself since there are purely reiterative and repetitive measures which cannot actually dance, and would be in their real place as accompaniment of the dance.

But the final pages—those depicting the sunrise, with the harmonies that shatter like the points of a thousand spears against the sustained chords of the trumpets, are—if not misusing the greates—among the most significant pages of recent musical literature. These things were imposed upon the listener in the most emotional way by the masterly performance of Mr. Koussevitsky and men. It is hard to believe that Prokofieff has ever had a more excellent interpretation.

The piano concerto is more advanced and more absolutely musical in intention than the early suite. It is pure musical form. The first movement has lyrical ideas which are clear, melodic and of a flowing quality, and they are subjected to masterful and astonishing treatment. The later movements are stretches in part symmetrical and conventional in form. They are worked out largely on the basis of rhythm, and contrapuntal devices are also employed. There is little of a lyrical nature after the first movement. The second, as the program book states, is a kind of "moto perpetuo for the two hands playing against the orchestral part, the whole having the effect of a rapid technical etude.

There is the insistence upon so-called "pure" form, rhythm, design. As a matter of fact, for a record of a first hearing, this writer finds many of these purely formal ideas purely monotonous and undistinguished. He finds commonplace figures overworked; variation, frequently ingenious, but in the end monotonous, rather than development of germinal motives; a good deal of banality and not very much musical fertility or intensity. Mr. Prokofieff, for his part, played the piano with ample technic and tonal power, and with the rhythmical pulse so essential to this music.

Prokofieff was introduced with an air of innocence with Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," which Mr. Koussevitzky's men have played more than once, and, in the past, very well in this city. The concerto was followed by three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat." They are lively but commonplace by the side of the same composer's score of "Amor Brujo" and there is obvious indebtedness to one Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff. A fascinating concert, whatever its pros and cons, with the novelty of material that so many orchestral concerts in New York lack, and a standard of orchestral virtuosity which has not been surpassed, if it has been equalled, this Winter in New York City.

Schubert, Strauss And Koussevitzky

YESTERDAY afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra played the third of the concerts of the Tuesday afternoon series. Two composers stood upon the program. Two numbers each contributed. From Schubert we heard music from "Rosamunde," the overture and first ballet (the first ballet is the popular movement that the public best knows). From Schubert we heard also the two movements which go by the title, "Unfinished Symphony." From Schubert to Richard Strauss, and the two tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration," and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Listening to the overture to "Rosamunde" it is easy to believe the remark attributed to Schubert when questioned as to what his method of composition might be. Schubert is said to have replied, "When I have finished one piece I start another." For "piece" substitute "theme" and the applicability of the remark to the overture becomes apparent. For with inventive profusion Schubert allows theme after theme to follow each other. Some are songful after the glorious manner in which Schubert writes melodies. Others are rhythmical after the enticing manner in which Schubert pens intriguing rhythms. The ballet is of course all rhythm—charming rhythm. And Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the almost hackneyed music was no less than revelation.

Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Schubert's symphony in B minor is long familiar to all. In the symphony Schubert is all melody, and Dr. Koussevitzky makes Schubertian melody sing, soulfully, expressively, or brightly and gayly—but always it sings. And this song one must agree is the essence of the work.

After an intermission Strauss. Once again—possibly many in this Tuesday audience for the first time—we followed the trials of the soul through the pangs of dissolution, on the way to transfiguration. We follow the doomed invalid through the beginnings of the death struggle. At once we hear the death rattle in his throat. Plainly as a picture the music suggests the pallor of the sick one's ghastly smile. Then there are tumultous measures of struggle. But there is too much resistance. Not yet will the flow of life-blood in veins and arteries cease. Death must yet wait a moment. But the struggle exhausts the victim. He seems to dream. His life passes before him in review. He thinks of childhood, he recalls the awakening of youth, he is stirred again to the idealism of his strong manhood. He would transform the evil of the world. But such thoughts are too exhausting. They bring the struggle of the death-bed with renewed fury. And the gong strikes. The soul is on its way. Death has won another victory. But wait. What life would not bring, death at once offers: the transfiguration theme in all its glory is the subject of this last section. That the story is magnificently treated by Strauss ha long been matter of common knowledge. But one may also begin to ask, "How would the music sound to one did he not know the program?" Dr. Koussevitzky is excellent interpreter for Strauss. He is graphic with the many details. He warmly and triumphantly outlines the Transfiguration theme. The whole stands forth with great vividness.

Continued on Following Page

Schubert, Strauss And Koussevitzky

Continued from Preceding Page

Vividness. At once one repeats the word, for it is in itself perfect characterization of the playing of Strauss's other tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." Here a program is an accessory. One would as soon hear the tone-poem had one nothing more than the title—in fact one has for program precious little more. It is a piece of "merry pranks;" that is sufficient. And pranks, roguish pranks, the orchestra is playing from beginning to end. Perhaps it is even playing one more prank than Eulenspiegel himself, perhaps it is playing a prank on him in the way it pictures his death on the gallows. Who knows?—Two Straussian deaths here, and what a world of difference!

A. H. M.

Days of the Symphony
Rush Said to Be Numbered

Transcript Feb 7 (?) '20

THERE'S a peculiar fascination about going "rush" to the Friday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At first blush, the necessity of dawdling for an hour or more on the cold steps, sprinting up the two flights to the second balcony, and whiling away the interlude until the concert begins, would not appear to hold especial allure—yet there are old-timers who tell you with sparkling eyes that they have been coming for over forty years; they remember the early laurels of Melba and Paderewski, they rushed when Geraldine Farrar came back from Europe, and the champing Symphony line reached to the children's hospital!

I'm inclined to think the initial intoxication of rushing belongs to the fresh air, and particularly to those challenging winter winds that swirl up Huntington avenue. Old hands come fortified with sweaters and steamer rugs, composing themselves on the steps with book or knitting as informally as if on the deck of a transatlantic liner. Others, less wise and less well acclimated, stamp newspapers into a pulp, and blow stertorously into their gloves in a vain endeavor to keep blood circulating in outlying members. The casual initiates warm themselves in near-by drug stores until the moment when a sapient eye warns them that a longer deferment would mean disaster.

Wedged between his fellow-men, the student of faces is in clover. His eye roves excitedly up and down the lines, he listens to intimate conversations, better than anything in the theater, piped obligingly into his very ear-drum. He sees hatless students with long noses and short jackets, armed with bulging music cases, foreign-looking youths with black hair flung back with studied carelessness, a sprinkling of natty young blades in coon overcoats—Davidson fans from Harvard probably—who smoke incessantly, exchanging reminiscences of Europe in accents notably Oxfordian.

He meets the vague blue orbs of numerous frustrate females, wearing harmless expressions and woolen stockings. Their hats are always a little crushed, there is a purplish tensity about the gills, and they are always maneuvering to catch the eye of some "really nice" man, with whom they may scrape a romantic acquaintance.

There will be a smattering of girl students of Russo-Jewish persuasion, a few sleek, slightly pompous music professors, with high voices and curly hair, and, of course, the old guard, without whom the Symphony steps would be a waste land—Brownie, blue-hatted church organist from Hanson, and her two cronies, perched in a nook of the chilly facade. (Brownie can be heard in monologue with ominous head shakings, "And I sez to him, if you'd a kep her warm, she'd a been alive today.") There is the witchlike dame wrinkled as a walnut, with rose-chenille turban and red schoolbag embroidered in gold leaf; the large lady in the mustard trench-coat, and hat a la Dickens, said creation resting on her nose "en avant" and borne heavenward in the rear by a bun big as a football. The dark student with slanting forehead and no hat, with a little knob of oily hair out of which protrudes a strand like a rooster's tail! She is studying with Slonimsky. There is the girl in black plush and silver laurel, the old lady with countenance meek, round and waxy as a plaster-of-Paris moon, the pale youth with hooked nose and Fasciti hat, and the pretty bareheaded girl with pink cheeks and blue tweed suit, who spells him on his cigarette.

Almost everyone brings a book or magazine and the literary level is astonishingly high. Snitzler, Spengler, Strachey, Gide—these are the merest commonplaces—one remarks within the range of an eye Willa Cather's Archbishop, Dusty Answer, Why Be a Mudturtle?, It's a Great War, Swan's Way, and A Hoosier Schoolmaster. French masterpieces of fiction and philosophy are the particular stock-in-trade of the students.

When Ravel Conducted

The vanguard of the rushers arrives at noon—or even earlier if there is to be a famous soloist. When Ravel conducted last year, the line at twelve-thirty had already turned the corner of Massachusetts avenue. On such gala days suspense makes the crowd more than ordinarily sociable. Neighbors exchange conjectures as to the prospects of getting in; old timers nod complacently, indicating that one is "all right." The linesman with a sharp eye out for "crashers" grudgingly admits that you have a fighting chance. You stand first on one foot and then another, nervously but hopefully, as the long minutes to one-thirty run their course.

Once inside, the tedious waiting is instantly forgotten. You clap your half dollar on the table, snatch a program and streak up the two flights of stairs to the balcony as fast as your somewhat numbed limbs will allow. You slip your hat and coat into a vacant seat in the most advantageous position yet unclaimed, and downward again you speed to the second floor lunchroom and the luncheon line.

Here all is chatter and relaxation after the chilly hours in the wind. Obliging little music students assist you in your choice of coffee, tea in glass cups, egg, ham or salmon sandwiches, doughnuts or brownies. Hugging your tray, you hurry out to the stairs—the little tables are always crowded—and with your lunch set on the landing, you crouch, munching, reading, exchanging comments with friends and neighbors. The air streams with sun motes and dust, programs rustle, there is a constant obbligato of talk and laughter, clouds of cigarette smoke and no little flirting among the vivacious young students. Everyone is happy, easy, friendly, pleasantly expectant. In a surprisingly short time the bell rings, you scuttle up to your seat, the doors close, the conductor enters and the concert begins.

But what a fillip to the solid nourishment of the orchestra this approach has given you—in what a genial "let-down" mood you find yourself, the perfect mood in which to soak up music. The people about you are as eager for the treat as yourself—to see their illumined faces as they lean forward is to share their own enveloping ardor.

In the last few years the two front rows of second balcony seats have been given over to subscribers, and the ranks of the rushers thereby appreciably thinned. It is rumored that next season the entire second balcony will be sold. Then the glow, the friendliness, the fun of that crusade to the concerts will end, as it has ended in other cities. With it will go something elusive and picturesque—a zest, a joyousness, an anxiety which now make the spurt to the second balcony well worth the trouble.

Transcript, Feb. 7 (?) '20

The Pipes of Pan?

Agnes C. at the Symphony,
So soaked with smoke she cannot see
That smoke is surely bound to be
Now girls are bobbed and girls are free
To smoke their fill at Symphony.

To stop all this why can't they chew
The rag or gum, or serge would do?
They surely would if they but knew
How many smelt the smoking few,
How clothes just reeked all thru and thru—
It's true, they'd chew, if they but knew How Agnes felt.

E. PLURIBUS UNUM.

Herald Feb 12

Butting in the Bathtub

Top o' the Morning:

I have noticed at least two letters, both from ladies, complaining of smokers at the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. May I add a word from the man's side. Each Saturday when I take my bath, after the Symphony, I find numerous cigarette stubs in my whiskers and hair. Once I found a cigar butt. However, this might have gotten in the day before when I was in a smoking car on the New Haven. If smoke clings to the gossamer gowns of ladies, just think of whiskers, and when one considers the fire hazard it seems time something was done. HAIRSUTIS.

DEBUSSY WORKS BY SYMPHONY

Radcliffe and Cecilia Societies Assist Hub Orchestra

Herald Feb 15

Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have given Boston audiences distinctive and interesting musical fare during the current season. Each ensuing concert holds its surprise. Each succeeding week the performance reaches greater heights, and we again rejoice that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has reached and surpassed its former excellence.

Yesterday afternoon, in conjunction with the Radcliffe Choral Society, the Cecilia Society, Mme. Ritter-Ciampi and Jean MacDonald, the orchestra turned its attention to an entire Debussy program.

For the first time at the Boston concerts the mystery play of Gabriele d'Annunzio, "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" was given in its entirety. A program note sets forth that when the great Italian poet asked Debussy to compose music for his tragic and beautiful play, the composer was thrown "into a fever, so happy and proud was I to illustrate in music M. D'Annunzio's work."

Surely nothing more exquisitely moving has come from his pen. Symbolic of the greatest of Christian martyrs, rich in pictorial suggestion, delicately etched or broadly and boldly outlined, this great music reveals throughout the deep significance of its subject matter.

The score holds technical complexities for conductor, soloists, and chorus. Yet so thoroughly skilled Dr. Koussevitzky, so superbly trained the Cecilia Society under Arthur Fiedler, and such a complete and sympathetic understanding for the work in hand, that yesterday's performance was sheer perfection from the opening "Court of Lilies," to the exuberant hallelujas of the closing "Paradise."

Mme. Ritter-Ciampi, soloist for both numbers on the program, displayed a voice of unusually beautiful quality. It is not a powerful soprano, and yet its sweetness and fullness were at all times equal to the demands of the exacting score.

"The Blessed Damozel," after the lyric poem of Rossetti, with the Radcliffe Choral society, conducted by G. Wallace Woodworth, carrying the choral parts, made up the first half of the program. Here again the music was the lovelier because of the masterly manner in which Dr. Koussevitzky presented it to us. Mme. Ritter-Ciampi and Jean Macdonald shared the solo parts with Miss Macdonald's deeply rich and resonant alto in effective contrast.

There was no detail lacking, as there never is with the orchestra at its present degree of perfection, to make yesterday's concert one of the most memorable of the season.

Special Concert Series At Symphony Hall, Boston

Brahms Festival Next Month Will Feature Many of German Master's Greatest Works—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Several Choral Societies, and Soloists, Will Take Part

A SPECIAL series of concerts, in which the principal orchestral, choral and chamber works of Johannes Brahms will be played, is announced for Symphony hall, Boston, in March, according to Musical America, in March. The Brahms festival will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee club, and the Radcliffe Choral society. Assisting artists will be Arthur Schnabel, noted pianist, who is to come from Europe especially for the occasion; Margaret Matzenauer, Jeannette Vreeland and Fraser Gange, as singers to take solo parts; and the Burgin String quartet.

There will be four special concerts, on Sunday afternoon, March 23, and the evenings of March 24, 25 and 26. On Sunday, Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the Second Pianoforte concerto, and the Fourth Symphony will be played. Works to be heard are: On Monday, "A Song of Destiny," and "A German Requiem"; on Tuesday, a chamber program including a violin sonata, the "Liebeslieder" for mixed chorus, a group of pianoforte numbers, and the quintet; and on Wednesday, the Rhapsody for alto, chorus and orchestra; the First Piano concerto, and the First Symphony. At the concerts of the previous Friday and Saturday, March 21 and 22, the "Academic Festival" Overture, and the Second and Third Symphonies will be played.

The series of four concerts is now being subscribed for by means of the automatic subscription board at Symphony hall.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS
REPUBLICAN

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Minister of Finland in Boston for Concert Today.

The Minister of Finland, Mr. Astrom, left Washington last evening for Boston, where this afternoon he will attend the Boston Symphony concert of Finnish music, with Mr. Serge Koussevitsky as conductor. In returning to Washington he will stop for a brief visit in New York and will be in the Capital the first of the week.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Tuesday afternoon series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Overture to "Rosamunde" and the first Ballet, also the "Unfinished" Symphony; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration" and "The Eulenspiegel."

The music from Schubert's music for the half-crazed Wilhelmine von Chezy's drama reminds one of his little success when he attempted to write operas and of his lack of taste in choosing librettos and poems for many of his songs. His musical nature was pre-eminently lyrical. In some of his songs he showed uncommon dramatic force, but not in his operas, and though there have been attempts in recent years to revive one or two of them—even with a new libretto—they have obtained only a respectful hearing. He was as indifferent in transferring the overture for one opera to another as the great Rossini. Take this overture to "Rosamunde": it first prefaced a melodrama; later "Rosamunde," also his operetta, "Der Vierjaehrige Posten," while the overture that really belonged to "Rosamunde" afterward served "Alfonso and Estrella."

When Liszt revived this opera at Weimar the overture then performed was one by Rubinstein—Liszt wrote in a hifalutin manner of Schubert's failures on the operatic stage. "His sublime Muse with gaze fixed ever in the clouds, preferred to cast her azure mantle over asphodel fields, woods and mountains, and was unversed in the artificial raiment in which the dramatic muse moves cautiously between curtain and footlights. His winged strophes took alarm at the rattle of machinery and revolving wheels," and so on, and so on.

The overture to "Rosamunde" was written hurriedly and in the prevailing Italian form of that day. The music is melodious, but it is in the charming ballet music that the true Schubert is revealed. This and the symphony were finely performed.

It was good to hear the two tone-poems of Strauss in close intraposition and so brilliantly played. When "Death and Transfiguration" was first heard in New York, a prominent critic in New York spoke of it as a charnel-house piece. When "Till Eulenspiegel" was produced in Boston, a scholarly critic wrote that it was the work of a madman, while a musician of high standing and fame said Strauss's tone-poems, they are not music; they belong to another and new art. Brethren, we should watch our steps in 1930, lest we stumble and fall, to the amusement of men in 1960.

Of the two-tone poems played yesterday, "Till" is indisputably the greater work. It is more personally Strauss himself. "Death and Transfiguration," however masterly the performance, has not the amazing vitality of "Till Eulenspiegel," in which the genius of the composer shines triumphantly. The fever of the dying man in the other tone poem no longer excites the anxiety of those in the sick room; his sentimental recollections when he is not delirious, no longer affect those standing by his bed; only in the transfiguration section does the structural proficiency of the composer, his building with material that in itself is not remarkable, compel admiration. The performance of the Rondo—for such in effect "Till" is, was amazingly brilliant, showing as it did the incomparable elasticity and euphony that this orchestra has attained under Dr. Koussevitzky.

The next concert of the series will be on Feb. 25.

MUSIC BODY NAMED FOR TERCENTENARY

State Committee Includes Koussevitsky—Headed by Leo R. Lewis

Appointment of a state tercentenary music committee headed by Leo Rich Lewis and including Serge Koussevitsky and others prominently identified with music was announced yesterday by the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary commission.

The committee comprises: Chairman, Leo Rich Lewis, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, George W. Chadwick, Bainbridge Crist, Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, Archibald T. Davison, Mrs. Anita Davis-Chase, William Arms Fisher, Arthur Foote, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Wallace Goodrich, Courtenay Guild, Herbert J. Gurney, Edward B. Hill, N. Penrose Hallowell, James R. Houghton, Serge Koussevitsky, Malcolm Lang, John P. Marshall, Mrs. William Lowell Putnam, John A. O'Shea, Walter R. Spalding, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Thompson Stone, Frederick W. Benker, secretary.

Members of the executive committee are: Leo Rich Lewis, Archibald T. Davison, Wallace Goodrich, N. Penrose Hallowell, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mrs. Anita Davis-Chase.

The committee was appointed to take charge of the musical features of two celebrations, one historical and the other literary in character, which are projected by the commission. It is probable also that the committee will seek the approval of the commission for two

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

Music Event

By HAROLD A.

KOUSSEVITSKY HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its third visit of the season to Brooklyn last night thereby effecting the lone break in the Friday evening schedule which seems to be their allotment.

Serge Koussevitsky prepared a Russian-Spanish program and once more gave Brooklynites an opportunity to hear an exponent of the young Slavic school for, as the assisting soloist, he presented Serge Prokofieff. The latter responded by offering for what is probably the first time in New York his second piano concerto in G Minor.

The symphony of the evening was the Tschaikovsky No. 6 while three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat" rounded out a brief program.

Since the "new" work was the Prokofieff, attention should be centered primarily upon that. This reviewer, however, cannot pass over the Koussevitsky reading of the Tschaikovsky which was last heard here some weeks back when the recently-departed Willem Mengelberg offered it with the Philharmonic at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The reading last night was solely Russian. And as one regards the Koussevitsky interpretation, one can readily see why the world premiere of the No. 6 in the then St. Petersberg "fell flat," according to the composer's brother Modeste. Granting it is a tragic work in itself, and especially so when one regards the events immediately following its premiere, the fact nevertheless remains that it is not the gloomy, foreboding score that the Boston conductor gave us last night. Mr. Koussevitsky evidently was attempting to stress the poignancy of his final contribution of the gigantic Russian who feared what has been called 'the iniquity of oblivion," who rewrote and rewrote this symphony, and who strove to achieve the greatness which was already his, though he believed it not.

The symphony is too familiar to orchestral followers to need any extended discussion of its "program" here, yet last night it appeared as though Mr. Koussevitsky knew but one aspect of it, the gloomy and despairing side, as Peter set himself down to describe the futility of life and the finality of the death that must come.

Tempi, coloration, melodic line, all of these were treated by the conductor with this one end in view. And he succeeded in making the evening naught but one of gloom and despair.

In the midst of such atmosphere, the Prokofieff work was offered, although the intermission intervened. The composer was at the piano for this work, which presented the Russian school in the new light of superficialities, though spirited ones at that. The concerto is in four movements, the first a mere listless grouping of cadenzas strictly in the modern vein.

It is followed by a scherzo which is but a moto perpetuo, as Mr. Hale points out in his informative program notes, wherein both hands of the soloist flit about to an orchestral accompaniment.

In the intermezzo, Mr. Prokofieff remembers that another Russian pianist wrote a certain prelude which has been battered from pillar to post by all sorts of players. Its principal theme haunts his mind as he tries to conceive this new movement in quasi-classical style.

And in the finale, Mr. Prokofieff recollects also a Polish pianist who is regarded as the originator of pianoforte technique. But the Russian is a member of the modernistic school and needs must not desert this classification.

After the forbidding Russian opening, the Prokofieff presented the other extreme — shallowness. Mr. Koussevitsky considerately abided by the ideas of the composer whose presence necessitated this.

The de Falla dances added a touch of lightness yet the air of the Tschaikovsky remained.

fternoon of Debussy and St. Sebastian

Signs and Miracles, a Visitor, Radcliffe and a Cecilia Revitalized

Trans Feb 15

MIRACLE! Miracle!—Thus the d'Annunzian crowd cries at this or that occurrence connected with their saint. A "sign" they repeatedly demand. With such words in mind, one began unconsciously to connect them with what took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Then and there, through the greater part of two hours, was played and sung music of the late Claude Achilles Debussy; music, further, in which there could be no opportunity for humor or levity; music on the one hand to deepen and to amplify and to enhance the peculiar type of beauty to be found in a poem of one of the pre-Raphaelite brotherhood of painters and poets, Dante Gabriel Rossetti; music on the other hand to set an atmosphere for the passion, the ecstasy, the mystic translation of a great martyr. Those there were who had whispered that a whole afternoon of music so circumscribed in emotional range would turn to monotony. Boredom would result. Debussy is excellent, one could hear, but an entire afternoon of him, with scant variety of subject, will be too much. And yet, in the actual even, faces remained rapt, attitudes attentive. The number of those who departed early—to suburbia—was not large; and more noiselessly than sometimes, they whisked themselves out of the room.——More. There were five divisions in the music after the intermission. But not a soul offered to clap hands. Too deeply did the spell hold, that spell wrought by music just heard; too eager was this audience for what was to come. No wonder that one who knew that he must make words about the things going on about him, began to find emerging from his sub-consciousness the scenes in which the cry "Miracle" is heard. For, that this amount of music of this narrow emotional range should work with this high degree of effectiveness, bordered indeed on the miraculous. —The doubters had their sign.

There is a host of new things to relate. A masterpiece, Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," was receiving its first complete hearing in these parts; a notable singer, Madame Ritter Ciampi, was making her American début; a revitalized choral society with an honorable past, the Cecilia, was being put to the test for the first time under a new regime; a group of singers usually heard in conjunction with others was being heard freshly "on its own," the Radcliffe Choral Society, singing Debussy's setting of Rossetti's "The Blessed Damozel"; a soloist in a minor part, Miss MacDonald, almost submerged in the wealth of matters demanding attention, who might have fared better had it been possible for a little more of this attention to come her way.

The afternoon was divided, then, between a Debussy just out of his student years and a Debussy just about to round out a lifetime of as original creative work as the world has yet seen. "The Blessed Damozel" was written while he was in Italy as a "prix de Rome"; "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" is considered by some his last really great work. Rossetti, reading with a thrill Edgar Allan Poe's supreme treatment of the grief of a love here on earth, determined (as might have been expected of him) to voice "the yearning of the loved one in heaven." Thus the damozel in her heaven, adorned only as Mary the Virgin would have her adorned, pours out chastely but warmly her soul in anticipation of the lover who will follow her to this heaven. But her speech must end in the mild sadness of "All this is when he comes"—and vague smiles—and tears. The very words are chosen for the music of their sound. And the young Debussy, meditating in his sunny Italy upon the evils in the world of music (as young people are wont to do) decided upon an ideal not too far removed from that of the pre-Raphaelites. He seized upon Rossetti's poem. Its deliciousness was his, became clothed with a like quality of tone. Yesterday afternoon it lived again as it is not often given a work to receive living tone. It could not have been more fortunate in its chorus. The freshness of tone of the young ladies from Radcliffe, the virginal purity of that tone seemed as if made for this music. And other qualities were by no means lacking—flexibility of voice, beauty of shading and nuance, perfection of intonation and of enunciation; not possibly could Mr. Woodworth's youngsters have scored higher than they did yesterday.

Add to them Madame Ritter-Ciampi with the words of the damozel. Here is a voice the crystalline purity it would be worth going miles to hear. (Indeed, one may invert and say that this voice came many miles so that we could hear it. And with the voice is a simplicity, an artless directness and sincerity that makes it the voice par excellence for the unrhetoric Debussy. If one must (or may) mention a lack it would be lack of volume. Of beauty, of oneness with the music, there can be no question. Nor must Miss Jean MacDonald, singing the alto solo parts of the "narrator" in Rossetti's poem, go without words of praise. No mere damning "adequate" need be her lot. Beauty of voice, understanding of the spirit of text and music, she brought to her measures.

The story of "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" of d'Annunzio and of Debussy, of Ida Rubinstein and of Leon Bakst, has been told too fully in these pages to require or justify repetition. In "the Court of Lilies" Sebastian fortifies the faith of two brothers condemned to columns to await their fate; by his sincerity converts their father and mother and sisters; performs the miracle of dancing upon a bed of live coals, exclaiming the while that he is dancing upon lilies. In the "Magic Chamber," surrounded by all the soothsayers and sorcerors of Paganism, he hears the story of a woman of the world who carried from the tomb of Christ the shroud in which he lay; witnesses her translation. In the court of the emperor before the whole "Council of False Gods" he makes his own confession of Christ, defies the emperor, and dances his "Dance of the High Drama of the Son of Man." Before "the Wounded Laurel" he is shot through and through with arrows at the command of the emperor, but lives and enters "Paradise" singing there with Apostles and Martyrs, with Virgins and with Angels, with the company of All the Saints.

It is mystery as well as miracle that this music does not bring monotony. Within a single group of closely related moods it holds itself with but few exceptions. Those exceptions are the short and curiously dissonant dance on the bed of coals, the martial prelude to "the Council of False Gods" (played almost entirely by brass), one or two short choruses of praise in this same act, the final choruses of glorification. All the remainder is music that relates to suffering. It may be of the beauty of the fortitude of Christian martyrs, as in the prelude to the first act and much of the rest of that act—yet it relates to suffering. It may be the music of sympathy of choruses of women as Sebastian (Act III) tells of the passion and death and resurrection of Christ; or as, in the same act, he mimes the dance of ecstatic anguish of that passion—it relates similarly. It may be the music of his own passion, as arrows strike him, as he supposedly passes from this earth; or again, through the same act, music of lamenting women, bewailing the fate of their beautiful "Adonis"—the relation is still the same: suffering. Probably no composer has ever thus consistently, in a long work, maintained a single mood or group of related moods, without causing that work to suffer the supreme penalty, unless it be Debussy himself in his "Pelleas and Melisande." And more, the somber, poignant mood is one of the most dangerous that a composer could possibly have chosen thus to sustain. Easier to fall into boredom with it than with almost any mood that could be actively rhythmed. But a Friday audience kept waiting for more!

As fortunte was this masterpiece of Debussy in its performance as was his earlier work. If Madame Ritter-Ciampi seemed ide l for the youthful Debussy toying with the smooth felicities of a Rossetti, she was revelation for the Debussy putting the best of his mature self into the mystery play of d'Annunzio. The lightness of her voice seemed of the essence of the character of Sebastian. For Sebastian is no hero of flesh and blood, of bulk and brawn; Sebastian's heroisms are all of the spirit, heroisms of another world.

The chorus of the Cecilia Society was no less than revelation in itself. Report had it that Mr. Fiedler had weeded out mercilessly where that process was needed, that he had been able to fill the vacancies thus caused, with useful singers. Performance in a difficult music would seem to prove the report correct. The ethereal tones of the Radcliffians, his sopranos did not, could not, have. But for all this lamentation the fuller bodied tone of his ladies was more serviceable in any case. The male contingent also furnished its chorus of laudable sonority and respectable timbre. Ample rehearsal had schooled these singers in the necessary perfections, so that they were able to give to Dr. Koussevitzky what he desired in the way of expressive effect. Slight hesitancy at the beginning of the first chorus was quickly overcome and must be considered entirely negligible.

But what would all this machinery have come to without the proper hand guiding and controlling it? Even as a single mind created it with pen on paper, so a single mind, working upon and through other minds, gave it living voice. Dr. Koussevitzky is master of the long expressive line of subtly blended sonority, of rhythm fluid and flexible. His, after all, is the chief honor in saving this sombre music from boredom, of securing from it and for it, the rapt, eager attention which it received. Next to Debussy, for us here in Boston, he is the creator of this music.

A. H. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

Who Will Help?

While the echoes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's lone concert of the season still linger about the Lyric, it seems an opportune time to start a movement for a regular season of concerts by this organization.

It has been announced that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will not return to this city next season.

This leaves Baltimore with only the Baltimore and Philadelphia Orchestras to gratify our taste for symphonic music.

There is every reason why the Boston Orchestra should give a series of concerts here.

There was a time, not many years ago, when that organization was both a social and a cultural magnet in this city.

Then came the World War, disrupting etsablished customs, and the Boston lost favor here.

Baltimore music lovers were threatened with an orchestra famine, but a little group of intelligent, public-spirited men and women took the situation in hand, gave strong support to the Philadelphia Orchestra and made it first in the hearts of our music patrons.

Now is the time to do the same thing on behalf of the Boston Orchestra.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Tuesday afternoon series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Overture to "Rosamunde" and the first Ballet, also the "Unfinished" Symphony; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration" and "The Eulenspiegel."

The music from Schubert's music for the half-crazed Wilhelmine von Chezy's drama reminds one of his little success when he attempted to write operas and of his lack of taste in choosing librettos and poems for many of his songs. His musical nature was pre-eminently lyrical. In some of his songs he showed uncommon dramatic force, but not in his operas, and though there have been attempts in recent years to revive one or two of them—even with a new libretto—they have obtained only a respectful hearing. He was as indifferent in transferring the overture for one opera to another as the great Rossini. Take this overture to "Rosamunde": it first prefaced a melodrama; later "Rosamunde," also his operetta, "Der Vierjaehrige Posten," while the overture that really belonged to "Rosamunde" afterward served "Alfonso and Estrella."

When Liszt revived this opera at Weimar the overture then performed was one by Rubinstein—Liszt wrote in a hifalutin manner of Schubert's failures on the operatic stage. "His sublime Muse with gaze fixed ever in the clouds, preferred to cast her azure mantle over asphodel fields, woods and mountains, and was unversed in the artificial raiment in which the dramatic muse moves cautiously between curtain and footlights. His winged strophes took alarm at the rattle of machinery and revolving wheels," and so on, and so on.

The overture to "Rosamunde" was written hurriedly and in the prevailing Italian form of that day. The music is melodious, but it is in the charming ballet music that the true Schubert is revealed. This and the symphony were finely performed.

It was good to hear the two tone-poems of Strauss in close intraposition and so brilliantly played. When "Death and Transfiguration" was first heard in New York, a prominent critic in New York spoke of it as a charnel-house piece. When "Till Eulenspiegel" was produced in Boston, a scholarly critic wrote that it was the work of a madman, while a musician of high standing and fame said Strauss's tone-poems, they are not music; they belong to another and new art. Brethren, we should watch our steps in 1930, lest we stumble and fall, to the amusement of men in 1960.

Of the two-tone poems played yesterday, "Till" is indisputably the greater work. It is more personally Strauss himself. "Death and Transfiguration," however masterly the performance, has not the amazing vitality of "Till Eulenspiegel," in which the genius of the composer shines triumphantly. The fever of the dying man in the other tone poem no longer excites the anxiety of those in the sick room; his sentimental recollections when he is not delirious, no longer affect those standing by his bed; only in the transfiguration section does the structural proficiency of the composer, his building with material that in itself is not remarkable, compel admiration. The performance of the Rondo—for such in effect "Till" is, was amazingly brilliant, showing as it did the incomparable elasticity and euphony that this orchestra has attained under Dr. Koussevitzky.

The next concert of the series will be on Feb. 25.

MUSIC BODY NAMED FOR TERCENTENARY

State Committee Includes Koussevitsky—Headed by Leo R. Lewis

Appointment of a state tercentenary music committee headed by Leo Rich Lewis and including Serge Koussevitsky and others prominently identified with music was announced yesterday by the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary commission.

The committee comprises: Chairman, Leo Rich Lewis, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, George W. Chadwick, Bainbridge Crist, Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, Archibald T. Davison, Mrs. Anita Davis-Chase, William Arms Fisher, Arthur Foote, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Wallace Goodrich, Courtenay Guild, Herbert J. Gurney, Edward B. Hill, N. Penrose Hallowell, James R. Houghton, Serge Koussevitsky, Malcolm Lang, John P. Marshall, Mrs. William Lowell Putnam, John A. O'Shea, Walter R. Spalding, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Thompson Stone, Frederick W. Benker, secretary.

Members of the executive committee are: Leo Rich Lewis, Archibald T. Davison, Wallace Goodrich, N. Penrose Hallowell, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mrs. Anita Davis-Chase.

The committee was appointed to take charge of the musical features of two celebrations, one historical and the other literary in character, which are projected by the commission. It is probable also that the committee will seek the approval of the commission for two

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

Music Event

By HAROLD A.

KOUSSEVITSKY HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its third visit of the season to Brooklyn last night thereby effecting the lone break in the Friday evening schedule which seems to be their allotment.

Serge Koussevitsky prepared a Russian-Spanish program and once more gave Brooklynites an opportunity to hear an exponent of the young Slavic school for, as the assisting soloist, he presented Serge Prokofieff. The latter responded by offering for what is probably the first time in New York his second piano concerto in G Minor.

The symphony of the evening was the Tschaikovsky No. 6 while three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat" rounded out a brief program.

Since the "new" work was the Prokofieff, attention should be centered primarily upon that. This reviewer, however, cannot pass over the Koussevitsky reading of the Tschaikovsky which was last heard here some weeks back when the recently-departed Willem Mengelberg offered it with the Philharmonic at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The reading last night was solely Russian. And as one regards the Koussevitsky interpretation, one can readily see why the world premiere of the No. 6 in the then St. Petersberg "fell flat," according to the composer's brother Modeste. Granting it is a tragic work in itself, and especially so when one regards the events immediately following its premiere, the fact nevertheless remains that it is not the gloomy, foreboding score that the Boston conductor gave us last night. Mr. Koussevitsky evidently was attempting to stress the poignancy of his final contribution of the gigantic Russian who feared what has been called 'the iniquity of oblivion," who rewrote and rewrote this symphony, and who strove to achieve the greatness which was already his, though he believed it not.

The symphony is too familiar to orchestral followers to need any extended discussion of its "program" here, yet last night it appeared as though Mr. Koussevitsky knew but one aspect of it, the gloomy and despairing side, as Peter set himself down to describe the futility of life and the finality of the death that must come.

Tempi, coloration, melodic line, all of these were treated by the conductor with this one end in view. And he succeeded in making the evening naught but one of gloom and despair.

In the midst of such atmosphere, the Prokofieff work was offered, although the intermission intervened. The composer was at the piano for this work, which presented the Russian school in the new light of superficialities, though spirited ones at that. The concerto is in four movements, the first a mere listless grouping of cadenzas strictly in the modern vein.

It is followed by a scherzo which is but a moto perpetuo, as Mr. Hale points out in his informative program notes, wherein both hands of the soloist flit about to an orchestral accompaniment.

In the intermezzo, Mr. Prokofieff remembers that another Russian pianist wrote a certain prelude which has been battered from pillar to post by all sorts of players. Its principal theme haunts his mind as he tries to conceive this new movement in quasi-classical style.

And in the finale, Mr. Prokofieff recollects also a Polish pianist who is regarded as the originator of pianoforte technique. But the Russian is a member of the modernistic school and needs must not desert this classification.

After the forbidding Russian opening, the Prokofieff presented the other extreme — shallowness. Mr. Koussevitsky considerately abided by the ideas of the composer whose presence necessitated this.

The de Falla dances added a touch of lightness yet the air of the Tschaikovsky remained.

fternoon of Debussy and St. Sebastian

Signs and Miracles, a Visitor, Radcliffe and a Cecilia Revitalized

MIRACLE! Miracle!—Thus the d'Annunzian crowd cries at this or that occurrence connected with their saint. A "sign" they repeatedly demand. With such words in mind, one began unconsciously to connect them with what took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Then and there, through the greater part of two hours, was played and sung music of the late Claude Achilles Debussy; music, further, in which there could be no opportunity for humor or levity; music on the one hand to deepen and to amplify and to enhance the peculiar type of beauty to be found in a poem of one of the pre-Raphaelite brotherhood of painters and poets, Dante Gabriel Rossetti; music on the other hand to set an atmosphere for the passion, the ecstasy, the mystic translation of a great martyr. Those there were who had whispered that a whole afternoon of music so circumscribed in emotional range would turn to monotony. Boredom would result. Debussy is excellent, one could hear, but an entire afternoon of him, with scant variety of subject, will be too much. And yet, in the actual even, faces remained rapt, attitudes attentive. The number of those who departed early—to suburbia—was not large; and more noiselessly than sometimes, they whisked themselves out of the room.——More. There were five divisions in the music after the intermission. But not a soul offered to clap hands. Too deeply did the spell hold, that spell wrought by music just heard; too eager was this audience for what was to come. No wonder that one who knew that he must make words about the things going on about him, began to find emerging from his sub-consciousness the scenes in which the cry "Miracle" is heard. For, that this amount of music of this narrow emotional range should work with this high degree of effectiveness, bordered indeed on the miraculous. —The doubters had their sign.

There is a host of new things to relate. A masterpiece, Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," was receiving its first complete hearing in these parts; a notable singer, Madame Ritter Ciampi, was making her American début; a revitalized choral society with an honorable past, the Cecilia, was being put to the test for the first time under a new regime; a group of singers usually heard in conjunction with others was being heard freshly "on its own," the Radcliffe Choral Society, singing Debussy's setting of Rossetti's "The Blessed Damozel"; a soloist in a minor part, Miss MacDonald, almost submerged in the wealth of matters demanding attention, who might have fared better had it been possible for a little more of this attention to come her way.

The afternoon was divided, then, between a Debussy just out of his student years and a Debussy just about to round out a lifetime of as original creative work as the world has yet seen. "The Blessed Damozel" was written while he was in Italy as a "prix de Rome"; "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" is considered by some his last really great work. Rossetti, reading with a thrill Edgar Allan Poe's supreme treatment of the grief of a love here on earth, determined (as might have been expected of him) to voice "the yearning of the loved one in heaven." Thus the damozel in her heaven, adorned only as Mary the Virgin would have her adorned, pours out chastely but warmly her soul in anticipation of the lover who will follow her to this heaven. But her speech must end in the mild sadness of "All this is when he comes"—and vague smiles—and tears. The very words are chosen for the music of their sound. And the young Debussy, meditating in his sunny Italy upon the evils in the world of music (as young people are wont to do) decided upon an ideal not too far removed from that of the pre-Raphaelites. He seized upon Rossetti's poem. Its deliciousness was his, became clothed with a like quality of tone. Yesterday afternoon it lived again as it is not often given a work to receive living tone. It could not have been more fortunate in its chorus. The freshness of tone of the young ladies from Radcliffe, the virginal purity of that tone seemed as if made for this music. And other qualities were by no means lacking—flexibility of voice, beauty of shading and nuance, perfection of intonation and of enunciation; not possibly could Mr. Woodworth's youngsters have scored higher than they did yesterday.

Add to them Madame Ritter-Ciampi with the words of the damozel. Here is a voice the crystalline purity it would be worth going miles to hear. (Indeed, one may invert and say that this voice came many miles so that we could hear it. And with the voice is a simplicity, an artless directness and sincerity that makes it the voice par excellence for the unrhetoric Debussy. If one must (or may) mention a lack it would be lack of volume. Of beauty, of oneness with the music, there can be no question. Nor must Miss Jean MacDonald, singing the alto solo parts of the "narrator" in Rossetti's poem, go without words of praise. No mere damning "adequate" need be her lot. Beauty of voice, understanding of the spirit of text and music, she brought to her measures.

The story of "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" of d'Annunzio and of Debussy, of Ida Rubinstein and of Leon Bakst, has been told too fully in these pages to require or justify repetition. In "the Court of Lilies" Sebastian fortifies the faith of two brothers tried to martyrdoms to await their fate; by his sincerity converts their father and mother and sisters; performs the miracle of dancing upon a bed of live coals, exclaiming the while that he is dancing upon lilies. In the "Magic Chamber," surrounded by all the soothsayers and sorcerors of Paganism, he hears the story of a woman of the world who carried from the tomb of Christ the shroud in which he lay; witnesses her translation. In the court of the emperor before the whole "Council of False Gods" he makes his own confession of Christ, defies the emperor, and dances his "Dance of the High Drama of the Son of Man." Before "the Wounded Laurel" he is shot through and through with arrows at the command of the emperor, but lives and enters "Paradise" singing there with Apostles and Martyrs, with Virgins and with Angels, with the company of All the Saints.

It is mystery as well as miracle that this music does not bring monotony. Within a single group of closely related moods it holds itself with but few exceptions. Those exceptions are the short and curiously dissonant dance on the bed of coals, the martial prelude to "the Council of False Gods" (played almost entirely by brass), one or two short choruses of praise in this same act, the final choruses of glorification. All the remainder is music that relates to suffering. It may be of the beauty of the fortitude of Christian martyrs, as in the prelude to the first act and much of the rest of that act—yet it relates to suffering. It may be the music of sympathy of choruses of women as Sebastian (Act III) tells of the passion and death and resurrection of Christ; or as, in the same act, he mimes the dance of ecstatic anguish of that passion—it relates similarly. It may be the music of his own passion, as arrows strike him, as he supposedly passes from this earth; or again, through the same act, music of lamenting women, bewailing the fate of their beautiful "Adonis"—the relation is still the same: suffering. Probably no composer has ever thus consistently, in a long work, maintained a single mood or group of related moods, without causing that work to suffer the supreme penalty, unless it be Debussy himself in his "Pelleas and Melisande." And more, the somber, poignant mood is one of the most dangerous that a composer could possibly have chosen thus to sustain. Easier to fall into boredom with it than with almost any mood that could be actively rhythmed. But a Friday audience kept waiting for more!

As fortunte was this masterpiece of Debussy in its performance as was his earlier work. If Madame Ritter-Ciampi seemed ideal for the youthful Debussy toying with the smooth felicities of a Rossetti, she was revelation for the Debussy putting the best of his mature self into the mystery play of d'Annunzio. The lightness of her voice seemed of the essence of the character of Sebastian. For Sebastian is no hero of flesh and blood, of bulk and brawn; Sebastian's heroisms are all of the spirit, heroisms of another world.

The chorus of the Cecilia Society was no less than revelation in itself. Report had it that Mr. Fiedler had weeded out mercilessly where that process was needed, that he had been able to fill the vacancies thus caused, with useful singers. Performance in a difficult music would seem to prove the report correct. The ethereal tones of the Radcliffians, his sopranos did not, could not, have. But for all this lamentation the fuller bodied tone of his ladies was more serviceable in any case. The male contingent also furnished its chorus of laudable sonority and respectable timbre. Ample rehearsal had schooled these singers in the necessary perfections, so that they were able to give to Dr. Koussevitzky what he desired in the way of expressive effect. Slight hesitancy at the beginning of the first chorus was quickly overcome and must be considered entirely negligible.

But what would all this machinery have come to without the proper hand guiding and controlling it? Even as a single mind created it with pen on paper, so a single mind, working upon and through other minds, gave it living voice. Dr. Koussevitzky is master of the long expressive line of subtly blended sonority, of rhythm fluid and flexible. His, after all, is the chief honor in saving this sombre music from boredom, of securing from it and for it, the rapt, eager attention which it received. Next to Debussy, for us here in Boston, he is the creator of this music.

A. H. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

Who Will Help?

While the echoes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's lone concert of the season still linger about the Lyric, it seems an opportune time to start a movement for a regular season of concerts by this organization.

It has been announced that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will not return to this city next season.

This leaves Baltimore with only the Baltimore and Philadelphia Orchestras to gratify our taste for symphonic music.

There is every reason why the Boston Orchestra should give a series of concerts here.

There was a time, not many years ago, when that organization was both a social and a cultural magnet in this city.

Then came the World War, disrupting etsablished customs, and the Boston lost favor here.

Baltimore music lovers were threatened with an orchestra famine, but a little group of intelligent, public-spirited men and women took the situation in hand, gave strong support to the Philadelphia Orchestra and made it first in the hearts of our music patrons.

Now is the time to do the same thing on behalf of the Boston Orchestra.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

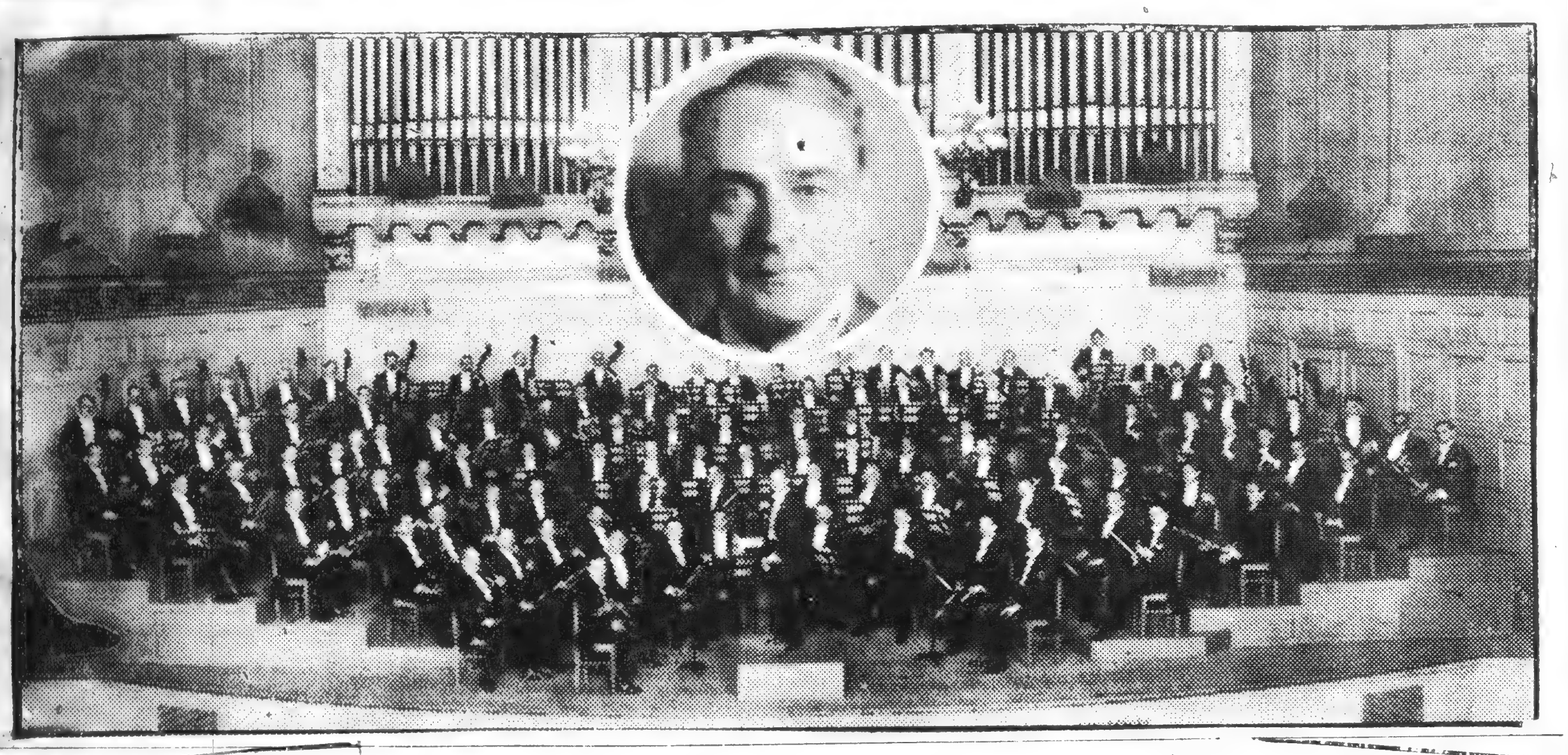
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

48

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

FEB

At Mosque Tomorrow Night— The Boston Symphony Orchestra, below, with Serge Koussevitzky (inset) its famous conductor, weilding the baton, will follow close on the footsteps of the famous American Opera Company, which concluded a week's engagement at the Mosque last week. The Boston orchestra will be presented at the Mosque tomorrow night, beginning at 8:30 o'clock, as the second of a series of offerings by T. Michaux Moody. A large and appreciative audience is expected to hear this famous orchestra.



THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

S. Prokofieff Appears Again

Composer-Pianist Plays with Bostonians.

A sort of Prokofieff festival was the offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening. The Russian composer provided the program with both his "Scythian" suite and his second piano concerto, in G minor. The latter work, a novelty to New York, enlisted his co-operation a soloist.

Votaries of the "Scythian" suite were enabled to enjoy an enormously spirited performance of the work, which Mr. Koussevitzky led with great apparent enthusiasm and the orchestra played magnificently. Those who feel that this once terrifying composition is already dated could at least approve the way in which it was set forth.

The second piano concerto has a history. Composed in the spring of 1913 and performed both in Russia and at Rome, it was lost, save for some sketches of the piano part, when the Soviet government confiscated Mr. Prokofieff's Leningrad apartment. From the sketches he rewrote the concerto in 1923, profiting, naturally, by his more mature technic.

The result is an elaborate work of what now seems a discreetly tempered modernity, some pages of which would be appreciated in any night club. Mr. Prokofieff played the very percussive piano part with quite stunning effect, and the orchestra did its share in admirable fashion. At the conclusion of this work, as well as of the concerto, the great audience gave the composer an ovation.

The concert began with Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" and ended with three dances from Manuel de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat." Mozart's exquisite "serenade" exhibited the brilliance and precision of the Bostonian strings.

P. S.

Boston Symphony Orchestra At Mosque Tomorrow Night

Special Train Will Bring Famous Band and Noted Director to City From Boston; Thousands Expected to Hear Concert at the Mosque

A special train of three Pullman cars and a baggage coach is leaving Boston for Richmond this afternoon and will arrive here tomorrow morning, bearing the 112 musicians comprising the distinguished Boston Symphony Orchestra, their famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and the tour manager. The orchestra will give its annual concert tomorrow night at the Mosque at 8:30 o'clock, presented by T. Michaux Moody as the second offering in his artists' course, tickets for which will be on sale at Walter D. Moses & Co., until 5:30 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, after which the box office will open at the theatre at 7:30 o'clock.

The half-century-old orchestra will draw thousands of music lovers from all sections of Eastern Virginia as well as from this city, for an orchestral concert is different from any other musical attraction and has a large and distinct following. Whenever the Boston orchestra has appeared here it has brought together a large audience of eager listeners, all confident that they are hearing one of the world's really great orchestras that is offering them the best in that type of music.

Serge Koussevitzky has brought his players to Richmond three times before in the five years in which he has held the baton of the Boston, and the performances they have given under his leadership have been phenominal. Ever since the orchestra was founded its players have given all their time to it, and the leaders of each group have been selected from the very best the world has had to offer. The program for the concert tomorrow is thought to have been most happily chosen, for it opens with "Bolero," by Ravel, a composition dedicated to Ida Rubenstein, the famous actress and dancer, and is played in this country only by the Boston orchestra. Then comes Dvorak's beautiful "New World Symphony," which he wrote following a visit to America and which contains many themes based on the Negro spirituals of the old South. Parts of this work are familiar to all music lovers. It will be followed by the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the program will close with the Concerto in D Minor, by Vavaldi.

NEW YORK
JOURNAL

Prokofieff Soloist With Boston Orchestra

Serge Prokofieff arrived in town last night with a bang. It might be said that he also arrived with a boom or two and a whole series of biffs. All of which has to do with his "Scythian" Suite, which was part of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall.

For sheer ear-splitting sound and bicep development in the percussion section, Prokofieff's suite is just about in a class by itself. But, for all of that, the music is not without merit, although merit might be more readily recognized if presented in not quite such voluminous doses.

Mr. Prokofieff appeared as soloist, playing his Concerto in G Minor. The work, written seventeen years ago and restored after it had been lost in the Bolshevik upheaval in Russia, was given its first American presentation.

Serge Koussevitzky, who was at the conductor's stand, opened the concert with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." Three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," concluded the programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

MUSIC WITH A KICK

THOSE fortunate enough to hear the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Wednesday night saw a strange sight. They saw dainty gloved and bejeweled hands waved in the air as a sign of approval to Mr. Koussevitzky and his gifted gang. And what evoked this unusual demonstration, accompanied by thunderous applause, was a work new to Baltimore—Ravel's "Bolero."

Maurice Ravel, pianist-composer, and probably the greatest musical genius of present-day France, has done big things before. His "Spanish Rhapsody" is a shadowy, fantastic, almost Goyesque work which attracted much attention when it was first presented in this country some six or eight years ago.

Ravel has an almost diabolical faculty for taking a simple theme and embellishing and decorating it with that deft, Gallic humor that inspires a French chef to put panties on a lamb chop. In "Bolero" he has taken a barbaric Spanish dance form and, without changing the time or theme, built up an overpowering piece of orchestration.

Starting as a murmur, scarcely heard, it increases in volume as first one and then another instrument takes up the weird strain until it becomes a mighty roar and ends with a crash that lifts you from your seat. It grips you like the pounding of the tom-toms in "Emperor Jones." It gets into your bones and marrow. You find yourself wondering what is coming next. You know the theme and rhythm—it rings in your ears for hours after the concert—but you are puzzled to know in what form it is coming to you next.

No wonder sedate dowagers waved their hands and dour-visaged baldheads pounded their chubby palms together. I wanted to stand on my seat and yell. The Communists are missing a good bet. They ought to adopt "Bolero" for their international anthem. As has been said of certain brands of bootleg liquor, that "tune" would make a rabbit spit in a bulldog's face.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

Brahms Festival in March

A week of special concerts in which the principal orchestral, choral and chamber works of Brahms will be played, is to be given March 21-26, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall, Boston.

The Brahms Festiyal will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; the Hargard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Artur Schnabel, the famous German pianist who holds a particular fame in the music of particular fame in the music of Brahms and who will come from Europe for the occasion; the singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Jeanette Vreeland and Fraser Gange, and the Burgin String Quartet.

On Sunday afternoon, March 23, and the evenings of March 24, 25 and 26, there will be given the First and Fourth Symphonies, the two pianoforte concertos, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the "Song of Destiny" and "German Requiem," the "Liebeslieder," Rhapsody (alto and male chorus), Violin Sonata and Quintet in F minor.

At the concerts of the previous Friday and Saturday, March 21 and 22, the "Academic Festival" Overture, and the Second and Third Symphonies will be played. This pair of concerts, however, is not included in the subscription series, since they are already fully subscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM POST

Music

By OSCAR THOMPSON

AS SOLOIST and composer of half the program, Serge Prokofieff had the lion's share of attention in Carnegie Hall last night when the Boston Symphony returned for the third of its evening concerts. The tall Russian was first summoned from the wings to accept the plaudits bestowed upon his "Sythian" Suite and later was even more generously applauded for his performance with the orchestra of his Second Piano Concerto in C minor. Both works are products of the younger Prokofieff, though the Concerto, originally composed in 1913, when he was twenty-two, was rewritten six years ago in the light of the composer's increased technical resources. It possesses Prokofieff's characteristic dexterity and was as dexterously played, making its effect not by virtue of its material but chiefly through its propulsive momentum.

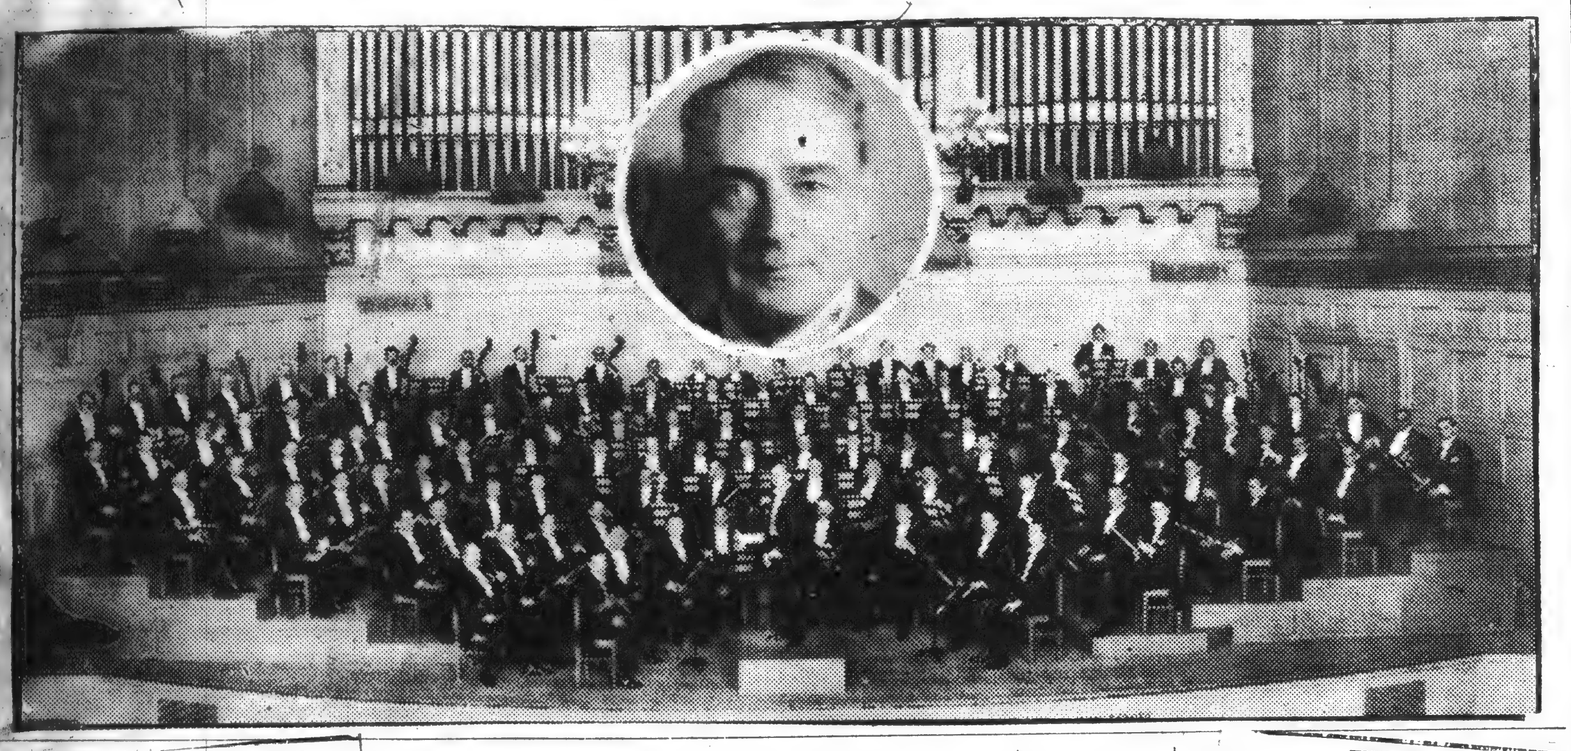
Mr. Koussevitzky conducted a brilliant performance of the "Scythian" Suite and made hugely and boisterously colorful the three dances excerpted from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" ballet.

48

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

FEB

At Mosque Tomorrow Night— The Boston Symphony Orchestra, below, with Serge Koussevitzky (inset) its famous conductor, weilding the baton, will follow close on the footsteps of the famous American Opera Company, which concluded a week's engagement at the Mosque last week. The Boston orchestra will be presented at the Mosque tomorrow night, beginning at 8:30 o'clock, as the second of a series of offerings by T. Michaux Moody. A large and appreciative audience is expected to hear this famous orchestra.



THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

S. Prokofieff Appears Again

Composer-Pianist Plays with Bostonians.

A sort of Prokofieff festival was the offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening. The Russian composer provided the program with both his "Scythian" suite and his second piano concerto, in G minor. The latter work, a novelty to New York, enlisted his co-operation a soloist.

Votaries of the "Scythian" suite were enabled to enjoy an enormously spirited performance of the work, which Mr. Koussevitzky led with great apparent enthusiasm and the orchestra played magnificently. Those who feel that this once terrifying composition is already dated could at least approve the way in which it was set forth.

The second piano concerto has a history. Composed in the spring of 1913 and performed both in Russia and at Rome, it was lost, save for some sketches of the piano part, when the Soviet government confiscated Mr. Prokofieff's Leningrad apartment. From the sketches he rewrote the concerto in 1923, profiting, naturally, by his more mature technic.

The result is an elaborate work of what now seems a discreetly tempered modernity, some pages of which would be appreciated in any night club. Mr. Prokofieff played the very percussive piano part with quite stunning effect, and the orchestra did its share in admirable fashion. At the conclusion of this work, as well as of the concerto, the great audience gave the composer an ovation.

The concert began with Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" and ended with three dances from Manuel de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat." Mozart's exquisite "serenade" exhibited the brilliance and precision of the Bostonian strings.

P. S.

Boston Symphony Orchestra At Mosque Tomorrow Night

Special Train Will Bring Famous Band and Noted Director to City From Boston; Thousands Expected to Hear Concert at the Mosque

A special train of three Pullman cars and a baggage coach is leaving Boston for Richmond this afternoon and will arrive here tomorrow morning, bearing the 112 musicians comprising the distinguished Boston Symphony Orchestra, their famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and the tour manager. The orchestra will give its annual concert tomorrow night at the Mosque at 8:30 o'clock, presented by T. Michaux Moody as the second offering in his artists' course, tickets for which will be on sale at Walter D. Moses & Co., until 5:30 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, after which the box office will open at the theatre at 7:30 o'clock.

The half-century-old orchestra will draw thousands of music lovers from all sections of Eastern Virginia as well as from this city, for an orchestral concert is different from any other musical attraction and has a large and distinct following. Whenever the Boston orchestra has appeared here it has brought together a large audience of eager listeners, all confident that they are hearing one of the world's really great orchestras that is offering them the best in that type of music.

Serge Koussevitzky has brought his players to Richmond three times before in the five years in which he has held the baton of the Boston, and the performances they have given under his leadership have been phenominal. Ever since the orchestra was founded its players have given all their time to it, and the leaders of each group have been selected from the very best the world has had to offer. The program for the concert tomorrow is thought to have been most happily chosen, for it opens with "Polero," by Ravel, a composition dedicated to Ida Rubenstein, the famous actress and dancer, and is played in this country only by the Boston orchestra. Then comes Dvorak's beautiful "New World Symphony," which he wrote following a visit to America and which contains many themes based on the Negro spirituals of the old South. Parts of this work are familiar to all music lovers. It will be followed by the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the program will close with the Concerto in D Minor, by Vavaldi.

NEW YORK
JOURNAL

Prokofieff Soloist With Boston Orchestra

Serge Prokofieff arrived in town last night with a bang. It might be said that he also arrived with a boom or two and a whole series of biffs. All of which has to do with his "Scythian" Suite, which was part of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall.

For sheer ear-splitting sound and bicep development in the percussion section, Prokofieff's suite is just about in a class by itself. But, for all of that, the music is not without merit, although merit might be more readily recognized if presented in not quite such voluminous doses.

Mr. Prokofieff appeared as soloist, playing his Concerto in G Minor. The work, written seventeen years ago and restored after it had been lost in the Bolshevik upheaval in Russia, was given its first American presentation.

Serge Koussevitzky, who was at the conductor's stand, opened the concert with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." Three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," concluded the programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

MUSIC WITH A KICK

THOSE fortunate enough to hear the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Wednesday night saw a strange sight. They saw dainty gloved and bejeweled hands waved in the air as a sign of approval to Mr. Koussevitzky and his gifted gang. And what evoked this unusual demonstration, accompanied by thunderous applause, was a work new to Baltimore—Ravel's "Bolero."

Maurice Ravel, pianist-composer, and probably the greatest musical genius of present-day France, has done big things before. His "Spanish Rhapsody" is a shadowy, fantastic, almost Goyesque work which attracted much attention when it was first presented in this country some six or eight years ago.

Ravel has an almost diabolical faculty for taking a simple theme and embellishing and decorating it with that deft, Gallic humor that inspires a French chef to put panties on a lamb chop. In "Bolero" he has taken a barbaric Spanish dance form and, without changing the time or theme, built up an overpowering piece of orchestration.

Starting as a murmur, scarcely heard, it increases in volume as first one and then another instrument takes up the weird strain until it becomes a mighty roar and ends with a crash that lifts you from your seat. It grips you like the pounding of the tom-toms in "Emperor Jones." It gets into your bones and marrow. You find yourself wondering what is coming next. You know the theme and rhythm—it rings in your ears for hours after the concert—but you are puzzled to know in what form it is coming to you next.

No wonder sedate dowagers waved their hands and dour-visaged baldheads pounded their chubby palms together. I wanted to stand on my seat and yell. The Communists are missing a good bet. They ought to adopt "Bolero" for their international anthem. As has been said of certain brands of bootleg liquor, that "tune" would make a rabbit spit in a bulldog's face.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

FEB

Brahms Festival in March

A week of special concerts in which the principal orchestral, choral and chamber works of Brahms will be played, is to be given March 21-26, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall, Boston.

The Brahms Festival will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; the Hargard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Artur Schnabel, the famous German pianist who holds a particular fame in the music of Brahms and who will come from Europe for the occasion; the singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Jeanette Vreeland and Fraser Gange, and the Burgin String Quartet.

On Sunday afternoon, March 23, and the evenings of March 24, 25 and 26, there will be given the First and Fourth Symphonies, the two pianoforte concertos, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the "Song of Destiny" and "German Requiem," the "Liebeslieder," Rhapsody (alto and male chorus), Violin Sonata and Quintet in F minor.

At the concerts of the previous Friday and Saturday, March 21 and 22, the "Academic Festival" Overture, and the Second and Third Symphonies will be played. This pair of concerts, however, is not included in the subscription series, since they are already fully subscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM POST

Music

By OSCAR THOMPSON

AS SOLOIST and composer of half the program, Serge Prokofieff had the lion's share of attention in Carnegie Hall last night when the Boston Symphony returned for the third of its evening concerts. The tall Russian was first summoned from the wings to accept the plaudits bestowed upon his "Sythian" Suite and later was even more generously applauded for his performance with the orchestra of his Second Piano Concerto in G minor. Both works are products of the younger Prokofieff, though the Concerto, originally composed in 1913, when he was twenty-two, was rewritten six years ago in the light of the composer's increased technical resources. It possesses Prokofieff's characteristic dexterity and was as dexterously played, making its effect not by virtue of its material but chiefly through its propulsive momentum.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted a brilliant performance of the "Scythian" Suite and made hugely and boisterously colorful the three dances excerpted from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" ballet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

FEB 6 '08

CONCERT and OPERA

By Noel Straus

SERGE PROKOFFIEFF, the celebrated Russian musician, figured conspicuously, both as composer and pianist, at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. Up for performance were two of Mr. Prokofieff's most ponderable additions to the repertory—namely, the "Scythian Suite," long familiar here, and the Second Piano Concerto in G Minor, to which was accorded a first local hearing, with its creator at the keyboard.

Although the Concerto in its present form dates from 1923, a full decade after the penning of the orchestral Suite, the two works showed exactly the same dominant characteristics. If the later opus proved more radical in its harmonic devices, it possessed the powerful rhythmic impetus, the violent splashes of color and the primitive, elemental vitality to be found in the earlier one. Both attain incontrovertibly the objectivity and soullessness for which the modernists strive, and in so doing they naturally fail to arouse enthusiastic response from those who consider expressiveness a necessary factor in the higher arts.

There is a classic sense of form and proportion in these compositions as well as a clarity and biting precision of line that raise them above the majority of effusions of their type. The Concerto was as easy to follow in its structural pattern as the simplest of old-fashioned works in the form. In fact the "Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart, which opened the program, was far more complicated architecturally. Of the four movements of Mr. Prokofieff's display piece, the first and second surpassed the others in interest. Whatever merits the Concerto boasts, it contains a plethora of ugly noise. But the first section has a terrifically difficult cadenza, in which a melody thundered in the bass is surrounded by a network of ornamentation covering the entire compass of the instrument. This was electrical in its effect, as set off by the delicate close that followed. More admirable still was the ensuing Scherzo, a perpetual motion of flying sixteenth notes in unison at the octave, punctuated with sharp accents. As Mr. Prokofieff played these two movements they were exciting experiences, but one trembles to think what they would become under less skilful fingers. Alone among pianists he seems able to use the percussion touch without making an atrocity of it.

Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to accomplish all that was possible with the barbaric coloring and wild rhythms of the Suite, and gave splendid support to the soloist in the Concerto, which found less favor with the audience than the orchestral number. The Mo- brisk, poetic, strings an as- mbrero ed the

Herald Feb 7

MORE ON SYMPHONY SMOKING

To the Editor of The Herald:

I rejoiced to see a letter in today's Herald, protesting against the monopoly of Symphony hall corridors by smokers, who make it impossible for many of us to enjoy the relaxation of the promenade. One's eyes and throat are stinging with thick, acrid smoke if you go out. Before women began to smoke, the men kept peacefully to the lobby. Two years ago I wrote to the management, asking to have at least one corridor, say the left one, where smoke would be forbidden, but nothing came of it. Signs and ushers could soon make this a habit, and we who, by the way, do not in the least object to smoking within reason, might be able to resume our greatly missed walk. Presumably that is the object of the intermission, to allow one a change of position. Boston audiences are patient, indeed, to have stood this nuisance so long.

MARY M. BROOKS.

Boston, Feb. 5.

49

February 5, 1930

FRANCIS R. JONES
301 MARLBOROUGH STREET
BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS

My dear Mr. Brennan:

I wish to endorse every word of the letter of Miss (Mrs!) Doyle in this morning's Herald about the horrible nuisance of the totally unwarranted boot-legged smoking in Symphony Hall. I am writing you, instead of the Trustees, because I am sure that you can stop the nuisance effectively and immediately.

I have felt for many years that the time will arrive when it should be necessary to exclude that class from the Symphony Concerts, as they do from the Opera. You can fill the Hall by complying with decent civilized people; who now are excluded from lack of space. In the old, old story of the law governing the Symphony,

Yours very truly,

Francis R. Jones

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN

FEB 8 '08

Boston Symphony Third Concert

Prokofieff Is Soloist in His Concerto on Program Including 'Scythian Suite.'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, having yielded its customary Thursday to the Philharmonic, gave its third concert of the series in Carnegie Hall last night. The program was various, indefinite and nevertheless prevailingly Muscovitish expatriate. There were two compositions by Serge Prokofieff, whose abode is Paris, and there also Mr. Koussevitzky lingers in the lap of approbation when he is not enrapturing Boston or amazing New York. Before the intermission last night Mr. Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" was performed; after it the composer appeared in person as the solo executant in his own second concerto for piano and orchestra.

Mr. Prokofieff's Scythians have descended upon our coasts from time to time since 1924 and have persuaded us that barbarians knew how to make noises in several keys at once and to disturb the atmosphere violently to no special end. It does not impress itself upon this chronicler as imperative that he should write another essay on the "Scythian Suite." Let it speak for itself. It does so very loudly and in several keys at once. The piano concerto being new to these avenues of culture calls for pause and pondering.

The composition has almost a political history. It was made in 1913 and played not only in Russia but also in Rome under Mr. Molinari. When Mr. Prokofieff came to this country in 1918 he confidingly left his concerto in his chambers in Leningrad. The apartment was confiscated under a decree of the Soviet Government and the concerto, except some sketches of the piano part rescued by the composer's mother, was destroyed. In 1923 Mr. Prokofieff accomplished what must have been the painful task of recreating the concerto from the piano outline. The new version differs greatly from the original; the composer had been learning things in the years between 1918 and 1923 and there were fruits of his learning in the new score.

There are four movements—the first in three sections, andantino, allegretto and andantino, second a scherzo, third an intermezzo, and a finale in which there are two principal subjects and several canons for piano and orchestra.

The composition displays all the characteristics of Prokofieff, insistent elemental rhythms, a predominance of music ejaculatory rather than lyrical—though there is one songlike passage of pure Russian quality in the last movement—powerful massing of tones, polytonal harmonization, prodigious climaxes and elaborate cadenzas. These appear in the first and last movements and are not introduced by the conventional suspension on the dominant, but are begun nevertheless effectively and contain brilliant outpourings of the latest devices in piano figuration.

As a whole, however, the concerto seems at a first hearing to be energetic rather than strong and to offer little that might tempt pianists generally to take it up. But possibly a second hearing may place the work in a more favorable light. When it ended last evening this particular hearer did not think he would make any heroic struggle to hear it again. The concert began with Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," which has rarely been played less smoothly in this town. The "Scythian Suite" was on the contrary superbly done. The final delight was three dances from De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat."

W. J. H.

OUR MAIL BAG

MORE ON SYMPHONY SMOKING

To the Editor of The Herald:

I rejoiced to see a letter in today's Herald, protesting against the monopoly of Symphony hall corridors by smokers, who make it impossible for many of us to enjoy the relaxation of the promenade. One's eyes and throat are stinging with thick, acrid smoke if you go out. Before women began to smoke, the men kept peacefully to the lobby. Two years ago I wrote to the management, asking to have at least one corridor, say the left one, where smoke would be forbidden, but nothing came of it. Signs and ushers could soon make this a habit, and we who, by the way, do not in the least object to smoking within reason, might be able to resume our greatly missed walk. Presumably that is the object of the intermission, to allow one a change of position. Boston audiences are patient, indeed, to have stood this nuisance so long.

MARY M. BROOKS.

Boston, Feb. 5.

SMOKING AT CONCERTS

To the Editor of The Herald:

The matter of smoking at the symphony concerts seems so far to have been discussed from one angle only. I desire to plead for greater liberality. The fugitive cigarette in the corridor is all very well, but why not smoking at the concert itself? As sex is no longer a line of demarcation between smoker and non-smoker, would not this reform be well-nigh universally acceptable? Concert-givers might take note that the easy chair and the pipe are no small factor in the lure of their competitor, the radio. ARTHUR M. BROWN.

Wellesley Hills, Feb. 11.

ICE-FREE PORTS

To the Editor of The

SMOKING AT THE SYMPHONY

To the Editor of The Herald:

Is there not some way that the management of Symphony hall can be compelled to stop the nuisance of cigarette smoking in the corridors at the intermission of the Saturday evening concerts? It has grown to be dangerous, as well as an intolerable nuisance. It is impossible to walk in the corridors without lighted cigarettes pushed into one's face and eyes, and in the case of women wearing chiffon dresses or light scarves, setting them on fire. I have been a subscription seatholder for many years, a floor seat near the centre door, and in my efforts to push through the crowd of smokers have had many dresses damaged. Women are the worst offenders, young and middle-aged. They are rude in manner and disgusting to look at. They think they are "smart." In the opinion of many they are very dull. The same class used to elevate their shoulders and noses when they saw an old woman sucking her pipe and taking comfort out of it, and say, "how hideously vulgar."

The management of Symphony hall should corral the smokers in one spot and keep them there. The men are pretty decent and do not take the liberties the women and their callow "boy friends" do. Many people who pay for subscription seats are forced to remain in them during intermission and choke and cough from the smoke drifting in and filling the hall. Their comfort and pleasure is ruined, and their clothes soaked with smells they do not like. Too polite and well bred to protest, they suffer in silence.

AGNES C. DOYLE.

Boston, Feb. 4.

Concert Patron Condemns Smokers

Editor Boston American:

Is there not some way that the management of Symphony Hall can be compelled to stop the nuisance of cigarette smoking in the corridors at the intermission of the Saturday evening concerts? It has grown to be dangerous, as well as an intolerable nuisance. It is impossible to walk in the corridors without a lighted cigarette pushed into one's face and eyes, and in the case of women wearing chiffon dresses or light scarfs, setting them on fire.

I have been a subscription seat-holder for many years, a floor seat near the center door, and in my efforts to push through the crowd of smokers have had many dresses damaged.

Women are the worst offenders, young and middle-aged. They are rude in manner and disgusting to look at. They think they are "smart." In the opinion of many they are very dull.

The same class used to elevate their shoulders and noses when they saw an old woman sucking her pipe and taking comfort out of it, in the back kitchens they and their forbears were brought up in, and say (after they got away from them) how hideously vulgar!"

The management of Symphony Hal should corral the smokers in one spot, and keep them there. The men are pretty decent, and don't take the liberties the women and their callow "boy-friends" do. Many people who pay for subscription seats are forced to remain in them during intermission and choke and cough from the smoke drifting in and filling the hall. Their comfort and pleasure is ruined and their clothes soaked with smells they don't like. Too polite and well-bred to protest, they suffer in silence.

AGNES C. DOYLE,
Member New England Women's Press Association.

for I

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

CONCERT and OPERA

By Noel Straus

SERGE PROKOFFIEFF, the celebrated Russian musician, figured conspicuously, both as composer and pianist, at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. Up for performance were two of Mr. Prokofieff's most ponderable additions to the repertory—namely, the "Seythian Suite," long familiar here, and the Second Piano Concerto in G Minor, to which was accorded a first local hearing, with its creator at the keyboard.

Although the Concerto in its present form dates from 1923, a full decade after the penning of the orchestral Suite, the two works showed exactly the same dominant characteristics. If the later opus proved more radical in its harmonic devices, it possessed the powerful rhythmic impetus, the violent splashes of color and the primitive, elemental vitality to be found in the earlier one. Both attain incontrovertibly the objectivity and soullessness for which the modernists strive, and in so doing they naturally fail to arouse enthusiastic response from those who consider expressiveness a necessary factor in the higher arts.

There is a classic sense of form and proportion in these compositions as well as a clarity and biting precision of line that raise them above the majority of effusions of their type. The Concerto was as easy to follow in its structural pattern as the simplest of old-fashioned works in the form. In fact the "Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart, which opened the program, was far more complicated architecturally. Of the four movements of Mr. Prokofieff's display piece, the first and second surpassed the others in interest. Whatever merits the Concerto boasts, it contains a plethora of ugly noise. But the first section has a terrifically difficult cadenza, in which a melody thundered in the bass is surrounded by a network of ornamentation covering the entire compass of the instrument. This was electrical in its effect, as set off by the delicate close that followed. More admirable still was the ensuing Scherzo, a perpetual motion of flying sixteenth notes in unison at the octave, punctuated with sharp accents. As Mr. Prokofieff played these two movements they were exciting experiences, but one trembles to think what they would become under less skilful fingers. Alone among pianists he seems able to use the percussion touch without making an atrocity of it.

Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to accomplish all that was possible with the barbaric coloring and wild rhythms of the Suite, and gave splendid support to the soloist in the Concerto, which found less favor with the audience than the orchestral number. The Mozart selection referred to was brisk, bright and alert rather than poetic, and the tone of the reduced strings employed for this quintet had an astringent quality. Da Falla's "Sombrero de Tres Picos" dances completed the schedule.

Herald Feb 7

MORE ON SYMPHONY SMOKING

To the Editor of The Herald:

I rejoiced to see a letter in today's Herald, protesting against the monopoly of Symphony hall corridors by smokers, who make it impossible for many of us to enjoy the relaxation of the promenade. One's eyes and throat are stinging with thick, acrid smoke if you go out. Before women began to smoke, the men kept peacefully to the lobby. Two years ago I wrote to the management, asking to have at least one corridor, say the left one, where smoke would be forbidden, but nothing came of it. Signs and ushers could soon make this a habit, and we who, by the way, do not in the least object to smoking within reason, might be able to resume our greatly missed walk. Presumably that is the object of the intermission, to allow one a change of position. Boston audiences are patient, indeed, to have stood this nuisance so long.

MARY M. BROOKS.

Boston, Feb. 5.

FRANCIS R. JONES
301 MARLBOROUGH STREET
BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS

49

Feb 5, 1930

My dear Mr. Brennan:

I wish to endorse every word of the letter of Miss (Mrs!) Doyle in this morning's Herald ~~with~~ about the horrible nuisance of the totally unnecessary but legal smoking in Symphony Hall. I am writing you instead of the Trustees, because I am sure that you can stop the nuisance effectively and immediately.

I have for many years felt that the time has arrived when it should be necessary to exclude that class from the Symphony Concerts, as you can fill the Hall complying with decent civilized people.

[illegible] the old, old story of the few ruining the [illegible]

Yours very truly,

OUR MAIL BAG

MORE ON SYMPHONY SMOKING

To the Editor of The Herald:

I rejoiced to see a letter in today's Herald, protesting against the monopoly of Symphony hall corridors by smokers, who make it impossible for many of us to enjoy the relaxation of the promenade. One's eyes and throat are stinging with thick, acrid smoke if you go out. Before women began to smoke, the men kept peacefully to the lobby. Two years ago I wrote to the management, asking to have at least one corridor, say the left one, where smoke would be forbidden, but nothing came of it. Signs and ushers could soon make this a habit, and we who, by the way, do not in the least object to smoking within reason, might be able to resume our greatly missed walk. Presumably that is the object of the intermission, to allow one a change of position. Boston audiences are patient, indeed, to have stood this nuisance so long.

MARY M. BROOKS.

Boston, Feb. 5.

SMOKING AT CONCERTS

To the Editor of The Herald:

The matter of smoking at the symphony concerts seems so far to have been discussed from one angle only. I desire to plead for greater liberality. The fugitive cigarette in the corridor is all very well, but why not smoking at the concert itself? As sex is no longer a line of demarcation between smoker and non-smoker, would not this reform be well-nigh universally acceptable? Concert-givers might take note that the easy chair and the pipe are no small factor in the lure of their competitor, the radio.

ARTHUR M. BROWN.

Wellesley Hills, Feb. 11.

ICE-FREE PORTS

To the Editor of The

SMOKING AT THE SYMPHONY

To the Editor of The Herald:

Is there not some way that the management of Symphony hall can be compelled to stop the nuisance of cigarette smoking in the corridors at the intermission of the Saturday evening concerts? It has grown to be dangerous, as well as an intolerable nuisance. It is impossible to walk in the corridors without lighted cigarettes pushed into one's face and eyes, and in the case of women wearing chiffon dresses or light scarves, setting them on fire. I have been a subscription seatholder for many years, a floor seat near the centre door, and in my efforts to push through the crowd of smokers have had many dresses damaged. Women are the worst offenders, young and middle-aged. They are rude in manner and disgusting to look at. They think they are "smart." In the opinion of many they are very dull. The same class used to elevate their shoulders and noses when they saw an old woman sucking her pipe and taking comfort out of it, and say, "how hideously vulgar."

The management of Symphony hall should corral the smokers in one spot and keep them there. The men are pretty decent and do not take the liberties the women and their callow "boy friends" do. Many people who pay for subscription seats are forced to remain in them during intermission and choke and cough from the smoke drifting in and filling the hall. Their comfort and pleasure is ruined, and their clothes soaked with smells they do not like. Too polite and well bred to protest, they suffer in silence.

AGNES C. DOYLE.

Boston, Feb. 4.

Concert Patron Condemns Smokers

Editor Boston American:

Is there not some way that the management of Symphony Hall can be compelled to stop the nuisance of cigarette smoking in the corridors at the intermission of the Saturday evening concerts? It has grown to be dangerous, as well as an intolerable nuisance. It is impossible to walk in the corridors without a lighted cigarette pushed into one's face and eyes, and in the case of women wearing chiffon dresses or light scarfs, setting them on fire.

I have been a subscription seat-holder for many years, a floor seat near the center door, and in my efforts to push through the crowd of smokers have had many dresses damaged.

Women are the worst offenders, young and middle-aged. They are rude in manner and disgusting to look at. They think they are "smart." In the opinion of many they are very dull.

The same class used to elevate their shoulders and noses when they saw an old woman sucking her pipe and taking comfort out of it, in the back kitchens they and their forbears were brought up in, and say (after they got away from them) how hideously vulgar!"

The management of Symphony Hal should corral the smokers in one spot, and keep them there. The men are pretty decent, and don't take the liberties the women and their callow "boy-friends" do. Many people who pay for subscription seats are forced to remain in them during intermission and choke and cough from the smoke drifting in and filling the hall. Their comfort and pleasure is ruined and their clothes soaked with smells they don't like. Too polite and well-bred to protest, they suffer in silence.

AGNES C. DOYLE,
Member New England Women's Press Association.

[illegible]ird Concert

[illegible] to on

[illegible]s cus-
[illegible]ncert
[illegible] was [illegible]ritish
[illegible]ieff,
[illegible]gers
[illegible]ston
[illegible] last nig[illegible]t
[illegible]ned; after it the [illegible] solo executant in his own [illegible] and orchestra.

[illegible] Exhibition in Skyscraper Robinson
demy.

Camp-kind-ing

[illegible]s Scythians have [illegible]pon our coasts from time
[illegible]me since 1924 and have persuaded us that barbarians knew how to make noises in several keys at once and to disturb the atmosphere violently to no special end. It does not impress itself upon this chronicler as imperative that he should write another essay on the "Scythian Suite." Let it speak for itself. It does so very loudly and in several keys at once. The piano concerto being new to these avenues of culture calls for pause and pondering.

The composition has almost a political history. It was made in 1913 and played not only in Russia but also in Rome under Mr. Molinari. When Mr. Prokofieff came to this country in 1918 he confidingly left his concerto in his chambers in Leningrad. The apartment was confiscated under a decree of the Soviet government and the concerto, except some sketches of the piano part rescued by the composer's mother, was destroyed. In 1923 Mr. Prokofieff accomplished what must have been the painful task of recreating the concerto from the piano outline. The new version differs greatly from the original; the composer had been learning things in the years between 1918 and 1923 and there were fruits of his learning in the new score.

There are four movements—the first in three sections, andantino, allegretto and andantino, second a scherzo, third an intermezzo, and a finale in which there are two principal subjects and several canons for piano and orchestra.

The composition displays all the characteristics of Prokofieff, insistent elemental rhythms, a predominance of music ejaculatory rather than lyrical—though there is one songlike passage of pure Russian quality in the last movement—powerful massing of tones, polytonal harmonization, prodigious climaxes and elaborate cadenzas. These appear in the first and last movements and are not introduced by the conventional suspension on the dominant, but are begun nevertheless effectively and contain brilliant outpourings of the latest devices in piano figuration.

As a whole, however, the concerto seems at a first hearing to be energetic rather than strong and to offer little that might tempt pianists generally to take it up. But possibly a second hearing may place the work in a more favorable light. When it ended last evening this particular hearer did not think he would make any heroic struggle to hear it again. The concert began with Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," which has rarely been played less smoothly in this town. The "Scythian Suite" was on the contrary superbly done. The final delight was three dances from De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat."

W. J. H.

50

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

MUSIC

by Charles D. Isaacson

A VERY happy Serge Koussevitzky beheld the triumph of his friend and fellow-countryman, Serge Prokofieff. Indeed, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert as interestingly contrived by Koussevitzky, belonged chiefly to the blond modest Russian composer.

At Carnegie Hall, Friday evening, two of Prokofieff's works were included in the program, one the "Scythian Suite' for orchestra, already familiar to New Yorkers, and the G Minor Concerto (No. 2) played for the first time in this city, and by the composer himself.

There was no possible question as to the findings of the audience. The Prokofieff, who heard musicians declaring at rehearsals in Russia, but a few years ago, "If it were not for my hungry babies and wife, I wouldn't lower myself to play such truck", this Prokofieff found the most critical of gatherings and one of the foremost orchestras, on its feet, to do him honor.

Preferring to remain in the background, and smiling with unmistakable joy, the conductor, Koussevitzky saw the realization of a long dream, the satisfaction of a vivid faith in the composer. For it has been Koussevitzky, in Russia, Germany, France and in America, who has been most steadfast to Prokofieff's creative genius.

▼

THE composer, who has found his medium in his own peculiar and fascinating idiom, which is popular-modernistic, or modernism of a popular order, and who has demonstrated he can write as classically as the musicians of two centuries ago, was exhibited in two works, completed ten years apart. The "Scythian Suite" was of the 1914 variety, not far removed from the days when he revolted, under his teacher's rebuke. At school, Serge brought his youthful compositions to his master, who cried: "You write without originality." Then later, "You write so far different to anybody else, it would seem you have gone mad, write something people can understand." Somewhere between the two came the suite.

It is barbaric. It suggests lurid, painted faces of frenzied rituals. It evokes a sense of mad, unreasoning, blind faith in unseen and all-powerful gods. It pictures the bizarre temples, the modeled altars, the sacrificial fire, with its odors of human flesh. It reaches out and invades the mysterious heights of the imagined heavens of the gods, in their vast palaces, surrounded by their many-headed dragons, indulging in their loves and hates. Dances, unregenerate and symbolical, are sent in reeling, sensual, blood-lusting locutions, fast, intricate, naked, sweating, straining. The littleness of humanity, the giant mightiness of the good and evil gods, contrast in the illuminating phrases of an epic, born in the imagination of a curious brain. Highly decorative the decorations of this music, almost Orientally programmatic, the dragons roar, the night is filled with misty, cloud-like figures, the warrior is clad in armor, painted with mystic and magic designs to bewilder his enemies.

There are the invocations to the god and goddess, the dance of the pagan monsters, the attack upon the goddess Ala by the Evil-God, the battle of Lolli, the hero, with the Evil-God, and his victory through the intervention of the Sun-God. The rising of the blazing sun, piercing the heavens with a million flaming lights, putting night to flight, heating the sea, the mountains, the valleys, is the climax of the Suite. It is as descriptive and overpowering an example of inevitable writing as may be found in all the pages of musical literature. One listens, blinks his eyes, feels bathed in blood-red sunshine, and realizes the religious awe of the ancients, in the presence of these inexplicable phenomenons of nature, to them, the daily emanations of the gods, in personal procession.

▼

FROM the "Scythian Suite," played with surpassing skill under the Koussevitzky baton, the composer having bowed, turned to his Concerto. I venture the prediction that this work will remain in the piano repertoire for a long time to come.

Further, it is my belief that pianists will make at least one, if not two, of the movements, actually popular, and will delight in playing the "Intermezzo" and "Finale." Strangely, or perhaps not, according to the way one considers popularity, the first two movements are the more important. With a startling individualism, which has at once cleared a new path, while adhering to accepted traditions, the piano voice sets up a dramatic structure of fascinating appeal, against which a background of highly original orchestral accompaniment is erected. Prokofieff, in this work, has planned, evolved, opened, developed, concluded every section of his Concerto. The vagueness and maddening indefiniteness of so many of his contemporaries is absent. No starting ending in space, no repetitions and padding. Meat is here. Real matter. I could easily write a comprehensive article analyzing the Concerto; I may not. At the moment, the need is concretely to record: Prokofieff's Second Concerto is great music, seemingly destined to immortality.

Melodic Doings Of a Sunday

FOUR orchestral presentations today: Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall this afternoon, the Friends of Music with chorus and orchestra at Mecca Hall this afternoon, where the Manhattan Symphony plays tonight . . . and tonight the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra is heard in their home auditorium, but on the stage instead of in the pit . . . and a brand new orchestra, the International, makes its bow at the Forrest Theater tonight... Recitalists of the day are the young violinist, Charles Fleischmann at Steinway Hall this afternoon, Hattie Strauss, soprano, at the John Golden Theater tonight . . . Stewart Baird, diseur, at the Charles Hopkins Theater; Victor Chenkin, diseur, at the Times Square Theater, both tonight . . . Segovia, the Spanish guitarist, at the Town Hall this afternoon, his last concert this season . . . a program of new music by the Copland Sessions group at Steinway Hall tonight.

▼

PROGRAMS: (Friends) All Bach program, "Phoebus and Pan" and Goldbery Variations, with Homer Samuel, soloist; Mr. Bodanzky conducting. . . (International) Wagner, "Meistersinger"; Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet"; Scraibine, "Symphony"; Savadsky's "Flowers of Moriah" with Luda Bennett, soprano, soloists: Mr. Vassily Savadsky conducting...(Philharmonic) Handel, Beethoven, Chopin (Mr. Brailowsky soloist); Mr. Molinari conducting . . .(Manhattan) "Masquerede" of Carl McKinley, Beethoven E flat piano concerto (Katherine Goodson, soloist); Liszt, "Les Preludes," Henry Hanley conducting . . . (Fleischmann), Handel, Lalo and short numbers . . . (Segovia), Sor, Torrbba, Bach, Schubert, Pedrell, Granados, Albeniz . . . (Copland Sessions), Jeffrey Mark, Robert Bennett, Vladimir Dukelsky, Henry Brant, Nina Rota, Robert Delaney . . .(Harrison), Verdi, Schumann, Franz, Schubert, Rachmaninoff, Gretchaninoff and English group.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD

Prokofieff Heard Again With Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Gives Program of Repetitions at Matinee

Yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, the third New York matinee of the present season, offered a program consisting wholly of repetitions. The solo feature of Friday evening's concert—the appearance of Serge Prokofieff as pianist in his own Second Concerto—was the central feature of the program. Before it Dr. Koussevitzky repeated the Second Symphony of Arnold Bax and the Overture, "Portsmouth Point" of William Walton, both of which had been features of the Orchestra's evening concert here a month ago. For his concluding number Dr. Koussevitzky repeated from Friday's program the familiar suite of dances by De Falla, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Mr. Prokofieff again made a striking impression by the brilliant virtuosity which he exhibited in the different solo parts of his high-spirited and engaging concerto—music which applies the piquant devices of modernism to a constructive scheme fundamentally conservative.

The fine orchestra played with spirit and finish, and both soloist and conductor were heartily applauded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES

BOSTON'S PLAYERS ABROAD.

Fortunately we in Rhode Island are sufficiently near to Boston to enjoy a share of the privileges accorded to hearers of the great symphony orchestra of that city. Through the energy and public spirit of energetic and generous citizens courses of symphony concerts in Providence are guaranteed. There have been three such concerts this year and the next will be the last of the season. It is earnestly to be hoped that the concerts will be repeated next year and for many seasons in the future.

We know the value of that great organization; all New England knows it, and cultured Boston is entitled to the highest credit for fostering it during its uncertain early years, and maintaining it in the present period of its splendid maturity. But how about other communities? Do they also know and appreciate the Boston Symphony?

One answer is furnished by a review in the New York Times of a New York concert given by the Boston players last week-end. Says the Times reviewer, Olin Downes: "It may be said, for it is true, that Boston has now an orchestra which is without a superior, if it has an equal in this country, a band that Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to a unique flexibility, sensitiveness and virtuosity."

We are not unaware of the splendid orchestras they have in New York nor the men who have and are still leading them. The names of Mengelburg and Stransky and the inimitable Damrosch spring to mind at once when symphonies and tone poems are mentioned; New York is doing its big part in the promotion of musical culture, and consequently the tribute paid to the Boston orchestra by Mr. Downes is doubly generous. Every admirer of Mr. Koussevitzky's great group of artists appreciate the honor paid by the Times writer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

Prokofiev Hailed

Applause such as is rarely heard burst out in Manhattan's Carnegie Hall last week. The occasion was a Boston Symphony concert. The heroes: Russian Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky and Russian Composer Sergei Prokofiev who appeared also as pianist. No stranger in U. S. music halls is Composer Prokofiev. He used to be railed at as the enfant terrible among moderns, a name belied by his pleasant, Pucklike presence. But since others have outdone him in the making of queer, dissonant patterns, the public has found him less disturbing, more to be accepted. Prokofiev too has changed in the past ten years. Now 38, leading an unheckled life in Manhattan, he writes more simply and with greater deference to melody. Yet it was music done in his first, scorned manner which caused the furor last week—his Scythia Suite, fearfully exhilarating with its barbaric dances, its wailings, its concluding salute to the sun; then his Second Piano Concerto, originally composed in 1913 but lost when the Soviet Government confiscated all Prokofiev property in Leningrad and only recently rewritten from sketches.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

KOUSSEVITZKY STARRED AS DOUBLE BASS VIRTUOSO

Many a conductor has started his career as a virtuoso of some particular instrument. Stokowski, the conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, for example, and Stock, the Chicago conductor, both worked up from the orchestral ranks: while Pierre Monteux's instrument, as a student, was the viola.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which comes to Woolsey hall on March 5, has the sole distinction of having been a virtuoso of the doublebass. Circumstances of his early choice are these. When as a boy of 14 he entered the Moscow Conservatory, he was required by the rules of the institution to study, for the orchestral class, either a brass instrument or the doublebass. Koussevitzky chose the latter and later became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. He developed an extraordinary proficiency and for the first ten years of his professional career toured Europe, East and West, giving recitals upon this unusual instrument. He even composed a Concerto for it which he played with the leading orchestras of the time.

It must not be supposed that Koussevitzky used the unwieldy doublebass of the modern orchestra which, of course, is built for volume and depth of "ground tone". He acquired an instrument made by Amati, the illustrious Italian and contemporary of Stradivarius, in the 17th century.

These early Italian basses were really chamber instruments, somewhat smaller than those to which we are accustomed, and of course more adaptable for solo purposes. likened to an anlarged and deepened 'cello, retaining all the tonal beauty of this more familiar in-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Who will conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall March 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

SEATS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ON SALE

Seats for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Woolsey hall on Wednesday evening, March 5, are now on sale at Steinert's and Loomis' music stores, and it is already indicated that Yale university's beautiful auditorium will be the scene of one of it's largest audiences when the great organization makes its annual appearance here.

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra to New Haven is always considered the high light of the musical season in New Haven. Led by its famous Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky, this noted body of one hundred and ten selected musicians ranks with the finest orchestras of the world, and each year sees the demand for appearances becoming more and more insistent throughout the musical centers of this country. This city, being happily geographically situated between New York and Boston, is able to count on an annual visit of the noted organization, and the local date is so arranged to climax the season's musical activities here abouts.

The coming of the Boston Symphony will mark the concluding event of the Woolsey hall concert series, which this season has risen to heights of popularity far exceeding any previous year. Plans are now going forward for the 1930-31 series, which will bring another group of fine concert events to this city.

50

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
FEB 9 - 1930

MUSIC

by Charles D. Isaacson

A VERY happy Serge Koussevitzky beheld the triumph of his friend and fellow-countryman, Serge Prokofieff. Indeed, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert as interestingly contrived by Koussevitzky, belonged chiefly to the blond modest Russian composer.

At Carnegie Hall, Friday evening, two of Prokofieff's works were included in the program, one the "Scythian Suite' for orchestra, already familiar to New Yorkers, and the G Minor Concerto (No. 2) played for the first time in this city, and by the composer himself.

There was no possible question as to the findings of the audience. The Prokofieff, who heard musicians declaring at rehearsals in Russia, but a few years ago, "If it were not for my hungry babies and wife, I wouldn't lower myself to play such truck", this Prokofieff found the most critical of gatherings and one of the foremost orchestras, on its feet, to do him honor.

Preferring to remain in the background, and smiling with unmistakable joy, the conductor, Koussevitzky saw the realization of a long dream, the satisfaction of a vivid faith in the composer. For it has been Koussevitzky, in Russia, Germany, France and in America, who has been most steadfast to Prokofieff's creative genius.

▼

THE composer, who has found his medium in his own peculiar and fascinating idiom, which is popular-modernistic, or modernism of a popular order, and who has demonstrated he can write as classically as the musicians of two centuries ago, was exhibited in two works, completed ten years apart. The "Scythian Suite" was of the 1914 variety, not far removed from the days when he revolted, under his teacher's rebuke. At school, Serge brought his youthful compositions to his master, who cried: "You write without originality." Then later, "You write so far different to anybody else, it would seem you have gone mad, write something people can understand." Somewhere between the two came the suite.

It is barbaric. It suggests lurid, painted faces of frenzied rituals. It evokes a sense of mad, unreasoning, blind faith in unseen and all-powerful gods. It pictures the bizarre temples, the modeled altars, the sacrificial fire, with its odors of human flesh. It reaches out and invades the mysterious heights of the imagined heavens of the gods, in their vast palaces, surrounded by their many-headed dragons, indulging in their loves and hates. Dances, unregenerate and symbolical, are sent in reeling, sensual, blood-lusting locutions, fast, intricate, naked, sweating, straining. The littleness of humanity, the giant mightiness of the good and evil gods, contrast in the illuminating phrases of an epic, born in the imagination of a curious brain. Highly decorative the decorations of this music, almost Orientally programmatic, the dragons roar, the night is filled with misty, cloud-like figures, the warrior is clad in armor, painted with mystic and magic designs to bewilder his enemies.

There are the invocations to the god and goddess, the dance of the pagan monsters, the attack upon the goddess Ala by the Evil-God, the battle of Lolli, the hero, with the Evil-God, and his victory through the intervention of the Sun-God. The rising of the blazing sun, piercing the heavens with a million flaming lights, putting night to flight, heating the sea, the mountains, the valleys, is the climax of the Suite. It is as descriptive and overpowering an example of inevitable writing as may be found in all the pages of musical literature. One listens, blinks his eyes, feels bathed in blood-red sunshine, and realizes the religious awe of the ancients, in the presence of these inexplicable phenomenons of nature, to them, the daily emanations of the gods, in personal procession.

▼

FROM the "Scythian Suite," played with surpassing skill under the Koussevitzky baton, the composer having bowed, turned to his Concerto. I venture the prediction that this work will remain in the piano repertoire for a long time to come.

Further, it is my belief that pianists will make at least one, if not two, of the movements, actually popular, and will delight in playing the "Intermezzo" and "Finale." Strangely, or perhaps not, according to the way one considers popularity, the first two movements are the more important. With a startling individualism, which has at once cleared a new path, while adhering to accepted traditions, the piano voice sets up a dramatic structure of fascinating appeal, against which a background of highly original orchestral accompaniment is erected. Prokofieff, in this work, has planned, evolved, opened, developed, concluded every section of his Concerto. The vagueness and maddening indefiniteness of so many of his contemporaries is absent. No starting ending in space, no repetitions and padding. Meat is here. Real matter. I could easily write a comprehensive article analyzing the Concerto; I may not. At the moment, the need is concretely to record: Prokofieff's Second Concerto is great music, seemingly destined to immortality.

Melodic Doings Of a Sunday

FOUR orchestral presentations today: Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall this afternoon, the Friends of Music with chorus and orchestra at Mecca Hall this afternoon, where the Manhattan Symphony plays tonight . . . and tonight the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra is heard in their home auditorium, but on the stage instead of in the pit . . . and a brand new orchestra, the International, makes its bow at the Forrest Theater tonight... Recitalists of the day are the young violinist, Charles Fleischmann at Steinway Hall this afternoon, Hattie Strauss, soprano, at the John Golden Theater tonight . . . Stewart Baird, diseur, at the Charles Hopkins Theater; Victor Chenkin, diseur, at the Times Square Theater, both tonight . . . Segovia, the Spanish guitarist, at the Town Hall this afternoon, his last concert this season . . . a program of new music by the Copland Sessions group at Steinway Hall tonight.

▼

PROGRAMS: (Friends) All Bach program, "Pheobus and Pan" and Goldbery Variations, with Homer Samuel, soloist; Mr. Bodanzky conducting. . . (International) Wagner, "Meistersinger"; Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet"; Scraibine, "Symphony"; Savadsky's "Flowers of Moriah" with Luda Bennett, soprano, soloists; Mr. Vassily Savadsky conducting...(Philharmonic) Handel, Beethoven, Chopin (Mr. Brailowsky soloist); Mr. Molinari conducting . . .(Manhattan) "Masquerede" of Carl McKinley, Beethoven E flat piano concerto (Katherine Goodson, soloist); Liszt, "Les Preludes," Henry Hanley conducting . . . (Fleischmann), Handel, Lalo and short numbers . . . (Segovia), Sor, Torrbba, Bach, Schubert, Pedrell, Granados, Albeniz . . . (Copland Sessions), Jeffrey Mark, Robert Bennett, Vladimir Dukelsky, Henry Brant, Nina Rota, Robert Delaney . . .(Harrison), Verdi, Schumann, Franz, Schubert, Rachmaninoff, Gretchaninoff and English group.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD

Prokofieff Heard Again With Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Gives Program of Repetitions at Matinee

Yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, the third New York matinee of the present season, offered a program consisting wholly of repetitions. The solo feature of Friday evening's concert—the appearance of Serge Prokofieff as pianist in his own Second Concerto—was the central feature of the program. Before it Dr. Koussevitzky repeated the Second Symphony of Arnold Bax and the Overture, "Portsmouth Point" of William Walton, both of which had been features of the Orchestra's evening concert here a month ago. For his concluding number Dr. Koussevitzky repeated from Friday's program the familiar suite of dances by De Falla, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Mr. Prokofieff again made a striking impression by the brilliant virtuosity which he exhibited in the different solo parts of his high-spirited and engaging concerto—music which applies the piquant devices of modernism to a constructive scheme fundamentally conservative.

The fine orchestra played with spirit and finish, and both soloist and conductor were heartily applauded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES
Pawtucket, R.I.
FEB 11 1930
(2)

BOSTON'S PLAYERS ABROAD.

Fortunately we in Rhode Island are sufficiently near to Boston to enjoy a share of the privileges accorded to hearers of the great symphony orchestra of that city. Through the energy and public spirit of energetic and generous citizens courses of symphony concerts in Providence are guaranteed. There have been three such concerts this year and the next will be the last of the season. It is earnestly to be hoped that the concerts will be repeated next year and for many seasons in the future.

We know the value of that great organization; all New England knows it, and cultured Boston is entitled to the highest credit for fostering it during its uncertain early years, and maintaining it in the present period of its splendid maturity. But how about other communities? Do they also know and appreciate the Boston Symphony?

One answer is furnished by a review in the New York Times of a New York concert given by the Boston players last week-end. Says the Times reviewer, Olin Downes: "It may be said, for it is true, that Boston has now an orchestra which is without a superior, if it has an equal in this country, a band that Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to a unique flexibility, sensitiveness and virtuosity."

We are not unaware of the splendid orchestras they have in New York nor the men who have and are still leading them. The names of Mengelburg and Stransky and the inimitable Damrosch spring to mind at once when symphonies and tone poems are mentioned; New York is doing its big part in the promotion of musical culture, and consequently the tribute paid to the Boston orchestra by Mr. Downes is doubly generous. Every admirer of Mr. Koussevitzky's great group of artists appreciate the honor paid by the Times writer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME
FEB 17 1930

Prokofiev Hailed

Applause such as is rarely heard burst out in Manhattan's Carnegie Hall last week. The occasion was a Boston Symphony concert. The heroes: Russian Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky and Russian Composer Sergei Prokofiev who appeared also as pianist. No stranger in U. S. music halls is Composer Prokofiev. He used to be railed at as the enfant terrible among moderns, a name belied by his pleasant, Pucklike presence. But since others have outdone him in the making of queer, dissonant patterns, the public has found him less disturbing, more to be accepted. Prokofiev too has changed in the past ten years. Now 38, leading an unheckled life in Manhattan, he writes more simply and with greater deference to melody. Yet it was music done in his first, scorned manner which caused the furor last week—his Scythia Suite, fearfully exhilarating with its barbaric dances, its wailings, its concluding salute to the sun; then his Second Piano Concerto, originally composed in 1913 but lost when the Soviet Government confiscated all Prokofiev property in Leningrad and only recently rewritten from sketches.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
FEB 15 1930

KOUSSEVITZKY STARRED AS DOUBLE BASS VIRTUOSO

Many a conductor has started his career as a virtuoso of some particular instrument. Stokowski, the conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, for example, and Stock, the Chicago conductor, both worked up from the orchestral ranks; while Pierre Monteux's instrument, as a student, was the viola.

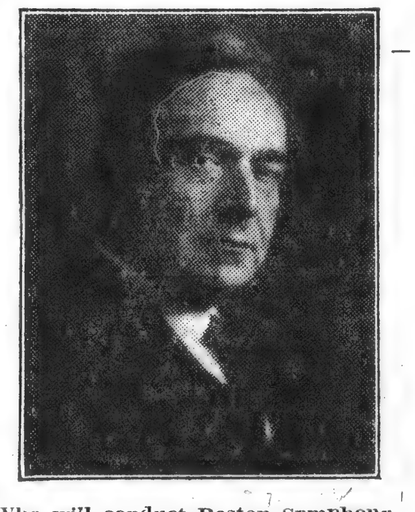
Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which comes to Woolsey hall on March 5, has the sole distinction of having been a virtuoso of the doublebass. Circumstances of his early choice are these. When as a boy of 14 he entered the Moscow Conservatory, he was required by the rules of the institution to study, for the orchestral class, either a brass instrument or the doublebass. Koussevitzky chose the latter and later became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. He developed an extraordinary proficiency and for the first ten years of his professional career toured Europe, East and West, giving recitals upon this unusual instrument. He even composed a Concerto for it which he played with the leading orchestras of the time.

It must not be supposed that Koussevitzky used the unwieldy doublebass of the modern orchestra which, of course, is built for volume and depth of "ground tone". He acquired an instrument made by Amati, the illustrious Italian and contemporary of Stradivarius, in the 17th century.

These early Italian basses were really chamber instruments, somewhat smaller than those to which we are accustomed, and of course more adaptable for solo purposes. likened to an anlarged and deepened 'cello, retaining all the tonal beauty of this more familiar instrument.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
FEB 15 1930

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY



Who will conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall March 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

SEATS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ON SALE

Seats for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Woolsey hall on Wednesday evening, March 5, are now on sale at Steinert's and Loomis' music stores, and it is already indicated that Yale university's beautiful auditorium will be the scene of one of it's largest audiences when the great organization makes its annual appearance here.

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra to New Haven is always considered the high light of the musical season in New Haven. Led by its famous Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky, this noted body of one hundred and ten selected musicians ranks with the finest orchestras of the world, and each year sees the demand for appearances becoming more and more insistent throughout the musical centers of this country. This city, being happily geographically situated between New York and Boston, is able to count on an annual visit of the noted organization, and the local date is so arranged to climax the season's musical activities here abouts.

The coming of the Boston Symphony will mark the ~~concluding~~ event of the Woolsey hall concert series, which this season has risen to heights of popularity far exceeding any previous year. Plans are now going forward for the 1930-31 series, which will bring another group of fine concert events to this city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16

TUESDAY CONCERT IN NATURE OF TEST

Public Response to Appearance of Cleveland Orchestra to Be Norm for Next Year.

POSSIBILITIES POINTED OUT

Mrs. Sharpe Hopes City Will Have Symphonic Galaxy Equalled Only By New York

Referring to next Tuesday's concert here by the Cleveland Orchestra as, in some respects, a test case, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Providence Music Association, last night declared that public response to the concert would indicate to the association how far it might go in planning for next year and continuing or extending its activities.

The association, which sponsors the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in this city, this season will have also brought the Detroit Symphony and the Cleveland Orchestra here. The return of the latter organization after its successful Providence debut less than 10 months ago was described by Mrs. Sharpe as "inevitable."

"Providence is rich in possibilities for hearing all our best American symphony orchestras," said Mrs. Sharpe, "because it is between New York and Boston, where they are sure to come on tour. This rich vein in which chance has put us we must develop, as we have tried to do these two years past.

"I hope to see the time, not far off when—added to our gorgeous four Boston Symphony concerts—we may have four visiting orchestras (for after all Boston is almost 'ours') and have a symphonic galaxy equalled only by New York.

"When one contemplates what the costs of a first water symphony orchestra is ($100,000 a year, at least, in Boston, Rochester, Cleveland and Detroit), I wonder if Providence people are fully awake to our rare opportunity. For we may have these visiting orchestras for an underwriting of ten or twelve thousand dollars a year and sell our seats at less than they are sold for in Boston and New York.

"The Music Association hopes to implant these facts in the consciousness of our supporters:

"Financially—for so comparatively little do we enjoy the fruits of others' effort and expense, and

"Musically—it enriches our enjoyment and educates our taste far beyond what any one symphony, however perfect, can do.

"The response to the concert by the Cleveland Orchestra will enable us to see whether we have properly brought to our music lovers the idea of our very wonderful possibilities.

"Last year when we brought Mr. Sokoloff and his orchestra to Providence it was an interesting experiment. The concert had such an enthusiastic audience that a return engagement was inevitable. Those who heard last year will not miss one of Mr. Sokoloff's well chosen and interestingly played programs:

"Personally I have seldom heard greater enthusiasm than that expressed following the Cleveland Orchestra concert last year. We simply had to have them back again and are indeed fortunate it could be arranged."

The demand for tickets thus far at M. Steinert & Sons is said to be very satisfactory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

Sir George Henschel is said to have been invited by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchstra to conduct some time during its fiftieth anniversary. "It would be indeed a fitting climax to a very long and honorable musical career," says The London Daily Telegraph of recent date, "if Sir George Henschel, now on the point of celebrating his eightieth birthday, were to accept the invitation of the directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct at their jubilee concerts. For be it remembered that Sir George was actually their first conductor."

The first concert occurred on Oct. 22, 1881.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

Conductor Has Led Strange Life

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Nothing, save his eleoquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall March 5, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of 12, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the Conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the doublebass, and the noted master, Ramboussee, was his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be consedered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

But Koussevitzky could not rest content with brining music to the city folk of Russia. There lay about him a vast agrarion population, most of whom had never even heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga River, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful, new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra (formerly the Court Orchestra.)

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He assembled an orchestra in Paris, and has since conducted annually his series of "Concert Koussevitzky" at the Opera House. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts, but also by virtue of operatic performances in Paris and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant, inspired, and inspiring conductor in that part of the world.

Each Spring, since Koussevitzky became the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently hold to be an indispensable part of their musical life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
FEB 18 1930

Brahms Festival in Boston March 23-26

Boston is arranging a Brahms festival for March 23, 24, 25 and 26. Programs on these days will be given in Symphony Hall, and with them will be linked the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of March 21 and 22. Serge Koussevitzky is named as conductor, and a guest of honor will be Arthur Schnabel, specialist in Brahms's piano music. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will participate, as will also the Burgin String Quartet and the following singers: Jeannette Vreeland, Margaret Matzenauer and Fraser Gange.

* * *

By Honegger and From Manuscript

A New ... d A New ... d at

... year ago holds the ... gh regard. ...formances ...piece. "Pa- ...ece, "Rug- ... finished a ...ntrusted it ...ut to revisit ...ested to his ...e production

...tor Symphony Hall. Mr. Maréchal's engagements denied him place in the Friday-Saturday series; but Dr. Koussevitzky readily made room for him on a supplementary Monday. Last evening, accordingly, the new Concerto was played for the first time anywhere to an interested, applausive audience, thrice recalling the violoncellist.

So pleased was the conductor with the piece that he promptly substituted it for the Prelude to Mussorgsky's "Khovantschina," announced for the concert in Cambridge next Thursday. After these two performances with the orchestra that the composer most desired, it will start on the way toward its native Paris. As for Mr. Maréchal, he gave proof of technical ease that hided exaction in accomplishment; of sonorous tone, deep, warm, flowing; of a musician's regard for the part before him and for the companioning orchestra; of a sense of style that does not try to shape Honegger into the mold of Lalo or Saint-Saëns, writing for violoncello; of that balance of virtue from touch to taste marking executive artists Parisian-schooled.

Mr. Honegger's Concerto for Violoncello is not so short as his Concertino for Piano played by Mme. Andrée in Boston and Cambridge thirteen months ago; but it is brief in its kind—the part of obvious wisdom when a limited and satiating instrument is concerned. With Honegger, moreover, terseness is always the word. It is written, as well, for relatively small orchestra—string choir diminished; woodwinds, horns, trumpets in pairs; no harps, no decorative percussion. It also proceeds continuously, though plainly in the three orthodox divisions, with the usual interplay of motivs in the first and the final section, the usual slow song between.

Once more, following a personal bent as well as an inclination of his time, Mr. Honegger is classic in form, modernist in treatment. Since his own programnote speaks of a middle movement "in imitation of a North America Indian Chant," here, as elsewhere, he might be suspected of an occasional romantic leaning. (In one of his early orchestral pieces, "The Song of Nigamon," he was busy with Chateaubriand's Redskins.) It was to be noted also that nowhere does Mr. Honegger provoke the violoncello into futile and tedious bravura; that he avoids its upper and thinner range; lingers not too lovingly over its middle voice; prefers often its deeper, darker tones.

Again, out of personal inclination and the wisdom of his musical generation, Mr. Honegger will have none of the overserious, over-weighted Concerto, symphonic, four-square and with a message. Throughout he prefers the light hand, the clear course, the direct mood. A flowing motiv, a motiv lively-rhythmed, generate the first division. The one invites the violoncello to song; the other incites a contrasting animation. A clear-voiced orchestra winds in the background; smartens the livelier rhythms; tosses in occasional modernisms. Audibly, Mr. Honegger is letting light and air into that stodgy hothouse, the usual Concerto for Violoncello. For half a century there has been need of both.

The Indian Chant, which sounds more of Honegger than of the American aborigines, is bare, grave, deep-voiced, written in broad measures for the darker tones of the violoncello. The orchestra recedes into accompaniment. The sonorous Honegger—and last evening the answering Maréchal—pervade the musical scene. The finale, light-paced and bright-rhythmed without over-driving the solo instrument, sets it and the orchestra in lively interplay; multiplies the modernisms, especially in the impatient wind-choir; gives a sentimental motiv no more than half a chance; persists in its gayety; again suggests a Honegger freeing and animating the withered, stiffening concerto-form. A good job, done without effort, timely, precisely.

Otherwise the concert ministered out of the current repertory to the conservative likings of a Monday audience. Mozart's little Serenade ("Eine kleine Nachtmusik") began it—accent, suavity, fleetness each in turn to charm from the string choir, but sometimes with accent over-sharpened. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," followed—composer's and conductor's mingled masterpiece of characterization by music. A final three-quarters of an hour for Dvorák's "New World" Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky does not take it as task-work "to please the people." No more does the orchestra merely play the notes. Forty years on, Dvorák's melodic freshness, warm color, clear moods, stand renewed. There is that in him to which Dr. Koussevitzky still answers simply and musically. In such orchestral voices his "natural" ear would also have rejoiced.

H. T. P.

DEBUSSY'S DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Radcliffe Choral and Cecilia Society Assist

POST FEB 15 '30

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although there is no evidence of conspiracy, the Chicago Opera Company and the Boston Symphony Orchestra between them contrived, for the last days of this week, a sort of Debussy festival. At the Opera House, Thursday evening, the bill was "Pelleas and Melisande," while the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, as will that of this evening, fell wholly to the French composer's music.

BUT TWO PIECES ON LIST

Two pieces only make this current symphony program; the one, the setting for women's chorus, soprano and contralto soloists and orchestra of Rosetti's "The Blessed Damozel," as rendered into French by Gabriel Sarrazin; the other, the incidental vocal and orchestral music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." In the first-named, the orchestra was assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society and Mme. Ritter-Ciampi and Miss Jean Macdonald, and in the second by the Cecilia Society and Mme. Ritter-Ciampi.

In concert hall as in opera house, Debussy was fortunate in his interpreters. As did Mr. Polacco and the Chicagoan orchestra on Thursday, so did Dr. Koussevitzky and his band yesterday afternoon cause Debussy's endlessly beautiful instrumental sonorities to fall carressingly or stimulatingly upon the ear. The conductors vied with each other in their sensitiveness to Debussy's melodic line, in their ability to keep his music, as it should be kept, ceaselessly plastic, undulant and flowing; phrase melting into phrase.

Superb Choruses

And, to speak of the symphony concert, both the Radcliffe chorus and the Cecilia surpassed themselves in the production of a sonorous or luminous tone, for which Mr. Woodworth and Mr. Fiedler, who respectively trained them, deserve their share of the credit. Regarded objectively, Mme. Ritter-Ciampi's voice might be found lacking in warmth and fullness, but it proved yesterday, nevertheless, a most suitable medium for the music of Debussy, and it was to be noted that while by no means a powerful voice it seemed always to hold its own, without apparent strain, against the orchestra. Less edgeless, less inclined to blend with the orchestra were Miss Macdonald's tones.

The former, dating from 1887, the latter from 1911, "The Blessed Damozel" and the "Saint Sebastian" music represent almost the two extremes of Debussy's career as composer; nor would it be extravagant to speak of the one as his first significant work and of the other as his last. The pieces before "The Blessed Damozel" were relatively tentative and immature; those that followed "Saint Sebastian" more or less artificial, mannered and sterile, as though the creative vein was drying up, leaving only the faultless technique, the fastidious workmanship.

Of Ecstatic Beauty

Yet to the extent that it did not break completely with existing harmonic and melodic idioms, "The Blessed Damozel" is still to be reckoned as "early" Debussy, but not for that reason to be despised. There is in this score a grace and charm, an ecstatic beauty, not to mention the perfect musical transliteration of the poem, that make it one of the most to be prized of modern choral pieces. Yesterday's performance was not the first that "The Blessed Damozel" had received in Boston, or at the Symphony concerts, yet it is hardly too much to speak of it as the most eloquent and revealing.

It has been said of the music to "Saint Sebastian" that it falls short of full effectiveness both in the theatre and in the concert hall; due in one instance to the distracting limitations of paint and canvas and of actors who must materialize spiritual states, and in the other to the clear need, at times, of visual aid to give point to the tonal commentary. Studied, furthermore, in the version for voices and piano Debussy's music seems here and there to be but dryly invented, lacking in impulse, though in actual performance the composer's necromantic skill in the manipulation of timbres makes many of these measures engrossing to hear.

But leaving out not a little that in the last analysis must be set down as deficient in the quality commonly known as inspiration, there remains in the "Saint Sebastian" music much that is of a searching and elevated beauty, an expression of the mystical, of spiritual ecstacy, to be matched but seldom in the entire course of the tonal art.

Yesterday's performance by the way, was the first in Boston to make use of the very important parts for chorus and soloist, Mr. Monteux having previously made known to us only the orchestral numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16

TUESDAY CONCERT IN NATURE OF TEST

Public Response to Appearance of Cleveland Orchestra to Be Norm for Next Year.

POSSIBILITIES POINTED OUT

Mrs. Sharpe Hopes City Will Have Symphonic Galaxy Equalled Only By New York

Referring to next Tuesday's concert here by the Cleveland Orchestra as, in some respects, a test case, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Providence Music Association, last night declared that public response to the concert would indicate to the association how far it might go in planning for next year and continuing or extending its activities.

The association, which sponsors the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in this city, this season will have also brought the Detroit Symphony and the Cleveland Orchestra here. The return of the latter organization after its successful Providence debut less than 10 months ago was described by Mrs. Sharpe as "inevitable."

"Providence is rich in possibilities for hearing all our best American symphony orchestras," said Mrs. Sharpe, "because it is between New York and Boston, where they are sure to come on tour. This rich vein in which chance has put us we must develop, as we have tried to do these two years past.

"I hope to see the time not far off when—added to our gorgeous four Boston Symphony concerts—we may have four visiting orchestras (for after all Boston is almost 'ours') and have a symphonic galaxy equalled only by New York.

"When one contemplates what the costs of a first water symphony orchestra is ($100,000 a year, at least, in Boston, Rochester, Cleveland and Detroit), I wonder if Providence people are fully awake to our rare opportunity. For we may have these visiting orchestras for an underwriting of ten or twelve thousand dollars a year and sell our seats at less than they are sold for in Boston and New York.

"The Music Association hopes to implant these facts in the consciousness of our supporters:

"Financially—for so comparatively little do we enjoy the fruits of others' effort and expense, and

"Musically—it enriches our enjoyment and educates our taste far beyond what any one symphony, however perfect, can do.

"The response to the concert by the Cleveland Orchestra will enable us to see whether we have properly brought to our music lovers the idea of our very wonderful possibilities.

"Last year when we brought Mr. Sokoloff and his orchestra to Providence it was an interesting experiment. The concert had such an enthusiastic audience that a return engagement was inevitable. Those who heard last year will not miss one of Mr. Sokoloff's well chosen and interestingly played programs:

"Personally I have seldom heard greater enthusiasm than that expressed following the Cleveland Orchestra concert last year. We simply had to have them back again and are indeed fortunate it could be arranged."

The demand for tickets thus far at M. Steinert & Sons is said to be very satisfactory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

Sir George Henschel is said to have been invited by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct some time during its fiftieth anniversary. "It would be indeed a fitting climax to a very long and honorable musical career," says The London Daily Telegraph of recent date, "if Sir George Henschel, now on the point of celebrating his eightieth birthday, were to accept the invitation of the directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct at their jubilee concerts. For be it remembered that Sir George was actually their first conductor."

The first concert occurred on Oct. 22, 1881.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

Sons of the To Hold

Selecting for the occasion the birthday of the man on whose principles their organization is founded, the Connecticut Society of the Sons of the American Revolution will hold its 40th annual banquet on Saturday, Washing-

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Nothing, save his eleoquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall March 5, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of 12, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the Conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the doublebass, and the noted master, Ramboussee, was his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be consedered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

But Koussevitzky could not rest content with brining music to the city folk of Russia. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never even heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga River, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful, new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra (formerly the Court Orchestra.)

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He assembled an orchestra in Paris, and has since conducted annually his series of "Concert Koussevitzky" at the Opera House. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
FEB 18 1930

Brahms Festival in Boston March 23-26

Boston is arranging a Brahms festival for March 23, 24, 25 and 26. Programs on these days will be given in Symphony Hall, and with them will be linked the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of March 21 and 22. Serge Koussevitzky is named as conductor, and a guest of honor will be Arthur Schnabel, specialist in Brahms's piano music. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will participate, as will also the Burgin String Quartet and the following singers: Jeannette Vreeland, Margaret Matzenauer and Fraser Gange.

* * *

By Honegger and From Manuscript

A New Concerto and A New 'Cellist Introduced at Symphony Hall

SINCE he visited Boston a year ago last month, Mr. Honegger holds the Symphony Orchestra in high regard. To it also he owes the first performances in America of his locomotive-piece, "Pacific 2-3-1" and his football-piece, "Rugby." Recently, when he had finished a Concerto for Violoncello and entrusted it to Mr. Maurice Maréchal, about to revisit the United States, he suggested to his 'cellist-friend that he reserve production for Symphony Hall. Mr. Maréchal's engagements denied him place in the Friday-Saturday series; but Dr. Koussevitzky readily made room for him on a supplementary Monday. Last evening, accordingly, the new Concerto was played for the first time anywhere to an interested, applausive audience, thrice recalling the violoncellist.

So pleased was the conductor with the piece that he promptly substituted it for the Prelude to Mussorgsky's "Khovantschina," announced for the concert in Cambridge next Thursday. After these two performances with the orchestra that the composer most desired, it will start on the way toward its native Paris. As for Mr. Maréchal, he gave proof of technical ease that hided exaction in accomplishment; of sonorous tone, deep, warm, flowing; of a musician' regard for the part before him and for the companioning orchestra; of a sense of style that does not try to shape Honegger into the mold of Lalo or Saint-Saëns, writing for violoncello; of that balance of virtue from touch to taste marking executive artists Parisian-schooled.

Mr. Honegger's Concerto for Violoncello is not so short as his Concertino for Piano played by Mme. Andrée in Boston and Cambridge thirteen months ago; but it is brief in its kind—the part of obvious wisdom when a limited and satiating instrument is concerned. With Honegger, moreover, terseness is always the word. It is written, as well, for relatively small orchestra—string choir diminished; woodwinds, horns, trumpets in pairs; no harps, no decorative percussion. It also proceeds continuously, though plainly in the three orthodox divisions, with the usual interplay of motivs in the first and the final section, the usual slow song between.

Once more, following a personal bent as well as an inclination of his time, Mr. Honegger is classic in form, modernist in treatment. Since his own programnote speaks of a middle movement "in imitation of a North America Indian Chant," here, as elsewhere, he might be suspected of an occasional romantic leaning. (In one of his early orchestral pieces, "The Song of Nigamon," he was busy with Chateaubriand's Redskins.) It was to be noted also that nowhere does Mr. Honegger provoke the violoncello into futile and tedious bravura; that he avoids its upper and thinner range; lingers not too lovingly over its middle voice; prefers often its deeper, darker tones.

Again, out of personal inclination and the wisdom of his musical generation, Mr. Honegger will have none of the overserious, over-weighted Concerto, symphonic, four-square and with a message. Throughout he prefers the light hand, the clear course, the direct mood. A flowing motiv, a motiv lively-rhythmed, generate the first division. The one invites the violoncello to song; the other incites a contrasting animation. A clear-voiced orchestra winds in the background; smartens the livelier rhythms; tosses in occasional modernisms. Audibly, Mr. Honegger is letting light and air into that stodgy hothouse, the usual Concerto for Violoncello. For half a century there has been need of both.

The Indian Chant, which sounds more of Honegger than of the American aborigines, is bare, grave, deep-voiced, written in broad measures for the darker tones of the violoncello. The orchestra recedes into accompaniment. The sonorous Honegger—and last evening the answering Maréchal—pervade the musical scene. The finale, light-paced and bright-rhythmed without over-driving the solo instrument, sets it and the orchestra in lively interplay; multiplies the modernisms, especially in the impatient wind-choir; gives a sentimental motiv no more than half a chance; persists in its gayety; again suggests a Honegger freeing and animating the withered, stiffening concerto-form. A good job, done without effort, timely, precisely.

Otherwise the concert ministered out of the current repertory to the conservative likings of a Monday audience. Mozart's little Serenade ("Eine kleine Nachtmusik") began it—accent, suavity, fleetness each in turn to charm from the string choir, but sometimes with accent over-sharpened. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," followed—composer's and conductor's mingled masterpiece of characterization by music. A final three-quarters of an hour for Dvorák's "New World" Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky does not take it as task-work "to please the people." No more does the orchestra merely play the notes. Forty years on, Dvorák's melodic freshness, warm color, clear moods, stand renewed. There is that in him to which Dr. Koussevitzky still answers simply and musically. In such orchestral voices his "natural" ear would also have rejoiced.

H. T. P.

DEBUSSY'S DAY WITH SYMPHONY

51

Radcliffe Choral and Cecilia Society Assist

Post FEB. 15 '30

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although there is no evidence of conspiracy, the Chicago Opera Company and the Boston Symphony Orchestra between them contrived, for the last days of this week, a sort of Debussy festival. At the Opera House, Thursday evening, the bill was "Pelleas and Melisande," while the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, as will that of this evening, fell wholly to the French composer's music.

BUT TWO PIECES ON LIST

Two pieces only make this current symphony program; the one, the setting for women's chorus, soprano and contralto soloists and orchestra of Rosetti's "The Blessed Damozel," as rendered into French by Gabriel Sarrazin; the other, the incidental vocal and orchestral music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." In the first-named, the orchestra was assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society and Mme. Ritter-Ciampi and Miss Jean Macdonald, and in the second by the Cecilia Society and Mme. Ritter-Ciampi.

In concert hall as in opera house, Debussy was fortunate in his interpreters. As did Mr. Polacco and the Chicagoan orchestra on Thursday, so did Dr. Koussevitzky and his band yesterday afternoon cause Debussy's endlessly beautiful instrumental sonorities to fall carressingly or stimulatingly upon the ear. The conductors vied with each other in their sensitiveness to Debussy's melodic line, in their ability to keep his music, as it should be kept, ceaselessly plastic, undulant and flowing; phrase melting into phrase.

Superb Choruses

And, to speak of the symphony concert, both the Radcliffe chorus and the Cecilia surpassed themselves in the production of a sonorous or luminous tone, for which Mr. Woodworth and Mr. Fiedler, who respectively trained them, deserve their share of the credit. Regarded objectively, Mme. Ritter-Ciampi's voice might be found lacking in warmth and fullness, but it proved yesterday, nevertheless, a most suitable medium for the music of Debussy, and it was to be noted that while by no means a powerful voice it seemed always to hold its own, without apparent strain, against the orchestra. Less edgeless, less inclined to blend with the orchestra were Miss Macdonald's tones.

The former, dating from 1887, the latter from 1911, "The Blessed Damozel" and the "Saint Sebastian" music represent almost the two extremes of Debussy's career as composer; nor would it be extravagant to speak of the one as his first significant work and of the other as his last. The pieces before "The Blessed Damozel" were relatively tentative and immature; those that followed "Saint Sebastian" more or less artificial, mannered and sterile, as though the creative vein was drying up, leaving only the faultless technique, the fastidious workmanship.

Of Ecstatic Beauty

Yet to the extent that it did not break completely with existing harmonic and melodic idioms, "The Blessed Damozel" is still to be reckoned as "early" Debussy, but not for that reason to be despised. There is in this score a grace and charm, an ecstatic beauty, not to mention the perfect musical transliteration of the poem, that make it one of the most to be prized of modern choral pieces. Yesterday's performance was not the first that "The Blessed Damozel" had received in Boston, or at the Symphony concerts, yet it is hardly too much to speak of it as the most eloquent and revealing.

It has been said of the music to "Saint Sebastian" that it falls short of full effectiveness both in the theatre and in the concert hall; due in one instance to the distracting limitations of paint and canvas and of actors who must materialize spiritual states, and in the other to the clear need, at times, of visual aid to give point to the tonal commentary. Studied, furthermore, in the version for voices and piano Debussy's music seems here and there to be but dryly invented, lacking in impulse, though in actual performance the composer's necromantic skill in the manipulation of timbres makes many of these measures engrossing to hear.

But leaving out not a little that in the last analysis must be set down as deficient in the quality commonly known as inspiration, there remains in the "Saint Sebastian" music much that is of a searching and elevated beauty, an expression of the mystical, of spiritual ecstacy, to be matched but seldom in the entire course of the tonal art.

Yesterday's performance by the way, was the first in Boston to make use of the very important parts for chorus and soloist, Mr. Monteux having previously made known to us only the orchestral numbers.

52

MUSIC

Review of Opera
On Page 14

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 15th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, comprised Debussy's "Blessed Damozel" and "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," both sung in French. The Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, was the chorus for the "Blessed Damozel"; the Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, sang in the "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." Mme. Ritter-Ciampi was entrusted with the solo soprano music in both works. The music of the Reciter in the "Blessed Damozel" was sung by Jean Macdonald.

Here we had music by the Debussy of 1887 and the Debussy of 1911. As the works were performed yesterday the younger Debussy was preferred by the great majority of the audience. The reason for this is not far to seek. First of all there was the familiar poem, and although it is the fashion in some quarters to underrate Rossetti, "the Blessed Damozel" is still a poem of exquisite beauty. The music is as exquisite as the verses. The charge of preciosity cannot justly be brought against either. Again, there is a continuous emotional, appealing story. The music, furthermore, has apparent simplicity. It is at once appreciated, enjoyed, gratefully remembered. Nor are the choral measures beyond the ability of a well-trained chorus of women. Last of all, the choral measures were sung with delightful purity of tone; with an expressiveness that was not forced nor incompatible with the sentiment of the poem; and Miss Macdonald, as the reciter, delivered her lines with refreshing clearness and significance of diction, not forcing her fine voice, though her position on the stage might have tempted her to do it. It might be pertinently asked why she was not seated by the solo soprano.

The chorus in the "Martyrdom of Saint-Sebastian" had a more difficult task. That it was so well accomplished reflects credit on Mr. Fiedler, who was recently appointed the conductor of the Cecilia. It might be said of the two choruses, with regard to the women's voices, par nobile sororum. Nor did the men of the Cecilia fall behind their sisters in art, when the great technical difficulties in the Mystery are considered. It is needless to say that Dr. Koussevitzky had rehearsed the orchestra with sympathetic care; that the orchestral performance was, after all, the one that was most enjoyed.

Admirers of the work, who speak of it as Debussy's crowning achievement, insist that it should not be performed on the stage of a theatre. What is the result when it is heard in a concert hall? The work then appears to be a series of episodes, loosely strung together. Unless the hearer has thoroughly acquainted himself with d'Annunzio's drama for which the music was composed, he wonders what is happening; what Sebastian is doing or suffering; what is going on in the "Magic Chamber"; why in a Mystery with a Christian Saint, the chorus should now hurrah for Apollo, now mourn the beautiful Adonis. Is the death of the latter symbolical of Sebastian's tortured passing? And who, pray, the hearer might ask, is the Virgin Erigone and what has she to do with it all? Nor is the hearer, unable to read any printed synopsis of the drama on account of the dimly lighted hall, a Philistine, because he rubs his eyes, wonders, and questions.

He is unable, under those conditions, to find dramatic, pictorial, or strikingly impressive music in these choral episodes thrown together as if at random. Here and there are passages of genuine beauty, especially for the female voices; but these passages are to him merely agreeable sounds; he is unable, hearing them, "to dilate with the proper emotion." Having read of the "majestic," also "exultant" final chorus when Sebastian takes the seat of St. John and drinks out of his cup, with the combined chorus of Martyrs, Virgins, Apostles, Angels,—the whole company of the heavenly host praising the Lord Omnipotent, he is grievously disappointed and is not to be blamed if he remembers choruses by Handel. Nor, again, does he find emotion of any sort in the music written for the solo soprano voice.

Mme. Ritter-Ciampi sang in Boston for the first time. Her voice is light and flexible, pleasing in the lower register. In many measures where the tones should have been well sustained, they lacked body and were not firmly held.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is as follows: Haydn, Symphony D major, "The Horn Call" (B. & H. No. 31, first time at those concerts). Lazar, Concerto Grosso No. 1 for orchestra (first performance). De Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" (Mr. Sanroma, pianist). Gruenberg, Jazz Suite, op. 28.

DEBUSSY PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two Local Choruses Assist Orchestra

"Martyrdom of St Sebastian" and "Blessed Damozel" Performed

Globe Feb 15

Dr Koussevitzky devoted yesterday's Symphony concert to the performance of two works by Debussy for chorus and orchestra, "The Blessed Damozel," and "The Martyrdom of St Sebastian." The Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by its own conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth, sang in "The Blessed Damozel." The contralto soloist in this number was Jean MacDonald. The Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, now its conductor, sang in the "St Sebastian." The soprano soloist in both works was Mme Ritter-Ciampi, of the Paris Opera, who sang for the first time in America.

Those who heard the Chicago Civic Opera's performance of Debussy's "Pelleas" Thursday night as well as yesterday's Symphony concert enjoyed an unusual opportunity to survey his whole musical career. "The Blessed Damozel," written in 1887, is a work of his youth, already familiar to Boston audiences. "Pelleas," first performed in 1902, is the masterpiece of his middle years. The music for d'Annunzio's mystery play, first performed in 1911, seemed yesterday the crowning glory of his last years.

When Debussy's music was new, reviewers spoke as with one voice of its "impressionism." What struck them was the then novel harmonic scheme, based on a scale of whole tones. They denied that Debussy wrote melody. They denied that his music had any strictly formal or architectural qualities. Performers even today frequently interpret Debussy's works from this angle, as though they were vague, evanescent improvisations, full of strange harmonies, but otherwise meaningless. With a confused feeling for the delicacy and restraint of Debussy, who never wrote a superfluous note or a measure of mere padding repetition, performers subdued his music to a dreamy chaos of bitter-sweet sound.

When, as was inevitable, makers of newer and stranger music arrived, those who had accepted this view of Debussy as the only true one allowed their newborn fervor for Stravinsky and Honegger and the rest of the present generation to cool their once ardently expressed admiration for Debussy. Marcel Proust, sensitive to music as to the life around him, noted just before the war the decline of Debussy's reputation with the musical intelligentsia of Paris, and recorded it with so much else of the history of that era in "Remembrance of Things Past."

Had these restless thinkers in the Paris salons so dear to Proust been correct in their estimate, Debussy's music would now be as certainly doomed to ultimate oblivion as is that of Charpentier. But they were wrong. Debussy is already a classic. His work will endure, though by other qualities than those they heard in it.

Debussy is a great melodist, though his melodies are often brief, and almost never diatonic. Debussy's music has a form o. its own always, though not one to be found in such text books as the once celebrated works of Ebenezer Prout. Debussy had an intense dramatic sense. Consider the crucial scenes in "Pelleas." Have they not, when rightly conducted, as Mr Polacco has shown us at the Opera House, a thrill in them almost as powerful if rather less crude than the thrills in Verdi and Wagner?

Turn to the music for d'Annunzio's ecstatic play, a piece full of the "voluptuous religiosity" some have found in Wagner's "Parsifal," a quality repugnant to others as well to as the Archbishop who tried to ban the original performance at Paris. Note that Debussy can use stern, jagged rhythms, sonorous outbursts from the brass, a soaring final chorus of apotheosis, culminating in "Alleluias" that echo long afterwards in the listening ear. The music has a purity, a serenity absent from the play. There is a frenzy of the senses in the laments for Adonis, but in the choruses of mourning a solemn sadness soon overpowers the merely sensuous excitement.

This music is a strangely neglected masterpiece, which should be more often heard in years to come. Remember that it is to one woman, Mary Garden, that America owes its relative familiarity with "Pelleas." "The Martyrdom" may yet find a celebrity to insist that audiences hear it until they cease to be baffled by it, as has happened in Boston with "Pelleas."

Dr Koussevitzky conducted yesterday with remarkable eloquence. The two choruses performed their allotted tasks well. Miss MacDonald sang her solos with a fine quality of tone, and a command of style rare in young singers hereabouts. Mme Ritter-Ciampi, obviously very nervous over her American debut, has a lyric soprano voice of fine quality, if small volume. When she regained her self-possession, as she did by the later parts of the "St Sebastian," she sang eloquently and beautifully.

P. R.

BOS

SOLOIST AT MONDAY SYMPHONY

Maurice Marechal, the Cellist, Plays Honegger's Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is not unusual for one of the Monday evening Symphony Concerts to offer a soloist who does not appear at the concerts of the regular series, but it is most unusual for such a one to chose as his or her "vehicle" a piece new to Boston, especially one from a distinguished contemporary hand.

CONCERTO BY HONEGGER

Last evening, however, the unusual occurred. Maurice Marechal, French 'cellist, making his Boston debut at the fourth of the current series of Monday concerts, played for the first time in this city the concerto of Arthur Honegger, written for him during 1928 and 1929.

Had the listener been unaware of the authorship of this concerto he might easily have attributed it to one of the abler of the younger Americans. Not only is the theme of the second movement avowedly in imitation of an American Indian chant, there are suggestions elsewhere of what we are pleased to consider our own brand of "popular" music. There were hints of the "romantic fox-trot," to borrow a phrase from Mr. Leo Reisman. There were thoughts, too, of the sentimental ditties to be found in the musical comedies of Kern, Gershwin and others, with high notes falling on succulent chords of the "barber shop" variety, expressively sustained. And then, as though by way of comic relief, would come passages consistently dissonant in the ultra-modern fashion that would cause those in the audience unaccustomed to this idiom to wear a look of consternation that speedily disappeared when the music returned to its prevailingly amiable course.

An amusing and entertaining piece, this concerto, ingratiating, even, at times. But it was a bit disquieting to find the author of "King David" and "Horace Victorious" descending to such fooleries. It was, indeed, but one more indication of the melancholy fact that few composers now-a-days seem to take their art seriously.

While the piece lay no very heavy tax upon the performer, Mr. Marechal succeeded in demonstrating that he is an accomplished player with a pretty knack for singing a melody and one who commands a singularly agreeable tone. It would be a pleasure to hear him in a work more worthy of his undoubted gifts. He was warmly applauded last evening.

For the rest, the programme listed three pieces from the season's repertory, namely, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World."

DEBUSSY PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two Local Choruses Assist Orchestra

"Martyrdom of St Sebastian" and "Blessed Damozel" Performed

Dr Koussevitzky devoted yesterday's Symphony concert to the performance of two works by Debussy for chorus and orchestra, "The Blessed Damozel," and "The Martyrdom of St Sebastian." The Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by its own conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth, sang in "The Blessed Damozel." The contralto soloist in this number was Jean MacDonald. The Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, now its conductor, sang in the "St Sebastian." The soprano soloist in both works was Mme Ritter-Ciampi, of the Paris Opera, who sang for the first time in America.

Those who heard the Chicago Civic Opera's performance of Debussy's "Pelleas" Thursday night as well as yesterday's Symphony concert enjoyed an unusual opportunity to survey his whole musical career. "The Blessed Damozel," written in 1887, is a work of his youth, already familiar to Boston audiences. "Pelleas," first performed in 1902, is the masterpiece of his middle years. The music for d'Annunzio's mystery play, first performed in 1911, seemed yesterday the crowning glory of his last years.

When Debussy's music was new, reviewers spoke as with one voice of its "impressionism." What struck them was the then novel harmonic scheme, based on a scale of whole tones. They denied that Debussy wrote melody. They denied that his music had any strictly formal or architectural qualities. Performers even today frequently interpret Debussy's works from this angle, as though they were vague, evanescent improvisations, full of strange harmonies, but otherwise meaningless. With a confused feeling for the delicacy and restraint of Debussy, who never wrote a superfluous note or a measure of mere padding repetition, performers subdued his music to a dreamy chaos of bitter-sweet sound.

When, as was inevitable, makers of newer and stranger music arrived, those who had accepted this view of Debussy as the only true one allowed their newborn fervor for Stravinsky and Honegger and the rest of the present generation to cool their once ardently expressed admiration for Debussy. Marcel Proust, sensitive to music as to the life around him, noted just before the war the decline of Debussy's reputation with the musical intelligentsia of Paris, and recorded it with so much else of the history of that era in "Remembrance of Things Past."

Had these restless thinkers in the Paris salons so dear to Proust been correct in their estimate, Debussy's music would now be as certainly doomed to ultimate oblivion as is that of Charpentier. But they were wrong. Debussy is already a classic. His work will endure, though by other qualities than those they heard in it.

Debussy is a great melodist, though his melodies are often brief, and almost never diatonic. Debussy's music has a form o. its own always, though not one to be found in such text books as the once celebrated works of Ebenezer Prout. Debussy had an intense dramatic sense. Consider the crucial scenes in "Pelleas." Have they not, when rightly conducted, as Mr Polacco has shown us at the Opera House, a thrill in them almost as powerful if rather less crude than the thrills in Verdi and Wagner?

Turn to the music for d'Annunzio's ecstatic play, a piece full of the "voluptuous religiosity" some have found in Wagner's "Parsifal," a quality repugnant to others as well to as the Archbishop who tried to ban the original performance at Paris. Note that Debussy can use stern, jagged rhythms, sonorous outbursts from the brass, a soaring final chorus of apotheosis, culminating in "Alleluias" that echo long afterwards in the listening ear. The music has a purity, a serenity absent from the play. There is a frenzy of the senses in the laments for Adonis, but in the choruses of mourning a solemn sadness soon overpowers the merely sensuous excitement.

This music is a strangely neglected masterpiece, which should be more often heard in years to come. Remember that it is to one woman, Mary Garden, that America owes its relative familiarity with "Pelleas." "The Martyrdom" may yet find a celebrity to insist that audiences hear it until they cease to be baffled by it, as has happened in Boston with "Pelleas."

Dr Koussevitzky conducted yesterday with remarkable eloquence. The two choruses performed their allotted tasks well. Miss MacDonald sang her solos with a fine quality of tone, and a command of style rare in young singers hereabouts. Mme Ritter-Ciampi, obviously very nervous over her American debut, has a lyric soprano voice of fine quality, if small volume. When she regained her self-possession, as she did by the later parts of the "St Sebastian," she sang eloquently and beautifully.

P. R.

FEB. 18 BOST

SOLOIST AT MONDAY SYMPHONY

Maurice Marechal, the Cellist, Plays Honegger's Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is not unusual for one of the Monday evening Symphony Concerts to offer a soloist who does not appear at the concerts of the regular series, but it is most unusual for such a one to chose as his or her "vehicle" a piece new to Boston, especially one from a distinguished contemporary hand.

CONCERTO BY HONEGGER

Last evening, however, the unusual occurred. Maurice Marechal, French 'cellist, making his Boston debut at the fourth of the current series of Monday concerts, played for the first time in this city the concerto of Arthur Honegger, written for him during 1928 and 1929.

Had the listener been unaware of the authorship of this concerto he might easily have attributed it to one of the abler of the younger Americans. Not only is the theme of the second movement avowedly in imitation of an American Indian chant, there are suggestions elsewhere of what we are pleased to consider our own brand of "popular" music. There were hints of the "romantic fox-trot," to borrow a phrase from Mr. Leo Reisman. There were thoughts, too, of the sentimental ditties to be found in the musical comedies of Kern, Gershwin and others, with high notes falling on succulent chords of the "barber shop" variety, expressively sustained. And then, as though by way of comic relief, would come passages consistently dissonant in the ultra-modern fashion that would cause those in the audience unaccustomed to this idiom to wear a look of consternation that speedily disappeared when the music returned to its prevailingly amiable course.

An amusing and entertaining piece, this concerto, ingratiating, even, at times. But it was a bit disquieting to find the author of "King David" and "Horace Victorious" descending to such fooleries. It was, indeed, but one more indication of the melancholy fact that few composers now-a-days seem to take their art seriously.

While the piece lay no very heavy tax upon the performer, Mr. Marechal succeeded in demonstrating that he is an accomplished player with a pretty knack for singing a melody and one who commands a singularly agreeable tone. It would be a pleasure to hear him in a work more worthy of his undoubted gifts. He was warmly applauded last evening.

For the rest, the programme listed three pieces from the season's repertory, namely, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Dvorak's

FEB. 18 '30

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, TUESDAY, F

Music in Boston

Symphony Concert

The fourth program of the Monday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall last evening. The list of music comprised Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Honegger's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra and Dvořák's Symphony in E minor, "From the New World." Maurice Marechal was the soloist.

With the exception of the Honegger concerto, which had its first Boston performance, all the items on the program had been heard previously this season.

In Honegger's piece there was a new venture, and consequently considerable interest. Written in 1928 and 1929, this concerto gives us Honegger's present, or at least very recent, stylistic tendency. Gone are the impacts, the smashing, reeling curves of the musical locomotive of M. Honegger's earlier fashioning, "Pacific 231." Nor does one hear the dissonances of the "Rugby," which owned a tremendous rhythmic facility and power. Instead, there is a rhythmic suavity, a pulse of more subdued yet none the less effective regularity, and a marshaling of orchestral forces which etch in a comprehensive and well-arrayed background for the solo instrument. And the soloist of this concerto is permitted to deploy some melodies. This is startling indeed. Can it be that we are reverting to melodic material which shall again be comprehensible not to musical specialists alone but also to the people who make up the bulk of our audiences? But melody or dissonance or any other single item aside, one must confess that this new work of Honegger's does not seem—at a first hearing at least—to be an outstanding or particularly significant product of his abilities.

C. S. B.

Angna Enters

ESDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1930

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the fourth concert of the Monday night series last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik. Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Honegger, concerto for violoncello and orchestra. Dvorak, symphony No. 5, E minor, "From the New World."

The soloist was Maurice Marechal, for whom Honegger wrote the concerto played last night for the first time anywhere. Mr. Marechal, born at Dijon, was awarded a first prize for playing the violoncello at the Paris Conservatory in 1911. For some years he was the first 'cellist of several Parisian orchestras, but of late years he has led the life of a virtuoso.

Honegger composed this concerto in 1928-9. The performance was delayed until it could take place in Boston under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, with Mr. Marschal, violoncellist. Honegger wrote a little note about the work; a short but sufficient argument to the effect that the three movements, enchained without a pause, are in the traditional form. The first movement has two contrasting elements: one a suave melodic line; the other a rhythmic pattern. The former is a more sustained and emotional song than one is accustomed to associate with the composer's instrumental compositions; the latter has little distinction except for its unusual contents, which are for the display of technical proficiency, but the orchestral portion of this movement is interesting even when some combinations and effects excite surprise rather than whole-hearted admiration. Mr. Honegger says that the second movement is a song in imitation of a North American Indian chant. This is not the first time he has looked kindly on this racial music. One of his earliest orchestral pieces with North American themes was performed here when he visited Boston. The present song is charming in its melancholy and it was simply presented. In the finale we preferred the second sentimental theme to the "gay and rhythmical" main body of the movement. Again there was singular instrumentation as when the wind instruments apparently mocked the sentimental song, impatient to have their say. Mr. Marechal is an accomplished artist, having a beautiful, rich, but not cloying tone in song passages; a violoncellist of fine taste, possessing a fluent and accurate technic. He was recalled several times.

The remaining numbers on the program were of a popular nature, nor is the word "popular" here used in the obnoxious sense. The delightful music by Mozart; the dazzling brilliance shown by the orchestra in Strauss's admirable tone-poem, and the symphony, with its direct appeal, justly aroused the enthusiasm of the very large audience.

The next concert of the series will be on Monday, March 17. Renee Longy-Miquella, pianist, will be the soloist.

EDWARD

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

JOURNAL COURIER

NEW CONCERTO AT MONDAY SYMPHONY

Maurice Marechal, as soloist at the fourth of the Boston Symphony's Monday concerts, played Honegger's new concerto for violincello, written for him and still unpublished. The other numbers on Dr Koussevitzky's program were Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Richard Strauss' "Till," and Dvorak's "New World' Symphony.

As a rule the Monday subscribers hear only repetitions of works recently given in the regular Friday and Saturday series, but Honegger's concerto is an exception. Last night's was the first performance of it in Boston, nor has one heard of other performances in the United States.

Honegger supplied a brief note for the program books, explaining that this concerto was written for Mr Marechal in 1923 and '29, that it has three movements, to be played without pause; and is, like his concerto for pianoforte, in the classic form. The slow movement is "a song in imitation of a North American Indian chant."

Although the composer does not say so in his brief and modest account of his work, this concerto betrays other American influences than those of the vanished redmen so dear to the French romantic writers. Much of it shows the influence upon Honegger of American popular music of the "jazz" type. It is apparently a "Concerto from the New World," full of echoes of Honegger's American visit, during which he conducted a pair of Boston Symphony concerts and listened to all the leading jazz bands.

Those who believe that much American jazz is worth taking seriously as music, despite the deplorable vulgarity of many jazz pieces, and the atrocious technique of the average jazz player, will find support for this side of what it still a rather heated debate in the fact that not merely Honegger but also Ravel have in recent seasons paid our jazz the proverbially flattering tribute of imitating it. Ravel's violin sonata, written three or four years ago, betrays, like Honegger's new concerto, the influence of American popular music.

French musicians of modernist leanings are all more or less attracted by our jazz. The leading left wing musical journal in France, "La Revue Musicale," has in each issue a section devoted to important new phonograph records in which, along with "musical masterpiece" recordings from all over the world, a certain number of American jazz records are discussed.

Dr Koussevitzky, if his conducting of the orchestral accompaniment last night is any test, does not like syncopated rhythms of the jazz type. They annoy and confuse him, as they do so many professional musicians of the older generation. Mr Marechal, hampered by a wooden and wavering accompaniment, did his not inconsiderable best to make Honegger's concerto appealing. One wished Paul Whiteman or Leo Reisman could have been there to conduct, just for this one number.

Honegger's intricate rhythms and occasionally audacious instrumentation were the most interesting parts of this score. The themes lack distinction of style. One could not help thinking that George Gershwin could write better tunes.

The other numbers, played as they have been in recent symphony concerts, were very warmly applauded last night. There was hearty applause for Mr Marechal, and, one hopes, for Honegger, after the concerto.

P. R.

Incidents and Prospects

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Feb. 28 and March 1, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will play for the first times in Boston the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius, hitherto known only to Philadelphia and New York from Mr. Stokowski. It is brief, as symphonies go; proceeds without pause; contains no slow movement.

At the end of the Symphony Concert last Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky called upon the stage, to share the applause, the conductors of the two contributing choirs. As usual, Mr. Woodworth of the Radcliffe Choral Society was cordially received. Then came the turn of Mr. Arthur Fiedler, as conductor of The Cecilia. At sight of him the audience "perked up" (as New Englanders say) and clapped him with uncommon warmth—all of which was good omen for his approaching days as conductor of The Pops. Gossip has hinted that some of the older members of the Symphony Orchestra might not care to play under a leader so much their junior. To the contrary: Mr. Fiedler is generally liked among his fellow-players.

As noted yesterday in a review, Dr. Koussevitzky has substituted Honegger's new Concerto for Violoncello, with Mr. Maréchal to play the solo-part, for the Prelude to Musorgsky's "Khovantchina" on the program of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge tomorrow. . . . Mr. Spalding, the violinist, is announced for a concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 16.

LEWISTON, ME.

SUN

53

CONCERNING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Sixth Symphony of Sibelius will be played for the first time in Boston by Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra at the Symphony concert Feb. 28 and again on March 1st. Of last Saturday's concert the Boston Evening Transcript says:

At the end of the Symphony Concert last Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky called upon the stage, to share the applause, the conductors of the two contributing choirs. As usual, Mr. Woodworth of the Radcliffe Choral Society was cordially received. Then came the turn of Mr. Arthur Fiedler, as conductor of The Cecilia. At sight of him the audience "perked up" (as New Englanders say) and clapped him with uncommon warmth—all of which was good omen for his approaching days as conductor of The Pops. Gossip has hinted that some of the older members of the Symphony Orchestra might not care to play under a leader so much their junior. To the contrary: Mr. Fiedler is generally liked among his fellow-players.

As noted Tuesday in a review, Dr. Koussevitzky has substituted Honegger's new Concerto for Violincello, with Mr. Marechal to play the solo-part, for the Prelude to Musorgsky's "Khovantchina" on the program of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge tomorrow . . . . Mr. Spalding, the violinist, is announced for a concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 16.

"RUSH SEATS" A TRADITION OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

The so-called "rush line" which stands on the front steps of Symphony Hall, Boston, each Friday afternoon before the symphony concert dates back to a custom of student seats, which is as old as the orchestra itself.

Back on the 80s when the Boston Symphony orchestra had just started, concerts were given only on Saturday nights, and students could gain admission to the final "dress" rehearsal each Friday afternoon by paying a few cents at the door. These Friday afternoon rehearsals became so popular, they were ultimately made regular concerts, although for many years they were referred to as "rehearsals." However, seats in the second balcony were still open to the first comer for the payment of 25 cents at the door. Since seats for the Symphony concerts were at a premium the system of a rush line and cash payment had to be used to prevent ticket speculation. The students are counted as they enter, and when the admissions exactly correspond with the number of seats available, the doors are closed, since no standing is allowed.

The "rush line" on days when music of special interest is to be performed reaches far around the block. The custom has been preserved, although for years the demand for subscription seats is such that any seats released each spring are allotted to the waiting lists for both the Friday and Saturday series, and there is therefore no open subscription sale.

The Boston Symphony orchestra pays its annual New Haven visit at Woolsey hall Wednesday night, March 5, tickets for which important musical event are now on sale at Steinert's and Loomis.'

54

1930 Herald Feb 22

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D major (with the Horn Call—B. & H. No. 31). Lazar, Concerto Grosso No. 1 for orchestra, in the Old Style. De Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" for piano (Mr. Sanroma) and orchestra. Gruenberg, Jazz Suite op. 38. The symphony was played for the first time at a concert of this orchestra. Lazar's Concerto was performed for the first time anywhere. The Jazz Suite, having been played at Cincinnati and Los Angeles, was heard in Boston for the first time.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to be heartily praised for acquainting the audience with Haydn's delightful symphony. When a symphony by this composer is chosen, it is usually one with which we are all thrice familiar. Arthur Nikisch had the courage to put the "Bear" symphony on a program, but in spite of the fact that the list is a long one, few conductors here have felt it their duty to let the audience know that Haydn wrote more than a half-dozen. These, by constant repetition, have become stale, so it is not surprising that the younger generation in the audience is inclined to regard Haydn's music as hopelessly out of date and boresome. This "Hunting Call" symphony is interesting not only because written in 1765 when Haydn was in the service of an Esterhazy prince, the score calls for four horns; not only because the finale, instead of a rollicking movement, is in the form of a theme with variations, but because the music itself is surprisingly fresh and charming. Solo instruments have so much to do—the first violin in the adagio; first violin, violoncello, flute, horns in the set of variations that the symphony may well be described as Concertante. There is no attempt at program music although the horns suggest the chase; and there is another title bestowed by some unknown commentator—"On the stand, or hiding place" from which the hunted may be slain as they pass by or approach. The richly ornamented adagio has nothing to do with the chase. In the lusty minuet one hears the stamping of the country folk—music that is far removed from the grace and elegance of the French dance. But in the finale, after the variations, the horn call brings the end. The whole symphony was admirably performed. The variations, melodious, not painfully complex, yet calling for tonal beauty and technical proficiency, served for the display of virtuoso qualities.

Filip Lazar, the Roumanian composer, living in Paris, is not an unfamiliar name. His "Gypsies" and a Scherzo have been performed under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. They left only a fleeting, if not pleasing impression. This concerto has solid substance without dryness. "In the Old Style"—in that of Handel rather than of Bach or Vivaldi. The first movement full of life and showing a technical authority that one missed in the preceding works is followed by a singularly impressive slow movement—and here was a not unwelcome touch of modernity through an emotional quality, somewhat sombre in its gravity; yet the modernity was in the musical thought, not in the harmonies, not in the instrumentation. The two following movements, interesting enough, even when there was purely scholastic treatment, have less individuality, and the theme of the final allegro is of a trivial lightness. The concerto well deserves a repetition.

De Falla's "Nights in Spanish Gardens," was performed here in 1924 when Mr. Monteux conducted and Mr. Gebhard was the pianist. The composer says that this music is not descriptive; it is merely expressive. Some no doubt found it full of "local color." A good many years ago Johannes Weber, the Alsatian, who was the first music critic of Le Temps in Paris, and held that position for a long time to the distress of musicians and those only "fond of music," wrote an article to prove that local color is chimera. For example, a Westerner, not knowing native Oriental music, but told by a program that a certain piece has eastern character, at once finds in that piece peculiar melodic characteristics, rhythms, gorgeous coloring that he fondly believes are Oriental, though a Hindu, a Persian, an Arabian, a Chinaman would hear only unmeaning, perhaps disagreeable noises, and wonder what it was all about. There is some truth in this article of the crotchety Johannes. But De Falla is a Spaniard, who sojourning in Paris for some years, was not unduly influenced so that he wished to be more French than the French composers. There are charming pages in the work played yesterday; there are also pages that are simply music without especial suggestiveness of Spain or any other country; pages indeed that suggest labor rather than racial spontaneity. Though the performance by the orchestra and the pianist was brilliant, a mere foreigner prefers to gain his impressions of Spain from Chabrier's "Espana," Debussy's "Evening in Grenada" and "Iberia"; Ravel's orchestral suite, and the compositions by Albainez and Granados.

There is no denying the fact that jazz has mightily influenced contemporary composers. There is no reason why works that show this influence should not be performed at symphony concerts. Whether jazz gains by symphonic and sophisticated treatment is a subject for those who write learnedly or chatter jauntily about music. We prefer our jazz to be naked and unashamed. Mr. Gruenberg is an accomplished musician. That is recognized by those who heard the symphonic poem played earlier in the season and know other works by him. In the "Jazz Suite" one misses the frank melodic lines that should be on the brink of vulgarity; one misses delirious rhythms; the crooning or compelling sensuality that should permeate and give a vitality that is not gained merely by daring instrumentation; the spirit of Harlem, or of the Congo as it appeared to Andre Gide and Paul Morand.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Florent Schmitt's Symphonic Study for Poe's "Haunted Palace"; the violin concerto and the symphony No. 6 by Sibelius. Mr. Burgin will be the soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

The Elm C

Ravel's "Bolero", the piece which has aroused more excitement than any music to be composed within the last decade, is to form a part of the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it plays in Woolsey Hall on March 5. The new music, these days, is not apt to arouse very much enthusiasm, but wherever the "Bolero" has been played it has been greeted with frenzied cheers, many thanks to Daggett Lee.

...dy sugge... interest-

ATURDAY MORNING

VARIOUS PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Post Feb 22

De Fallas "Noches," With Sanroma at the Piano, Outstanding

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

If the all-Debussy program of last week's pair of Symphony concerts taxed to an unusual degree the listeners' attention and was open to the charge of monotony, that of this week, which had its initial hearing yesterday, is both untaxing and varied. It might, indeed, but for the presence of some fine and some chic music, be described as a bag of orchestral tricks.

TICKLISH PART FOR HORN

To take things in the order in which they come there was by way of beginning a Symphony of Haydn in D major composed in 1765, in other words, when Haydn was 33 and had his most significant years still far ahead of him, and previously unheard at these concerts, if ever in Boston. The score bears the sub-title "With the horn call."

Haydn has written parts for four horns, a thing which many well informed musicians believe to have been first done in symphonic writing in Beethoven's Ninth, and the part for the first horn is not only prominent, it is at times decidedly ticklish. Of this player Haydn in the last movement expects the high F-sharp, and Mr. Boettcher, who distinguished himself as musician and virtuoso throughout the symphony, delivered it with fine quality of tone.

Audience Likes It

Moreover, Haydn writes in the second and fourth movements for solo violin and solo violoncello, so Mr. Burgin and Mr. Bedetti had also their innings. Curiously, the symphony sounds more Mozartean than Haydnish, proving perhaps, that the younger composer was after all truer to the 19th century norm. The homely sentiment and peasant-gaiety that we associate with the Haydn symphonies are in this rather formal yet on the whole decidedly pleasing music not in evidence. The performance bespoke much care in rehearsal and the audience obviously took pleasure in a work that Dr. Koussevitzky has done well to add to the repertory.

Of the next piece, a Concerto Grosso "in the old style," by the Roumanian Felip Lazar, a composer with whom Dr. Koussevitzky has already twice acquainted us, there is less to say.

If Lazar had, as the expression goes, put new wine into old bottles there might have been at least a stimulating result. But he has chosen rather to imitate the old win, and while his music has agreeable moments it left the auditor convinced that the "old style" was handled much better by those to whom it was the "new style" and hence a natural medium of expression. Yesterday's performance was, by the way, the first that the work has received.

Sanroma at Piano

Followed the musical climax of the concert in the shape of De Folla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Sanroma, the best possible choice among available pianists, to play the solo part. This was the second performance of the "Noches" at the Symphony concerts and it far out-classed its predecessor, thanks partly to Dr. Koussevitzky's ardor, his clear sympathy with this warmly-colored, romantic, pulsing music. For all concerned there were again deserved plaudits.

Once upon a time the presence on a Symphony programme of a piece bearing the title, "Jazz Suite" would have been a "front-page" sensation. But symphonic jazz has become an old and rather trite story, and the "Jazz Suite" of Eugene Gruenberg that brought yesterday's generally entertaining concert to a close in no way disturbed the peace of Symphony Hall. The audience clearly liked much of this music, and much of it is likeable. But it suffers from the limitations that must ever beset the attempt to endow jazz with company manners. When Mr. Gruenberg would make his jazz sophisticated, it lacked the proper "punch," and when he permitted himself to write the genuine article, or something closely approaching it, he achieved that which, while wholly appropriate to the "Egyptian Room," counted at a Symphony concert for nothing more or less than musical vulgarity.

22

NEW "JAZZ SUITE" SYMPHONY CONCERT

Louis Gruenberg's Music Wins Applause

Unfamiliar Haydn Symphony and Lazar Concerto Grosso Played

Globe Feb 22

Dr Koussevitzky chose for yesterday's symphony concert a program of unfamiliar music. Although only one of its four numbers, de Falla's "Noches" had previously been played at these concerts, and that but once, the audience applauded everything and everybody concerned with unusual cordiality. Even a "Jazz Suite" by Louis Gruenberg, containing a "fox trot," "Blues" and a "one-step," failed to mar the pleasure of the supposedly conservative Friday subscribers.

Mr Gruenberg, last represented on a Boston Symphony program by a conventional tone poem, "The Enchanted Isle," has also experimented with the timbers and rhythms of present day American popular music in his "Daniel Jazz," heard here two years ago at a concert of the Chamber Music Club. The "Jazz Suite" heard yesterday is one of the few successful attempts to write "symphonic jazz," in which a serious composer has succeeded in the difficult task of elaborating the dances of our day into relatively intricate musical patterns without becoming dull or pedantic.

Dr Koussevitzky, whose interpretations of all music, old and new, seldom stick very closely to the printed text, gave a curiously personal and original version of Mr Gruenberg's music. He does not, it would appear, ... the obstreperous insistant fundamental rhythms of jazz. So in Mr Gruenberg's fox trot and one-step he employed a "tempo rubato" which quite obscured the popular dance rhythms.

Young Americans hearing his version could not feel that this "Koussevitzkyized" music was jazz at all.

Lazar's Concerto Grosso No 1, "in the old style," was played yesterday for the first time anywhere. The composer, a young Rumanian living in Paris, has had two previous works introduced to the world here by Dr Koussevitzky. This concerto grosso is more appealing than the "Tziganes," and "Music for Orchestra" of Lazar.

He has written music almost devoid of polyphony, and with simple harmonies for the most part, into which he introduces, like so many plums in a pudding, the effects that please him in 18th century polyphonic music. This concerto is not to be compared with the works in which Stravinsky has been inspired by Bach and Handel, because Lazar's musical texture is so childishly simple, where Stravinsky is complex and profound.

The Haydn Symphony, "with the horn call" with which the concert began, was written almost 25 years earlier than the symphonies by which Haydn is commonly judged, those in the "Oxford" and "London" sets. It dates from 1765.

One hopes that the very hearty applause for this unknown Haydn work will encourage Dr Koussevitsky to dig up for us other unfamiliar works of Haydn and Mozart.

De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" seemed less interesting than his other orchestral works, despite Mr Sanroma's brilliant and musicianly playing of the piano solo part.

The program announced for next week includes Sibelius' violin concerto to be played by Richard Burgin, Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, and a new piece by Florent Schmitt.

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON MARCH 5

The superlative performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening, March 5, are indeed a thing to wonder at. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate. The simple facts of its history are self-explanatory.

In 1881 the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra, a rare phenomenon in those days. This noted musician, soldier, financier, and public-spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill its ranks and brought to this country one after another of the worlds greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the cumulative improvement of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra in its original form had only sixty players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of the day. The initial aims (always since adhered to) were that the musicians should play under one engagements; that artistic consideration should always be paramount, and that the conductor should be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot in those days. The policies, the programmes, even the venture itself were violently attacked and staunchly defended. But the wisdom of the founder was justified as each succeeding year of the orchestra added growth and success to the last. In 1900 Symphony Hall was built, to become the orchestra' special and permanent home.

The second conductor, William Gericke, had two terms (1884-9 and 1898-1906.) Through years of tireless training, this thorough and arduous musician gradually built up the fine ensemble for which the Boston Symphony orchestra has since held its special renown. In the intermim of Gericke's periods of service came Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian leader, and Emil Pauer condusted through 1893-8.

Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor

(Continued from Page Four.)

conductor in one orchestra and not debase their talents by routine from 1906 to 1918, with the exception of the years 1908-12, which were held by Max Fiedler. To Mr. Muck's exacting hand the great orchestra responded like a single, marvelously perfect instrument.

The Boston Symphony orchestra next had two French conductors—Henri Rabaud in the season of 1918-19, a distinguished musician and composer now head of the Paris Conservatoire—and Pierre Monteux (1919-24), who ably carried on the then established tradition of a finely blended ensemble.

In the autumn of 1924, Serge Koussevitzky first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. From Europe had come many reports of his remarkable qualities as a leader and as an artist. Expectations were more than fulfilled. America, having heard perhaps all the "great" conductors living, has found in Koussevitzky's leadership qualities which are said to be without equal.

With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader, it is not surprising that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day. There are waiting lines for every subscription series, and seats for any concert are at a premium.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, WHO WILL CONDUCT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AT WOOLSEY HALL MARCH 5

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY HIGHLY PRACTICED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which visits Woolsey Hall next week Wednesday evening as the concluding offering of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series, is easily the most popular musical organization ever to visit this city, which fact is attested to by the throngs of music lovers who attend the brilliant annual musical event. And not alone does New Haven "go strong" for the famous musical body of one hundred and ten musicians, for the popular appeal of the Boston Symphony is the same everywhere. Thus this city merely reflects the sentiments of other important musical center when it welcomes what is conceded in many quarters as being American's finest musical [illegible]

In the Minneapolis Star of October 31st, Mr. John Sherman had the following to say regarding the appearance of the Boston Symphony in that city: "Without giving way to the natural impulse to use superlatives, the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky must be conceded to be a great orchestra. First and foremost it is a marvelous unit, trained to the finest edge of technical perfection—a single musical instrument that plays as one man might. No music is so intricate or dazzling that it cannot be elucidated, with overpowering conviction, by the one hundred and ten men who make up its personel. Secondly Serge Koussevitzky is a genius whose strength and sensitivity and intelligence are everywhere apparent. A great clarifier and a great lover, his interpretations live and breathe; their appeal is so magnetic that the hearers' attention is riveted into an almost painful absorption. Koussevitzky's eloquence is so moving that one can hardly restrain the urge to shout and clap strangers on the back at the end of a performance."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

55

Boston Symphony Orchestra In Beethoven Festival Here

Mrs. Wilson-Greene announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give a festival of four performances of Beethoven music in Washington next December. The "Ninth Symphony," with 250 in chorus and famous soloists, will be a feature.

This is one of many specialties planned to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of that orchestra.

Music in Boston

monday feb 24

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A program bristling with novelties was offered by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the delectation of his audiences of Feb. 21 and 22 at the sixteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A Concerto Grosso No. 1 for orchestra, "in the old style," by Filip Lazar, had its first performance, from manuscript. We had been diverted three years earlier by the "Tziganes" of this composer, and by his "Music for an Orchestra" two years ago. On the latter of these occasions we congratulated Mr. Lazar on at least having refrained from following his master, Stravinsky, in the retreat to the eighteenth century. Our felicitations were premature. In his latest piece he has adopted Handel as his model. Yet compliments thus treated loses much of its native tang. Should not serious composers employ its devices where they are appropriate to the expression of a musical thought, rather than devote an entire suite to its exploitation?

We are becoming a little concerned over Dr. Koussevitzky's lapse into the soloist habit. One of the most attractive features of his prefecture has been the rarity of "assisting artists." Of late we have been having such assistance most of the time. Nor has this assistance been of unquestionable value in every instance. Fewer soloists, and those only of the first rank, would enhance enjoyment of the concerts. The Boston Symphony Orchestra does not need extraneous "attractions."

L. A. S.

To open the program, Dr. Koussevitzky had disinterred Haydn's Symphony in D major, B. & H., No. 31 ("with the Horn Call"). This proved refreshing, if only by way of contrast to the handful of Haydn symphonies which are endlessly repeated. Four horns are employed, probably for the first time in a symphony. There are solo passages for violin, violoncello, oboes and flute. The Finale is in the form of a theme and variations. There are pages in this work which are less than thrilling, but it was easily worth revival.

After a nostalgic performance of De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," with J. M. Sanroma as excellent pianist, came the first Boston performance of Louis Gruenberg's Jazz Suite for orchestra, which was runner-up to Bloch's "America" for Musical America's prize last year. As this work has already been reviewed in these columns, as performed by the orchestras of Cincinnati and Chicago, it does not require detailed comment. The composer has undoubtedly achieved his purpose of treating jazz symphonically, but there is some question whether it is desirable to make quite such a point of it. Jazz

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

"Bolero,' the latest score of Maurice Ravel which has had nation-wide attention this season, will be introduced to New Haven by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky when the Boston Symphony orchestra makes its annual visit to give a concert in Woolsey hall on Wednesday, March 5, at 8:15. The first appearance was given by Toscanini in New York last November. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to Boston on December 6 with such pronounced success that it was repeated in January. He has also played it in other cities which the orchestra has visited.

"Bolero" was written for Ida Rubinstein who danced to the music in Paris last summer, consists simply of a constant almost literal repetition of a theme in this characteristic Spanish rhythm. The piece begins pianissimo and increases gradually in tonal force until the long crescendo leads to a stupifying climax. To attain endless variety in color where there is not variety in notation and rhythm, this most skillful of French orchestrators uses almost every instrument in the orchestra in turn to state the theme as a solo. A drum gives the dance rhythm which is maintained throughout. A flute announces the theme which is subsequently repeated by the clarinet, oboe d'amore, bassoon saxophone and high saxophone. The solo trumpet and the trombone each state the theme with their characteristic color. Meanwhile the strings are introduced with combinations of wind instruments in gradually built up dynamics, while the constant beat of the drum likewise gradually grows stronger. The piece ends in what has been described as a tornado of sound, with a surprising modulation at the very last.

This Bolero, dedicated to Ida Rubinstein, was brought out by her and danced by her in Paris in November, 1928. Alexandre Benoist designed the settings and the costume to reppresent a score that Goya might have painted: a Spanish inn, with the dancer on a trestle table, men surrounding it. At first calm, the actors on the Parisian stage were little by little excited to frenzy as the dancer became more and more animated. Knives were drawn—the woman was tossed from arms to arms, until her partner intervened; they danced until quiet was restored. So was the scene described by French and English reporters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

It is an appropriate invitation which the Boston Symphony extends to Sir George Henschel to conduct a concert during next season, the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra, of which Henschel was the first conductor. He is 80 years of age and acceptance of the invitation is doubtful.

V

Concert-Chronicle

Old But New Mon Feb 25

IT would be easy enough, though scarcely accurate, to set down the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday as another Tuesday afternoon of "standard" classics. True the program comprised Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor (Op. 6, No. 1), Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H. 31) and Chaikovsky's Symphony, No. 6 in B minor ("The Pathetic"); superficially, the list presented a familiar aspect. The Symphony of Haydn, however, was not from hackneyed repertory, but the rarely heard Symphony "with the horn call," which Dr. Koussevitzky presented for the first time at the regular series of concerts last Friday and Saturday. Handel's Concerto Grosso suffered somewhat by its proximity to the Haydn revival. This remark is not to infer any opinion regarding the intrinsic merit of either piece, but the progressions of the Concerto Grosso, if not the composition itself, are quite familiar to the Boston public. The audience heard it attentively and with evident appreciation, then dismissed it with a round of polite applause. The string divisions of the orchestra played it with fine precision and with a unanimity of attack which is one of the orchestra's most celebrated virtues. Dr.Koussevitzky's interpretation was characteristically sympathetic, and in the third movement he led the musicians through a series of measures notably buoyant and carefully inflected.

The unfamiliar Symphony of Haydn was the event of the day. Its charming freshness was at once apparent. The four horns seated in their lonely prominence in the rearmost tier of seats announced its first cheerful notes. Henceforth their bright tones colored the entire piece. Scarcely less active were the other solo instruments—the 'cello, the violin, the flute and the oboes. Between the Concerto Grosso of Handel and the Symphony of Haydn, it was a day of brilliant individual performance. Balancing the light play of solo instruments against the happy harmonies of the complete ensemble, the symphony pursued its amiable course. At times the skill of the musicians and the ahriness of the music combined to carry the piece without obvious effort. Upon these occasions Dr. Koussevitzky dropped his stick motionless at his side and watched the measure pass in uninterrupted flow. The audience delighted in this music and its performance, took pleasure in recognizing the solo voices as they entered for their respective turns in the theme and variations and clapped with a spontaneous enthusiasm to match the brightness of the symphony itself. The Tuesday audience is not without discernment. Dr. Koussevitzky's interesting excursions into the unfamiliar music of the early composers are as much appreciated here as elsewhere.

Continued on Following Page

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

Possibly the listener looks forward more or less complacently to the "Pathetic" Symphony of Chaikovsky. "Popular Chaikovsky . . . almost old hat." The phrases slip out all too easily. During the concert, they take flight and vanish completely. The bright irresistible onward rush of the third movement sweeps the listener along in a state of ever mounting excitement. Dr. Koussevitzky once more lowers his stick and lets the music move of its own momentum. Despite the tradition of Symphony Hall, the audience breaks into applause at the pause between movements. The sincerety of emotion in the concluding Adagio combined with Dr. Koussevitzky's sympathetic approach creates a deep and lasting impression.

N. M. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON MARCH 5

The superlative performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening, March 5, are indeed a thing to wonder at. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate. The simple facts of its history are self-explanatory.

In 1881 the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra, a rare phenomenon in those days. This noted musician, soldier, financier, and public-spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill its ranks and brought to this country one after another of the worlds greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the cumulative improvement of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra in its original form had only sixty players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of the day. The initial aims (always since adhered to) were that the musicians should play under one engagements; that artistic consideration should always be paramount, and that the conductor should be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot in those days. The policies, the programmes, even the venture itself were violently attacked and staunchly defended. But the wisdom of the founder was justified as each succeeding year of the orchestra added growth and success to the last. In 1900 Symphony Hall was built, to become the orchestra' special and permanent home.

The second conductor, William Gericke, had two terms (1884-9 and 1898-1906.) Through years of tireless training, this thorough and arduous musician gradually built up the fine ensemble for which the Boston Symphony orchestra has since held its special renown. In the intermim of Gericke's periods of service came Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian leader, and Emil Pauer conducted through 1893-8.

Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor

(Continued from Page Four.)

conductor in one orchestra and not debase their talents by routine from 1906 to 1918

tion of

Sudden E
Shocks

1924, Serge ast crossed the At-become the conductor of
Boston Symphony orchestra.
From Europe had come many reports of his remarkable qualities as a leader and as an artist
Expectations were more than fu-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, WHO WILL CONDUCT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AT WOOLSEY HALL MARCH 5

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY HIGHLY PRACTICED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which visits Woolsey Hall next week Wednesday evening as the concluding offering of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series, is easily the most popular musical organization ever to visit this city, which fact is attested to by the throngs of music lovers who attend the brilliant annual musical event. And not alone does New Haven "go strong" for the famous musical body of one hundred and ten musicians, for the popular appeal of the Boston Symphony is the same everywhere. Thus this city merely reflects the sentiments of other important musical center when it welcomes what is conceded in many quarters as being American's finest musical body.

In the Minneapolis Star of October 31st, Mr. John Sherman had the following to say regarding the appearance of the Boston Symphony in that city: "Without giving way to the natural impulse to use superlatives, the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky must be conceded to be a great orchestra. First and foremost it is a marvelous unit, trained to the finest edge of technical perfection—a single musical instrument that plays as one man might. No music is so intricate or dazzling that it cannot be elucidated, with overpowering conviction, by the one hundred and ten men who make up its personel. Secondly Serge Koussevitzky is a controlling genius whose strength and sensitivity and intelligence are everywhere apparent. A great clarifier and a great lover, his interpretations live and breathe; their appeal is so magnetic that the hearers' attention is riveted into an almost painful absorption. Koussevitzky's eloquence is so moving that one can hardly restrain the urge to shout and clap strangers on the back at the end of a performance."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Boston Symphony Orchestra In Beethoven Festival Here

Mrs. Wilson-Greene announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give a festival of four performances of Beethoven music in Washington next December. The "Ninth Symphony," with 250 in chorus and famous soloists, will be a feature.

This is one of many specialties planned to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of that orchestra.

Music in Boston

Monday Feb 24

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A program bristling with novelties was offered by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the delectation of his audiences of Feb. 21 and 22 at the sixteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A Concerto Grosso No. 1 for orchestra, "in the old style," by Filip Lazar, had its first performance, from manuscript. We had been diverted three years earlier by the "Tziganes" of this composer, and by his "Music for an Orchestra" two years ago. On the latter of these occasions we congratulated Mr. Lazar on at least having refrained from following his master, Stravinsky, in the retreat to the eighteenth century. Our felicitations were premature. In his latest piece he has adopted Handel as his model. Yet compliments are due him on another score. Unlike some of the musical regressionists, Lazar has not grown dull in his historiology. In contrary motion to Respighi's Roman tours, his third chapter is more pleasing than its predecessors. The third movement of the piece, Allegretto, seemed trivial: but the other three are concerned with interesting material, well handled. The most conspicuous feature of this Concerto, though, is its curiously un-Handelian emotional quality. The composer, using "the old style," has nevertheless imbued it with a tense quality which is not to be found in the model.

To open the program, Dr. Koussevitzky had disinterred Haydn's Symphony in D major, B. & H., No. 31 ("with the Horn Call"). This proved refreshing, if only by way of contrast to the handful of Haydn symphonies which are endlessly repeated. Four horns are employed, probably for the first time in a symphony. There are solo passages for violin, violoncello, oboes and flute. The Finale is in the form of a theme and variations. There are pages in this work which are less than thrilling, but it was easily worth revival.

After a nostalgic performance of De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," with J. M. Sanroma as excellent pianist, came the first Boston performance of Louis Gruenberg's Jazz Suite for orchestra, which was runner-up to Bloch's "America" for Musical America's prize last year. As this work has already been reviewed in these columns, as performed by the orchestras of Cincinnati and Chicago, it does not require detailed comment. The composer has undoubtedly achieved his purpose of treating jazz symphonically, but there is some question whether it is desirable to make quite such a point of it. Jazz thus treated loses much of its native tang. Should not serious composers employ its devices where they are appropriate to the expression of a musical thought, rather than devote an entire suite to its exploitation?

We are becoming a little concerned over Dr. Koussevitzky's lapse into the soloist habit. One of the most attractive features of his prefecture has been the rarity of "assisting artists." Of late we have been having such assistance most of the time. Nor has this assistance been of unquestionable value in every instance. Fewer soloists, and those only of the first rank, would enhance enjoyment of the concerts. The Boston Symphony Orchestra does not need extraneous "attractions."

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

"Bolero," the latest score of Maurice Ravel which has had nation-wide attention this season, will be introduced to New Haven by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky when the Boston Symphony orchestra makes its annual visit to give a concert in Woolsey hall, on Wednesday, March 5, at 8:15. The first appearance was given by Toscanini in New York last November. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to Boston on December 6 with such pronounced success that it was repeated in January. He has also played it in other cities which the orchestra has visited.

"Bolero" was written for Ida Rubinstein who danced to the music in Paris last summer, consists simply of a constant almost literal repetition of a theme in this characteristic Spanish rhythm. The piece begins pianissimo and increases gradually in tonal force until the long crescendo leads to a stupifying climax. To attain endless variety in color where there is not variety in notation and rhythm, this most skillful of French orchestrators uses almost every instrument in the orchestra in turn to state the theme as a solo. A drum gives the dance rhythm which is maintained throughout. A flute announces the theme which is subsequently repeated by the clarinet, oboe d'amore, bassoon saxophone and high saxophone. The solo trumpet and the trombone each state the theme with their characteristic color. Meanwhile the strings are introduced with combinations of wind instruments in gradually built up dynamics, while the constant beat of the drum likewise gradually grows stronger. The piece ends in what has been described as a tornado of sound, with a surprising modulation at the very last.

This Bolero, dedicated to Ida Rubinstein, was brought out by her and danced by her in Paris in November, 1928. Alexandre Benoist designed the settings and the costume to reppresent a score that Goya might have painted: a Spanish inn, with the dancer on a trestle table, men surrounding it. At first calm, the actors on the Parisian stage were little by little excited to frenzy as the dancer became more and more animated. Knives were drawn—the woman was tossed from arms to arms, until her partner intervened; they danced until quiet was restored. So was the scene described by French and English reporters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

It is an appropriate invitation which the Boston Symphony extends to Sir George Henschel to conduct a concert during next season, the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra, of which Henschel was the first conductor. He is 80 years of age and acceptance of the invitation is doubtful.

Concert-Chronicle

Old But New Jan Feb 28

IT would be easy enough, though scarcely accurate, to set down the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday as another Tuesday afternoon of "standard" classics. Truly the program comprised Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor (Op. 6, No. 1), Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H. 31) and Chaikovsky's Symphony, No. 6 in B minor ("The Pathetic"); superficially, the list presented a familiar aspect. The Symphony of Haydn, however, was not from hackneyed repertory, but the rarely heard Symphony "with the horn call," which Dr. Koussevitzky presented for the first time at the regular series of concerts last Friday and Saturday. Handel's Concerto Grosso suffered somewhat by its proximity to the Haydn revival. This remark is not to infer any opinion regarding the intrinsic merit of either piece, but the progressions of the Concerto Grosso, if not the composition itself, are quite familiar to the Boston public. The audience heard it attentively and with evident appreciation, then dismissed it with a round of polite applause. The string divisions of the orchestra played it with fine precision and with a unanimity of attack which is one of the orchestra's most celebrated virtues. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was characteristically sympathetic, and in the third movement he led the musicians through a series of measures notably buoyant and carefully inflected.

The unfamiliar Symphony of Haydn was the event of the day. Its charming freshness was at once apparent. The four horns seated in their lonely prominence in the rearmost tier of seats announced its first cheerful notes. Henceforth their bright tones colored the entire piece. Scarcely less active were the other solo instruments—the 'cello, the violin, the flute and the oboes. Between the Concerto Grosso of Handel and the Symphony of Haydn, it was a day of brilliant individual performance. Balancing the light play of solo instruments against the happy harmonies of the complete ensemble, the symphony pursued its amiable course. At times the skill of the musicians and the aliveness of the music combined to carry the piece without obvious effort. Upon these occasions Dr. Koussevitzky dropped his stick motionless at his side and watched the measure pass in uninterrupted flow. The audience delighted in this music and its performance, took pleasure in recognizing the solo voices as they entered for their respective turns in the theme and variations and clapped with a spontaneous enthusiasm to match the brightness of the symphony itself. The Tuesday audience is not without discernment. Dr. Koussevitzky's interesting excursions into the unfamiliar music of the early composers are as much appreciated here as elsewhere.

Continued on Following Page

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

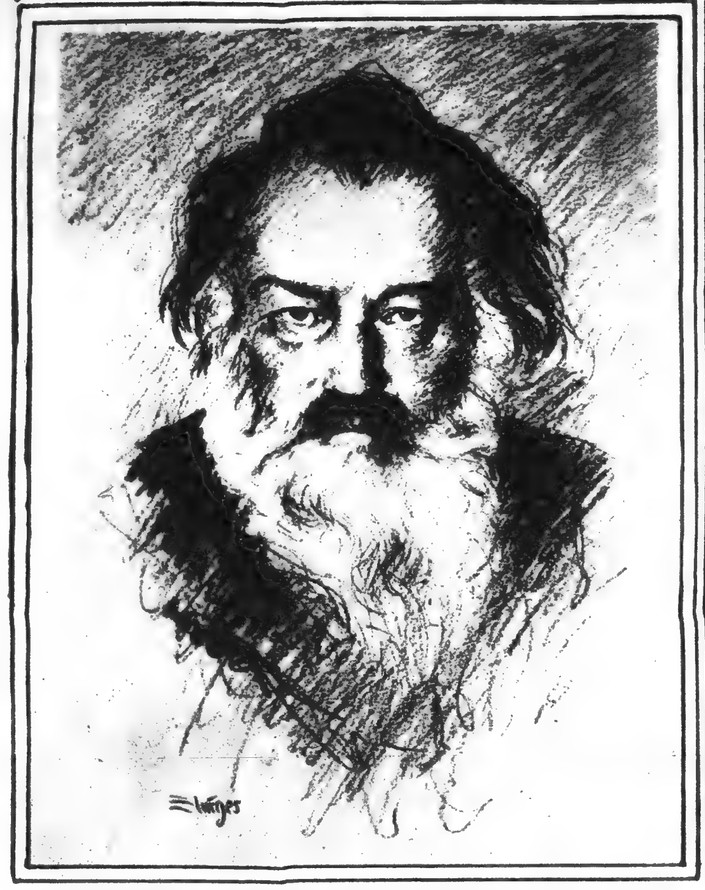
Possibly the listener looks forward more or less complacently to the "Pathetic" Symphony of Chaikovsky. "Popular Chaikovsky . . . almost old hat." The phrases slip out all too easily. During the concert, they take flight and vanish completely. The bright irresistible onward rush of the third movement sweeps the listener along in a state of ever mounting excitement. Dr. Koussevitzky once more lowers his stick and lets the music move of its own momentum. Despite the tradition of Symphony Hall, the audience breaks into applause at the pause between movements. The sincerety of emotion in the concluding Adagio combined with Dr. Koussevitzky's sympathetic approach creates a deep and lasting impression.

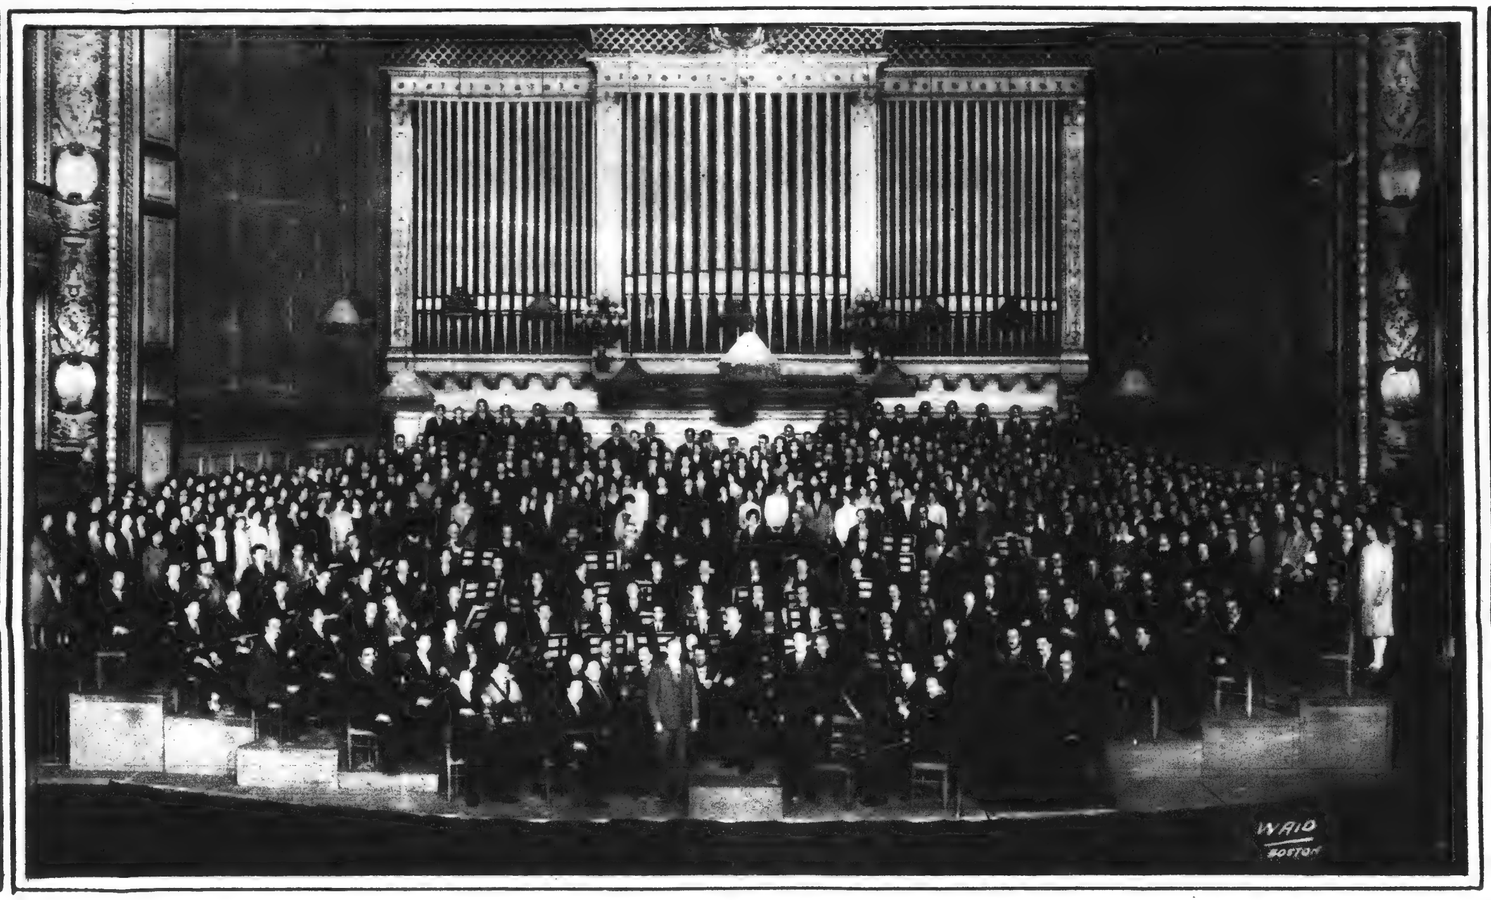
N. M. J.

BRAHMS FESTIVAL TO BE GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA UNDER DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

A landmark in the history of music in Boston will be the Brahms Festival, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in Symphony Hall, on the successive days of March 21-26. The principal orchestral, choral and smaller works of the German master will be presented by the orchestra in collaboration with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe, and the soloists here pictured.



JOHANNES BRAHMS, noted composer, who will be honored March 21 to 26, when many of the works of the German master will be presented at Symphony hall.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA with choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe, who will be heard under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky during the Brahms festival.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra as they present, in collaboration with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe and the soloists shown below, the principal orchestral, choral and smaller works of Johannes Brahms. (Garo)

(At right) FRASER GANGE, baritone.

(At left) JEANNETTE VREELAND, soprano.

(At left) MARGARET MATZENAUER, contralto.

(At right) ARTUR SCHNABEL, pianist.

FILMED AS BOUND

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

57

Rounding Out Sibelius Upon Boston Ears

Dr. Koussevitzky Presents the Sixth Symphony of the Finnish Master

FOR the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky turns to Sibelius, with the familiar Violin-Concerto and the unfamiliar Sixth Symphony (in D minor) filling half of the program. To the conductor the habitués of Symphony Hall owed the first performances in America of Sibelius's Seventh Symphony—as some have it "without equal in the whole range of works cast in the symphonic form." In turn, his revelation of the unexpected delights of Sibelius's Third Symphony surprised even those most "in the know." Now he would do as much for this Sixth Symphony, hitherto heard in America at two concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Mr. Stokowski, on April 23-24, 1926. By that time the "new" Symphony was at least three years old. One of the admirable "miniature essays," published by the English house of Chester gives the date of composition as 1921. Mr. Gilman, unwilling to commit himself in the programbook of the Philadelphia Orchestra, notes that the "Dictionary of Modern Music and Musicians" prefers 1923. Grove's Dictionary also affirms that year. Then one discovers an illuminating article on "The Nationalism of Sibelius," by Mr. Watson Lyle in the Musical Quarterly, which gives plausible solution. The symphony "is dated 1921," but was published in 1923. The printed score itself no indication whatsoever, not even a date of copyright. The symphony was published in Stockholm by A. Hirsch, and is dedicated to Dr. Wilhelm Stenhammer. The scoring is relatively modest in these days of huge orchestras.

The little essay above cited speaks of the Sixth Symphony as one "which again seems to have sprung from the primeval soil of Finland." Says Mr. Lyle, whose principal purpose is to question many of the accepted notions concerning Sibelius: "The nationalism in it takes shape as an expression of the atmosphere of the countryside rather than of the humanity of the composer's native land. The form does not adhere strictly to classical tradition. Sibelius goes further in his enomomy of material [Mr. Lyle had just pointed out an increase in these matters in the Fifth Symphony], and there is again the closely knit constructive manner to which attention has been directed." We have to do then, with a terse symphony, which is also pleasant symphony in every sense.

There are four movements: I, Allegro molto moderato; II, Allegretto moderato; III, Poco vivace; IV, Allegro molto. Thus, it was pointed out straightway, a symphony without a slow movement. But a parallel comes quickly to mind. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is also without a slow division. His second movement is also an Allegretto; and this Allegretto is followed by a Presto even as Sibelius's is followed by a Vivace. But this very Allegretto of Beethoven is frequently taken as a dirge-like movement—whether rightly or wrongly, is not here in question. For even when it is taken thoroughly in the allegretto-mood, it still fills perfectly the place and the function of a slow movement. Similarly, this second movement of Sibelius has its theme marked carefully "espressivo," giving it a serenely lyrical character.

Scholars are apt to discuss learnedly the relation (oftener the lack of relation) between the movements of a symphony; to bewail the fact that often the last movement is not a cumulative climax to the whole; is, to the contrary, in many cases no more than a superficially exciting conclusion. They are wont also to point to Bruckner and to Mahler, fathered by Schubert, as most successful in plannnig a symphony on a gradually ascending scale in unfolding and expanding scheme. To the list of symphonies which step by step lead onward to larger and larger things, until final consumation is reached, may be added this Sixth Symphony of Sibelius.

The first movement is in many portions misty, which adjective does not mean gloomy. It is only with difficulty that one seizes upon measures which may be dignified by the term, "themes." Here and there certain phrases, more definitely formed than others, emerge from the general texture. There is for example a songful passage in thirds, heard first in flutes, which singles itself out, arrests for a moment the attention. There is, again, a lyric line for 'cellos and bass-clarinet, sufficiently definite. But it would be a rash analyst who would designate these as "first and second theme." The tonality is as vague as the "thematic" (?) writing. There is no key-signature. But one must look very closely to discover whether one is in C major, or A minor, or one of the old church-modes—and not always does one discover indisputably the answer. In fact the first eight measures and the last are definitely in the Dorian mode. There is much exceedingly close writing in the middle and moderately high registers. There are thus long stretches without double bass. As the 'cello often sings the song of the first violins an octave lower, the viola is in many portions the real bass of the orchestra. The orchestral texture may be found nowhere else than in Sibelius. Blocks of one compactly woven web of tonal strands in a single tonal color take turn about with similar blocks in another color. Here is, in truth a misty Finland. Here is also, one would like to hazard, the most original musician of the age, Jan Sibelius.

Out of this partially formed beginning one comes into the second movement. Cheerfulness here prevails. One can recognize the themes easily; sing them lightly along with the composer. Chords in drab colors from wood-winds make beginning. Then the gentle, ingratiating theme from violins. Through several developments it is carried, to several climaxes it mounts. Then another enigmatical portion, in steadily flowing sixteenth notes, brings the movement to an end. By no formal dogma may this closing section be justified. As a poetical reference back to the uncertainties of the first movement it has its place.

The scherzo, for such in reality is the Poco Vivace, brings further increase of life. A typical scherzo-ryhthm alternates with another theme in thirds, also in the flutes, but much more fully developed, more perfectly formed than that of the first movement. There is also a choral-like theme, gently played, in even notes, once more first heard in flutes. . . . The last movement is plainly the goal toward all which that has gone before is striving. No display of unnecessary brilliance here. Rather an unflagging increase of vitality. It is the longest and most highly organized movement of the four. A theme is at once heard energetic in the first part; songful ('cellos above violas in sixths) in the second portion. There is also an actively rhythmed theme first heard in the massed violins and violas, G-string for violins. These furnish the material of the movement. There are also, near the end, some references to the first movement. The close is one of spacious breadths and largeness, but never showy or brilliant. A. H. M.

"The Sixth Symphony is not so highly concentrated as the Seventh; there are four movements. But they contain so little waste-matter that the whole work is over and done with in thirty-five minutes. Sibelius seldom repeats an idea; if he recalls one it is to modify it somewhere, either by breaking up the sequence of the notation—it is hardly possible to speak of melodies in the later Sibelius—or by a rhythmical readjustment, or by some unexpected mingling of a phrase with another—a combination which, until it has been achieved, has never been suggested to the ordinary ear. Yet when these themes or short figures are brought together the effect is of a piece of inevitable counterpoint. Sibelius is fond of taking the last few notes of a phrase and using them as a fresh idea. Ideas indeed breed ideas throughout the work. It is all done by note-spinning of the utmost spontaneity and mastery. And with all this profusion there is no discursiveness. Sibelius gets his symphony along on the principle of continuous development.

"The mood of the music is unchanging; it is that of a nature-piece—bleak and without sunshine, yet vital and multitudinous. It is almost impossible to give even a broad hint of the 'meaning' of music such as this. Sibelius strips the orchestra of its customary emotional and picturesque suggestiveness; none of the 'reach-me-down' symbols of expression are wanted for his purpose. Though the symphony tells of Sibelius's country, of its fitful summer and its hard, stark winter, there is no obvious tone-painting. The music is subjective—it is Sibelius, his way of experiencing life, turned for the while into sound. And, like most big men, he is representative of his race. . . . It is his ideas, his intellectual and emotional energy, that are unique. So finely does he write for the orchestra, according to the greyness of his æsthetic plan, that it is difficult for us to think of any one of his themes or figures apart from the instruments that play them. To describe his music as essentially cerebral is not to imply that it is without blood. Stronger and more manly music has not been written since Beethoven."

To these paragraphs may be added others by the reviewer of concerts for the Manchester Guardian, who heard this Sixth Symphony from Sir Henry Wood in the winter of 1926-27. Says Mr. Cardus:

Bach via Schoenberg

Another New Piece for the Symphony Concerts This Week

ONCE more Schmitt's "Study" (in tones) for Poe's tale of "The Haunted Palace" has been dropped from a program at the Symphony Concerts. Instead, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will play on Friday and Saturday for the first times in Boston, Schönberg's transcription of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat for Organ. The piece was heard in Berlin last autumn and warmly received; likened even to his masterly transcriptions of two of Bach's Choral-Preludes, already known to the Symphony Concerts. Said the correspondent of The Musical Courier:

> A novelty in the form of Bach's Organ Prelude in E-flat, arranged for orchestra by Arnold Schönberg, opened Furtwängler's second symphony concert of the season. For once Schönberg had created something in which his masterly workmanship could be appreciated and admired by the general public. Even coupled with Bach's simple themes and clear construction, Schönberg's harmonies were entirely inoffensive and, probably for the first time within memory, there was not a single hiss from the audience, nothing but hearty applause.
>
> Consequent revision of the program adds to it the Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde." The numbers from Sibelius are unchanged.

Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody On Boston Symphony Program

Ernest Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody, "Schelomo" ("Solomon"), a score for cello solo which has contributed to the fame of this composer perhaps as much as any single piece, will have an unprecedented performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New Haven when Dr. Koussevitzky gives the solo part to four violoncellists, to be played in unison. For the broad and sombre declamation of this solo part as conceived by Bloch, probably no cellist living could provide ample tone. Dr. Koussevitzky will first try this experiment at the concert of next week's tour.

Ernest Bloch, born in Geneva in 1880, has since 1916 made his home in this country. Until recent years, practically all of his compositions had a decided Hebraic strain. Ernest Bloch, who lives in San Francisco, has identified himself with this country and accordingly composed his prize Rhapsody, "America," for orchestra and chorus which was performed by every large orchestra in the country last season.

Bloch thus described the racial strain in his earlier scores: "It is not my purpose, not my desire, to attempt a 'reconstitution' of Jewish music, or to base my works on melodies more or less authentic. I am not an archaeologist. I hold it of first importance to write good, genuine music, my music. It is the Jewish soul that interest me, the complex, glowing, agitated soul, that I feel vibrating throughout the Bible: the freshness and naivete of the Patriarchs; the violence that is evident in the prophetic books; the savage love of justice; the despair of the Preacher of Jerusalem; the sorrow and the immensity of the Book of Job; the sensuality of the Song of Songs. All this is in us, all this is in me, and it is the better part of me. It is all this that I endeavor to hear in myself and to transcribe in my music; the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers day down in our soul."

Guido M. Gatti gave the following account of "Schelomo" in La Critica Musicale, April 1920:

"The violoncello, with its ample breadth of phasing, now melodic and with moments of superb lyricism, now declamatory and with robustly dramatic lights and shades, lends itself to a reincarnation of Solomon in all his glory, surrounded by his thousand wives and concubines, with his multitude of slaves and warriors behind him. His voice resounds in the devotional silence, and the sentences of his wisdom sing into the heart as the seed into a fertile soil:

At times the sonorous voice of the violoncello is heard predominate amid a breathless and fateful obscurity throbbing with persestent rhythms: The entire discourse of the soloist, vocal rather than instrumental, seems like musical expression intimately conjoined with the Talmudic prose. The pauses, the repttitions of entire passages, the leaps of a double octave, the chromatic progressions, all find their analogues in the Book of Ecclesiastes—in the fairly epigraphic reiteration of the admonitions ('and all is vanity and vexation of spirit'), in the unexpected shifts from one thought to another, in certain crescendi of emotion that end in explosions of anger or grief uncontrolled."

Programs in Prospect

At his concert tomorrow afternoon in Jordan Hall, Mr. Orlov will play a "Sonata of Beethoven in E-flat"—probably that of Opus 27; Schumann's "Papillons"; two of Skriabin's Studies; numbers from Chopin and Debussy.

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary matinée of the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Tuesday, March 11:

Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea".....Debussy
Bolero .....Ravel
(Last Time at These Concerts)
Symphony in D minor.....Franck

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, March 14 and 15:

Sonata in G major.....Galliard
(Transcribed for Small Orchestra by M. Steinberg)
Assyrian Bas-Reliefs .....Martelli
(First Times in America)
Alpine Symphony .....Strauss

From Mr. Spalding, the violinist, for his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 16:

Sonata in G major.....Bach
(First Time in Boston)
Allegro .....Padre Martini
Fantasia in C major for Violin and Piano, Op. 159 .....Schumann
Spanish Symphony .....Lalo
Arethusa's Fountain .....Szymanovski
At the Spring—Evening Song.....Schumann
La Campanella .....Paganini

At the concert of chamber music, on Tuesday evening, March 25, in the approaching Brahms Festival at Symphony Hall, Mr. Schnabel, the pianist who comes oversea especially for it, will play the three Intermezzi and the Rhapsody of Opus 119. Brahms wrote no richer piano-pieces. At the same concert, Mme. Matzenauer, late of the Metropolitan Opera House, will sing four of his songs: "Sapphische Ode"; "von ewiger Liebe"; "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer"; "Meine Li be ist grün." With the Burgin Quartet, Mr. Schnabel will also play the piano-part of the Quintet in F minor.

Franz Kneisel

On Boston Boards

Shakspeare from Chicago

AT LAST the repertory comes to hand for the fortnight of Shakspeare that Fritz Leiber and his company will proffer to Boston under the auspices of the Chicago Shakspeare Society—a "civic" theater in the better sense of that threadbare word. They will begin their stay at the Wilbur on Monday, March 10; act ten plays through sixteen performances, distributed as follows:

"King Lear"—Monday, March 10; Friday, March 21.

"Hamlet"—Tuesday, March 11; Saturday afternoon, March 15; Mon-

Cast
$1.50

Amusements

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

10

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

No Lesser Names Upon The Program

Sibelius, Wagner, Bach, Stock The Symphony Concert, Schoenberg Aiding

HALF the Symphony Concert of yesterday—the undisturbed half through the permutations of the week—fell to the music of Jan Sibelius. Again, after only a twelfth-month, Mr. Burgin played the solo-part in the Violin-Concerto of 1905. (Needless to say, a public that the longer it knows him, the more admires him, welcomed the concert-master warmly; applauded him heartily; renewed its mood when, for the Prelude to "Tristan," he returned to his customary seat.) For the first time in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky also produced Sibelius's Sixth Symphony of 1921—the only one in the series of seven hitherto unheard at Symphony Hall. (Some, noting the opening and the closing measures assign it to the key of D minor. The program-book preferred to leave it keyless).

To both Concerto and Symphony the audience gave close attention and generous appreciation—so far as clapping may go. How much each one in it enjoyed the pieces may be left to his, or her, musical conscience and perception. Certainly Sibelius is established composer at Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke, in his second incarnation as conductor, introduced him. Dr. Muck fostered him. Mr. Monteux returned to him. Dr. Koussevitzky cultivates him. In Boston, in degree also in New York and Philadelphia, no living composer sits more securely in the standard repertory. Yet whenever a new, or an old piece, by Sibelius is played in London, in Paris, in the German capitals of music, there are apologies. He is not a popular composer (they run) but consider his unique quality and consequent deserts. In American concert-halls we may lack traditions. Where they prevail, they sometimes make for closed perceptions.

After all these years and schooling, the presumption is that most of us encounter Sibelius with prepared minds. With nearly one voice the authorities have told us that he is pre-eminently a racial composer. In his music, whether it is as banal as "Finlandia" or as exalted as the Seventh Symphony, we are to discover the Finnish temperament, react to the Finnish spirit. (The truth is that at first hand, most of us know nothing of either.) Into tones he translates Finnish legend; often, as in "The Swan of Tuonela" or "Tapiola," both the fable and the musical vesture illude us. We are told that he conjures his music out of Finnish landscape; over it play the lights and airs of lakes and forests; to the swift summer, to the long winter, it moves and tingles. (But how few of us have any acquaintance with the Finnish scene, except as the betraveled musical geographers conduct us thither.)

Similarly we are presumed to be instructed in many a musical idiosyncrasy of the matured Sibelius. We expect him to be terse. Though it marshals four movements, the Symphony of yesterday continued through only thirty-five minutes; while the Concerto, earlier by sixteen years, seemed long and expansive beside it. Orchestrally, we should know that Sibelius confides much to the string choir, though of late under modernist preachment and example it has gone out of the fashion; that he is wary of the percussion-corner; that he shuns decorative instrumentation and pomps of sound; that in and out of tonal mists his melodies or motivs pierce and vanish; that to his will he bends theory and practice—orthodox or innovating—and usually gains his end.

Other characteristic procedures are counted equally familiar to those that hear—the use of short motivs; the play of rhythmic figures and rhythmic dialogue; the birth of a new-found idea from an expiring phrase; shadowy thematic definition; the avoidance of symmetries and other formalisms; the preference in each piece for a single prevailing color; concision yet large spacing; spare frame, stripped harmonies, yet endless inventive resource as the musical thought or feeling passes from instrument to instrument or from group to group. So onward, were newspaper columns desirable avenues of technical exposition.

Yet is it not the truth that in the concert-hall, in the actual presence of two such pieces as the Concerto and the Symphony of yesterday, the listener sloughs away this foreknowledge; tests next to none of these expectations; hears engrossed by a musical narrative; cares not a jot for the Finnish temperament or the Finnish landscape? Which is only to say that Sibelius's riper music is self-contained and self-communicative; interesting, illuding and impressive by what it is and by the course it runs. Sibelius unfolds or suggests a musical idea; amplifies or diversifies it; out of it or its ramifications breeds others; ceases, often abruptly, before he has exhausted them; again recalls them; finally, as in this Sixth Symphony, magnifies them into mounting unity and significance. Or he insinuates an atmosphere; spins it out of figures; weaves it into measure after measure; thickens or thins it with harmonic or instrumental color. After twenty years, the Violin-Concerto still expands with mental, musical, emotional energy. Beginning hazily, the Sixth Symphony clears, brightens, gathers into the vital, ized but measured fullness of the close.

We listeners are caught into the tonal progress; listen to a musical tale that is told; hear not of Finland, think hardly at all of procedures; are absorbed in the thought, the speech, the revelation of a mind and spirit whose means of expression is symphonic music, written so close-knit that the idea and the instrument, the sound and the suggestion, are as one. The interest, the impression, of Sibelius's pages is not "literary" or pictorial. To little purpose do the musical geographers unroll their wordy panoramas. No more is that residue theoretical or formal. The dry-as-dusts may analyze Sibelius's "innovations" and technical "idiosyncrasies" until they choke. For us others enough that he writes a subjective music, therein and thereby disclosing a strange, solitary, self-immersed man. For such ears, Sibelius's tonal narrative tells the tale of his mental and spiritual experiences in a speech of his own and in the atmosphere in which he underwent or recalls them. By such quality is his music a wholly individual expression, akin to Blake's poems or Thoreau's prose. It is by no means certain that Sibelius's symphonies are a poetry of music as we use the word with Mozart or Schubert, Wagner or Debussy. But they are of its most penetrating and significant prose.

—

Disappointed by Florent Schmitt's tonal "Study" for a tale of Poe—after all Schmitt is not modern-classic but only pre-war—Dr. Koussevitzky harked back to Bach's Brandenburg Concerto for Violin, Flute, Oboe and Trumpet, in which Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gilet and Mager might once more find virtuoso opportunity. Before he had quite decided, into his hands came a desired but delayed score—of Schönberg's version for orchestra of an Organ Prelude and Organ-Fugue of Bach by the transcriber joined. On the instant he substituted it, as was evident yesterday in a performance occasionally more eager than measured. The substitution cost the diligent program-editor a dozen learned pages; otherwise all concerned were gainers. Schönberg made his first transcriptions on commission — of two Choral-Preludes, heard impressively at the Symphony Concerts two or three seasons ago. Now seemingly his own impulse prompted him to as admirable work.

It is hardly necessary to renew the debate—too much like the controversies of Omar Khayyam's quatrain—over arrangements from Bach in other media than that for which he wrote a given piece. The demand for orchestral Bach exceeds the supply. Conductors and audiences both crave it; while the Brandenburg Concertos and the occasional Suites are not inexhaustible. Twentieth-century ears easily hear Bach's organ-pieces in terms of a modern orchestra. Conductors, like Mahler, Wood, Stokowski, have made transcriptions for personal use. Schönberg, arranging as composer, hands his, like Elgar, to the general concert-room. Once more the purists will demur loftily. The pleasured will far outnumber them.

From moment to moment this orchestral version of Prelude and Fugue in E-flat sounds uncannily organ-like. Out of the orchestra come the very strands, texture, movement, voices of an organ-piece. A master-organist rather than a transcribing composer and an imparting conductor might be playing upon a human keyboard, pedals, stops. Much else in Schönberg's version has a quasi-independent existence. He uses Bach's subject-matter, follows Bach's courses; yet gives to the material and development a new accent and quality. They become not only orchestral, but modernly orchestral. They sound not as Bach sounded to burghers, or musicians, in the Thomas-Church at Leipzig, but as he sounds, under other possessions, across a twentieth-century auditorium. The richness of the sonorities, the variety and interplay of tonal color, the intensive harmonies, warm the ear. Incisiveness of outline and energy of accent quicken the mind. Often the Fugue proceeds in a new vitality and urgency. Occasionally, Schönberg's ingrained fondness for minutiæ stays the large unfolding of the Prelude. Everywhere else a Bach come into a new age and tempered to it: a Schönberg not too often theorizing or pedantic; both, therefore, stirring to hear.

With the Prelude and the Closing Scene from Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde," Dr. Koussevitzky, courting large contrasts to Schönberg and Sibelius, ended the concert. There have been occasions to demur to his Wagner, even to his version of these excerpts, deeply as they stir him. Now he has clarified, ripened and enlarged performance. The veritable Wagner, at the acme of passion and splendor he now sets free. An orchestra, as sensuous as it was sonorous, gave both voice.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth visit to New York to give a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon March 6 and 8. On the two programs, Dr. Koussevitzky will give the first New York performances of Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," which was first performed in Boston in February.

The Thursday program will open with a little known symphony in D major by Haydn entitled, "With the Horn Call." This is probably the first case in which four horns were used in a symphony. Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" will also be played. The solo part which the composer intended as the voice of Solomon will be played not by one cello, but by four cellos in unison. Bach's prelude and fugue in E flat (Schenberg arrangement) will conclude the program.

At the Saturday afternoon concert, in addition to Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," Sibelius's symphony No. 6 and his violin concerto played with Richard Burgin as soloist and the Lazar concerto No. 1 for orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall on its fourth visit this season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. He will give the first New York presentation of Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," performed in Boston Feb. 21. The Thursday program will open with a little known symphony in D major by Haydn entitled "With the Horn Call." Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," with Jean Bedetti as cello soloist, and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E Flat also will be played at Thursday's concert. On Saturday, Sibelius's Symphony No. 6 and his Violin Concerto and Filip Lazar's Concerto Grosso No. 1 will be introduced with the Gruenberg work.

MUSIC.

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

It was announced a week ago that the program of the Boston Symphony concert of yesterday would comprise Florent Schmitt's "Study of Poe's 'Haunted Palace'"; Sibelius's Violin Concerto and Symphony, No. 6.

Schmitt's "Study" was reserved for a later occasion. The program then read: Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; the Violin Concerto and symphony by Sibelius; Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Late in the week the score and parts of Schoenberg's transcription for orchestra of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat major were received. Bach's Brandenburg Concerto was thrown overboard, but the last change was made too late for the Program Book, which necessarily contained no note about the transcription and retained the pages about Bach's Concerto.

The program finally presented was as follows: Bach-Schoenberg, Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat major transcribed for orchestra. Sibelius, Violin Concerto (Richard Burgin, violinist). Sibelius, Symphony No. 6. Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

These moderns will not let Bach alone. What do they not do to him? The organ Prelude and Fugue transcribed by Schoenberg were originally separate compositions, that is not compositions of one jet. The fugue is the one known in England and this country as the "Saint Anne" fugue because there is a similarity between the first notes of the fugue's subject and those of the familiar, stately psalm or hymn tune. The authorship of this tune is ascribed to Dr. Croft, but it is said that the first strain of it is from a French chanson of the 16th century. There are some who will resent the transcription for full orchestra, seeing in it only Schoenberg's desire to show ingenuity in orchestration without regard to the characteristics of the original; to turn a noble prelude and a masterly fugue into a bedecked and bedizened showy, virtuoso piece. On the other hand transcribers may reply, if organists persist in playing the "Ride of the Valkyrie" and Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony on the organ, why should we not be allowed to make Bach's organ music more popular by employing strings, wood-wind, brass and percussion instruments? If Schoenberg had only written in a parenthesis following the title "Prelude and Fugue in E major (after Bach and longways after)!" Impressive and sonorous continuity in the prelude was thus turned into mosiac patterns and kaleidoscopic effects. It was all very clever in its irreverential modernism, and as it was brilliantly performed, great was the joy of the audience.

Two Sibeliuses entered into Symphony hall yesterday: The composer who wrote the violin concerto 25 years ago; the Sibelius who wrote the Symphony, hitherto not performed here, of 1923. Only here and there in the Symphony was the earlier Sibelius revealed.

The rhapsodic Concerto is the work of the man still obsessed by Finland's epic; the man on whose musical horizon a tempest was ever louring; the composer whose most characteristic music often suggested the "Spasms of the Sky and the Shatter of the Sea"; music of passionate emotion; wild, heaven-assailing defiance; the darkness of black melancholy. Music peculiarly individual, not recognizing influence or school. Music robust, dramatic, often tragic; yet at times tender without sensuousness; lighter moments turning to demoniacal fury.

The sixth Symphony might be considered by his many warm admirers as in the nature of an experiment. An experiment in structure, in harmonic schemes, even in orchestration. Or as a sketch in black and white to be afterwards enlarged as a painting. The work seemsto us in thematic invention, in expositions and developments, in emotional appeals, in the employment of instruments the weakest of his symphonies. Later works have shown that his creative powers have not failed; but here is thinness, a passion for the repetition of insignificant, almost childish figures, an absence even of sentiment—these seem inexplicable. In spite of Dr. Koussevitzky's care in preparation, and in performance the symphony to which one had looked forward disappointed those eager to praise.

Mr. Burgin's performance of the concerto was more than technically brilliant. There are other qualities necessary for an impressive, even an adequate rendering of the work. These qualities were fully displayed. An excellent musician-virtuoso might easily content himself with an exterior view; the inner, the emotional contents and the prevailing rhapsodic, bardic spirit might as easily escape him. They did not escape Mr. Burgin.

The familiar Wagnerian excerpt was strongly in contrast with what had preceded. Here sensuousness in highly dramatic guise made its customary appeal to nerves and to other organs than the ears. The concert will be repeated tonight. The next concerts will be on March 14-15. The program, as announced, will be: Galliard-Steinberg, Sonata in G major. Martelli, Assyrian Bas Reliefs (first performance). Strauss, An Alpine Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

MOST broadcasters must have noticed that among the works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its New York recital the other night was an original jazz composition. One by one they're falling. And when they fall, they are frank about it. They come right out in the programme and call it jazz.

* * *

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Presumably to make Boston Sibelius-conscious, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky placed two of the Finnish master's works on the seventeenth program of the symphony orchestra, for the concert pair scheduled for Feb. 28 and March 1, in Symphony Hall, Boston. These works were the Violin Concerto, with Richard Burgin, concermaster, as soloist ,and the Sixth Symphony, which, at the Friday afternoon concert, had its first Boston hearing.

Not that Sibelius was unheard of in Boston, apart from "Finlandia," the "Valse Triste" and "The Swan of Tuonela." The First, Third, Fifth and Seventh Symphonies were familiar, and the Violin Concerto was played twice with the orchestra by Maud Powell, and had been revived only a year ago by Mr. Burgin. Why was it chosen again so soon? Dr. Koussevitzky, it is said, likes to compel audiences to accept music that he admires. Thus it is reported that he purposes to repeat Debussy's "St. Sebastien" annually until it becomes popular. But this concerto was well received last year, and not only because Mr. Burgin was the player. On the present occasion, ne was recalled several times after negotiating in masterly fashion the enormous difficulties of his part.

The symphony, which followed, appeared to us to be a worthy companion-piece to the composer's other works in this form. Like its fellows, it is characterized by a controlled turbulence, an austerity under which violent emotions are ever surging. Distinctly outdoor music, music of many moods, built by sternly restrained means. Now it is swept by icy winds, now made rhythmic by dance-like song, now near to exploding with repressed passion, now peaceful with ecclesiastical calm. This, we believe is music that will be listened to with respect and affection when much of the more resounding music of our day rests in the warehouse.

Perhaps because he found his program a little ascetic, Dr. Koussevitzky closed it with the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan." But, what was more important, he had opened it with Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat, another novelty to Boston. Here was a masterpiece of a different order; a coat of many colors made by a master craftsman to dress out a piece that already had claim to greatness in its more modest churchly garb. Yet if we are to allow transcriptions, there is reason to demand that they be made by Schoenberg. He does not attempt here to atonalize Bach. Rather, with his mastery of orchestral resources, he installs a modern lighting system in Bach's magnificent edifice.

L. A. S.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

SYMPHONY FEATURES A BACH FUGUE

Sibelius' Sixth Given for First Time in Boston

Post Mar)

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the conductor of the Symphony concerts to hold the programmes open only to composers of undisputed eminence would be unduly to narrow their range. And that Dr. Koussevitzky has no intention of doing. Yet it was good yesterday afternoon, in a concert devoted to the music of Bach, Wagner and Sibelius, to listen only to composers who have spoken with authority.

OUTDOES ORGAN IN SPLENDOR

In general, transcriptions for orchestra are not to be regarded too highly, but Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, with which yesterday's concert began, is another matter. Bach could not, in the nature of things, express his greatest ideas orchestrally: the instrument of his day would not have borne their weight. Yet some of his music for the organ is orchestral in its scope and not unnaturally tempts the transcriber. And when that transcriber is a master of Schoenberg's caliber something significant is likely to emerge.

At times in this Prelude and Fugue, heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, Schoenberg has consciously, and with rare cunning, made the orchestra sound organ-like. At other times he has used the full resources of the modern orchestra "for all they are worth." But whatever his method, the result is impressive. As heard yesterday Bach's music had a majestic and a splendor that no organ could have lent it. The performance was an eloquent one and warmly applauded. It behooves Dr. Koussevtizky to keep this transcription in the active repertory.

Burgin Plays Concerto

Twice yesterday was Sibelius represented. The first time by his Violin Concerto with Richard Burgin as soloist, the second, by his Sixth Symphony, hitherto unheard in Boston. The concerto, which Mr. Burgin resurrected last season after it had slumbered in the orchestra's library since 1912, is a work which deserved no such neglect. The marked impression that it made a year ago yesterday heightened and intensified. And Mr. Burgin, it was possible to feel, played with more freedom than before, with even greater feeling for the music's individual qualities: the wild rhapsodizing of the first movement, the fervent lyricism of the Adagio, the excitements of the Finale.

Granting a certain prolixity in this music a diffuseness that the later Sibelius, of intense concentration, would not have permitted himself, it still must be set down as of genuine importance, and the finest violin concerto since that of Brahms.

Mr. Burgin was received yesterday with a warmth that must have repaid him amply for the years of service that he has rendered in the less rewarding role of concert master.

Except in the final one of its four movements, which is comparatively plain sailing, Sibelius' No. 6, the only one of his seven symphonies that Boston had not heard, must be set down as music somewhat baffling and elusive upon a first hearing. Here is Sibelius, as in the Seventh Symphony, or perhaps even more than in the later work, confining himself to the simplest musical materials, cutting away all excess, resisting all temptation to musical sensuousness, unquestionably earning the attributes that, as it now seems, were misapplied to his earlier works; spare, trenchant, forthright, economical, grim and sombre. Yet for all its occasional crabbedness, a bareness that comes almost to vacuity, an austereness that here and there came near to repelling, this symphony remains a work of singular fascination and power, one that cries out for another hearing. Let it be hoped that Dr. Koussevitzky speedily grants it.

A glowing performance of the "Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod brought the end, and the audience lingered to recall Dr. Koussevitzky and to applaud until he had summoned the players to their feet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

HE BOSTON

BURGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concert Master Heard in Sibelius Concerto

Sibelius' Sixth Symphony and Bach Prelude and Fugue Played

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heartily applauded at yesterday's Symphony concert for his musicianly playing of the exacting solo part in Sibelius' concerto for violin. The orchestral novelties on the program, which had been twice changed, were Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E flat, orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg; and Sibelius' Sixth Symphony. The concert concluded with the "Prelude and Death" from Wagner's "Tristan."

One wondered, as one has too often wondered, why Dr Koussevitzky cannot choose his programs without these last minute changes, which are irritating to the many subscribers who endeavor to familiarize themselves before each Symphony concert with the music announced for performance.

When Mr Burgin played the Sibelius concerto last season it so pleased the subscribers as to receive several hundred votes in the balloting for the request program given at the last pair of concerts. Yesterday the vitality and grace of the music and the brilliance of the performance again won cordial and prolonged applause. Mr Burgin's great abilities have never shown to more advantage.

The sixth of Sibelius' seven symphonies, and the only one not previously played at these concerts, was published in 1923, and played for the first time in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra, April 23, 1926. Writers about music, remembering that Sibelius has more than once expressed a devotion to nature, have generally tried to describe his works in terms of the landscape of his native Finland. But one might as well describe the work of Beethoven, whose devotion to nature is even better known, in terms of the rural landscapes near Vienna, among which he found inspiration not merely for the "Pastoral Symphony," but for many another masterpiece.

All this talk of bleak wind-swept forests, and steel blue lakes, waiting to be ice-bound through the dark rigors of the sub-arctic Winter, has little relevance to the music of Sibelius. His originality lies not in being a native and resident of Finland, but in the mysterious human quality one can only call imagination, or genius.

Every work by Sibelius has its own distinctive flavor, so that one is not likely to confuse in memory his fourth symphony with his second, or his sixth with his seventh. This circumstance, plainly illustrated yesterday by the difference between the violin concerto and the sixth symphony, links the composer with the great names of Beethoven and Wagner rather than with the lesser men like Franck.

This sixth symphony is so original that those who dislike it will speak more or less civilly of its eccentricity. Its themes are nearly all scale-like passages. They are woven into an intricate musical pattern, yet the work sounds with the apparent childlike simplicity one rashly ascribes at a first hearing to mediaeval pieces in the old modes. Yesterday's performance had the curiously personal style, the Koussevitzky flavor, imparted these days to everything the Boston Symphony performs.

Schoenberg, despite the ernism of his own comp unusually discreet and scriber of Bach. With make the orchestra sou organ, he succeeds in n lieve that if Bach had w lude and fugue for a mo he would have scored Schoenberg has.

The performance yes the effect of scanty number of badly sm Nor did one agree with ky's conception of th working out of the music made its emot great was Bach's gen

The reading of th "Liebestod" from "T finest Dr Koussevitzk Boston, because it magnificient lines of tern as well as the ing Wagner imparte regard as his master

The orchestra will next week. The pr nounced (subject, c change) for the next March 14 and 15, incl Galliard, transcribe Martellis "Assyrian Richard Strauss' "A

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES ~~UNION~~

59

Boston Symphony Next Wednesday at Woolsey

Ernest Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody, "Schelomo" ("Solomon"), a score for cello which has contributed to the fame of this composer perhaps as much as any single piece, will have an unprecedented performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall next Wednesday when Dr. Koussevitzky gives the solo part to four violin cellists, to be played in unison. For the broad and sombre declamation of this solo part as conceived by Bloch, probably no cellist living could provide ample tone. Dr. Koussevitzky will first try this experiment at the concerts of next week's tour.

Ernest Bloch, born in Geneva in 1880, has since 1916 made his home in this country. Until recent years, practically all of his compositions had a decided Hebraic strain. Ernest Bloch, who lives in San Francisco, has identified himself with this country and accordingly composed his prize Rhapsody, "America," for orchestra and chorus which was performed by every large orchestra in the country last season.

Bloch thus described the racial strain in his earlier scores: "It is not my purpose, not my desire, to attempt a 'reconstitution' of Jewish music, or to base my works on melodies more or less authentic. I am not an archaeologist. I hold it of first importance to write good, genuine music, my music. It is the Jewish soul that interests me, the complex, glowing, agitated soul, that I fell vibrating throughout the Bible: the freshness and naivete of the Patriarchs; the violence that is evident in the prophetic books: the Jew's savage love of justice; the despair of the Preacher in Jerusalem; the sorrow and the immensity of the Book of Job; the sensuality of the Song of Songs. All this is in us; all this is in me, and it is the better part of me. It is all this that I endeavor to hear in myself and to transcribe in my music: the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers way down in our soul."

Guido M. Gatti gave the following account of "Schelomo" in La Critica Musicale, April, 1920:

"The Violincello, with its ample breadth of phrasing, now melodic and with moments of superb lyricism, now declamatory and with robustly dramatic lights and shades, lends itself to a reincarnation of Solomon in all his glory, surrounded by his thousand wives and concubines, with his multitude of slaves and warriors behind him. His voice resounds in the devotional silence, and the sentences of his wisdom sink into the heart as the seed into a fertile soil.

"At times the sonorous voice of the violincello is heard predominant amid a breathless and fateful obscurity throbbing with persistent rhythms; the entire discourses of the soloist, vocal rather than instrumental, seems like musical expression intimately conjoined with the Talmudic prose. The pauses, the repetitions of entire passages, the leaps of a double octave, the chromatic progressions, all find their analogues in the Book of Ecclesiastes—in the versicles, in the fairly epigraphic reiteration of the admonitions ('and all is vanity and vexation of spirit'), in the unexpected shifts from one thought to another, in certain crescendi of emotion that end in explosions of anger or grief uncontrolled."

The entire program for the New Haven concert by the Boston Symphony is as follows:

Schubert .....
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished."
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto
Ravel ..... Bolero
Gruenberg ..... Jazz Suite, Op. 28
Boston Waltz Tempo
Fox-trot Tempo.
Bloch .... "Schelomo" ("Solomon") Hebrew Rhapsody for Violincello and Orchestra.
(The solo part will be played in unison by Jean Bedetti, Alfred Zighera, Jacobus Langendoen, Hippolyte Droeghmans)
Bach .....
Prelude and Fugue in E-flat (for organ). Arranged for Orchestra by Schonberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Concert

Boston Tours

Koussevitsky With Boston Symphony At New Haven

The crowning event of the musical season in New Haven, as well as the concluding offering of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music, takes place next Wednesday evening, March 5, at which time the Boston Symphony orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky makes its annual visit to the Elm City.

The coming of the great body of one hundred and ten selected musicians to New Haven is always the signal for lovers of the finest music hereabouts to wend their way towards the massive Yale auditorium, and this year, more than ever, probably, is the urge more insistent, for an unusually popular program is to be rendered. Although the listed numbers are of such great musical importance that hardly one stands out more than another, Ravel's "Bolereo," by reason of it having achieved such nation-wide attention this season, might be called the featured musical tid-bit. However, the works of Schubert, Gruenberg, Bloch and Bach likewise must command important notice, hence the program might well be called an "all-star" one in its entirety.

The numbers to be played, and their order ,are as follows:

Schubert—Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"
Ravel—"Bolero"
Gruenberg—Jazz Suite, Op. 28
Bloch—"Schelomo" (Solomon)
Bach—Prelude and Fugue in E-flat (for organ), arranged for orchestra by Schonberg

There are approximately 460 oil refineries in the United States with an annual production having a wholesale value of more than $2,500,000,000.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in concert at Woolsey hall, New Haven, Wednesday evening March 5.

SYMPHONY FEATURES A BACH FUGUE

Sibelius' Sixth Given for First Time in Boston

Post Mar)

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the conductor of the Symphony concerts to hold the programmes open only to composers of undisputed eminence would be unduly to narrow their range. And that Dr. Koussevitzky has no intention of doing. Yet it was good yesterday afternoon, in a concert devoted to the music of Bach, Wagner and Sibelius, to listen only to composers who have spoken with authority.

OUTDOES ORGAN IN SPLENDOR

In general, transcriptions for orchestra are not to be regarded too highly, but Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, with which yesterday's concert began, is another matter. Bach could not, in the nature of things, express his greatest ideas orchestrally: the instrument of his day would not have borne their weight. Yet some of his music for the organ is orchestral in its scope and not unnaturally tempts the transcriber. And when that transcriber is a master of Schoenberg's caliber something significant is likely to emerge.

At times in this Prelude and Fugue, heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, Schoenberg has consciously, and with rare cunning, made the orchestra sound organ-like. At other times he has used the full resources of the modern orchestra "for all they are worth." But whatever his method, the result is impressive. As heard yesterday Bach's music had a majestic and a splendor that no organ could have lent it. The performance was an eloquent one and warmly applauded. It behooves Dr. Koussevtizky to keep this transcription in the active repertory.

Burgin Plays Concerto

Twice yesterday was Sibelius represented. The first time by his Violin Concerto with Richard Burgin as soloist, the second, by his Sixth Symphony, hitherto unheard in Boston. The concerto, which Mr. Burgin resurrected last season after it had slumbered in the orchestra's library since 1912, is a work which deserved no such neglect. The marked impression that it made a year ago yesterday heightened and intensified. And Mr. Burgin, it was possible to feel, played with more freedom than before, with even greater feeling for the music's individual qualities: the wild rhapsodizing of the first movement, the fervent lyricism of the Adagio, the excitements of the Finale.

Granting a certain prolixity in this music a diffuseness that the later Sibelius, of intense concentration, would not have permitted himself, it still must be set down as of genuine importance, and the finest violin concerto since that of Brahms.

Mr. Burgin was received yesterday with a warmth that must have repaid him amply for the years of service that he has rendered in the less rewarding role of concert master.

Except in the final one of its four movements, which is comparatively plain sailing, Sibelius' No. 6, the only one of his seven symphonies that Boston had not heard, must be set down as music somewhat baffling and elusive upon a first hearing. Here is Sibelius, as in the Seventh Symphony, or perhaps even more than in the later work, confining himself to the simplest musical materials, cutting away all excess, resisting all temptation to musical sensuousness, unquestionably earning the attributes that, as it now seems, were misapplied to his earlier works; spare, trenchant, forthright, economical, grim and sombre. Yet for all its occasional crabbedness, a bareness that comes almost to vacuity, an austereness that here and there came near to repelling, this symphony remains a work of singular fascination and power, one that cries out for another hearing. Let it be hoped that Dr. Koussevitzky speedily grants it.

A glowing performance of the "Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod brought the end, and the audience lingered to recall Dr. Koussevitzky and to applaud until he had summoned the players to their feet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

HE BOSTON

BURGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concert Master Heard in Sibelius Concerto

Sibelius' Sixth Symphony and Bach Prelude and Fugue Played

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heartily applauded at yesterday's Symphony concert for his musicianly playing of the exacting solo part in Sibelius' concerto for violin. The orchestral novelties on the program, which had been twice changed, were Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E flat, orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg; and Sibelius' Sixth Symphony. The concert concluded with the "Prelude and Death" from Wagner's "Tristan."

One wondered, as one has too often wondered, why Dr Koussevitzky cannot choose his programs without these last minute changes, which are irritating to the many subscribers who endeavor to familiarize themselves before each Symphony concert with the music announced for performance.

When Mr Burgin played the Sibelius concerto last season it so pleased the subscribers as to receive several hundred votes in the balloting for the request program given at the last pair of concerts. Yesterday the vitality and grace of the music and the brilliance of the performance again won cordial and prolonged applause. Mr Burgin's great abilities have never shown to more advantage.

The sixth of Sibelius' seven symphonies, and the only one not previously played at these concerts, was published in 1923, and played for the first time in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra, April 23, 1926. Writers about music, remembering that Sibelius has more than once expressed a devotion to nature, have generally tried to describe his works in terms of the landscape of his native Finland. But one might as well describe the work of Beethoven, whose devotion to nature is even better known, in terms of the rural landscapes near Vienna, among which he found inspiration not merely for the "Pastoral Symphony," but for many another masterpiece.

All this talk of bleak wind-swept forests, and steel blue lakes, waiting to be ice-bound through the dark rigors of the sub-arctic Winter, has little relevance to the music of Sibelius. His originality lies not in being a native and resident of Finland, but in the mysterious human quality one can only call imagination, or genius.

Every work by Sibelius has its own distinctive flavor, so that one is not likely to confuse in memory his fourth symphony with his second, or his sixth with his seventh. This circumstance, plainly illustrated yesterday by the difference between the violin concerto and the sixth symphony, links the composer with the great names of Beethoven and Wagner rather than with the lesser men like Franck.

This sixth symphony is so original that those who dislike it will speak more or less civilly of its eccentricity. Its themes are nearly all scale-like passages. They are woven into an intricate musical pattern, yet the work sounds with the apparent childlike simplicity one rashly ascribes at a first hearing to mediaeval pieces in the old modes. Yesterday's performance had the curiously personal style, the Koussevitzky flavor, imparted these days to everything the Boston Symphony performs.

Schoenberg, despite the baffling modernism of his own compositions, is an unusually discreet and skilful transcriber of Bach. Without trying to make the orchestra sound just like an organ, he succeeds in making one believe that if Bach had written this prelude and fugue for a modern orchestra he would have scored it exactly as Schoenberg has.

The performance yesterday betrayed the effect of scanty rehearsal in a number of badly smeared passages. Nor did one agree with Dr Koussevitzky's conception of the subject and working out of the fugue. Yet the music made its emotional effect, so great was Bach's genius.

The reading of the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" was the finest Dr Koussevitzky has given in Boston, because it brought out the magnificient lines of the musical pattern as well as the intensity of feeling Wagner imparted to what many regard as his masterpiece.

The orchestra will be away on tour next week. The program now announced (subject, one assumes, to change) for the next Boston concerts, March 14 and 15, includes a sonata by Galliard, transcribed by Steinberg; Martellis "Assyrian Bas Reliefs"; and Richard Strauss' "Alpine Symphony."

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES ~~UNION~~

59

Boston Symphony Next Wednesday at Woolsey

Ernest Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody, "Schelomo" ("Solomon"), a score for cello which has contributed to the fame of this composer perhaps as much as any single piece, will have an unprecedented performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall next Wednesday when Dr. Koussevitzky gives the solo part to four violin cellists, to be played in unison. For the broad and sombre declamation of this solo part as conceived by Bloch, probably no cellist living could provide ample tone. Dr. Koussevitzky will first try this experiment at the concerts of next week's tour.

Ernest Bloch, born in Geneva in 1880, has since 1916 made his home in this country. Until recent years, practically all of his compositions had a decided Hebraic strain. Ernest Bloch, who lives in San Francisco, has identified himself with this country and accordingly composed his prize Rhapsody, "America," for orchestra and chorus which was performed by every large orchestra in the country last season.

Bloch thus described the racial strain in his earlier scores: "It is not my purpose, not my desire, to attempt a 'reconstitution' of Jewish music, or to base my works on melodies more or less authentic. I am not an archaeologist. I hold it of first importance to write good, genuine music, my music. It is the Jewish soul that interests me, the complex, glowing, agitated soul, that I fell vibrating throughout the Bible: the freshness and naivete of the Patriarchs; the violence that is evident in the prophetic books; the Jew's savage love of justice; the despair of the Preacher in Jerusalem; the sorrow and the immensity of the Book of Job; the sensuality of the Song of Songs. All this is in us; all this is in me, and it is the better part of me. It is all this that I endeavor to hear in myself and to transcribe in my music; the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers way down in our soul."

Guido M. Gatti gave the following account of "Schelomo" in La Critica Musicale, April, 1920:

"The Violincello, with its ample breadth of phrasing, now melodic and with moments of superb lyricism, now declamatory and with robustly dramatic lights and shades, lends itself to a reincarnation of Solomon in all his glory, surrounded by his thousand wives and concubines, with his multitude of slaves and warriors behind him. His voice resounds in the devotional silence, and the sentences of his wisdom sink into the heart as the seed into a fertile soil.

"At times the sonorous voice of the violincello is heard predominant amid a breathless and fateful obscurity throbbing with persistent rhythms; the entire discourses of the soloist, vocal rather than instrumental, seems like musical expression intimately conjoined with the Talmudic prose. The pauses, the repetitions of entire passages, the leaps of a double octave, the chromatic progressions, all find their analogues in the Book of Ecclesiastes—in the versicles, in the fairly epigraphic reiteration of the admonitions ('and all is vanity and vexation of spirit'), in the unexpected shifts from one thought to another, in certain crescendi of emotion that end in explosions of anger or grief uncontrolled."

The entire program for the New Haven concert by the Boston Symphony is as follows:

Schubert .....
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished."
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
Ravel ..... Bolero
Gruenberg ..... Jazz Suite, Op. 28
Boston Waltz Tempo.
Fox-trot Tempo.
Bloch .... "Schelomo" ("Solomon")
Hebrew Rhapsody for Violincello and Orchestra.
(The solo part will be played in unison by Jean Bedetti, Alfred Zighera, Jacobus Langendoen, Hippolyte Droeghmans)
Bach .....
Prelude and Fugue in E-flat (for organ). Arranged for Orchestra by Schonberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Record
Meriden, Conn

Koussevitsky With Boston Symphony At New Haven

The crowning event of the musical season in New Haven, as well as the concluding offering of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music, takes place next Wednesday evening, March 5, at which time the Boston Symphony orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky makes its annual visit to the Elm City.

The coming of the great body of one hundred and ten selected musicians to New Haven is always the signal for lovers of the finest music hereabouts to wend their way towards the massive Yale auditorium, and this year, more than ever, probably, is the urge more insistent, for an unusually popular program is to be rendered. Although the listed numbers are of such great musical importance that hardly one stands out more than another, Ravel's "Bolereo," by reason of it having achieved such nation-wide attention this season, might be called the featured musical tid-bit. However, the works of Schubert, Gruenberg, Bloch and Bach likewise must command important notice, hence the program might well be called an "all-star" one in its entirety.

The numbers to be played, and their order ,are as follows:

Schubert—Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"
Ravel—"Bolero"
Gruenberg—Jazz Suite, Op. 28
Bloch—"Schelomo" (Solomon)
Bach—Prelude and Fugue in E-flat (for organ), arranged for orchestra by Schonberg

There are approximately 460 oil refineries in the United States with an annual production having a wholesale value of more than $2,500,000,000.

with life, co romance and ymphony orchestra evening March 5.

60

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

BOSTON SYMPHONY BODY OF VIRTUOSOS

It is a historical as well as a present fact that the greatness of the Boston Symphony orchestra is very largely due to the eminent qualities of the virtuosos which make up its personnel. The finest masters of each instrument which Europe and America have produced have always been engaged to lead each section. Such musicians as Franz Kneisel who formed his famous quartet from the string players of this orchestra, is typical of the illustrious line of concert masters. Such great names as Georges Longy, long considered the greatest oboeist in the world; Charles M. Loeffler, composer and violinist; Georges Grisez, the clarinetist; Emil Ferir, the viola player, are but a few of the virtuosos who have sat for years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert master's chair is now fittingly held by Richard Burgin, the celebrated Russian musician. Mr. Burgin came to America to take the position in 1920. He had been concert master to more than one great conductor in Europe, and was eually admired for his recitals and activities in chamber music. Richard Burgin is known in America not only by his appearance as soloist with the orchestra, but by many recitals and by the string quartet and the trio which bear his name. Last season, he was appointed the regular assistant conductor of the orchestra.

The seniority among the string leaders at present is held by Julius Theodorowicz, the second concert master, who was one of the original Kneisel Quartet. Jean Bedetti is the first cellist, and one of the finest in the world. Jean Ilefranc, leader of the violas, is a virtuoso of the same sort.

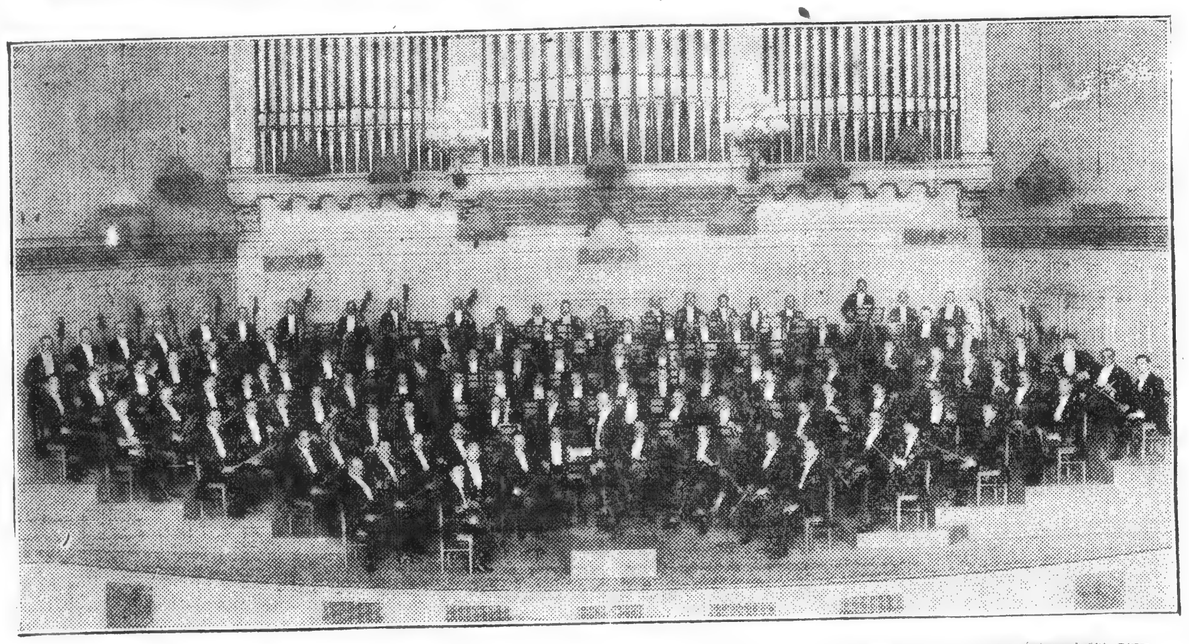
What these artists are to their instruments, so is George Laurent to the flute. Also masters of the rarest quality are Fernand Gillet, the first oboe, George Hamelin, the first clarinet, Abdon Laus, first bassoon and Louis Speyer, the English Horn virtuoso.

George Mager is the brilliant first trumpet, Georg Boettcher, whom the orchestra was most fortunate in acquiring last year, the leader of the French horns, and Joannes Rochut, the highly distinguished first trombone. Another true ornament to the orchestra is Bernard Zighera, the first harp.

That the associates of these virtuosos are likewise splendid masters of their instruments is eloquently apparent when, in some modern score, a second or third solo part is called for by a woodwind or brass instrument.

And this is no less true of the string sections. Anyone of two dozen string players could at command step to the front and play one of the most difficult concertos with technical brilliance and ease.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, AT WOOLSEY HALL NEXT WEDNESDAY EVENING



220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST

Gruenberg's Jazz Suite Premi

First Performance in New York by Boston Symphony Orchestra—Philharmonic Takes a Short Trip—Other Music

GRUENBERG'S Jazz Suite will be heard for the first time in New York Thursday evening at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. It is divided into three movements—Fox Trot Tempo, Boston Waltz, Blues tempo (slow drag) and one-step tempo. The suite was performed for the first time anywhere by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Fritz Reiner, conductor, March 22, 1929; was played January 30, this year, by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, Artur Rodinzky, conductor, and was first played by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston Friday evening of last week. The rest of the program is made up of Haydn's Symphony in D major, "With the Horn Call"; Bloch's "Scheleme," Hebrew Rhapsody for cello and orchestra, with four cellists as soloists, and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg.

Sibelius will make up half the program at the Saturday matinee concerts with the sixth symphony of the Finnish composer and his concerto for violin and orchestra in D minor, with Richard Burgin as soloist. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg and Gruenberg's jazz suite will be the other numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Record
New Haven
(2)
Courier

Finland Minister Makes Long Trip to Hear Music

Boston, March 1 (INS)—Axel Leonard Astrom, minister of Finland to the United States, was bound back to his post at Washington today, having come all the way to Boston to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra featuring Finnish music. He said the wonderful music was worth the long trip.

William B. Murray Sees Possibility of Complete Ring Given Next Season

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, may appear next season for the first time over a nation-wide hookup for a series of three concerts.

The Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, may be heard regularly throughout the nation.

A complete Nibelungen Ring, to be offered in weekly programs, will be proposed to a sponsor for opening the next winter season.

These significant possibilities were revealed in a conversation with William B. Murray, president of the Judson Radio Program Corp., the largest musical service organization of its kind in the world, with offices in Steinway Hall.

Both Managed by Judson.

The Boston organization, it was pointed out, has broadcast locally on several occasions, but never has the music been spread over an inter-city hookup. Gabrilowitsch has conducted his orchestra nationally only once—that time on a General Motors program—although he has appeared as piano soloist on several occasions.

Both of these organizations are under the management of the Judson organization. It is with the possibility of presenting a Ring, however, that Murray is most interested.

Sans Photographs.

"There is no question in my mind that Wagner is most popular among operagoers and radio listeners alike," he said. "I would not, however, offer a cut version. I would offer the Ring scene for scene and act for act, even though it ran over a great number of weeks.

"We are preparing a Ring for radio presentation, and there is every possibility that it may be offered next season."

Murray discussed these projects as he sat in his offices on the sixteenth floor of Steinway Hall, the offices of a concert manager, yet strangely lacking in the expected autographed photographs from opera songbirds.

Murray came to radio several years ago with a long record of musical activity. Formerly music critic for the Boston Transcript, the Christian Science Monitor and the Brooklyn Eagle, he also edited the Musical Monitor for the National Federation of Music Clubs.

Later becoming an executive with the Baldwin Piano Co., Murray has brought over numerous pianists and composers from Italy. One of the results has been that in 1929 he was decorated by the Italian government with the Order of the Crown for his services to Italian music and artists.

Many-Sided Organizations.

Since he has been associated with radio Murray, with John T. Adams, vice president, has built up an organization that is well nigh as many sided as a department store.

The Judson organization prepares programs, among which are the Puccini operas, Jack Frost and formerly the popular Baldwin Hours.

It engages artists for broadcasts, among whom are the greatest in the world—Rosa Ponselle, Gigli, Iturbi, Zimbalist. In fact, most of the concert and opera celebrities whom you have heard and are hearing during this season are under the Judson management.

The field in which the organization most recently has entered is the preparation of recorded programs, an activity which Murray believes will develop more rapidly than any other phase of broadcasting.

Changed Studios.

The studios on the seventeenth floor of Steinway Hall formerly used by the Columbia Broadcasting System have been redecorated and changed into audition rooms and studios for preparing the program records.

It also is pointed out that if a station in the provinces should call upon the organization to prepare a program the words and music could be piped from these studios to any city in the country.

But if one might judge from the master records that are heaped about the rooms the greatest activity at the moment centres around the preparation of recorded programs.

Always Supplementary.

"Through programs such as this the smallest station in the country may enjoy the best music and drama," Murray commented. "Of course, recorded programs always will be supplementary to the guest artist program, but they may become an important factor in broadcasting history."

"Is there anything that can prevent the development of such programs?" Murray was asked.

"Of course the government could enact a regulation barring them from the air," he replied. "But I don't think it will."

1930 NEWS

(Formerly NEWS OF 1930)

Published Monthly by Massachusetts Bay Tercentenary, Inc.,
22 Beacon Street, Boston. Telephone, Haymarket 5730

EDITORIAL BOARD—EDWARD E. WHITING, Chairman
CHARLES E. BELLATTY, FRANK CHOUTEAU BROWN, HENRY T. CLAUS,
HERBERT F. JENKINS Manager—EVERETT B. MERO

Subscription, $1.00 a year. Single Copy, 10 Cents

Combined FEBRUARY-MARCH, 1930 No. 28

We Shall Show Art

Not only does 1930 happen to be also the year of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as was mentioned upon our editorial page recently, but it is further the Sixtieth Anniversary of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts as well. Thus both these famous and established Boston institutions will have every incentive to cooperate as fully as possible in the plans that are being made to entertain and instruct the many visitors who will be in the vicinity through this Anniversary year. And few can take as effective a part in at once establishing the preeminence of New England in the kindred arts of Music, Painting and Sculpture.

And what can be better for the future cultural improvement of this country than the wider spread of a realization of the importance of the arts? America has too exclusively based its standards of success and importance upon merely commercial gradings of prosperity. Too little appreciation of artistic standards is to be found, particularly away from the Eastern borders of the country, and from the larger centers of population throughout the entire country. It is true that museums are being built and endowed in even the smaller centers, but these museums are too often exclusively given to products of art expression foreign to this country, and even this race.

It is comparatively recently that our established institutions came to accept American products in Music, Painting and Sculpture upon the same identical bases as the European products were accepted and exhibited. While that the historic value of our early American background has been of still more recent acceptance is amusingly proved by the fact that when, a bare dozen or fifteen years ago, a resident of Newport, R. I., wrote to the Metropolitan Museum in New York directing attention to the imminent destruction of an old dwelling and suggesting that was an unusual opportunity here to secure some early American material, he was rebuked in a letter stating that there was nothing of really cultural value to be derived from work of that period in this country! When, a dozen years later, the same museum turned to the same individual for assistance in securing material for its projected ironic pleasure in exhibiting to the representative of the museum, its dictum of a few years before! But now the "American Wing" of the Metropolitan is one of its most attractive and most visited features.

The Boston Museum, and the Museum in Philadelphia have both opened extensive new portions given to the showing exclusively of the early products of this country, in Architecture and the decorative arts. The Western Museums are all planning similar exhibitions, the more particularly as this method of arrangement has now been accepted as preferable to the former general custom of exhibiting in large galleries crowded with similar objects, instead of arranging material of different types grouped in possible and probable rooms, as would be best representative of the period of which these various arts were the product.

Probably nothing will arouse more interest in Boston and be more visited by strangers next year than the dozen or more interiors showing different periods of New England architecture and furnishings, arranged around the new Garden Court, which our Museum has so recently installed and completed in time for this Sixtieth Anniversary of the Museum, as well as the Three Hundredth year of the northern Colonies. These interiors were briefly described in Tercentenary bulletin No. 15 of October, 1928.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
CITIZEN

61

Music in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth concert of the season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 7. Dr. Serge Koussevitky will open the program with a little known symphony in D major by Haydn (B. & H. No. 31) entitled, "With the Horn Call." This is probably the first case in which four horns were used in a symphony On account of conspicuous solos for the violin and 'cello, the symphony has been characterized as Concertante.

Another feature of the concert will be a performance of Ernest Block's Hebrew Rhapsody, "Schelomo," with four violoncellos instead of one playing the solo part in unison. Dr Koussevitzky will make this inovation in an effort to give this solo, which is supposed to represent the voice of Solomon, a breadth and intensity for which the character of the music seems to call The solo part will be taken by Jean Bedetti, Alfred Zighera, Jacobus Langendoen and Hippolyte Droeghmans.

Stravinsky's suite from the "Fire-Bird" will likewise be played. The movements are: I. Introduction; Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird. II. Supplication of the Fire-Bird. III. The Princesses play with the Golden Apples. IV. Dance of the Princess. V. Infernal Dance of all the subjects of Katschei.

The concert will end with Ravel's "Bolero," the most conspicuous novelty of the sermon, in which the French composer repeats many times a Spanish dance theme, giving it in turn to diffferent solo instruments in the orchestra with increasing intensity in color. The piece thus rises from pianissimo in one long crescendo to an overwhelming climax, modulating in key only at the every end.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra recently gave a Debussy choral concert, which included "La Damoiselle Elue," after Dante Gabriel Rossetti's lyric poem. The Radcliffe Choral Society, under Wallace Goodrich, assisted, and the soloists were Mme. Ritter-Ciampi, soprano, and Jean Macdonald, contralto. The remainder of the program was devoted to the same composer's "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien," based on Gabriele d'Annunzio's mystery play. This latter work received its first complete rendition at these concerts on this occasion. The Cecilia Society, under Arthur Fiedler, assisted and Mme. Ritter-Ciampi again was the soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
POST

Bridgeport Conn
2

'een

Four Instead of One

Dr. Koussevitzky Tries an Experiment, Then Mistrusts It.

THE Symphony Orchestra has returned from its visit to New York with its experiment untried. And that experiment had set agog the quidnuncs of Symphony Hall.

Mr. Bloch wrote his Rhapsody, "Schelomo" — or Solomon, the Great King—for violoncello and full orchestra. The oftener Dr. Koussevitzky conducted in it, the more he was persuaded that in many passages the tone of one violoncello was too light for the orchestral voices. He would try four, playing together the solo-part. New Haven was to hear them experimentally; New York to provide the ultimate test.

Rehearsals followed; with them came doubts and scruples. In a solo-part four may hardly play as one; while the quadrupled tone did not always gain the larger resonance. The conductor bowed to the evidence of his ears. In New Haven and in New York, Mr. Bedetti, unassisted, played the solo-part in "Schelomo."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall, New Haven, Wednesday evening, March 5th.

1930 NEWS

(Formerly NEWS OF 1930)

Published Monthly by Massachusetts Bay Tercentenary, Inc.,
22 Beacon Street, Boston. Telephone, Haymarket 5730

EDITORIAL BOARD—EDWARD E. WHITING, Chairman
CHARLES E. BELLATTY, FRANK CHOUTEAU BROWN, HENRY T. CLAUS,
HERBERT F. JENKINS Manager—EVERETT B. MERO

Subscription, $1.00 a year. Single Copy, 10 Cents

Combined FEBRUARY-MARCH, 1930 No. 28

We Shall Show Art

Not only does 1930 happen to be also the year of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as was mentioned upon our editorial page recently, but it is further the Sixtieth Anniversary of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts as well. Thus both these famous and established Boston institutions will have every incentive to cooperate as fully as possible in the plans that are being made to entertain and instruct the many visitors who will be in the vicinity through this Anniversary year. And few can take as effective a part in at once establishing the preeminence of New England in the kindred arts of Music, Painting and Sculpture.

And what can be better for the future cultural improvement of this country than the wider spread of a realization of the importance of the arts? America has too exclusively based its standards of success and importance upon merely commercial gradings of prosperity. Too little appreciation of artistic standards is to be found, particularly away from the Eastern borders of the country, and from the larger centers of population throughout the entire country. It is true that museums are being built and endowed in even the smaller centers, but these museums are too often exclusively given to products of art expression foreign to this country, and even this race.

It is comparatively recently that our established institutions came to accept American products in Music, Painting and Sculpture upon the same identical bases as the European products were accepted and exhibited. While that the historic value of our early American background has been of still more recent acceptance is amusingly proved by the fact that when, a bare dozen or fifteen years ago, a resident of Newport, R. I., wrote to the Metropolitan Museum in New York directing attention to the imminent destruction of an old dwelling and suggesting that was an unusual opportunity here to secure some early American material, he was rebuked in a letter stating that there was nothing of really cultural value to be derived from work of that period in this country! When, a dozen years later, the same museum turned to the same individual for assistance in securing material for its projected ironic pleasure in exhibiting to the representative of the museum, its dictum of a few years before! But now the "American Wing" of the Metropolitan is one of its most attractive and most visited features.

The Boston Museum, and the Museum in Philadelphia have both opened extensive new portions given to the showing exclusively of the early products of this country, in Architecture and the decorative arts. The Western Museums are all planning similar exhibitions, the more particularly as this method of arrangement has now been accepted as preferable to the former general custom of exhibiting in large galleries crowded with similar objects, instead of arranging material of different types grouped in possible and probable rooms, as would be best representative of the period of which these various arts were the product.

Probably nothing will arouse more interest in Boston and be more visited by strangers next year than the dozen or more interiors showing different periods of New England architecture and furnishings, arranged around the new Garden Court, which our Museum has so recently installed and completed in time for this Sixtieth Anniversary of the Museum, as well as the Three Hundredth year of the northern Colonies. These interiors were briefly described in Tercentenary bulletin No. 15 of October, 1928.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
CITIZEN
MAR 2 - 193

Music in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth concert of the season in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 7. Dr. Serge Koussevitky will open the program with a little known symphony in D major by Haydn (B. & H. No. 31) entitled, "With the Horn Call." This is probably the first case in which four horns were used in a symphony. On account of conspicuous solos for the violin and 'cello, the symphony has been characterized as Concertante.

Another feature of the concert will be a performance of Ernest Block's Hebrew Rhapsody, "Schelomo," with four violoncellos instead of one playing the solo part in unison. Dr. Koussevitzky will make this inovation in an effort to give this solo, which is supposed to represent the voice of Solomon, a breadth and intensity for which the character of the music seems to call. The solo part will be taken by Jean Bedetti, Alfred Zighera, Jacobus Langendoen and Hippolyte Droeghmans.

Stravinsky's suite from the "Fire-Bird" will likewise be played. The movements are: I. Introduction; Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird. II. Supplication of the Fire-Bird. III. The Princesses play with the Golden Apples. IV. Dance of the Princess. V. Infernal Dance of all the subjects of Katschei.

The concert will end with Ravel's "Bolero," the most conspicuous novelty of the sermon, in which the French composer repeats many times a Spanish dance theme, giving it in turn to diffflerent solo instruments in the orchestra with increasing intensity in color. The piece thus rises from pianissimo in one long crescendo to an overwhelming climax, modulating in key only at the every end.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
MAR - [illegible]

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra recently gave a Debussy choral concert, which included "La Damoiselle Elue," after Dante Gabriel Rossetti's lyric poem. The Radcliffe Choral Society, under Wallace Goodrich, assisted, and the soloists were Mme. Ritter-Ciampi, soprano, and Jean Macdonald, contralto. The remainder of the program was devoted to the same composer's "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien," based on Gabriele d'Annunzio's mystery play. This latter work received its first complete rendition at these concerts on this occasion. The Cecilia Society, under Arthur Fiedler, assisted and Mme. Ritter-Ciampi again was the soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
POST
Bridgeport Conn
MAR 2 1930

Four Instead of One

Dr. Koussevitzky Tries an Experiment, Then Mistrusts It.

THE Symphony Orchestra has returned from its visit to New York with its experiment untried. And that experiment had set agog the quidnuncs of Symphony Hall.

Mr. Bloch wrote his Rhapsody, "Schelomo" — or Solomon, the Great King—for violoncello and full orchestra. The oftener Dr. Koussevitzky conducted in it, the more he was persuaded that in many passages the tone of one violoncello was too light for the orchestral voices. He would try four, playing together the solo part. New Haven was to hear them experimentally; New York to provide the ultimate test.

Rehearsals followed; with them came doubts and scruples. In a solo-part four may hardly play as one; while the quadrupled tone did not always gain the larger resonance. The conductor bowed to the evidence of his ears. In New Haven and in New York, Mr. Bedetti, unassisted, played the solo-part in "Schelomo."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall, New Haven, Wednesday evening, March 5th.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

62

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
EAGLE

A Finnish Masterpiece

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky Will Play the Sixth Symphony of Jan Sibelius for the First Time in New York

DURING the week to come Serge Koussewitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a trio of New York concerts. Two will be given at Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, the third at the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, and no fewer than four novelties are included among the works comprising the exceptionally interesting programs to be performed on these occasions. A Jazz Suite, Louis Gruenberg's Op. 28, will be heard at both of the Manhattan concerts; on Thursday evening Schoenberg's transcription of a Bach Prelude and Fugue in E minor will receive its first New York performance, and on Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussewitsky will disclose to us a Concerto Grosso in the Old Style, by the Rumanian Filip Lazar, and the Sixth Symphony of Jan Sibelius. The programs otherwise include one of the more unfamiliar Haydn symphonies—that in B-flat, with the horn call, numbered 12 in Breitkopf & Haertel's catalogue—Ernest Bloch's rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra, "Schelemo" (in which the solo part will be played in unison upon four 'cellos), the seldom-heard Sibelius D minor Violin Concerto, a suite from Strawinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu" and the Ravel "Bolero."

A glance at these singularly attractive programs induces the reflection that we have been indebted chiefly to Mr. Koussewitsky, Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Sokoloff and their orchestras for the privilege of hearing much of the interesting new music that has come our way during recent seasons. Memory compares and contrasts the programs that have been performed in New York by these visitors from Boston, Philadelphia and Cleveland with those that have been given by indigenous orchestras, and the result is a striking tribute to the enterprise of the Messrs. Koussewitsky, Stokowski and Sokoloff. Our own conductors have more limited, or more conservative, tastes, and though we may esteem them for other virtues, other capacities, we must deplore the fact that they have frittered away their time and ours upon novelties by Respighi, Pizzetti, Zandonai, Pick-Mangiagalli, Tomassini, Casella, Malipiero and Alfano—as if all, or indeed as if any, interesting contemporary music were being produced in Italy!

* * *

True, Mr. Koussewitsky, Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Sokoloff each has his preferences. In Mr. Koussewitsky's case (since it is under consideration) these appear, however, rather less limited than in that of Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Molinari. Mr. Koussewitsky is a Russian and has a natural sympathy for Russian music. But it is in no sense an exclusive sympathy, and it has not dominated his programatic arrangements. By performing their works for the first time in America, or for the first time anywhere, Mr. Koussewitsky has encouraged the creative labors of Englishmen, Frenchmen, Americans, Slavs and Scandinavians as well as Russians. His audiences in Boston have enjoyed many novelties which he has not privileged his audiences in New York to hear; none the less, we have, in recent seasons, heard for the first time, and under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction, such important contemporary works as Strawinsky's "Oedipus Rex," the Toch Piano Concerto and Bax's E Minor Symphony. New music by Aaron Copland and Louis Gruenberg (both Americans), by Arthur Foote and William Walton, by Honegger and De Falla and Lazar and Tansman and Prokofiew has appeared upon his New York programs. And, like Mr. Sokoloff, he has been a patron of Loeffler and Bloch; like Mr. Stokowski, he has played for us the music of Schoenberg and Sibelius.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky's persistent undaunted championship of the music of Jan Sibelius is not the least important of the procedures which have placed him high in our esteem as a conductor and a musician. A major work, a symphony, by Sibelius has been included at least once a season up on the programs of New York concerts of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Koussewitsky was the first to play for us the Seventh Symphony, though his performance (in January of 1927, was closely followed by another, given under the direction of Mr. Damrosch. During the winter of 1927-28 he offered us the First Symphony; last season he revived the Fifth. This year it is to be the Sixth Symphony, a work until now unheard in New York.

* * *

There should, of course, be nothing remarkable in the fact that Mr. Koussewitsky thus frequently (comparatively speaking) undertakes to perform the works of a composer of whom it has been said that he is "the only modern whose genius is indisputable, the only master of symphonic form and symphonic style since Brahms." There should be nothing remarkable in the fact, but—unfortunately—there is. For conductors are loath to burden their programs with music to which, inexplicably, the public remains indifferent. We have often commented upon the curious position among his contemporaries occupied by Sibelius, the anomalous attitude adopted toward him by musicians and public alike. Both—so far as it is possible to judge from the criticism and the reception of his works when they are performed—profess the greatest admiration for his music; both boast a consciousness of his genius. Yet both maintain, in practice, a curious, unfathomable indifference to the man and his work. This we may conclude from the infrequency with which Sibelius' most representative productions—the seven symphonies—are heard in our concert halls. Cecil Gray states the problem in his "Survey of Contemporary Music" and admits his baffiement: Sibelius he calls "the dark horse of modern music," and cannot understand why he should be. No more can Lawrence Gillman, who, hearing Mr. Stokowski's performance of the Fifth Symphony, wonders what makes music — more perticularly, what makes symphonies popular, since this one obviously isn't. And no more can we.

* * *

Mr. Gray seeks the light by classing Sibelius among the "primitives" of music, along with Mossorgksky and Borodin. He is not—like Strawinsky, for example—a hypercivilized, supercultured, overrefined artist whose only recourse is an arbitrary but opportune reversion to the primitive; Sibelius and other composers to whom he may be compared are prrimitive, "not from any theoretic or sentimental yearnings, but simply because their minds are simple, direct and unsophisticated." In the end this explains nothing (except how it has been possible for Sibelius to produce almost as much bad music as good) and serves merely roughly to define Sibelius' artistic personality. Mr. Gilman wonders if possibly the epithets flung at Sibelius' music have discouraged its popularity. "Harsh," "gloomy," "austere," "unbending," "bleak"—these are a few, and for the moment we might well imagine that we are reading of an earlier master, of Brahms, who was all of these things and more to many among his contemporaries and his posterity. But these adjectives were offered in unfriendly criticism of Brahms; in the case of Sibelius they are intended as praise—otherwise the parallel might encourage us. Perhaps we have done Sibelius a poor service with our praise. Perhaps to cultivate a taste for his music, a desire to hear it, we should be less explicit in our descriptions of it, admit the greatness of the symphonies, and maintain secrecy as to the qualities upon which that greatness is based.

* * *

It would be an easy matter for the writer to enter into a conspiracy of silence on the subject of the Sixth Symphony. Easy, because he has not heard the Symphony and knows of it only that it is in the key of D minor and divided into four movements, that it was composed in 1925 and bears the opus number 104, and that it was first performed in this country by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Mr. Stokowski conducting, in Philadelphia on Jan. 13, 1927. However, he has found in various places hints as to the nature of this Symphony's content, interesting and suggestive, and these he proposes to share with the reader—who may, like himself, desire some little preparation for the first New York performance of this work, to be conducted by Mr. Koussewitsky on Saturday afternoon of this week.

The author of the article on Sibelius in Grove likens the Sixth Symphony to the Fourth, in A minor, the recognized masterpiece among the seven. The two have in common a "mystical, primeval nature-worship"; they seem, we are told, to grow from the primitive soil of Finland. Of the Fourth Symphony Mr. Rosenfeld has written sympathetically in Musical Portraits: "The work . . . reflects a landscape. It is full of home sounds, of cattle and 'saeters' of timbered houses and sparse nature. And through it there gleams a pale evanescent sunlight and through it there sounds the burden of a lowly tragedy." Does this also describe the Sixth Symphony? Let us hope that it does. Sibelius has admitted, "It is true that I am a dreamer and poet of nature. I love the mysterious sounds of the fields and forests, water and mountains," and it is in the nature-poetry of the Fourth Symphony that he is at his greatest. Perhapt the Sixth is equally a masterpiece. We shall see.

* * *

Sibelius' love of nature, his profound feeling for its beauty and mystery, his conception of nature as the garment of deity, is expressed in his music with gravity and reticence. He dares only rarely to publish in a jubilant song the revelation that has been vouchsafed him. But his ecstasy, though he must conceal it, is no less sharp than in the cry

God, I can push the grass apart
And lay my finger on thy heart!

For God and nature (Sibelius would perhaps not differentiate between the two) have disciplined this man to whom they have permitted the revelation of their truth; they have disciplined not him alone but his nation and race. It is not only for himself that Sibelius offers his reverence to nature pantheistically conceived but for the Finnish race, the Finnish people, and it is to Finnish earth and water and sky that he addresses his ceremony of worship. "There has been no composer," Mr. Rosenfeld reminds us, "whose music gives back the colors and form and odors of his native land more persistently. The orchestral compositions of Sibelius seem to have passed over black torrents and desolate moorlands, through pallid sunlight and grim primeval forests, and become drenched with them. The instrumentation is all wet grays and blacks, relieved only by bits of brightness wan and elusive as the northern summer, frostily green as the polar lights. The works are full of the gnawing of bassoons, and the bleakness of the English horn, full of shattering trombones and screaming violins, full of the sinister rolling of drums, the menacing reverberations of cymbals, the icy glittering of harps. The musical ideas of those compositions, which are finely realized, recall the ruggedness and hardiness and darkness of things that persist in the Finnish winter. The rhythms seem to approach the wild, unnumbered rhythms of the forest and the wind and the flickering sunlight."

Yet, he is narrowly a national musician only in works of little importance—the tone poem "Finlandia," the overture "En Saga," and a few choral compositions which have seldom been heard beyond the borders of Finland. His nationalism is deeply rooted and essential in the soul of the artist, but at its highest and best—in the First and Fourth and Fifth and Seventh Symphonies—it is universal and not alien to us. For Sibelius records those experiences of the spirit which are common not alone to his people but to all people, and his language is one which all may understand.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

Novelties to Feature Program by Symphony

Program of Boston Symphony Taken from Work of Sibelius

Great Finn's Violin Concerto Is One of the Selections Heard at Carnegie Hall.

By HERBERT F. PEYSER.

The Boston Symphony spent the larger part of Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall in glorifying Jan Sibelius. This is as it should be. Sibelius is probably the one musician still living and creating whose abode stands on the threshold of greatness and whose preoccupations scorn the shallow art sophistries of an ignoble age. His music is a tonic and a corrective, and for that very reason, doubtless, is not as liberally administered as, for the general weal, it ought to be.

Mr. Koussevitzky, elected on this occasion to represent the great Finn by his violin concerto and his sixth symphony, each a chargeful momentous work of potent architectonics and sometimes of baffling moods and either virtually a concert in itself. The peculiar color and the northern mystery of this music work an unquestionable strain on even the most cordially disposed listener. As a result Saturday's concert entailed a strain, not to say a sense of exhaustion rather infrequent in these days of imponderable or ill organized programs.

And, as if this dosage of Sibelius were not, in all conscience, enough, Mr. Koussevitzky began a plethoric session with a new four movement "Concerto Grosso" by a young Roumanian, Filip Lazar, and closed it with a second hearing of Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite."

The violin concerto, which found its earliest prophet in this country in the late Maud Powell, had for soloist on Saturday the orchestra's young concertmaster, Richard Burgin. Obviously nervous, Mr. Burgin played the taxing work in an overwrought manner that betrayed him into regrettable lapses of tone and pitch. The work itself ought to be heard oftener. Yet it is a creation with which many of the most devoted admirers of Sibelius have yet to make their peace. To the present writer the solo part has always seemed conventional in itself and unsatisfactory in its relation to the magnificent, if sombre, structure reared by the orchestra.

Mr. Lazar's concerto "in the old style" suffered somewhat by the overwhelming proximity of Sibelius. Yet it proved to be charming, adroitly written music, rich in ingenious counterpoint and genuinely felt even when most derivative.

ruenberg and Ravel's by Koussevitzky ere Wednesday.

Koussevitzky, after making several changes n his originally announced program, has decided to let New Haven hear two numbers which are new and a third presented in a distinctly novel way. There are those who think that a symphony orchestra is at its best in n Ravel, has had nation-wide attention this season. The first performance was given by Toscanini in New York last November. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to Boston on December 6 with such pronounced success that it was repeated in January.

Written for Ida Rubinstein, who danced to the music in Paris last Summer, "Bolero" consists simply of a constant almost literal repetition of a theme in this characterictic Spanish rhythm. The piece begins pianissimo and increases gradually in tonal force until the long crescendo leads to a stupifying climax. To attain endless variety in color where there is not variety in notation and rhythm, this the old stand-bys and who arch their brows a bit skentically at mention of modern works. But Dr. Koussevitzky, from the day he took command of the Boston band, has had a warm spot in his heart for novelties.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his inseparable companion, "Droll," a Boston terrier.

At first he surprised his American audiences with his audacity. As concert goers began to realze that here was something indeed worth while, those whose first impulse was to criticise became deeply interested. Sensing the favorable reaction of his audiences the conductor extended his efforts to break away from routine until he has come to be recognized as one of the outstanding exponents of the new and the novel. His success and popularity are readily apparent to those who have followed closely the affairs of the Boston Symphony in the past five or six years. There is seldom a vacant seat at a concert by the Boston band these days; frequenty, not only in Boston but afield, the S. R. O. sign is displayed.

WINS CHEERS

It was at a concert given in Providence five years ago by this splendid organization of musicians that the writer first heard cheering of football game proportions greet a musical presentation. Providence audiences have somewhat the same reputation as that which has often been attributed to New Haveners. They are cold and critical and proper—very proper and moderate in the matter of applause. A brief moment of unemotional handclapping usually suffices. There was usually suffices. There was little in the manner in which the first two numbers on the program were greeted to indicate what was to follow, that evening.

Then came "The Pines of Rome"—the first time it had been presented in Providence. Koussevitsky's eloquent back and wrists were considerably more eloquent than usual; so, too, were the members of the band. There was a momentary hush as the last note died out.

Tumult followed. Clapping, stamping, stamping, cheering, whistling, even cries of "bravo," not for a few seconds, but for minutes. The members of the orchestra frankly were astounded, even Koussevitsky's ordinarily imperturbable countenanse showed surprise. Modernism had bee ngreeted in the modern manner. Koussevitzky had done to a Providence audience what we never heard anyone else else do in the course of several years of concert going in that city.

We do not expect to hear such a demonstration in Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, although we have observed that New Haven is very fond of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We do believe, however, that the program which has been selected is something to anticipate with more than ordinary enthusiasm.

VARIETY ASSURED

The symphony chosen is the B Minor (Unfinished) by Schubert, which, although it has been heard time and time again, grows more beautiful with each rehearing. Second is Ravel's "Bolero," which was greeted by cheers in Boston in December. Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" (Fox-trot Tempo and Boston Waltz Tempo) comes after the intermission, followed by Bloch's "Schelomo" and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat (for organ) arranged for orchestra by Schonberg. Here is variety to suit the tastes of all.

"Bolero," the latest score of Maurice most skillful of French orchestrators uses almost every instrument in the orchestra in turn to state the theme as a solo. A drum gives the dance rhythm which is maintained throughout. A flute announces the theme which is subsequently repeated by the clarinet, oboe d'amour, bassoon, saxophone and high saxophone. The solo trumpet and the trombone each state the theme with their characteristic color. Meanwhile the strings are introduced with combinations of wind instruments in gradually built up dynamics, while the constant beat of the drum likewise gradually grows stronger. The piece ends in what has been described as a tornado of sound, with a surprising modulation at the very last.

"JAZZ SUITE"

Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" was introduced to Boston last week by Dr. Koussevitzky and will be given its first New York performance following that in New Haven. Gruenberg is a native of Russia, but he came to this country when a boy and now lives in Brooklyn. Of his compositions which have attracted considerable attention, his Daniel Jazz," "Enchanted Isle" and "Creation" should be mentioned.

There are four movements of the "Jazz Suite," but the last two, Blues Tempo—Slow Drag and One-step Tempo, have been eliminated from the revised program sent here. It is interesting to note that Mr. Gruenberg has been commissioned by the Juliard Foundation to write an opera, the first performance of which will be given by the pupils of the institution.

HEBREW RHAPSODY

Ernest Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody, "Schelomo" ("Solomon"), a score for cello solo which has contributed to the fame of this composer perhaps as much as any single piece, will have an unprecedented performance here when Dr. Koussevitzky gives the solo part to four violincellists, to be played in unison. For the broad and sombre declamation of this solo part as conceived by Bloch, probably no cellist living could provide ample tone. Dr. Koussevitzky will first try this experiment here.

Born in Geneva in 1880, Bloch has since made his home in this country. Until recent years, practically all of his compositions had a decided Hebraic strain. Having identified himself with this country he composed his prize Rhapsody, "America," for orchestra and chorus which was performed by every large orchestra in the country last season.

Bloch thus described the racial strain in his scores: "It is not my purpose, not my desire, to attempt a 'reconstitution' of Jewish music, or to base my works on melodies more or less authentic. I am not an archaeologist. I hold it of first importance to write good, genuine music. It is the Jewish soul that interests me, the complex, glowing, agitated soul, that I feel vibrating throughout the Bible: the freshness and naivete of the Patriarchs; the violence that is evident in the prophetic books; the Jew's savage love of justice ;the despair of the Preached in Jerusalem; the sorrow and the immensity of the Book of Job; the sensuality of the Song of Songs. All this is in us; all this is in me, and it is the better part of me. It is allthis that I endeavor to hear in myself and to transcribe in my music; the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers way down in our soul."

R. A. L.

68

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
EAGLE

A Finnish Masterpiece

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky Will Play the Sixth Symphony of Jan Sibelius for the First Time in New York

DURING the week to come Serge Koussewitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a trio of New York concerts. Two will be given at Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, the third at the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, and no fewer than four novelties are included among the works comprising the exceptionally interesting programs to be performed on these occasions. A Jazz Suite, Louis Gruenberg's Op. 28, will be heard at both of the Manhattan concerts; on Thursday evening Schoenberg's transcription of a Bach Prelude and Fugue in E minor will receive its first New York performance, and on Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussewitsky will disclose to us a Concerto Grosso in the Old Style, by the Rumanian Filip Lazar, and the Sixth Symphony of Jan Sibelius. The programs otherwise include one of the more unfamiliar Haydn symphonies—that in B-flat, with the horn call, numbered 12 in Breitkopf & Haertel's catalogue—Ernest Bloch's rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra, "Schelemo" (in which the solo part will be played in unison upon four 'cellos), the seldom-heard Sibelius D minor Violin Concerto, a suite from Strawinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu" and the Ravel "Bolero."

A glance at these singularly attractive programs induces the reflection that we have been indebted chiefly to Mr. Koussewitsky, Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Sokoloff and their orchestras for the privilege of hearing much of the interesting new music that has come our way during recent seasons. Memory compares and contrasts the programs that have been performed in New York by these visitors from Boston, Philadelphia and Cleveland with those that have been given by indigenous orchestras, and the result is a striking tribute to the enterprise of the Messrs. Koussewitsky, Stokowski and Sokoloff. Our own conductors have more limited, or more conservative, tastes, and though we may esteem them for other virtues, other capacities, we must deplore the fact that they have frittered away their time and ours upon novelties by Respighi, Pizzetti, Zandonai, Pick-Mangiagalli, Tomassini, Casella, Malipiero and Alfano—as if all, or indeed as if any, interesting contemporary music were being produced in Italy!

* * *

True, Mr. Koussewitsky, Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Sokoloff each has his preferences. In Mr. Koussewitsky's case (since it is under consideration) these appear, however, rather less limited than in that of Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Molinari. Mr. Koussewitsky is a Russian and has a natural sympathy for Russian music. But it is in no sense an exclusive sympathy, and it has not dominated his programatic arrangements. By performing their works for the first time in America, or for the first time anywhere, Mr. Koussewitsky has encouraged the creative labors of Englishmen, Frenchmen, Americans, Slavs and Scandinavians as well as Russians. His audiences in Boston have enjoyed many novelties which he has not privileged his audiences in New York to hear; none the less, we have, in recent seasons, heard for the first time, and under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction, such important contemporary works as Strawinsky's "Oedipus Rex," the Toch Piano Concerto and Bax's E Minor Symphony. New music by Aaron Copland and Louis Gruenberg (both Americans), by Arthur Foote and William Walton, by Honegger and De Falla and Lazar and Tansman and Prokofiew has appeared upon his New York programs. And, like Mr. Sokoloff, he has been a patron of Loeffler and Bloch; like Mr. Stokowski, he has played for us the music of Schoenberg and Sibelius.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky's persistent undaunted championship of the music of Jan Sibelius is not the least important of the procedures which have placed him high in our esteem as a conductor and a musician. A major work, a symphony, by Sibelius has been included at least once a season up on the programs of New York concerts of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Koussewitsky was the first to play for us the Seventh Symphony, though his performance (in January of 1927. was closely followed by another, given under the direction of Mr. Damrosch. During the winter of 1927-28 he offered us the First Symphony; last season he revived the Fifth. This year it is to be the Sixth Symphony, a work until now unheard in New York.

* * *

There should, of course, be nothing remarkable in the fact that Mr. Koussewitsky thus frequently (comparatively speaking) undertakes to perform the works of a composer of whom it has been said that he is "the only modern whose genius is indisputable, the only master of symphonic form and symphonic style since Brahms." There should be nothing remarkable in the fact, but—unfortunately—there is. For conductors are loath to burden their programs with music to which, inexplicably, the public remains indifferent. We have often commented upon the curious position among his contemporaries occupied by Sibelius, the anomalous attitude adopted toward him by musicians and public alike. Both—so far as it is possible to judge from the criticism and the reception of his works when they are performed—profess the greatest admiration for his music; both boast a consciousness of his genius. Yet both maintain, in practice, a curious, unfathomable indifference to the man and his work. This we may conclude from the infrequency with which Sibelius' most representative productions—the seven symphonies—are heard in our concert halls. Cecil Gray states the problem in his "Survey of Contemporary Music" and admits his bafflement: Sibelius he calls "the dark horse of modern music," and cannot understand why he should be. No more can Lawrence Gilman, who, hearing Mr. Stokowski's performance of the Fifth Symphony, wonders what makes music — more particularly, what makes symphonies popular, since this one obviously isn't. And no more can we.

* * *

Mr. Gray seeks the light by classing Sibelius among the "primitives" of music, along with Mossorgksky and Borodin. He is not—like Strawinsky, for example—a hypercivilized, supercultured, overrefined artist whose only recourse is an arbitrary but opportune reversion to the primitive; Sibelius and other composers to whom he may be compared are primitive, "not from any theoretic or sentimental yearnings, but simply because their minds are simple, direct and unsophisticated." In the end this explains nothing (except how it has been possible for Sibelius to produce almost as much bad music as good) and serves merely roughly to define Sibelius' artistic personality. Mr. Gilman wonders if possibly the epithets flung at Sibelius' music have discouraged its popularity. "Harsh," "gloomy," "austere," "unbending," "bleak"—these are a few, and for the moment we might well imagine that we are reading of an earlier master, of Brahms, who was all of these things and more to many among his contemporaries and his posterity. But these adjectives were offered in unfriendly criticism of Brahms; in the case of Sibelius they are intended as praise—otherwise the parallel might encourage us. Perhaps we have done Sibelius a poor service with our praise. Perhaps to cultivate a taste for his music, a desire to hear it, we should be less explicit in our descriptions of it, admit the greatness of the symphonies, and maintain secrecy as to the qualities upon which that greatness is based.

* * *

It would be an easy matter for the writer to enter into a conspiracy of silence on the subject of the Sixth Symphony. Easy, because he has not heard the Symphony and knows of it only that it is in the key of D minor and divided into four movements, that it was composed in 1925 and bears the opus number 104, and that it was first performed in this country by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Mr. Stokowski conducting, in Philadelphia on Jan. 13, 1927. However, he has found in various places hints as to the nature of this Symphony's content, interesting and suggestive, and these he proposes to share with the reader—who may, like himself, desire some little preparation for the first New York performance of this work, to be conducted by Mr. Koussewitsky on Saturday afternoon of this week.

The author of the article on Sibelius in Grove likens the Sixth Symphony to the Fourth, in A minor, the recognized masterpiece among the seven. The two have in common a "mystical, primeval nature-worship"; they seem, we are told, to grow from the primitive soil of Finland. Of the Fourth Symphony Mr. Rosenfeld has written sympathetically in Musical Portraits: "The work . . . reflects a landscape. It is full of home sounds, of cattle and 'saeters' of timbered houses and sparse nature. And through it there gleams a pale evanescent sunlight and through it there sounds the burden of a lowly tragedy." Does this also describe the Sixth Symphony? Let us hope that it does. Sibelius has admitted, "It is true that I am a dreamer and poet of nature. I love the mysterious sounds of the fields and forests, water and mountains," and it is in the nature-poetry of the Fourth Symphony that he is at his greatest. Perhaps the Sixth is equally a masterpiece. We shall see.

* * *

Sibelius' love of nature, his profound feeling for its beauty and mystery, his conception of nature as the garment of deity, is expressed in his music with gravity and reticence. He dares only rarely to publish in a jubilant song the revelation that has been vouchsafed him. But his ecstasy, though he must conceal it, is no less sharp than in the cry

God, I can push the grass apart
And lay my finger on thy heart!

For God and nature (Sibelius would perhaps not differentiate between the two) have disciplined this man to whom they have permitted the revelation of their truth; they have disciplined not him alone but his nation and race. It is not only for himself that Sibelius offers his reverence to nature pantheistically conceived but for the Finnish race, the Finnish people, and it is to Finnish earth and water and sky that he addresses his ceremony of worship. "There has been no composer," Mr. Rosenfeld reminds us, "whose music gives back the colors and form and odors of his native land more persistently. The orchestral compositions of Sibelius seem to have passed over black torrents and desolate moorlands, through pallid sunlight and grim primeval forests, and become drenched with them. The instrumentation is all wet grays and blacks, relieved only by bits of brightness wan and elusive as the northern summer, frostily green as the polar lights. The works are full of the gnawing of bassoons, and the bleakness of the English horn, full of shattering trombones and screaming violins, full of the sinister rolling of drums, the menacing reverberations of cymbals, the icy glittering of harps. The musical ideas of those compositions, which are finely realized, recall the ruggedness and hardiness and darkness of things that persist in the Finnish winter. The rhythms seem to approach the wild, unnumbered rhythms of the forest and the wind and the flickering sunlight."

Yet, he is narrowly a national musician only in works of little importance—the tone poem "Finlandia," the overture "En Saga," and a few choral compositions which have seldom been heard beyond the borders of Finland. His nationalism is deeply rooted and essential in the soul of the artist, but at its highest and best—in the First and Fourth and Fifth and Seventh Symphonies—it is universal and not alien to us. For Sibelius records those experiences of the spirit which are common not alone to his people but to all people, and his language is one which all may understand.

FANG OP

OL PRESENTS T THE NATIONAL

ce of the Sung Dynasty, Leads oodly Audience Moved to occasion to represent the great Finn by his violin concerto and his sixth symphony, each a chargeful momentous work of potent architectonics and sometimes of baffling moods and either virtually a concert in itself. The peculiar color and the northern mystery of this music work an unquestionable strain on even the most cordially disposed listener. As a result Saturday's concert entailed a strain, not to say a sense of exhaustion rather infrequent in these days of imponderable or ill organized programs.

And, as if this dosage of Sibelius were not, in all conscience, enough, Mr. Koussevitzky began a plethoric session with a new four movement "Concerto Grosso" by a young Roumanian, Filip Lazar, and closed it with a second hearing of Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite."

The violin concerto, which found its earliest prophet in this country in the late Maud Powell, had for soloist on Saturday the orchestra's young concertmaster, Richard Burgin. Obviously nervous, Mr. Burgin played the taxing work in an overwrought manner that betrayed him into regrettable lapses of tone and pitch. The work itself ought to be heard oftener. Yet it is a creation with which many of the most devoted admirers of Sibelius have yet to make their peace. To the presen writer the solo part has alway seemed conventional in itself an unsatisfactory in its relation to th magnificent, if sombre, structur reared by the orchestra.

Mr. Lazar's concerto "in the old style" suffered somewhat by the overwhelming proximity of Sibelius. Yet it proved to be charming, adroitly written music, rich in ingenious counterpoint and genuinely felt even when most derivative.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

Novelties to Feature Program by Symphony

"Jazz Suite" by Gruenberg and Ravel's "Bolero" Chosen by Koussevitzky for Concert Here Wednesday.

A RARE treat awaits New Haven music lovers who are on hand to greet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky when he strides across the stage at Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening to lead his Boston Symphony Orchestra in their annual concert here. A Boston Symphony concert is always a highlight in the musical season, but the program which the noted conductor has selected for presentation here this week promises to be unusually interesting.

Koussevitzky, after making several changes n his originally announced program, has decided to let New Haven hear two numbers which are new and a third presented in a distinctly novel way. There are those who think that a symphony orchestra is at its best in the old stand-bys and who arch their brows a bit skeptically at mention of modern works. But Dr. Koussevitzky, from the day he took command of the Boston band, has had a warm spot in his heart for novelties.

At first he surprised his American audiences with his audacity. As concert goers began to realze that here was something indeed worth while, those whose first impulse was to criticise became deeply interested. Sensing the favorable reaction of his audiences the conductor extended his efforts to break away from routine until he has come to be recognized as one of the outstanding exponents of the new and the novel. His success and popularity are readily apparent to those who have followed closely the affairs of the Boston Symphony in the past five or six years. There is seldom a vacant seat at a concert by the Boston band these days; frequenty, not only in Boston but afield, the S. R. O. sign is displayed.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his inseparable companion, "Droll," a Boston terrier.

WINS CHEERS

It was at a concert given in Providence five years ago by this splendid organization of musicians that the writer first heard cheering of football game proportions greet a musical presentation. Providence audiences have somewhat the same reputation as that which has often been attributed to New Haveners. They are cold and critical and proper—very proper and moderate in the matter of applause. A brief moment of unemotional handclapping usually suffices. There was usually suffices. There was little in the manner in which the first two numbers on the program were greeted to indicate what was to follow, that evening.

Then came "The Pines of Rome"—the first time it had been presented in Providence. Koussevitsky's eloquent back and wrists were considerably more eloquent than usual; so, too, were the members of the band. There was a momentary hush as the last note died out.

Tumult followed. Clapping, stamping, stamping, cheering, whistling, even cries of "bravo," not for a few seconds, but for minutes. The members of the orchestra frankly were astounded, even Koussevitsky's ordinarily imperturbable countenanse showed surprise. Modernism had bee ngreeted in the modern manner. Koussevitzky had done to a Providence audience what we never heard anyone else else do in the course of several years of concert going in that city.

We do not expect to hear such a demonstration in Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, although we have observed that New Haven is very fond of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We do believe, however, that the program which has been selected is something to anticipate with more than ordinary enthusiasm.

VARIETY ASSURED

The symphony chosen is the B Minor (Unfinished) by Schubert, which, although it has been heard time and time again, grows more beautiful with each rehearing. Second is Ravel's "Bolero," which was greeted by cheers in Boston in December. Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" (Fox-trot Tempo and Boston Waltz Tempo) comes after the intermission, followed by Bloch's "Schelomo" and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat (for organ) arranged for orchestra by Schonberg. Here is variety to suit the tastes of all.

"Bolero," the latest score of Maurice Ravel, has had nation-wide attention this season. The first performance was given by Toscanini in New York last November. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to Boston on December 6 with such pronounced success that it was repeated in January.

Written for Ida Rubinstein, who danced to the music in Paris last Summer, "Bolero" consists simply of a constant almost literal repetition of a theme in this characterictic Spanish rhythm. The piece begins pianissimo and increases gradually in tonal force until the long crescendo leads to a stupifying climax. To attain endless variety in color where there is not variety in notation and rhythm, this most skillful of French orchestrators uses almost every instrument in the orchestra in turn to state the theme as a solo. A drum gives the dance rhythm which is maintained throughout. A flute announces the theme which is subsequently repeated by the clarinet, oboe d'amour, bassoon, saxophone and high saxophone. The solo trumpet and the trombone each state the theme with their characteristic color. Meanwhile the strings are introduced with combinations of wind instruments in gradually built up dynamics, while the constant beat of the drum likewise gradually grows stronger. The piece ends in what has been described as a tornado of sound, with a surprising modulation at the very last.

"JAZZ SUITE"

Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" was introduced to Boston last week by Dr. Koussevitzky and will be given its first New York performance following that in New Haven. Gruenberg is a native of Russia, but he came to this country when a boy and now lives in Brooklyn. Of his compositions which have attracted considerable attention, his Daniel Jazz," "Enchanted Isle" and "Creation" should be mentioned.

There are four movements of the "Jazz Suite," but the last two, Blues Tempo—Slow Drag and One-step Tempo, have been eliminated from the revised program sent here. It is interesting to note that Mr. Gruenberg has been commissioned by the Juliard Foundation to write an opera, the first performance of which will be given by the pupils of the institution.

HEBREW RHAPSODY

Ernest Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody, "Schelomo" ("Solomon"), a score for cello solo which has contributed to the fame of this composer perhaps as much as any single piece, will have an unprecedented performance here when Dr. Koussevitzky gives the solo part to four violincellists, to be played in unison. For the broad and sombre declamation of this solo part as conceived by Bloch, probably no cellist living could provide ample tone. Dr. Koussevitzky will first try this experiment here.

Born in Geneva in 1880, Bloch has since made his home in this country. Until recent years, practically all of his compositions had a decided Hebraic strain. Having identified himself with this country he composed his prize Rhapsody, "America," for orchestra and chorus which was performed by every large orchestra in the country last season.

Bloch thus described the racial strain in his scores: "It is not my purpose, not my desire, to attempt a 'reconstitution' of Jewish music, or to base my works on melodies more or less authentic. I am not an archaeologist. I hold it of first importance to write good, genuine music, It is the Jewish soul that interests me, the complex, glowing, agitated soul, that I feel vibrating throughout the Bible: the freshness and naivete of the Patriarchs; the violence that is evident in the prophetic books; the Jew's savage love of justice ;the despair of the Preached in Jerusalem; the sorrow and the immensity of the Book of Job; the sensuality of the Song of Songs. All this is in us; all this is in me, and it is the better part of me. It is allthis that I endeavor to hear in myself and to transcribe in my music; the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers way down in our soul."

R. A. L.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

63

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Bostonian Music In New York Ears

Audiences and Reviewers Take Kindly to Koussevitzky's Novel Cargo

WHAT with one novel piece after another, at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra in New York last week, Dr. Koussevitzky gave two audiences much to interest them, and the reviewers plenty for their pens. From recent concerts at home they heard, for example, Mr. Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite." Most of the scribes—not to say Pharisees—thought poorly of it. Mr. Gilman, however, took the opposite view in the Herald Tribune:

> This symphonic jazz of Mr. Gruenberg's, regarded as jazz, may be either good or bad. We know not what the pundits of Tin-Pan Alley might think of it. We ventured, listening to the piece, to appraise it not as jazz, but as music. Thus considered, it lives its own life as organized and pleasurable sound. The thrice familiar patterns are filled with an ingenuity and richness of fancy, are ordered by a civilized musical consciousness, which makes the issue engaging and profitable for other than merely primitive minds.

Mr. Henderson in the Sun may be spokesman for the other side: "Mr. Gruenberg's Suite is one of several attempts which have been made to demonstrate that jazz, our own most particular product, can be treated artistically just as folk music has. But there is something wrong somewhere. Either this is not real jazz or real art; or perhaps jazz and real art cannot be successfully married. Mr. Gruenberg's piece was worth hearing, but when it had been heard one was convinced that he had been made acquainted with an experiment and nothing more. One listened to music which surely belongs to the jazz family, even if it has married a foreigner. There is a rich harvest of dissonances and there are trumpets con sordini to furnish the conventional 'breaks.' But nothing of the seductive wickedness of jazz was discovered. The finale, a grand smash of tone, evoked applause from an audience which up to that part of the suite had been singularly reticent."

And Schoenberg

At the same concert the Manhattanese also heard Schönberg's orchestral arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat originally written for organ. The audience approved; the reviewers, for the most part, agreed. To quote Mr. Gilman again: "Schönberg has transferred to the orchestra with astonishing skill the brilliancy and power of Bach's superb music. If the 'purists' are inclined, in their gentle way, to heave bricks at his impious head, conductors and orchestral program-makers will surely bless him."

In the concert of Saturday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky included the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius. Again the reviewers sat up and took notice. To Mr. Gilman the Symphony "had beauty, strength and fascination." To Mr. Thompson "an invigorating directness. The bold employment of thirds and of scale passages might have seemed even a little naive in a lesser man. But the composer's harmonic individuality, the strength and solidity of his structure, the clarity of his voices, his freedom from effect-for-effect's sake, the latter particularly evident in the manner with which several movements were brought to their conclusions with what seemed the scantiest of preparation, were never more evident than in this work. Increased familiarity with the Symphony might lessen or increase the impression that the basic ideas were of a sturdiness that would wear well."

Even to Lazar

For his part, Mr. Henderson lent a kindly ear to Lazar's Concerto Grosso, also heard at the matinée, writing in the Sun: "His style was a finely organized blend of old and new. He walked sometimes on the border of the modernist territory, but the fundamental substance of his harmonic scheme was that of the fathers. His melodic subjects were sharply outlined and had dignified character. They were clearly related and the progress of the musician's thought toward the goal of his finale was well marked. The concerto-grosso has found favor with several composers of our time, and with good reason. It gives the composer much freedom and permits many and varied instrumental effects without demanding a huge orchestra. Mr. Lazar's composition is a pleasing work and its aim is quite high enough for the possibilities of the form." . . . In the playing of all these pieces, at the one concert and the other, there was only praise for conductor and orchestra. In Sibelius's Concerto for Violin, heard at the matinée, Mr. Burgin fared as well.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY SENSATION IN CHICAGO VISIT

Chicago, second to New York in musical activities among American cities, had the sensation of its musical life, a year ago last autumn. It was the first visit of the Boston Sympohny Orchestra in 12 years, the famous orchestra having then played there under Dr. Muck, and once many years before, at the Columbian Exposition. Chicago had, of course, had many reports of Koussevitzky's genius, and the extraordinary performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his inspiring hand. When at last the Russian conductor made his first venture into the middle west with his orchestra, Orchestra Hall was crowded to the doors to hear him, despite the fact that the opera season opened on the same night.

Yet probably not a single person expected anything like what he heard. After every number a storm of applause interrupted the concert. At the end, the audience crowded about the stage.

The Chicago American fairly describes the occasion:

"What's the use of trying to tell anybody about what happened in Orchestra Hall last night! Veteran of the concert halls, I confess without fear of being accused of either hysteria or neurotic complex that I experienced one of the most legitimate, profound, esctatic thrills of my whole lifetime, an emotion shared with equal spontaneity and gratitude by an audience composed of the cognoscenti of Chicago, the cosmopolitan chosen, who have learned their lesson of art in every world school.

"If one writes with the hot blood of the twenties, it is because these men are a veritable elixir of youth, beside which I would not trade a million doses of Ponce de Leon's compound! The first part of the program was in truth so marvelous that when intermission came, no one had anything left to give. The audience was bled dry of emotion and nerves and ecstacy. A reading of Ravel's 'Daphnis and Chloe' that would take columns to describe in its essence and the reaction upon its hearers—a color screen of gorgeous, heavily blended hues and contrasts, of never-heard sonorities, of fascinating harmony, of light and shade, that held one breathless. The very silence of the audience was oppressive, a silence of rapt emotion, as though each human soul had forgoten the presence of its neighbor, an dthe ego were lost in this exhibition of matchless poetic beauty.

"Before this we had a surprise with Prokofieff's Classic Symphony. The clever young Russian fooled us this time. Instead of his former barbarities, he offers a symphony, almost a sinfonietta, exquisite, Mozartean, dainty, finely spun, short to the point of delight, brief ,of delectable briefness. Something said, and that's that, and Koussevitzky read it with charming lightness and humor. After the intermission we had the Tschaikowsky Symphony in F minor and I am sure no one has ever heard it played like that before with such passion, fire and superb virtuosity, such unheard-of technical finish. Each member of that orchestra is a great artist in his own right. It is indeed good to live in this America of ours. There is nothing like another such organization the world over. The audience did not disperse after the concert, but stood around an eternity, talking. They will talk a long time before they get through relating what happened on the evening of November 3, 1927, in Orchestra Hall."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
MAR

Koussevitzky To Conduct Thursday

Boston Orchestra Plans New York Premiere of Gruenberg Work

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the solo cello part for four cellists in Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, the first of the fourth pair of New York concerts this season. He also will give the first New York performance of Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," which was first performed in Boston on February 21 and 22. The movements are entitled: Fox-trot Tempo, Boston Waltz Tempo, Blues Tempo Slow Drag and One-Step Tempo.

The Thursday program will open with a little known symphony in D Major by Haydn (B. & H. No. 31) entitled "With the Horn Call." This is probably the first case in which four horns were used in a symphony. On account of conspicuous solos for the violin and cello the symphony has been characterized as Concertante.

At the Saturday afternoon concert, in addition to Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," Sibelius's Symphony No. 6, Filip Lazar's Concerto Grosso No. 1 will be introduced. The Roumanian composer has entitled his concerto "In the Old Style." Sibelius's Symphony is of small proportions and has no slow movement. The same composer's violin concerto will likewise be played, with Richard Burgin as soloist.

The programs:

Thursday Evening

Symphony in D major, B and H. No. 31 "With the Horn Call".....Haydn
"Jazz Suite".....Gruenberg
"Schelomo" (solo part to be played by four cellists).....Bloch
Prelude and Fugue in E flat, arranged for orchestra by Schonberg.....Bach

Saturday Afternoon

Concerto Grosso No. 1 for Orchestra...Lazar
Symphony No. 6.....Sibelius
Violin Concerto.....Sibelius
(Richard Burgin, Soloist)
"Jazz Suite".....Gruenberg

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

Sixth Symphony Of Jan Sibelius On Boston List

Unfamiliar Music Will Be Played by Koussevitzky in New York Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its fourth pair of Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with unfamiliar numbers on both programs. Both will include Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," which first performed in Boston on February 21-22. The premiere of the work was in Cincinnati on March 22, 1929, and it was played by the Los Angeles Symphony under Dr. Artur Rodzinski's direction on January 30 last. The Los Angeles conductor had a leaflet inserted in the program books defending the inclusion of jazz at a symphony concert. The work is in four movements, in Fox-Trot tempo, Boston Waltz tempo, Blues Tempo-Slow Drag, and One-Step Tempo.

Thursday's program offers an arrangement of Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E flat for orchestra by Arnold Schönberg, who, as an arranger of Bach, is already known here by two chorale preludes. The arrangement on this program had its first American performance in Boston last week. The opening number is a little known symphony by Haydn (B. and H. 31) labeled "With the Horn Call" and employing four horns. In Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" Dr. Koussevitzky has assigned the cello solo to four cellos playin unison.

Saturday's program will introduce to New York the sixth symphony of Jan Sibelius, which had its first American performance a few years ago by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski, but never reached this city, although the seventh was introduced to us in 1927 by the Boston Symphony, followed shortly by the New York Symphony under Klemperer. The sixth symphony is short, and has no slow movement.

Sibelius will also be represented by his violin concerto, with Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, as soloist. The opening number will be the first concerto grosso of the Rumanian composer, Filip Lazar, "in the old style."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

KOUSSEVITZKY PRAISES OUR MUSICAL PUBLIC

Serge Koussevitzky, in a recent interview, described music in America as it has impressed him during his five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"A phenomenal musical rennaissance," was the keynote of what he told the French reporters who sought him at his home on the Rue Colignon in Paris.

"Americans have the active temperament," he declared. "Everyone is active, and especially the women. Therefore, they have stimulated orchestral development just as they have created immense busness enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

In this connection Mr. Koussevitzky made the following statement: "What is most stimulating about the musical situation in America is that the majority of the people have musical taste. In Europe one finds always a certain circle who attend concerts, but in America it is the rank and file who form an enthusiastic audience."

Mr. Koussevitzky gave as specific instances of America's musical development "her twenty superb orchestras," and also "her promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Roger Sessions and Carpenter." The conductor believes that jazz has finished its major role as an influence in American music and will henceforth be relegated to the realm of dance. He also considers Stravinsky as perhaps the outstanding influence in modern music in America. However, no matter how much modern musicians have been influenced by this composer ,they are always striving to break away from him too. A real musician is always influenced by evolution but not by imitation.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership, comes to Woolsey hall tomorrow evening.

63

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY SENSATION IN CHICAGO VISIT

Chicago, second to New York in musical activities among American cities, had the sensation of its musical life, a year ago last autumn. It was the first visit of the Boston Sympohny Orchestra in 12 years, the famous orchestra having then played there under Dr. Muck, and once many years before, at the Columbian Exposition. Chicago had, of course, had many reports of Koussevitzky's genius, and the extraordinary performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his inspiring hand. When at last the Russian conductor made his first venture into the middle west with his orchestra, Orchestra Hall was crowded to the doors to hear him, despite the fact that the opera season opened on the same night.

Yet probably not a single person expected anything like what he heard. After every number a storm of applause interrupted the concert. At the end, the audience crowded about the stage.

The Chicago American fairly describes the occasion:

"What's the use of trying to tell anybody about what happened in Orchestra Hall last night! Veteran of the concert halls, I confess without fear of being accused of either hysteria or neurotic complex that I experienced one of the most legitimate, profound, esctatic thrills of my whole lifetime, an emotion shared with equal spontaneity and gratitude by an audience composed of the cognoscenti of Chicago, the cosmopolitan chosen, who have learned their lesson of art ... every world school.

"If one writes with the hot blood of the twenties, it is because these men are a veritable elixir of youth, beside which I would not trade a million doses of Ponce de Leon's compound! The first part of the program was in truth so marvelous that when intermission came, no one had anything left to give. The audience was bled dry of emotion and nerves and ecstacy. A reading of Ravel's 'Daphnis and Chloe' that would take columns to describe in its essence and the reaction upon its hearers—a color screen of gorgeous, heavily blended hues and contrasts, of never-heard sonorities, of fascinating harmony, of light and shade, that held one breathless. The very silence of the audience was oppressive, a silence of rapt emotion, as though each human soul had forgoten the presence of its neighbor, an dthe ego were lost in this exhibition of matchless poetic beauty.

"Before this we had a surprise with Prokofieff's Classic Symphony. The clever young Russian fooled us this time. Instead of his former barbarities, he offers a symphony, almost a sinfonietta, exquisite, Mozartean, dainty, finely spun, short to the point of delight, brief ,of delectable briefness.

Dynamite was [illegible] Tschaikowsky Symphony in F minor and I am sure no one has ever heard it played like that before with such passion, fire and superb virtuosity, such unheard-of technical finish. Each member of that orchestra is a great artist in his own right. It is indeed good to live in this America of ours. There is nothing like another such organization the world over. The audience did not disperse after the concert, but stood around an eternity, talking. They will talk a long time before they get through relating what happened on the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Bostonian Music In New York Ears

Audiences and Reviewers Take Kindly to Koussevitzky's Novel Cargo

WHAT with one novel piece after another, at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra in New York last week, Dr. Koussevitzky gave two audiences much to interest them, and the reviewers plenty for their pens. From recent concerts at home they heard, for example, Mr. Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite." Most of the scribes—not to say Pharisees—thought poorly of it. Mr. Gilman, however, took the opposite view in the Herald Tribune:

> This symphonic jazz of Mr. Gruenberg's, regarded as jazz, may be either good or bad. We know not what the pundits of Tin-Pan Alley might think of it. We ventured, listening to the piece, to appraise it not as jazz, but as music. Thus considered, it lives its own life as organized and pleasurable sound. The thrice familiar patterns are filled with an ingenuity and richness of fancy, are ordered by a civilized musical consciousness, which makes the issue engaging and profitable for other than merely primitive minds.

Mr. Henderson in the Sun may be spokesman for the other side: "Mr. Gruenberg's Suite is one of several attempts which have been made to demonstrate that jazz, our own most particular product, can be treated artistically just as folk music has. But there is something wrong somewhere. Either this is not real jazz or real art; or perhaps jazz and real art cannot be successfully married. Mr. Gruenberg's piece was worth hearing, but when it had been heard one was convinced that he had been made acquainted with an experiment and nothing more. One listened to music which surely belongs to the jazz family, even if it has married a foreigner. There is a rich harvest of dissonances and there are trumpets con sordini to furnish the conventional 'breaks.' But nothing of the seductive wickedness of jazz was discovered. The finale, a grand smash of tone, evoked applause from an audience which up to that part of the suite had been singularly reticent."

And Schoenberg

At the same concert the Manhattanese also heard Schönberg's orchestral arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat originally written for organ. The audience approved; the reviewers, for the most part, agreed. To quote Mr. Gilman again: "Schönberg has transferred to the orchestra with astonishing skill the brilliancy and power of Bach's superb music. If the 'purists' are inclined, in their gentle way, to heave bricks at his impious head, conductors and orchestral program-makers will surely bless him."

In the concert of Saturday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky included the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius. Again the reveiwers sat up and took notice. To Mr. Gilman the Symphony "had beauty, strength and fascination." To Mr. Thompson "an invigorating directness. The bold employment of thirds and of scale passages might have seemed even a little naive in a lesser man. But the composer's harmonic individuality, the strength and solidity of his structure, the clarity of his voices, his freedom from effect-for-effect's sake, the latter particularly evident in the manner with which several movements were brought to their conclusions with what seemed the scantiest of preparation, were never more evident than in this work. Increased familiarity with the Symphony might lessen or increase the impression that the basic ideas were of a sturdiness that would wear well."

Even to Lazar

For his part, Mr. Henderson lent a kindly ear to Lazar's Concerto Grosso, also heard at the matinée, writing in the Sun: "His style was a finely organized blend of old and new. He walked sometimes on the border of the modernist territory, but the fundamental substance of his harmonic scheme was that of the fathers. His melodic subjects were sharply outlined and had dignified character. They were clearly related and the progress of the musician's thought toward the goal of his finale was well marked. The concerto-grosso has found favor with several composers of our time, and with good reason. It gives the composer much freedom and permits many and varied instrumental effects without demanding a huge orchestra. Mr. Lazar's composition is a pleasing work and its aim is quite high enough for the possibilities of the form." . . . In the playing of all these pieces, at the one concert and the other, there was only praise for conductor and orchestra. In Sibelius's Concerto for Violin, heard at the matinée, Mr. Burgin fared as well.

Sixth Symphony Of Jan Sibelius On Boston List

Unfamiliar Music Will Be Played by Koussevitzky in New York Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its fourth pair of Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with unfamiliar numbers on both programs. Both will include Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," which first performed in Boston on February 21-22. The premiere of the work was in Cincinnati on March 22, 1929, and it was played by the Los Angeles Symphony under Dr. Artur Rodzinski's direction on January 30 last. The Los Angeles conductor had a leaflet inserted in the program books defending the inclusion of jazz at a symphony concert. The work is in four movements, in Fox-Trot tempo, Boston Waltz tempo, Blues Tempo-Slow Drag, and One-Step Tempo.

Thursday's program offers an arrangement of Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E flat for orchestra by Arnold Schönberg, who, as an arranger of Bach, is already known here by two chorale preludes. The arrangement on this program had its first American performance in Boston last week. The opening number is a little known symphony by Haydn (B. and H. 31) labeled "With the Horn Call" and employing four horns. In Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" Dr. Koussevitzky has assigned the cello solo to four cellos playin unison.

Saturday's program will introduce to New York the sixth symphony of Jan Sibelius, which had its first American performance a few years ago by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski, but never reached this city, although the seventh was introduced to us in 1927 by the Boston Symphony, followed shortly by the New York Symphony under Klemperer. The sixth symphony is short, and has no slow movement.

Sibelius will also be represented by his violin concerto, with Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, as soloist. The opening number will be the first concerto grosso of the Rumanian composer, Filip Lazar, "in the old style."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

KOUSSEVITZKY PRAISES OUR MUSICAL PUBLIC

Serge Koussevitzky, in a recent interview, described music in America as it has impressed him during his five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"A phenomenal musical rennaissance," was the keynote of what he told the French reporters who sought him at his home on the Rue Colignon in Paris.

"Americans have the active temperament," he declared. "Everyone is active, and especially the women. Therefore, they have stimulated orchestral development just as they have created immense busness enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

In this connection Mr. Koussevitzky made the following statement: "What is most stimulating about the musical situation in America is that the majority of the people have musical taste. In Europe one finds always a certain circle who attend concerts, but in America it is the rank and file who form an enthusiastic audience."

Mr. Koussevitzky gave as specific instances of America's musical development "her twenty superb orchestras," and also "her promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Roger Sessions and Carpenter." The conductor believes that jazz has finished its major role as an influence in American music and will henceforth be relegated to the realm of dance. He also considers Stravinsky as perhaps the outstanding influence in modern music in America. However, no matter how much modern musicians have been influenced by this composer ,they are always striving to break away from him too. A real musician is always influenced by evolution but not by imitation.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership, comes to Woolsey hall tomorrow evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

Koussevitzky To Conduct Thursday

Boston Orchestra Plans New York Premiere of Gruenberg Work

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the solo cello part for four cellists in Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, the first of the fourth pair of New York concerts this season. He also will give the first New York performance of Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," which was first performed in Boston Feb. 21 and 22. The movements are entitled: Fox-trot Tempo, Boston Waltz Tempo, Blues Tempo Slow Drag and One-Step Tempo.

The Thursday program will open with a little known symphony in D Major by Haydn (B. & H. No. 31) entitled "With the Horn Call." This is probably the first case in which four horns were used in a symphony. On account of conspicuous solos for the violin and cello the symphony has been characterized as Concertante.

At the Saturday afternoon concert, in addition to Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," Sibelius's Symphony No. 6, Filip Lazar's Concerto Grosso No. 1 will be introduced. The Roumanian composer has entitled his concerto "In the Old Style." Sibelius's Symphony is of small proportions and has no slow movement. The same composer's violin concerto will likewise be played, with Richard Burgin as soloist.

The programs:

Thursday Evening

Symphony in D major, B and H. No. 31 "With the Horn Call".....Haydn
"Jazz Suite".....Gruenberg
"Schelomo" (solo part to be played by four cellists).....Bloch
Prelude and Fugue in E flat, arranged for orchestra by Schonberg.....Bach

Saturday Afternoon

Concerto Grosso No. 1 for Orchestra...Lazar
Symphony No. 6.....Sibelius
Violin Concerto.....Sibelius
(Richard Burgin, Soloist)
"Jazz Suite".....Gruenberg

64

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
MAR 5 - 1930

MELODIC THRILL GIVEN TO SMITH CONCERT THRONG

Boston Symphony Is Widely Acclaimed for Superb Rendition of Novelties and Modern Work.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 4—Music of absorbing interest superbly played was offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, in John M. Greene Hall tonight.

Seldom has an orchestraal program hereabouts included so many novelties and modern works. Even the Haydn "Symphony in D Major," sometimes called the Hoch symphony, was something of a novelty, for it is not often heard. The entire program was keyed up. There was a distsinct modern trend tonigoht; even the Bach "Prelude and Fuge in E Flat" for organ had been arranged for orchestra by Schonberg. This was the closing number of the program.

In between Haydn and Bach, Dr. Koussevitsky put Ravel, Gruenberg and Bloch, a trio with which to reckon, Ravel's "Bolero" was given, Gruenberg was represented by his "Jazz Suite, Op. 28" and Blosch by "Solomon," a Hebrew rhapsody for cello and orchestra, with Jean Bedetti as soloist.

Work Is Amazing.

It is difficult to write of Ravel's "Bolero." After hearing it tonight it was quite easy to understand the furore it made in New York when it was introduced by Toscanini last November. It is an amazing work, impressing more by its srhythmic accentuation than by its melodic variety. The drum beat with which it opens continues without pause throughout the work with almost hypnotic result. Above this drum beat and mingling with it are crashing chords of strange harmonies and colors which clash, and clashing seems to blend. It is a superb bit of writing. The players seemed imbued with its spirit and played as we seldom remember hearing them.

Less satisfactory to us was the "Jaz Suite" of Gruenberg. We seemed far happier in "The Enchanted Isle," played at the last Worcester festival. Having heard this, we are inclined to believe that Mr. Gruenberg would do well to leave Jazz to George Gershwin. "Jazz Suite" offers a little either melodically or rythmically. Name it something else and it might be of interest because of its strange harmonizations, but as jazz it falls short.

Bloch's "Solomon" was undoubtedly the weightiest of the three novelties. The amazingly difficult passages for solo cello were magnificently played by Jean Bedetti. It was a real achievement. The work itself, like much of Bloch, who is at his best when using the Jewish idiom, attempts to express the Jewish soul, glowing and agitated. The work is rich in dramatic and poetic utterance, outbursts of despair alternating passages of lyrical beauty. One cannot grasp it at a single hearing.

Haydn seemed not out of place on this program. There is freshness and vitality in his "Symphony in D Major," an abundance melodic beauty and a sturdy, wholesome atmosphere which fits in with the present days. Few symphonies are more difficult than this, difficult because of its solo demands, horn, violin, cello, flute and oboes are all heard in rich solo passages. Dr. Koussevitsky gave a superbs reading, never losing sight of the essential sturdiness of its character.

The final number, the Bach "Prelude and Fuge" for organ, has been finely arranged by Schonberg. tIs nobility and beauty is enriched by the change from organ to orchestra. It provided a fitting finale to one of the most notable programs ever given by an orchestra hereabouts. The audience was wildly enthusiastic, recalling Dr. Koussevitsky time after time, especially after the "Bolero." It was a gala evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
REPUBLICAN
MAR 5 - 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEARD AT NORTHAMPTON

Dazzles Great Audience With Virtuoso Program in Smith College Course at John M. Greene Hall

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 4—The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave a remarkable concert tonight in John M. Greene hall in the Smith college course, dazzling a great audience with a virtuoso performance of a virtuoso program. It began modestly enough with a Haydn Symphony, but it was the Symphony in D major, "with the horn call," in which Haydn astonished his contemporaries by introducing four horns and by writing for them and for other instruments passages of virtuoso difficulty. It is a charming work, and for those who are not yet reconciled to modernity it gave at least a touch of old-world elegance, repose and poise, qualities not to be looked for in the audacious works which followed.

Ravel's "Bolero" was a virtuoso stunt in rhythm, with a marvelously managed long crescendo going up step by step till the culmination was reached with the entry of the great drum, after which any further climax would have needed cannon. The piquant Spanish rhythm opening with the barely audible clicking of castanets was given with much elegance, and altogether it was a tour de force of orchestration and performance. If this was a long step down from the serene classical hights of Haydn, an even longer step was taken with Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" of three movements, Blues tempo, slow drag, and one-step tempo.

It was an oddity and the brilliance of the performance saved it from being dull, but of far greater interest was the fine and poetic interpretation by Jean Bedetti and the orchestra of Bloch's 'cello work "Schelomo," a Hebrew rhapsody based on the life and character of Solomon and certainly one of the most notable works in the limited literature of the 'cello. It was a superb performance, and so was the playing of the highly sophisticated orchestral version by Schoenberg of Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E flat. The program was a daring one, good for an exception rather than as a model and played throughout with great brio. Mr Koussevitzky was at his admirable best in all the numbers, and the atmosphere was agreeably electric.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 4 - 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY BRINGS CONCERT SEASON TO END

The aura of sedateness and well fed lethargy that usually surrounds the concert hall was completely lacking last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last of the Woolsey Hall series for this year. Aside from the Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony that opened the program there was music to challenge the listener; music that demanded close attention; music far from the safe and sane routine of the symphony concert.

If last night's audience came to doze, it was soon disabused of that idea, for after the short two movements of the symphony there came the most giddy and hair-raising event of the musical season in the form of Ravel's much discussed "Bolero." The polite aftention so typical of musical audiences gave way to an intense absorption, as those in the hall, almost drunk on the insistent rhyms of the piece, swayed their heads, tapped their feet, learned forward in their chairs, and at the end broke into wild applause. Hockey games and gifhts have no monopoly on sheer physical tension.

In the "Bolero" Ravel takes a single curious h,aunting theme, and repeats it with an astonishing audacity until the very monotony of the music creates an astounding spell. So softly as to be almost inaudible the drums take up the tapping langorous rhythm of the dance; a flute announces the theme; other wodd-wind instruments repeat it; it is bandied about from instrument to instrument; restated again and again in curious alluring harmonies; enriched by the varying timbres of exoti cinstrumentation.

Through a 20 minute crescendo the theme and key are unchanged, and then toward the end comes a modulation, shockingly sudden, and the piece comes to an end with the full throated orchestra frenetically shrieking the theme. In terrific intensity and tearing excitement music might hardly go farther, and last night's performance was as magnificent a piece of virtuosity as was the composition.

There is little music that could follow this "Bolero" to advantage, and the rest of the program seemed by comparison a little grey a little prosy. In his "azz Sketches" Gruenberg employs our American idiom for more or less serious purposes, giving us music that was interesting if not striking Like most moderns his command of instrumental coloring left little to be desired, and the principal interest of the piece lay in this, but his thematic material was rather less than inspired.

The "Schelomo" of Bloch, on the other hand, rvas music of kindled imagination, struck out in the white heat of fervor. Here what the composer had to say was all-important, his treatment of it a secondary consideration. It was dark, tragical music, throbbing with emotion that too often got out of hand. One constantly felt the need of a more disciplined handling, a more subjective viewpoint. The tragedy implicit in the piece would perhaps have been more moying had it been a little less intensely and uncontrolledly personal. In the solo part, for the cello, Jean Bedetti gave a performance of consummate skill and of a deep responsiveness to the emotional content.

Schoenberg's instrumentation of the Bach organ Prelude and Fugue seemed a shade theatrical, with the Fugue coming off a shade the better of the two parts. The performance was masterly, with every voice clear and unentangled.

To the Unfinished Symphony, which opened the program Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave a delicately adjusted and beautifully shaded interpretation that revealed afresh beatuies that have tended to become a little tarnished through constant repetition. After all, hackneyed or not, this symphony is excellent music, and last night it was played for all the loveliness there was in it.

This final concert was a fitting conclusion to a notable concert series. It is hard to imagine what a gap the loss of these concerts would make in the cultural life of the city, and to Daggett Lee upon whose shoulders has rested the responsilibity of continuing them, the grtitude of New Haven is due. He is doing an important and significant work.

—JAMES SHUTE.

New Haven Register - Ma

BOSTON SYMPHONY BRINGS CONCERT SEASON TO END

The aura of sedateness and well fed lethargy that usually surrounds the concert hall was completely lacking last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last of the Woolsey Hall series for this year. Aside from the Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony that opened the program there was music to challenge the listener; music that demanded close attention; music far from the safe and sane routine of the symphony concert.

If last night's audience came to doze, it was soon disabused of that idea, for after the short two movements of the symphony there came the most giddy and hair-raising event of the musical season in the form of Ravel's much discussed "Bolero." The polite aftention so typical of musical audiences gave way to an intense absorption, as those in the hall, almost drunk on the insistent rhyms of the piece, swayed their heads, tapped their feet, learned forward in their chairs, and at the end broke into wild applause. Hockey games and gifhts have no monopoly on sheer physical tension.

In the "Bolero" Ravel takes a single curious h,aunting theme, and repeats it with an astonishing audacity until the very monotony of the music creates an astounding spell. So softly as to be almost inaudible the drums take up the tapping langorous rhythm of the dance; a flute announces the theme; other wodd-wind instruments repeat it; it is bandied about from instrument to instrument; restated again and again in curious alluring harmonies; enriched by the varying timbres of exoti cinstrumentation.

Through a 20 minute crescendo the theme and key are unchanged, and then toward the end comes a modulation, shockingly sudden, and the piece comes to an end with the full throated orchestra frenetically shrieking the theme. In terrific intensity and tearing excitement music might hardly go farther, and last night's performance was as magnificent a piece of virtuosity as was the composition.

There is little music that could follow this "Bolero" to advantage, and the rest of the program seemed by comparison a little grey a little prosy. In his "azz Sketches" Gruenberg employs our American idiom for more or less serious purposes, giving us music that was interesting if not striking Like most moderns his command of instrumental coloring left little to be desired and the principal interest of the piece lay in this, but his thematic material was rather less than inspired.

The "Schelomo" of Bloch, on the other hand, rvas music of kindled imagination, struck out in the white heat of fervor. Here what the composer had to say was all-important, his treatment of it a secondary consideration. It was dark, tragical music, throbbing with emotion that too often got out of hand. One constantly felt the need of a more disciplined handling, a more subjective viewpoint. The tragedy implicit in the piece would perhaps have been more moving had it been a little less intensely and uncontrolledly personal. In the solo part, for the cello, Jean Bedetti gave a performance of consummate

New Haven Journal-Courier March 6-1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN GREAT CONCERT

Noted Orchestra Concludes Brilliant Concert Series With Fine Program.

Anticipated by a demonstrative interest almost without precedent, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its annual appearance i nWoolsey Hall last evening before an audience which taxed accommodation to the limit. The reception accorded this famous organization and its noted conductor Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, gave every sign of approval of a program replete with modern music set in a framework of standard composers.

Opening and closing the program were such familiar numbers as "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, and Schonberg's transcription of Bach's great organ work, the "Prelude and Fugue in E flat" generally called the "St. Anne's Fugue" because of the resemblance of the fugue subject to the well-known hymn tune. The Schubert work with its several lovely melodies of which the third, the theme of Joy, is one of the greatest in all music, was played with a romantic sensitiveness altogether fitting.

Although the inclusion of the Bach organ fugue in a program given in Woolsey hall which houses one of the greatest organs in the world, might be regretted by some who would have preferred a great orchestral work, the refreshing grandeur of the work so magnificently performed made a brilliant close. One of the distinguishing features of the performance was the successful work of the horn players.

Of the three "novelties" the two selections of Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" were the least interesting. Both pieces gave less of an impression of jazz than of a symphonic fantasia all around jazz rhythms. Symphonic jazz pieces can have more to them and be more pleasing. Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody "Schelomo" has many of lyric beauty. In these, the venerable emotion of this Patriarch race slumbering in our souls was aroused. The writing for the cello solo, ably played by Jean Becetti, is filled with poetical richness. Still the work left an impression of majestic beauty not fully realized.

But the most thrilling number of the evening was Ravel's "Bolero". This is a tour de force of sheer rhythmic crescendo on a single theme. From the pianissimo of the first sound of the drum how effectively that theme was played among the instruments, rising with telling effect with the entrance of the first violins and attaining that tremendous finale, the dramatic brilliance of which will be long remembered! Mere love of savage rhythm, but how exciting!

This notable appearance of the Boston Symphony concludes the Woolsey Hall concert series, for the first time managed by Mr. Daggett M. Lee. It reflects much credit on Mr. Lee that he assembled a series of performances by noted artists which has been a decided artistic success. Surely the success of this season should enlist the confidence of future patrons, especially if the artist is not so well known. Such an instance was the artistic triumph of Elizabeth Rethberg in January. But to choose any concert for the "highest honors" would be inadvisable in a series which attained such general excellence.

MILES KASTENDIECK.

64

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
MAR 5 - 1930

MELODIC THRILL GIVEN TO SMITH CONCERT THRONG

Boston Symphony Is Widely Acclaimed for Superb Rendition of Noveltie and Modern Work.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 4—Music of absorbing interest superbly played was offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, in John M. Greene Hall tonight.

Seldom has an orchestraal program hereabouts included so many novelties and modern works. Even the Haydn "Symphony in D Major," sometimes called the Hoch symphony, was something of a novelty, for it is not often heard. The entire program was keyed up. There was a distsinct modern trend tonigoht; even the Bach "Prelude and Fuge in E Flat" for organ had been arranged for orchestra by Schonberg. This was the closing number of the program.

In between Haydn and Bach, Dr. Koussevitsky put Ravel, Gruenberg and Bloch, a trio with which to reckon, Ravel's "Bolero" was given, Gruenberg was represented by his "Jazz Suite, Op. 28" and Blosch by "Solomon," a Hebrew rhapsody for cello and orchestra, with Jean Bedetti as soloist.

Work Is Amazing.

It is difficult to write of Ravel's "Bolero." After hearing it tonight it was quite easy to understand the furore it made in New York when it was introduced by Toscanini last November. It is an amazing work, impressing more by its srhythmic accentuation than by its melodic variety. The drum beat with which it opens continues without pause throughout the work with almost hypnotic result. Above this drum beat and mingling with it are crashing chords of strange harmonies and colors which clash, and clashing seems to blend. It is a superb bit of writing. The players seemed imbued with its spirit and played as we seldom remember hearing them.

Less satisfactory to us was the "Jaz Suite" of Gruenberg. We seemed far happier in "The Enchanted Isle," played at the last Worcester festival. Having heard this, we are inclined to believe that Mr. Gruenberg would do well to leave Jazz to George Gershwin. "Jazz Suite" offers a little either melodically or rythmically. Name it something else and it might be of interest because of its strange harmonizations, but as jazz it falls short.

Bloch's "Solomon" was undoubtedly the weightiest of the three novelties. The amazingly difficult passages for solo cello were magnificently played by Jean Bedetti. It was a real achievement. The work itself, like much of Bloch, who is at his best when using the Jewish idiom, attempts to express the Jewish soul, glowing and agitated. The work is rich in dramatic and poetic utterance, outbursts of despair alternating passages of lyrical beauty. One cannot grasp it at a single hearing.

Haydn seemed not out of place on this program. There is freshness and vitality in his "Symphony in D Major," an abundance melodic beauty and a sturdy, wholesome atmosphere which fits in with the present days. Few symphonies are more difficult than this, difficult because of its solo demands, horn, violin, cello, flute and oboes are all heard in rich solo passages. Dr. Koussevitsky gave a superbs reading, never losing sight of the essential sturdiness of its character.

The final number, the Bach "Prelude and Fuge" for organ, has been finely arranged by Schonberg. Its nobility and beauty is enriched by the change from organ to orchestra. It provided a fitting finale to one of the most notable programs ever given by an orchestra hereabouts. The audience was wildly enthusiastic, recalling Dr. Koussevitsky time after time, especially after the "Bolero." It was a gala evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
REPUBLICAN
MAR 5 -

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEARD AT NORTHAMPTON

Dazzles Great Audience With Virtuoso Program in Smith College Course at John M. Greene Hall

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 4—The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave a remarkable concert tonight in John M. Greene hall in the Smith college course, dazzling a great audience with a virtuoso performance of a virtuoso program. It began modestly enough with a Haydn Symphony, but it was the Symphony in D major, "with the horn call," in which Haydn astonished his contemporaries by introducing four horns and by writing for them and for other instruments passages of virtuoso difficulty. It is a charming work, and for those who are not yet reconciled to modernity it gave at least a touch of old-world elegance, repose and poise, qualities not to be looked for in the audacious works which followed.

Ravel's "Bolero" was a virtuoso stunt in rhythm, with a marvelously managed long crescendo going up step by step till the culmination was reached with the entry of the great drum, after which any further climax would have needed cannon. The piquant Spanish rhythm opening with the barely audible clicking of castanets was given with much elegance, and altogether it was a tour de force of orchestration and performance. If this was a long step down from the serene classical hights of Haydn, an even longer step was taken with Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" of three movements, Blues tempo, slow drag, and one-step tempo.

It was an oddity and the brilliance of the performance saved it from being dull, but of far greater interest was the fine and poetic interpretation by Jean Bedetti and the orchestra of Bloch's 'cello work "Schelomo," a Hebrew rhapsody based on the life and character of Solomon and certainly one of the most notable works in the limited literature of the 'cello. It was a superb performance, and so was the playing of the highly sophisticated orchestral version by Schoenberg of Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E flat. The program was a daring one, good for an exception rather than as a model and played throughout with great brio. Mr Koussevitzky was at his admirable best in all the numbers, and the atmosphere was agreeably electric.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 5 - 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY BRINGS CONCERT SEASON TO END

The aura of sedateness and well fed lethargy that usually surrounds the concert hall was completely lacking last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last of the Woolsey Hall series for this year. Aside from the Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony that opened the program there was music to challenge the listener; music that demanded close attention; music far from the safe and sane routine of the symphony concert.

If last night's audience came to doze, it was soon disabused of that idea, for after the short two movements of the symphony there came the most giddy and hair-raising event of the musical season in the form of Ravel's much discussed "Bolero." The polite aftention so typical of musical audiences gave way to an intense absorption, as those in the hall, almost drunk on the insistent rhyms of the piece, swayed their heads, tapped their feet, learned forward in their chairs, and at the end broke into wild applause. Hockey games and gifhts have no monopoly on sheer physical tension.

In the "Bolero" Ravel takes a single curious h,aunting theme, and repeats it with an astonishing audacity until the very monotony of the music creates an astounding spell. So softly as to be almost inaudible the drums take up the tapping langorous rhythm of the dance; a flute announces the theme; other wodd-wind instruments repeat it; it is bandied about from instrument to instrument; restated again and again in curious alluring harmonies; enriched by the varying timbres of exoti cinstrumentation.

Through a 20 minute crescendo the theme and key are unchanged, and then toward the end comes a modulation, shockingly sudden, and the piece comes to an end with the full throated orchestra frenetically shrieking the theme. In terrific intensity and tearing excitement music might hardly go farther, and last night's performance was as magnificent a piece of virtuosity as was the composition.

There is little music that could follow this "Bolero" to advantage, and the rest of the program seemed by comparison a little grey a little prosy. In his "azz Sketches" Gruenberg employs our American idiom for more or less serious purposes, giving us music that was interesting if not striking Like most moderns his command of instrumental coloring left little to be desired, and the principal interest of the piece lay in this, but his thematic material was rather less than inspired.

The "Schelomo" of Bloch, on the other hand, rvas music of kindled imagination, struck out in the white heat of fervor. Here what the composer had to say was all-important, his treatment of it a secondary consideration. It was dark, tragical music, throbbing with emotion that too often got out of hand. One constantly felt the need of a more disciplined handling, a more subjective viewpoint. The tragedy implicit in the piece would perhaps have been more moving had it been a little less intensely and uncontrolledly personal. In the solo part, for the cello, Jean Bedetti gave a performance of consummate skill and of a deep responsiveness to the emotional content.

Schoenberg's instrumentation of the Bach organ Prelude and Fugue seemed a shade theatrical, with the Fugue coming off a shade the better of the two parts. The performance was masterly, with every voice clear and unentangled.

To the Unfinished Symphony, which opened the program Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave a delicately adjusted and beautifully shaded interpretation that revealed afresh beatuies that have tended to become a little tarnished through constant repetition. After all, hackneyed or not, this symphony is excellent music, and last night it was played for all the loveliness there was in it.

This final concert was a fitting conclusion to a notable concert series. It is hard to imagine what a gap the loss of these concerts would make in the cultural life of the city, and to Daggett Lee upon whose shoulders has rested the responsilibity of continuing them, the grtitude of New Haven is due. He is doing an important and significant work.

—JAMES SHUTE.

New Haven Register - March 6 1930.

New Haven Journal-Courier March 6-1930.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN GREAT CONCERT

Noted Orchestra Concludes Brilliant Concert Series With Fine Program.

Anticipated by a demonstrative interest almost without precedent, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its annual appearance i nWoolsey Hall last evening before an audience which taxed accommodation to the limit. The reception accorded this famous organization and its noted conductor Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, gave every sign of approval of a program replete with modern music set in a framework of standard composers.

Opening and closing the program were such familiar numbers as "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, and Schonberg's transcription of Bach's great organ work, the "Prelude and Fugue in E flat" generally called the "St. Anne's Fugue" because of the resemblance of the fugue subject to the well-known hymn tune. The Schubert work with its several lovely melodies of which the third, the theme of Joy, is one of the greatest in all music, was played with a romantic sensitiveness altogether fitting.

Although the inclusion of the Bach organ fugue in a program given in Woolsey hall which houses one of the greatest organs in the world, might be regretted by some who would have preferred a great orchestral work, the refreshing grandeur of the work so magnificently performed made a brilliant close. One of the distinguishing features of the performance was the successful work of the horn players.

Of the three "novelties' the two selections of Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" were the least interesting. Both pieces gave less of an impression of jazz than of a symphonic fantasia all around jazz rhythms. Symphonic jazz pieces can have more to them and be more pleasing. Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody "Schelomo" has many of lyric beauty. In these, the venerable emotion of this Patriarch race slumbering in our souls was aroused. The writing for the cello solo, ably played by Jean Becetti, is filled with poetical richness. Still the work left an impression of majestic beauty not fully realized.

But the most thrilling number of the evening was Ravel's "Bolero". This is a tour de force of sheer rhythmic crescendo on a single theme. From the pianissimo of the first sound of the drum how effectively that theme was played among the instruments, rising with telling effect with the entrance of the first violins and attaining that tremendous finale, the dramatic brilliance of which will be long remembered! Mere love of savage rhythm, but how exciting!

This notable appearance of the Boston Symphony concludes the Woolsey Hall concert series, for the first time managed by Mr. Daggett M. Lee. It reflects much credit on Mr. Lee that he assembled a series of performances by noted artists which has been a decided artistic success. Surely the success of this season should enlist the confidence of future patrons, especially if the artist is not so well known. Such an instance was the artistic triumph of Elizabeth Rethberg in January. But to choose any concert for the "highest honors" would be inadvisable in a series which attained such general excellence.

MILES KASTENDIECK.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES BLOCH WORK

"Schelomo," Hebrew Rhapsody, Received With Storms of Applause in Carnegie Hall.

ITS MUSIC IS GORGEOUS

Boston Symphony Also Offers a Novelty in the "Jass Suite" of Louis Gruenberg.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The predominating feature of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall, turned out to be the "Schelomo" of Ernest Bloch. This well-known and passionately conceived work was to have been performed with four 'cellists playing the solo part in unison. Mr. Koussevitzky, no doubt for good and sufficient reasons connected with the difficulty of four players performing as one such florid and rhapsodic music, changed his mind at the last moment, and the solo part was taken by Jean Bedetti alone. The composition and its performance precipitated storms of applause.

One would have delighted in four 'celli bearing up in certain places against Bloch's volcanic orchestra, but there was probably a greater gain to the listener in retaining the composer's original instrumental scheme. Once more we listened to the voice of Solomon the great King, surrounded by his slaves, warriors, philosophers and concubines, and heard him thunder his denunciations and wail the woes of his race, and ponder upon life and its vanities. There is no other piece of music just like it. This score remains one of the most gorgeous pieces of music in the modern repertory, over-rich, if anything, in ideas and material, luxuriant, rhapsodic, overwhelming. The listener is lashed by the frenzy of this music, and at last drugged by it—a work of sheer genius, not as controlled as the genius of Bloch today, but irresistible in its intensity and turbulence and revery. The music of an ancient race.

The novelty of the occasion was the "Jazz Suite" of Louis Gruenberg, a suite in four movements, couched respectively in the alleged rhythms of the "Fox trot," the "Boston waltz," a "Blues tempo" and a "One-step tempo." There were those in the hall, connoisseurs of the modern dance, who claimed that Mr. Gruenberg had not written in the rhythms genuinely characteristic of the steps claimed. One movement of the "Jazz Suite," the first, arrested this writer's attention and caused him to laugh at certain dexterous thrusts and jests and orchestral felicities. Thereafter the music soon palled. There was little variety in the material, and not a great deal of variety, after the first movement, in its treatment. Mr. Gruenberg, an American, seems to us to write of jazz, in these pages, with the miscomprehension of that idiom which distinguishes the average European composer. We would think more of twenty measures of George Gershwin.

But the delectable Haydn symphony, the symphony of the horn-call, which opened the concert, was a sheer delight, if one excepts an occasional technical blemish perhaps due to the tension of an orchestra at the end of a week of travel, rehearsal, and performance. Barring these slight blemishes, there was a delightful reading of the piece. At the same time it may again be asked why this new practice, or mannerism of the concert hall, whereby the conductor solemnly waves the orchestra through four movements of a symphony never intended to be solemn, the while, by gesture or a display of his back, he makes it known to the audience that between the movements it must not applaud? Why?

Haydn never intended that there should not be applause after the movements of his symphonies. His symphonies were designed to entertain, to provoke applause, to allow the audience to relax between the movements, and, if entertained, to show its pleasure in the music. There is nothing sacrosanct, occult, hieratic about a Haydn Symphony. It is glorious enough, without treating it as if it were the consecration of the grail, or the drinking of the love potion in "Tristan and Isolde." We are even willing, if the conductors will let us, to enjoy these symphonies in our innocent way, and clap our hands, and beam, or grin, or do any of the half-dozen things that listeners do when pleased. Or must the conductor stand idle, and the audience fidget, and a ridiculous restraint be observed until at last, thank Heaven, the music begins again?

The concert ended with Schönberg's arrangement of a Bach prelude and the St. Anne organ fugue for orchestra. The performance was meritorious. But the orchestration of Schönberg is not felicitous. Few of his instrumental compositions suggest the grandeur and the bold simplicity of Bach's style. For the orchestra this was an evening of accustomed triumphs. The program had its provocative element of novelty, but Mr. Koussivzky has contrived better lists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Gruenberg's Jazz Suite and Bach in Schoenbergian Guise Are Novelties at Koussevitzky Concert

TWO first performances in New York, with priority to be conceded in each instance to Cincinnati, where Fritz Reiner seems to have espoused some experiments, noble or otherwise, in advance of those who have been purveyors of novelties to Gotham and Gomorrah, imparted something of individuality to last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. One of these represented a clear case of old wine in new bottles—some purists may contend this one was a beer bottle—and the other, to have done with the allegory of the noble experiment, was a jazz cocktail.

The old wine came from Bach, the bottling was by Schoenberg. The gin and orange juice of the Jazz Suite, more orange juice than gin, had been well shaken by Louis Gruenberg.

By way of mixing metaphors, it may be ventured that in a bracketing of the Gruenberg jazz with that most Talmudic of Hebrew rhapsodies, Ernest Bloch's passionately racial "Schelomo," here was the Old and the New Testament of music, the exposition of which the right reverend Serge Koussevitzky was at once priestly, evangelical and rabbinical, with a total lack of sectarianism as between Solomon and jazz. Perhaps Solomon jazzed a bit on his own. Bloch, be it recalled, did so in "The Present" of his panoramic "America."

There was no hint of jazz, or even of racial self-consciousness, in Haydn's Symphony in D Major (B. and H. No. 31), "The Symphony With the Horn Call," which began the evening. Instead, there was a slow movement of romantic enchantment and, in the finale, a series of exquisite Variations that evoked some beautiful playing of solo instruments, particularly the cello and flute. The strings were always admirable. Unfortunately the four horns which give the work its distinctive character were not as secure as a fastidious ear would have wished them, and the choiring of the winds fell appreciably short of perfection.

THE Gruenberg opus bears the number 48. Its composer, whose "Enchanted Isle" had figured during an earlier Boston Symphony visit, was present to learn, first hand, how well his work was received, and took the customary bows. His Jazz Suite is sweet jazz: that is to say, it is refined and polite to the point of unction and elegance. No American composer has shown a defter hand in instrumentation than Gruenberg did in the polished niceties of this suite. If there were saxophones or other cabaret reminders in the conformation of his orchestra, they utterly eluded the eyes and ears of this attentive listener. In amiable and even graceful sequence, a Foxtrot, a Boston Waltz, a Slow Drag and a One-Step filtered by, full of engaging effects and always promising some out-and-out blare of tune that never arrived. In this suite was everything but substance—"fine feathers," but no "boid." The performance was a superb one.

So, too, the performance of the Bloch "Schelomo," in which the solo part happily was intrusted solely to Jean Bedetti, instead of being played in unison by four cellos, as subscribers had been forewarned it would be. This remains music of power and sumptuosity, one of the most remarkable of Bach's compositions and, in fact, one of the strongest and most richly-colored products of contemporary musical art. Mr. Bedetti was applauded according to his deserts and they were those of exceptionally fine playing.

The Schoenberg arrangement for orchestra of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-Flat, organ music made over for the sake of orchestral sonorities, raised some of the same controversial issues as were brought up by the arrangements of chorals which the Austrian worker of cross-tone puzzles elaborated some years ago at the request of Josef Stransky. In the use of tympani, harps, triangle and sundry pulsatile effects alien to Bach, there were details in this setting to disturb and possibly to offend the stickler for purity of color and fidelity to style in all transcriptions of Bach, but these blemishes—if blemishes they were—seemed to us but momentary, and the results of the whole impressive and uplifting, with much to recall in the scoring the mighty instrument for which Bach wrote in a day when orchestral resources would scarcely have tempted a Schoenberg to re-write the music of any man.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Soloist, Jean Bedetti, cellist.

Symphony in D Major, B. and H. No. 31.....Haydn
Jazz Suite, opus 28.....Gruenberg
Schelomo, cello and orchestra.....Bloch
Four cellos, including Mr. Bedetti.
Prelude and Fugue in E Flat.Bach-Schoenberg

Dr. Koussevitzky, aflame, as always, with a Lisztian zeal for the new in music, found a place on last night's Boston Symphony program for Mr. Louis Gruenberg's latest achievement, a "Jazz Suite," opus 28. The suite was first performed by Mr. Reiner and the Cincinnati Orchestra on March 22 of last year, and by Dr. Rodzinski and the Los Angeles Philharmonic on Jan. 30 of this. Certainly the present-day composer cannot complain of neglect.

As disclosed by the fiery and grandiose Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Gruenberg's suite seemed a very erudite composition. It was, indeed, so very erudite that one could imagine Mr. Gruenberg deciding before hand that it was high time that something serious was done about jazz, a popular idiom, which even the gifted Mr. Gershwin could not succeed in elevating to the dignity of real music that is, the kind of music that can hold up its head without shame when placed alongside Mr. Hindemith and Josef Haydn on a symphony program.

Mr. Gruenberg thereupon, one still imagines, collected the proper material—the blues, syncopations, waltz themes and one-steps and upon them let loose his symphonic and orchestral skill. As his symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," recently revealed, Mr. Gruenberg is pretty clever at the development of themes and really expert at orchestration. Yet in spite of the general cry for a learned treatment of jazz, Mr. Gruenberg's application of learning to "breaks" and stuttering trumpets and "drags" brought forth nothing that was half as alive as any piece of jazz you may encounter in a Harlem night club.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave us, in addition, Haydn's charming "Horn Call" Symphony, a first performance of a not very interesting organ prelude and fugue by Bach in a not very interesting orchestral arrangement by Schoenberg, and Bloch's Schelomo for Cello and Orchestra. Advance programs had advised us that the Bloch piece would, curiously enough, be played in unison by four of the Boston's cellists, but when the moment arrived only Mr. Jean Bedetti, the orchestra's premier cellist, was on hand to do honor to the Hebrew rhapsody. The lone performer played the composition with a less than beautiful tone but with good technique and plenty of enthusiasm. The audience acclaimed Mr. Bedetti for his valiant work in the rambling apostrophe to King Solomon, and Mr. Koussevitzky and his band for everything they did.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

WITH the Boston Symphony Orchestra chanting its most aureate euphony, in strings, woodwind and brass, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky rewarded a capacity audience at Carnegie Hall last night with one of the season's provocative programs. Two of the numbers might be included within the flexible term of American, though respectively African and Asiatic in inspiration—Louis Gruenberg's Jazz Suite for Orchestra, Opus 28, which enjoyed its first hearing in this city; and Ernest Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody, "Schelomo." Another work never before undertaken here was Arnold Schoenberg's orchestration of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat Major.

Mr. Gruenberg is one of the intellectuals who can still dupe himself with the belief that upon the dance-form which has burgeoned in the slums of America, it is possible to erect an aesthetic music. His very gifts of erudition, talent and orchestral virtuosity served in this new work to stress the insolvency of jazz as material for art. It was in vain that he struggled to introduce variety by writing the first movement as a fox-trot, the second as a waltz, the third as "Blues" and the fourth as a one-step. The tyranny of the duple mensuration characteristic of jazz overwhelmed his score with a fatal monotony of rhythm. Even the waltz would scarcely have been recognized except for the triple beat of the conductor's stick. It impressed the hearer as truncated four-four time.

Still more wearisome was the endless reiteration of the instrumental tricks familiar to frequenters of night clubs. The truth is that jazz possesses insufficient resources to sustain interest throughout four movements. It must be added that the score had not a syllable of content for the heart, that for the head it spoke only of technical brilliance, that its only human trait was a thin dilution of humor, and that its chief appeal was to the pulses of the feet.

As if to point a moral, Mr. Koussevitzky placed directly before this Suite, Haydn's Symphony in D Major ("Mit dem Hornsignal"), B. & H. No. 31. Let us hastily pass over the fact that Haydn's ideas were stated and developed with the logic of a highly civilized European skull, while those of the Suite were the stutterings of barbarians. Haydn commanded an orchestra not a third as large as that of Mr. Gruenberg, who employed instruments of which his predecessor had never heard, and wielded a massive science which would have bewildered the simple Croation. But the music of 165 years ago boasted a variety and fascination which the modern manuscript could not hope to rival, and even defeated it in its particular field—that of tonal color. The hues of the ancient score had a clearness, a richness and an individuality far surpassing Mr. Gruenberg's blinding smears.

Of a different order was Mr. Bloch's rhapsody—a work amply communicative to the emotions, the intellect and the spirit. It is a picture of Solomon's bitter disenchantment in the midst of all the luxury and sensual joy of the Orient. While the orchestra built up a structure of grandeur and pomp, the voice of a solo violoncello uttered the Preacher's sombre maxim, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." This instrument was played with singular expressiveness by Jean Bedetti, first 'celli of the Boston Orchestra. From a note in the program book, it seems to have been the intention to intrust the role to four violencellos, playing in unison. Perhaps the experiment was tested in Boston and failed. But it would have been an interesting one to hear.

Mr. Schoenberg's elaborations of Bach I found exasperating and signally inferior to the similar transcriptions with which Mr. Leopold Stokowski has enriched the orchestral repertory. One difference is that Mr. Stokowski was in former days a celebrated organist, while Schoenberg appears to have only the most meagre sense of that instrument's idiom. He revels in effects foreign to the organ, such as plucked strings, the thrum of harps and the cudgelling of timpani. Like Mr. Toscanini, Mr. Koussevitzky appears to lack a contrapuntal cerebrum. His polyphony moved in a solid, vertical mass instead of in parallel streams of horizontal melody, each with its individual phrasing and nuance.

Otherwise, the reading of the program deserved highest eulogy. The Haydn symphony was delivered with a delicacy and zest appropriate to its composer. Here, also, in the numerous solo episodes various members of the orchestra covered themselves with glory—in particular the concertmaster, Mr. Burgin; the first horn; Mr. Boettcher, and the first flute, Mr. Laurent. The Gruenberg Suite and the Bloch Rhapsody also served as vehicles for Mr. Koussevitzky's mark-worthy temperament and skill.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

CHROMATICS

By Austin Lord

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a nervous man. His trepidations last week warmed the telegraph wires between Boston and New York and nearly caused heart failure to several music editors, who thought at first a large and important story was about to happen, and then were sure it was all a snare and a delusion.

The usual advance programs arrived on schedule and were duly edited and cast in type. Then came the first of several frantic telegrams. "Change so-and-so. Dr. Koussevitzky will play so-and-so," they read, each an improvement on the last. The climax was a telegram which seemed to carry weight; "Dr. Koussevitzky will play the solo 'cello part in Bloch's 'Schelomo.'" You could hear the gasp from Times Square to the Battery. Every one recollected the Boston leader as a virtuoso of the double-bass. Could he be embracing the 'cello instead of the bass? And who could conduct "Schelomo" in his place?

These questions, trembling upon several tongues at once, were never answered. It developed that Dr. Koussevitzky hadn't the slightest intention of playing the 'cello or anything else. Just a typographical error, apparently, for Jean Bedetti was the soloist. The telegrams were signed "Burke," who said he had never meant to say such a thing. He blamed the editorial department of the Western Union.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE, GUIDED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

By GRENA BENNETT.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra occupied the stage at Carnegie Hall last evening and presented a programme that evidently pleased a large and fashionable audience of music lovers. The Russian director has ever been one to keep up with the musical band-wagon and proved that last evening by offering Gruenberg's "Jazz" suite. The composer was present in Box 15.

Ever since Gershwin put jazz as expressed in his "Rhapsody in Blue," on the symphonic map, the elect of concert patrons have accepted that popular American idiom in music.

Mr. Gruenberg's Jazz Suite possesses the metric beat and lilting syncopation that constitute the essential in that music form with a definite melodic line threatening its way through enfolding chords and harmonies. One does not expect the sedate Bay State orchestra to sway and jerk as do those bands addicted to jazz and "blues," nor did they. The performance was colorful and finely rhythmic, notwithstanding.

The Gruenberg composition was placed in sedate company. The programme began with Haydn's D major symphony, "With the Horn Call." The jazz number was followed by Bloch's "Schelomo," with its strange Oriental cadences, and the concert came to an end with Bach's E flat Prelude and Fugue, orchestrated by Schoenberg.

66

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
EAGLE

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

A Jazz Suite by Louis Gruenberg Is Played at a Boston Symphony Concert

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra had interesting new music to offer an audience in Carnegie Hall last evening. Indeed, the program for this concert was as a whole exemplary of Mr. Koussewitsky's enterprise in such matters: Ernest Bloch's rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra, "Schelemo," was the most familiar of the four works which it included; the symphony was Haydn's in D major, with the horn call (the "Auf den Anstand" Symphony, B. & H. 31), so seldom heard, and the novelties Louis Gruenberg's Jazz Suite, Op. 28, and Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral transcription of a Bach organ Prelude and Fugue in E minor.

* * *

Mr. Gruenberg's Jazz Suite had been performed by the orchestras of Cincinnati and Los Angeles, under the direction of Fritz Reiner and Artur Rodzinski, before it fell into the hands of Mr. Koussewitsky, who recently introduced it to Boston. No program is offered to serve as a guide to the content of the suite—evidently Mr. Gruenberg desires us to regard it as absolute music, expressive of purely musical concepts, and susceptible to whatever interpretation the individual listener may care to place upon it. The four movements bear as subtitles the following directions to the performers: "Fox-trot Tempo," "Boston Waltz Tempo," "Blues Tempo, Slow Drag," and "One-step Tempo," enabling Dr. Rodzinski to draw a parallel between Mr. Gruenberg's and the classic suite, which was composed of popular dance movements treated in serious style. However, the gigue and bouree and gavotte received a more realistic treatment at the hands of Bach than the fox-trot, one-step and waltz at the hands of Mr. Gruenberg.

Mr. Gruenberg is afraid of jazz. Like a great many muscians who have essayed to treat it seriously, he feels the need to compromise, lest his audience feel that he has mistaken the concert for the dance hall. He offers us symphonic jazz, near-jazz, one-half-of-one-percent jazz, and this is worse than none at all. Perhaps the trouble is that he does not understand and cannot handle the idiom. If so, he should not have attempted to do so; only the idiom is important in the Jazz Suite, and since Mr. Gruenberg uses it apologetically, and without skill, the result is unsatisfactory. His rhythms are confused; those of jazz have the effect, at least, of simplicity. His tunes have a self-conscious triviality and vulgarity; those of real jazzz are spontaneous and naive. His instrumentation is thick and opaque; that of jazz is notably sparing and transparent. The suite last evening was received with scant applause—insufficient to bring the composer to his feet, if he was a member of the audience.

* * *

The second novelty was less disappointing. Schoenberg has orchestrated Bach's E minor Prelude and Fugue soberly, less impressionistically than the chorale prelude "Schmucke Dich, O liebe Seele," and "Komm Gott, Schoepfer Heiliger Geist," but not less effectively. His transcription was last evening beautifully played by the Boston Orchestra—which, indeed, outdid itself throughout the evening. Mr. Koussewitsky contrived a superb performance of the Bloch rhapsody in which Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, played the solo part, and his reading of the Haydn Symphony was vigorous, full-blooded. A large audience enjoyed the concert and applauded the conductor and the players to the echo.

* * *

A performance of "La Gioconda" was given at the Opera House last evening. Mmes Corono, Claussen, Wakefield, and Messrs. Gigli, Danise and Ludikar appeared in the principal roles, and Mr. Bellezza conducted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS JAZZ AND BACH

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced some new music to New York at Carnegie Hall last night. The newest piece was Gruenberg's Jazz Suite, arranged in four movements described as Fox-trot Tempo, Boston Waltz Tempo, Blues Tempo, Slow Drag and One-step Tempo.

It must be recorded that the Jazz Suite is neither jazz nor classical, and comes dangerously close to not being music at all. At no time does the Fox-trot movement develop a fox-trot tempo, and there is hardly a moment when the waltz is a waltz. This, in addition to the fact that there are many merry Strauss pranks easily recognized in it. The Blues Tempo also quite missed the mark, but the One-step Tempo did have lively spots which might have set one to tapping his foot in time.

JAZZ FOR JAZZ'S SAKE.

If the symphony orchestras must encroach upon the field of the Whitemans, Olsens and Lopezes, it might be suggested that some energetic and curious-minded musician make orchestral arrangements of W. C. Handy's "St. Louis Blues" and Hugo Frey's "Havanola," and a piano and orchestra arrangement of Felix Arndt's "Nola," all of which are creditable jazz pieces.

In fairness to Mr. Gruenberg, who was in a box at the concert, it also must be chronicled that his opus received more applause than Haydn's Symphony in D Major (B. & H. No. 31), which opened the concert. There was great charm in Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the minuet movement.

BEDETTI IS SOLOIST.

After intermission the orchestra played Bloch's "Schelomo," with Jean Bedetti playing the solo 'cello. Mr. Bedetti drew forth a full and grave tone from his instrument, and he was copiously applauded.

The programme ended with Schoenberg's transcription of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E Flat, which arrangement was also having its first performance in New York.

K. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Music

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

From Symphonic Jazz to Bach at the Boston Symphony Concert

Fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Symphony in D major, B. and H. No. 31 ..... Haydn
2. Jazz Suite, Op. 28 ..... Gruenberg
3. Schelomo, cello and orchestra ..... Bloch (Jean Bedetti, solo cellist)
4. Prelude and Fugue in E Flat ..... Bach-Schoenberg

THE chief contributor of news to last night's Boston Symphony concert was Mr. Louis Gruenberg—unless it was the refreshing and talismanic Mr. Koussevitzky himself.

Mr. Gruenberg, the author of the novelty on the program, was born in Russia and lives in Brooklyn — which probably makes him an American composer. At all events, he is one of our most eminent and able exponents of symphonic jazz, although he occasionally turns slightly humid eyes toward those Enchanted Isles which were once respectable resorts for the musical imagination, but are now inhabited only by the embarrassed and furtive ghosts of such discredited emigrés as Weber, Schumann, Chopin, Debussy and the like.

* * *

One thinks too well of Mr. Gruenberg to believe that his visit to that depreciated romantic haunt will be repeated (the Boston Symphony Orchestra exhibited at a recent concert here the tale of his adventure, shamelessly inscribed, "My Trip to the Enchanted Isles"). The "Jazz Suite" that we heard last night is, one imagines, more nearly an expression of the essential Gruenberg. It was completed some four years ago in Paris, and was published in 1929 by the valiant and valuable Cos Cob Press, which specializes in the fostering of American compositions whose virtues lack an immediate cash value.

* * *

This symphonic jazz of Mr. Gruenberg's, regarded as jazz, may be either good or bad; we know not what the pundits of Tin Pan Alley might think of it. We ventured, listening to the piece, to appraise it not as jazz, but as music. Thus considered, it lives its own life as organized and pleasurable sound. The thrice familiar patterns are filled with an ingenuity and richness of fancy, are ordered by a civilized musical consciousness, which makes the issue engaging and profitable for other than merely primitive minds.

Yet perhaps Mr. Gruenberg is, after all, an incurable romanticist, for one caught him in the act of glancing a bit longingly over his shoulder at the love-making of Pelleas and Melisande and the gallantries of the Rosenkavalier as he went through the motions of his Boston Waltz and his Slow Drag and his One-Step.

* * *

There was another novelty of a sort on last evening's program: a transcription by Schönberg of the E flat Prelude and Fugue ("St. Anne's") for organ, which form, respectively, the opening and closing numbers of Part III of Bach's "Clavierübung."

Schönberg has transferred to the orchestra with astonishing skill the brilliancy and power of this superb music. If the "purists" are inclined, in their gentle way, to heave bricks at his impious head, conductors and orchestral program makers will surely bless him.

* * *

The great orchestra, barring some mishaps in the Haydn Symphony, played with its accustomed surety and finesse. Mr. Gruenberg took a bow after the performance of his Suite, and Mr. Bedetti was applauded for his solo performance in the somber and passionate rhapsody of Bloch.

Louis Gruenberg

© Victor Georg

Whose new "Jazz Suite" was heard last night

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

Salome Helps Octavian Thread the Mazes of Gruenberg Jazz

Boston Symphony Orchestra Holds Forth in Carnegie Hall Once More.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Running over to New York for a fourth time this season, the Boston Symphony of great renown favored its Carnegie Hall subscribers last evening with a double dispensation of the article labelled "first performance in New York." In each case the first performance anywhere seems to have taken place in Cincinnati.

One affected a "Jazz Suite for Orchestra, op. 28," by Louis Gruenberg, of Brooklyn. The other had to do with an organ prelude in E flat major and the "St. Ann's" organ fugue in the same key, both by Bach the Father, as presented in the orchestral transcriptions of the redoubtable Arnold Schoenberg, native and resident of Vienna.

The Cincinnati performances, by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, occurred respectively in March, 1929, and in February, 1930.

In Tribute to R. Strauss.

It was odd to hear hisses for the Gruenberg piece uttered by a few overtimid or mistakenly indignant bodies. As a matter of fact, Mr. Gruenberg's "jazz," resourcefully contrived, adroit in its instrumental dress, was a highly civilized and refined affair. Methuselah's great aunt might have listened to it without a tremor. Certainly the Sacred Cod didn't bat a scale.

If nothing alarming happened musically in the course of this suite, at any rate it answered one hoary question. At last we know what must have been the "Dance of the Seven Veils!" For here bold Salome steps out and takes Octavian's hand and together they tread the measures of Mr. Gruenberg's "Boston Waltz" while Dr. Richard Strauss oblibingly leads the band.

This distinctly pretty piece, by the way, stirred the crowded house to no end of applause, beside which the hisses sounded puny indeed. Following the excellent performance led by Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Gruenberg walked forward with the conductor to help him reap the harvest of well earned plaudits.

From Bach to Bloch.

We had had previous experience of Schoenberg's transcribing of Bach. In yesterday's specimen the Viennese modernist worked the pulsatile battery into his instrumental scheme and likewise harps, which Bach never dreamed of using, though he had ample authority direct from the heaven which he never questioned. There are those who gnash their teeth at the very thought of Schoenberg, but if any of them were present yesterday they manfully held their peace.

The concert opened with a symphony in D major "with the Horn Call" by Haydn. Our cordial thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky for thus resuscitating for us one of the numerous unfamiliar symphonies of a master whose work is now enjoying a renaissance and reappraisal.

There is the suggestion of the hunt in this symphony, due to the quartet of horns employed in the scoring. And yet the exquisite and ornate adagio has nothing to do with the chase. There is important solo work for several instruments. The vigorous minuet is irresistibly captivating. For the finale Haydn offers here not his wonted rondo frolic, but a theme with seven ingenious variations.

The performance exhibited the lustrousness and unanimity of the Bostonian strings. The wind instruments, however, were appreciably less successful. In the concert's remaining number—the fine Hebrew rhapsody, "Schelomo," of Ernest Bloch—the 'cello solo was performed by Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, not by four 'cellists playing in unison, as the program warned. Doubtless the singular way is the way of wisdom, and wisdom is the only way when the speaker is Solomon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

Melodic Doings Of a Friday

THE second Pension Fund concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, with Toscanini conducting, is played at Carnegie Hall tonight... The Amy Neill String Quartet, with Amy Neill, Stella Roberts, Charlotte Polak and Lois Bichl as the personnel, play at Steinway Hall tonight...At the Metropolitan, in the matinee Wagnerian series, "Siegfried," in uncut version, is presented, and this evening "Faust" is the bill...At Brooklyn the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, is at the Acade...

PROGRAMS: (Philharmonic) Rossini, Franck, Ravel, Beethoven... (Neill) Haydn, Roberts, Wagner, Weiner...Casts: ("Siegfried") Laubenthal, Bloch, Schorr, Schutzendorf, Gustafson, Branzell, Ohms, Fleischer, Mr. Bodanzky conducting....("Faust") Moore, Trantoul, Pinza, Basiola, Wolfe, Swarthout, Mr. Hasselmans con...ing.

66

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
EAGLE

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

A Jazz Suite by Louis Gruenberg Is Played at a Boston Symphony Concert

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra had interesting new music to offer an audience in Carnegie Hall last evening. Indeed, the program for this concert was as a whole exemplary of Mr. Koussewitsky's enterprise in such matters: Ernest Bloch's rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra, "Schelemo," was the most familiar of the four works which it included; the symphony was Haydn's in D major, with the horn call (the "Auf den Anstand" Symphony, B. & H. 31), so seldom heard, and the novelties Louis Gruenberg's Jazz Suite, Op. 28, and Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral transcription of a Bach organ Prelude and Fugue in E minor.

* * *

Mr. Gruenberg's Jazz Suite had been performed by the orchestras of Cincinnati and Los Angeles, under the direction of Fritz Reiner and Artur Rodzinski, before it fell into the hands of Mr. Koussewitsky, who recently introduced it to Boston. No program is offered to serve as a guide to the content of the suite—evidently Mr. Gruenberg desires us to regard it as absolute music, expressive of purely musical concepts, and susceptible to whatever interpretation the individual listener may care to place upon it. The four movements bear as subtitles the following directions to the performers: "Fox-trot Tempo," "Boston Waltz Tempo," "Blues Tempo, Slow Drag," and "One-step Tempo," enabling Dr. Rodzinski to draw a parallel between Mr. Gruenberg's and the classic suite, which was composed of popular dance movements treated in serious style. However, the gigue and bouree and gavotte received a more realistic treatment at the hands of Bach than the fox-trot, one-step and waltz at the hands of Mr. Gruenberg.

Mr. Gruenberg is afraid of jazz. Like a great many muscians who have essayed to treat it seriously, he feels the need to compromise, lest his audience feel that he has mistaken the concert for the dance hall. He offers us symphonic jazz, near-jazz, one-half-of-one-percent jazz, and this is worse than none at all. Perhaps the trouble is that he does not understand and cannot handle the idiom. If so, he should not have attempted to do so; only the idiom is important in the Jazz Suite, and since Mr. Gruenberg uses it apologetically, and without skill, the result is unsatisfactory. His rhythms are confused; those of jazz have the effect, at least, of simplicity. His tunes have a self-conscious triviality and vulgarity; those of real jazzz are spontaneous and naive. His instrumentation is thick and opaque; that of jazz is notably sparing and transparent. The suite last evening was received with scant applause—insufficient to bring the composer to his feet, if he was a member of the audience.

* * *

The second novelty was less disappointing. Schoenberg has orchestrated Bach's E minor Prelude and Fugue soberly, less impressionistically than the chorale preludes "Schmucke Dich, O liebe Seele," and "Komm Gott, Schoepfer Heiliger Geist," but not less effectively. His transcription was last evening beautifully played by the Boston Orchestra—which, indeed, outdid itself throughout the evening. Mr. Koussewitsky contrived a superb performance of the Bloch rhapsody, in which Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, played the solo part, and his reading of the Haydn Symphony was vigorous, full-blooded. A large audience enjoyed the concert and applauded the conductor and the players to the echo.

* * *

A performance of "La Gioconda" was given at the Opera House last evening. Mmes Corono, Claussen, Wakefield, and Messrs. Gigli, Danise and Ludikar appeared in the principal roles, and Mr. Bellezza conducted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS JAZZ AND BACH

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced some new music to New York at Carnegie Hall last night. The newest piece was Gruenberg's Jazz Suite, arranged in four movements described as Fox-trot Tempo, Boston Waltz Tempo, Blues Tempo, Slow Drag and One-step Tempo.

It must be recorded that the Jazz Suite is neither jazz nor classical, and comes dangerously close to not being music at all. At no time does the Fox-trot movement develop a fox-trot tempo, and there is hardly a moment when the waltz is a waltz. This, in addition to the fact that there are many merry Strauss pranks easily recognized in it. The Blues Tempo also quite missed the mark, but the One-step Tempo did have lively spots which might have set one to tapping his foot in time.

JAZZ FOR JAZZ'S SAKE.

If the symphony orchestras must encroach upon the field of the Whitemans, Olsens and Lopezes, it might be suggested that some energetic and curious-minded musician make orchestral arrangements of W. C. Handy's "St. Louis Blues" and Hugo Frey's "Havanola," and a piano and orchestra arrangement of Felix [illegible]rndt's "Nola," all of which are [illegible]editable jazz pieces.

[illegible]n fairness to Mr. Gruenberg, [illegible] was in a box at the concert. [illegible]so must be chronicled that his [illegible] received more applause than [illegible]n's Symphony in D Major [illegible]& H. No. 31), which opened the [illegible]t. There was great charm [illegible]. Koussevitzky's interpreta- of the minuet movement.

BEDETTI IS SOLOIST.

[illegible]fter intermission the orchestra [illegible]ayed Bloch's "Schelomo," with [illegible]ean Bedetti playing the solo cello. Mr. Bedetti drew forth a full and grave tone from his instrument, and he was copiously applauded.

The programme ended with Schoenberg's transcription of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E Flat, which arrangement was also having its first performance in New York.

K. W.

"G[illegible]T

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Music

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

From Symphonic Jazz to Bach at the Boston Symphony Concert

Fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Symphony in D major, B. and H. No. 31 ..... Haydn
2. Jazz Suite, Op. 28 ..... Gruenberg
3. Schelomo, cello and orchestra ..... Bloch (Jean Bedetti, solo cellist)
4. Prelude and Fugue in E Flat ..... Bach-Schoenberg

THE chief contributor of news to last night's Boston Symphony concert was Mr. Louis Gruenberg—unless it was the refreshing and talismanic Mr. Koussevitzky himself.

Mr. Gruenberg, the author of the novelty on the program, was born in Russia and lives in Brooklyn — which probably makes him an American composer. At all events, he is one of our most eminent and able exponents of symphonic jazz, although he occasionally turns slightly humid eyes toward those Enchanted Isles which were once respectable resorts for the musical imagination, but are now inhabited only by the embarrassed and furtive ghosts of such discredited emigrés as Weber, Schumann, Chopin, Debussy and the like.

* * *

One thinks too well of Mr. Gruenberg to believe that his visit to that depreciated romantic haunt will be repeated (the Boston Symphony Orchestra exhibited at a recent concert here the tale of his adventure, shamelessly inscribed, "My Trip to the Enchanted Isles"). The "Jazz Suite" that we heard last night is, one imagines, more nearly an expression of the essential Gruenberg. It was completed some four years ago in Paris, and was published in 1929 by the valiant and valuable Cos Cob Press, which specializes in the fostering of American compositions whose virtues lack an immediate cash value.

* * *

This symphonic jazz of Mr. Gruenberg's, regarded as jazz, may be either good or bad; we know not what the pundits of Tin Pan Alley might think of it. We ventured, listening to the piece, to appraise it not as jazz, but as music. Thus considered, it lives its own life as organized and pleasurable sound. The thrice familiar patterns are filled with an ingenuity and richness of fancy, are ordered by a civilized musical consciousness, which makes the issue engaging and profitable for other than merely primitive minds.

Yet perhaps Mr. Gruenberg is, after all, an incurable romanticist, for one caught him in the act of glancing a bit longingly over his shoulder at the love-making of Pelleas and Melisande and the gallantries of the Rosenkavalier as he went through the motions of his Boston Waltz and his Slow Drag and his One-Step.

* * *

There was another novelty of a sort on last evening's program: a transcription by Schönberg of the E flat Prelude and Fugue ("St. Anne's") for organ, which form, respectively, the opening and closing numbers of Part III of Bach's "Clavierübung."

Schönberg has transferred to the orchestra with astonishing skill the brilliancy and power of this superb music. If the "purists" are inclined, in their gentle way, to heave bricks at his impious head, conductors and orchestral program makers will surely bless him.

* * *

The great orchestra, barring some mishaps in the Haydn Symphony, played with its accustomed surety and finesse. Mr. Gruenberg took a bow after the performance of his Suite, and Mr. Bedetti was applauded for his solo performance in the somber and passionate rhapsody of Bloch.

Louis Gruenberg

© Victor Georg

Whose new "Jazz Suite" was heard last night

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

Salome Helps Octavian Thread the Mazes of Gruenberg Jazz

Boston Symphony Orchestra Holds Forth in Carnegie Hall Once More.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Running over to New York for a fourth time this season, the Boston Symphony of great renown favored its Carnegie Hall subscribers last evening with a double dispensation of the article labelled "first performance in New York." In each case the first performance anywhere seems to have taken place in Cincinnati.

One affected a "Jazz Suite for Orchestra, op. 28," by Louis Gruenberg, of Brooklyn. The other had to do with an organ prelude in E flat major and the "St. Ann's" organ fugue in the same key, both by Bach the Father, as presented in the orchestral transcriptions of the redoubtable Arnold Schoenberg, native and resident of Vienna.

The Cincinnati performances, by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, occurred respectively in March, 1929, and in February, 1930.

In Tribute to R. Strauss.

It was odd to hear hisses for the Gruenberg piece uttered by a few overtimid or mistakenly indignant bodies. As a matter of fact, Mr. Gruenberg's "jazz," resourcefully contrived, adroit in its instrumental dress, was a highly civilized and refined affair. Methuselah's great aunt might have listened to it without a tremor. Certainly the Sacred Cod didn't bat a scale.

If nothing alarming happened musically in the course of this suite, at any rate it answered one hoary question. At last we know what must have been the "Dance of the Seven Veils!" For here bold Salome steps out and takes Octavian's hand and together they tread the measures of Mr. Gruenberg's "Boston Waltz" while Dr. Richard Strauss oblibingly leads the band.

This distinctly pretty piece, by the way, stirred the crowded house to no end of applause, beside which the hisses sounded puny indeed. Following the excellent performance led by Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Gruenberg walked forward with the conductor to help him reap the harvest of well earned plaudits.

From Bach to Bloch.

We had had previous experience of Schoenberg's transcribing of Bach. In yesterday's specimen the Viennese modernist worked the pulsatile battery into his instrumental scheme and likewise harps, which Bach never dreamed of using, though he had ample authority direct from the heaven which he never questioned. There are those who gnash their teeth at the very thought of Schoenberg, but if any of them were present yesterday they manfully held their peace.

The concert opened with a symphony in D major "with the Horn Call" by Haydn. Our cordial thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky for thus resuscitating for us one of the numerous unfamiliar symphonies of a master whose work is now enjoying a renaissance and reappraisal.

There is the suggestion of the hunt in this symphony, due to the quartet of horns employed in the scoring. And yet the exquisite and ornate adagio has nothing to do with the chase. There is important solo work for several instruments. The vigorous minuet is irresistibly captivating. For the finale Haydn offers here not his wonted rondo frolic, but a theme with seven ingenious variations.

The performance exhibited the lustrousness and unanimity of the Bostonian strings. The wind instruments, however, were appreciably less successful. In the concert's remaining number—the fine Hebrew rhapsody, "Schelomo," of Ernest Bloch—the 'cello solo was performed by Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, not by four 'cellists playing in unison, as the program warned. Doubtless the singular way is the way of wisdom, and wisdom is the only way when the speaker is Solomon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

Melodic Doings Of a Friday

THE second Pension Fund concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, with Toscanini conducting, is played at Carnegie Hall tonight... The Amy Neill String Quartet, with Amy Neill, Stella Roberts, Charlotte Polak and Lois Bichl as the personnel, play at Steinway Hall tonight...At the Metropolitan, in the matinee Wagnerian series, "Siegfried," in uncut version, is presented, and this evening "Faust" is the bill...At Brooklyn the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, is at the Acade[illegible]

PROGRAMS: (Philharmonic) Rossini, Franck, Ravel, Beethoven... (Neill) Haydn, Roberts, Wagner, Weiner...Casts: ("Siegfried") Laubenthal, Bloch, Schorr, Schutzendorf, Gustafson, Branzell, Ohms, Fleischer, Mr. Bodanzky conducting....("Faust") Moore, Trantoul, Pinza, Basiola, Wolfe, Swarthout, Mr. Hasselmans con[illegible]ng.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK SUN

67

Boston Symphony Concert

Louis Gruenberg's 'Jazz Suite' Is Included in Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is with us once more. Its fourth evening concert took place in Carnegie Hall last night. There was music of various times and characters, and the American composer had another opportunity to reveal his suppressed powers.

The second number on the list was Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite." This composition is young, having been ushered into the light of day by the Cincinnati Orchestra, under Fritz Reiner, on March 22, 1929. It is one of several attempts which have been made to demonstrate that jazz, our own most particlar product, can be treated artistically just as folk music has.

But there is something wrong somewhere. Either this is not real jazz or real art; or perhaps jazz and real art cannot be successfully married. Mr. Gruenberg's suite was worth hearing, but when it had been heard one was convinced that he had been made acquainted with an experiment and nothing more. The composer has given us a work in four sections, of which the titles are fox trot tempo, Boston waltz tempo, blues tempo, slow drag, and one-step tempo. All of these titles are strictly respected by the composer and one hears music which surely belongs to the jazz family, even if it has married a foreigner.

There is a rich harvest of dissonances in the work and there are trumpets con sordini to furnish the conventional "breaks." But nothing of the seductive wickedness of jazz was discovered. The finale, a grand smash of tone, evoked applause from an audience which up to that part of the suite had been singularly reticent. The composer accepted his honors decorously and then there was the customary exodus to smoke the thing over. There had been much more approval after the first number which was Haydn's D major symphony, No. 31, in the Breitkopf & Haertel catalogue and generally known as the symphony with the horn call.

This delightful old work, one of Haydn's most ingenuous conceptions, was so well performed that it stirred the hearers to prolonged demonstrations. The members of the orchestra who had played the charming solos and the horn quartet stood up to be applauded. This symphony is probably the first to have four horns in the score, and it might be regarded as astonishing that only two were habitually used, did we not recollect that orchestras were small and their strings easily overbalanced. Mr. Koussevitzky was obviously enamored of the symphony, and it must be added that he also did everything in the power of a conductor for the jazz invention.

The third number was Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," which is well known to local music lovers, and which is perhaps the most profoundly felt of all Mr. Bloch's works. The concert reached its finish with the E-flat organ prelude and fugue of Bach, orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg. Great musicians believe it entirely proper to arrange Bach and some of the orchestral transcriptions are splendid in effect. Mr. Schoenberg's arrangement, presented last evening, had not been heard here before. Doubtless it will be played again, since orchestral works with such foundations as those provided by Bach are very scarce in these days.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

The Woolsey Hall Series

LOCAL concert-goers may have previously accorded to an orchestra or an artist a triumph equally impressive with that given Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Wednesday evening, but never a more impressive one. The applause that broke over crowded Woolsey Hall like thunder at the end of the primitive and fascinating "Bolero" of Ravel was a fitting climax to the Woolsey Hall series which Mr. Daggett Lee has arranged this season for the Yale School of Music. The series has been a complete answer to those who fear that artistic interests may die in a mechanicalized age; and, taken in its entirety, it was a notable demonstration of the democracy of this particular art.

